But when Aeneas arrived in those parts with fifteene ships, or perhaps fewer, wherein might be imbarked, according to the rate which Thucydides allows to the Vessels then used, about one thousand & two hundred men: then Latinus finding that it would stand best with his assurance, to make alliance with the Trojan, and moved with the great reputation of Aeneas, which himselfe had heard of in the Warre of Troy, gave his Daughter to him, breaking off the former appointment with Turnus; who incensed here.

* Erethidion calls the Jacke of the heathen deus Stercoris: and hence it may be that in the Evangelist we reade of Belzebub, Bilzebul, which is interpreted Domus stercoreis: and it may bee that after that Saturne became the name of an Idol, it pleased God that in a like sense this name Stercoris should stick unto him. Aeneid. 7.

herewith, fought to avenge himselfe by warre: which was soone ended with his owne death.

Of Amata the Wife of Latinus, it is very certaine, that were she an Italian, she could not have borne a Daughter marriageable at the arrivall of Aeneas; unless he should wholly follow Suidas, and rather give the conduct of the Cetei into Italy, to Telephus the Father, than to his Son, who served in the last yeere of the Trojan Warre. But Reynolds holds her an Asiaticque, and thinkes withall, that Lavinia was borne before Telephus came into Italy. That this name Amata, by which Virgil and Halicarnassensis call her, was not proper, but rather a surname, it may seeme by Varro; who calleth her Palatina: which name very well might be derived from the Greek name Pallas. Amata, which signifies beloved, or deare, was the name by which the High Priest called every Virgin whom he tooke to serve as a Nunne of Vesta; wherefore it is the more easie to be thought a surname, howsoever Virgil discourse of her and Venilia her sister.

Lavinia, the daughter of Latinus, being given in marriage to Aeneas, the Kingdome of Latium, or the greatest part of that Countrey, was established in that race: wherein it continued until it was over-grown by the might and greatnesse of the Romans.

§. IV.

Of Aeneas, and of the Kings and Governors of Alba.

A*ENEAS* himselfe being of the Royall blood of Troy, had the command of the Dardanians: he was a valiant man, very rich, and highly honoured among the Trojans. By his wife Crensa, the daughter of Priamus, hee had a sonne called Ascanius; whose surname was Julius, having before the ruine of Troy (as Virgil notes) bin surnamed Ilus. But when Aeneas was dead, his wife Lavinia, the daughter of Latinus, being great with childe by him, and fearing the power of this Ascanius, fled into the Woods, where she was delivered of a son, called thereupon Sylvius, and surnamed Posthumus, because he was borne after his fathers Funerall. This flight of Lavinia was evil taken by the people, that Ascanius procured her returne, entreated her honourably, and using her as a Queene, did foster her young son, his halfe-brother Sylvius. Yet afterwards, whether to avoid all occasions of disagreement, or delighted with the situation of the place; Ascanius leaving to his mother in law the Citie Lavinium, which Aeneas had built and called after his new wives name, founded the Citie Alba Longa, and therein reigned. The time of his reign was, according to some, eight and twenty yeeres: Virgil gives him thirty: others five and thirty, and eight and thirty. After his decease, there arose contention betweene Sylvius, the son of Aeneas, and Julius the sonne of Ascanius, about the Kingdome: but the people inclining to the sonne of Lavinia, Julius was contented to hold the Priesthood, which he and his race enjoyed, leaving the Kingdome to Sylvius Posthumus, whose posterity were afterwards called Sylvii.

The reigne of the Alba Kings, with the continuance of each mans reigne, I find thus set downe:

The most of these Kings lived in peace, and did little or nothing worthy of remembrance.

Latinus founded many Townes in the Borders of Latium: who standing much upon the honour of their original, grew thereby to be called Prisci Latini. Of Tiberinus some thinke that the River Tiber had name, being formerly called Albulas: but Virgil gives it that denomination of another called Tibris, before the coming of Aeneas into Italy. The Mountaine Aventinus had name (as many write) from Aventinus King of the Albanes: who was buried therein: but Virgil hath it otherwise. Julius, the brother of Aventinus, is named by Eusebius as father of another Julius, & grandfather of Julius Proculus, who leaving Alba, dwelt with Romulus in Rome: Numitor, the elder son of Procas, was deprived of his Kingdome by his brother Amulius: by whom also his son Aegesthus was slaine, and Ilia his daughter made a Nunne of Vesta, that thereby the issue of Numitor might be cut off. But she conceived two sonnes, either by her Uncle Amulius, as some thinke; or by Mars, as the Poets saine; or perhaps by some man of warre. Both the children, their Uncle commanded to be drowned, and the mother buried quicke, according to the law; which so ordained, when the Vestall Virgins brake their chastitie. Whether it was so, that the mother was pardoned at the entreatie of Asius, the daughter of Amulius, or punished as the Law required (for Authors herein doe varie) it is agreed by all, that the two children were preserved, who afterward revenged the cruelty of their Uncle, with the slaughter of him and all his, and restored Numitor their grandfather to the Kingdome: wherein how long hee reigned, I find not, neither is it greatly materiall to know; for as much as the Estates of Alba and of Latium were presently eclipsed by the swift increase of Rome; upon which the computation of Time following (as far as concerns the things of Italy) is dependant. After the death of Numitor, the Kingdome of Alba ceased; for Numitor left no male issue. Romulus chose rather to live in Rome; and of the Line of Sylvius none else remained. So the Albanes were governed by Magistrates; of whom only two Dictators are mentioned, namely Caius Claudius, who in the dayes of Tullus Hostilius, King of the Romanes, making warre upon Rome, dyed in the Campe; and Metius Sufferius, the successor of Claudius, who succeeded the Estate of Alba unto the Romanes, having committed the hazzard of both Signories to the successe of three men of each side, who decided the quarrell by Combat: in which, the three brethren Horatii, the Champions of the Romanes, prevailed against the Curatii, Champions of the Albanes. After this Combat, when Metius (following Tullus Hostilius with the Albane forces against the Volscians and Fidenates) withdrew his Companies out of the battaile, hoping thereby to leave the Romanes to such an overthrow, as might make them weake enough for the Albanes to deale with; Tullus, who notwithstanding this falsehood, obtained the victory, did reward Metius with a small death, causing him to be tyed to two Chariots, and so torne in pieces. Then was Alba destroyed and the Citizens carried to Rome, where they were made free Denizens, the noble Families being made Patricians; among which were the Julii: of whom C. Julius Caesar being descended, not only gloried in his ancient, royall, and forgotten pedigree, in full assembly of the Romanes, then governed by a free Estate of the People: but by his rare industrie, valour, and judgement, obtained the Sovereignty of the Romane Empire (much by him enlarged) to himselfe and his posterity; whereby the name of Aeneas, and honour of the Trojan and Alban Race, was so revived, that seldom, if ever, any one Family hath attained to a proportionable height of glory.

§. V.

Of the beginning of Rome, and of Romulus birth and death.

OF Rome, which devoured the Alban Kingdome, I may here best shew the beginnings, which (though somewhat uncertaine) depend much upon the birth and education of Romulus, the grand-child of Numitor, the last that reigned in Alba. For how not only the bordering people, but all Nations betweene Euphrates and the Ocean, were broken in pieces by the yron teeth of this fourth Beast, it is not to be described in one place, having bene the worke of many Ages; whereof I now doe handle onely the first, as incident unto the discourse preceding. Q. Fabius Pictor, Por-

ius Cato, Calpurnius Piso, Sempronius, & others, seeke to derive the Romans from Janus; but Herodotus, Marcellus, and many others of equal credit, give the Gracians for their ancestors: & as Strabo reporteth in his fifth Booke, Cæcilius rerum Romanarum Scriptor eo argumento colligit, Romanâ Græciis esse conditam, quod Romani Græci ritu, antiquo instructo, Hercule rem sacram faciunt: matrem quoque Evandri venerantur Romani; Cæcilius (saith he) a Romane Historiographæ, doth by this argument gather, that Rome was built by the Greeks, because the Romanes, after Greekeish fashion, by ancient ordinance doe sacrifice to Hercules: the Romanes also worship the mother of Evander.

Plutarch in the life of Romulus remembreth many founders of that Citie: as Romulus the son of Ulysses and Circe; Romus the son of Emathion, whom Diomedes sent thither from Troy; or that one Romus, a Tyrant of the Latines, who drave the Tuscan out of that Country, built it. Solinus bestowes the honour of building Rome upon Evander, saying, That it was before times called Valentia. Heraclides gives the denomination to a captive Lady, brought thither by the Gracians: others say, That it was anciently called Februa, after the name of Februa, the mother of Mars; witnesse S. Augustine in his third Booke de Civitate Dei. But Livie will have it to be the worke of Romulus, even from the foundation: of whom and his consort, Juvenal to a Roman Citizen, vaunting of their originall, answered in these Verses:

Majorum quisquis primus fuit ille tuorum,
Aut pastor fuit, aut illud quod dicere nolo.*

Yet though thou fetch thy pedigree so farre;
Thy first Progenitor, who ere he were,
Some Shepherd was, or else, that Ille forbear.

meaning, either a Shepherd or a Theist.

Now of Romulus begetting, of his education and preservation, it is said, That he had Rhea for his mother, and Mars supposed to be his father, that he was nursed by a Wolfe, found and taken away by Fausfula a Shepherdes wife. The same unnatural nursing had Cyrus, the same incredible fostering had Semiramis; the one by a Bitch, the other by Birds. But, as Plutarch saith, it is like enough that Amulius came covered with armour to Rhea, the mother of Romulus, when he begat her with childe: & therein it seemeth to me that he might have two purposes; the one, to destroy her, because she was the daughter and heire of his elder brother, from whom he injuriously held the Kingdome; the other, to satisfie his appetite, because she was faire and goodly. For she being made a Nunne of the goddesse Vesta, it was death in her, by the Law, to breake her chastitie. I also find in Fauschet his Antiquitez de Gaule, that Meroëe, King of the Frances, was begotten by a Monster of the Sea: but Fauschet sayes, Let them beleieve it that list; Il le cruira qui voudra: Also of Alexander and of Scipio African, there are poetical inventions: But to answer these imaginations in generall, It is true, that in those times, when the World was full of this barbarous Idolatry, and when there were as many gods as there were Kings, or passions of the minde, or as there were of vices and vertues; then did many women greatly borne, cover such slips as they made, by protesting to be forced by more than humane power: so did Oenone confesse to Paris, that she had beene ravished by Apollo. And Anchises boasted that hee had knowne Venus. But Rhea was made with childe by some man of Warre, or other, and therefore called Mars, the god of battell, according to the sense of the time. Oenone was overcome by a strong wit, and by such a one as had those properties ascribed to Apollo. The Mother of Meroëe might fancie a Sea Captaine, to be gotten with young by such a one: as the Daughter of Inachus fancied, according to Herodotus. Aeneas was a bastard, and begotten upon some faire Harlot, called for her beautie Venus, and was therefore the childe of lust, which is Venus. Romulus was nursed by a Wolfe, which was Lupa, or Lupina; for the Curtians in those dayes were called Wolfes, Que nunc (saith Halicarnassensis) honestiori vocabulo amica appellantur; Which are now by an honest name called friends. It is also written, that Romulus was in the end of his life taken up into heaven, or rather out of the world by his father Mars, in a great storme of thunder and lightning: so was it said that Aeneas vanished away by the River Namici:

but thereof Livie also speaketh modestly; for hee rehearseth the other opinion that the storme was the furie of the Senators, but seemeth to adhere partially to this taking up; and many Authors agree, that there was an unnaturall darknesse, both at his birth and at his death; and that he might be slaine by thunder or lightning, it is not unlikely. For the Emperour Anastafius was slaine with lightning; so was Strabo the Father of Pompey slaine with a thunder-bolt: so Carnus the Emperour (who succeeded Probus) whilest hee lodged with his Army upon the River Tygris, was there slaine with lightning. But a Mars of the same Kinde might end him that began him; for he was begotten by a man of war, & by violence destroyed. And that he died by violence (which destiny followed most of the Roman Emperours) it appeareth by Tarquinius Superbus, who was the seventh King after him: who when hee had murdered his Father-in-law, commanded that hee should not be buried, for (saith hee) Romulus himselfe died and was not buried. But let Halicarnassensis end this dispute: whose words are these: They (saith hee) who drew neere to the truth, say that he was slaine by his owne Citizens; and that his cruelties in punishment of offenders, together with his arrogancie, were the cause of his slaughter. For it is reported, that between his mother was ravished, whether by some man, or by a god, the whole body of the Sonne was eclipsed, and all the earth covered with darknesse like unto night, & that the same did happen at his death.

Such were the birth and death of Romulus: whose life historified by Plutarch, doth containe (besides what is here already spoken of him) the conquest of a few miles which had soone bin forgotten, if the Roman greatnesse built upon that foundation, had not given it memory in all ages following, even unto this day. A valiant man he was, very strong of body, patient of travell, and temperate in diet, as forbearing the use of wine & delicacies; but his raging ambition he knew not how to temper, which caused him to slay his brother, & neglect to revenge the death of Tatius, his companion in the Kingdome, that he himselfe might be Lord alone in those narrow Territories. He reigned 37. yeers first alone, then with Tatius, and after his death, single, till he was slaine, as is already shewed: after which time, the Sovereignty fell into the hands of Numa, a man to him unknown, and more Priest-like than King-like: wherein Rome it selfe in her latter times hath somewhat resembled this King. For having long bin sole Governesse till Constantin shared with her: afterwards, when as the Greeke Emperour was crushed by forraigne enemies, and the Latines disployed of Imperiall power, she fell into the subjection of a Prelate, swelling by degrees from the Sheepe-hooke to the Sword, and therewith victorious to excessive magnificence, from whence by the same degrees it fell, being driven from luxurie to defensive armes; and therein having bin unfortunate, at length betakes her selfe againe to the Crozier staffe.

And thus much of Rome in this place by occasion of the storie of the times of King Abaç, during whose reigne in Jurie, the foundations of this famous Citie were laid.

CHAP. XXV.

§. I.

Of the beginning of Ezechias, and of the agreeing of Ptolomie, Nabonassar, Nabopolassar and Mardocempadus, with the historie of the Bible.

THE first yeere of Abaç his reigne was confounded with the last of his father Jotham, so was the latter end of his sixteen yeeres taken up in the three first of Ezechias his son. This appears by the Reigne of Hofsa, over Israel, which began in the twelfth of Abaç, and therefore the third thereof was concurrent with Abaç his fourteenth. But the third of Hofsa was the first of Ezechia; so it followes, that Ezechia began to reigne in his Fathers foureteenth yeere. Like enough it is, that the third yeer of Hofsa, the same being the fourteenth of Abaç, was almost spent when Ezechia began, and so for the fifteenth yeere of Ahaz may have beene concurrent, for the most part, with the first of Ezechia.

By supposing that Hosea began his Kingdome, when the twelfth yeer of Ahaz was almost compleat, some would find the meanes how to dis-joyne the first of Ezechia from the fifteenth of Ahaz, placing him yet one year later, of which yeere, Ahaz may perhaps have lived not many dayes. But seeing that the foureteenth and fifteenth yeeres of Ezechia may not be removed out of their places, it is vaine labour to alter the first yeere.

In the fourteenth yeere of Ezechia, Senacherib, invading Juda and the Countreies adjoining, lost his Armie by a miraculous stroake from Heaven, fled home, and was slaine. The yeere following it was that God added fifteene yeeres to the life of Ezechia, when hee had already reigned fourteen of his nine and twenty: and the same yeeres was that miracle sene of the Sunnes going backe; of which wonder (as I heare) one Bartholomew Scultet, who is much commended for skill in Astronomie, hath by calculation found the very day, which answered unto the twenty fift of April, in the Jubius year, being then Thursday. I have not seene any workes of Scultet; but surely to find a motion so irregular and miraculous, it is necessary that he produce some record of observation made at such a time. Howsoever it be, the fifteenth yeere of Ezechia agreed upon, and therefore we may not alter the first. As for that saying, which is usuall in like cases,

1 Chron. 28. 27. that Ahaz slept with his Fathers, & Ezechia his Sonne reigned in his stead, it doth no more prove that Ezechia reigned not with his Father, than the like saying doth inferre the like at the death of Jehosaphat, and succession of Jehoram; whereof, as concerning the beginning of the Sonne to reigne whilst his Father lived, wee have already said enough.

Of this godly King Ezechias, we find, that his very beginning testified his devotion and zeale. For whether it were so, that his unfortunate and ungracious Father (who had out-worne his reputation) gave way to his Sons proceedings, which perhaps it lay not in him to hinder; or whether (as I rather thinke) the first yeere and first moneth of his

1 Chro. 29. v. 3. reigne, wherein Ezechias opened the doores of the Temple, were to bee understood as the beginning of his sole government; wee plainly find it to have beene his first worke, that hee opened the doores of the house of the Lord, which Ahaz had shut up, cleaned the Citie and Kingdome of the Idols, restored the Priests to their offices & estates, commanded the Sacrifices to bee offered which had bin for many yeeres neglected, & brake down the brazen Serpent of Moses, because the people burnt incense before it, & hee called it Nebushtan, which signifieth alump of brasse. He did also celebrate the Pass-over with great magnificence, inviting therunto the Israelites of the ten Tribes: many there were, even out of those Tribes, that came up to Jerusalem, to this feast. But the generall multitude of Israel did laugh the Messengers of Ezechia to scorne.

It was not long ere they that scorned to solemnize the memoriall of their deliverance out of the Egyptian servitude, fell into a new servitude, out of which they never were delivered. For in the fourth of Ezechia his reigne, Salmanassar the Son of Tiglath the Son of Belochus, hearing that Hosea King of Israel had practised with Soe King of Egypt, against him, invaded Israel, besieged Samaria, and in the third yeare (after the inhabitants had endured all sorts of miseries) forced it, and carried thence the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Assyria and Media: among whom Tobias, and his Son of the same name, with Anna his Wife, were sent to Nineve; in whose Seates and Places the Assyrians sent strangers of other Nations, and among them many of the ancient Enemies of the Israelites, as those of Cutha, Assur, Hammah, and Spheraim, besides Babylonians: whose Places and Nations I have formerly described in the Treatise of the Holy Land.

These later Assyrian Kings, and the Persians, which followed them, are the first of whom wee find mention made both in Prophane and Sacred bookes. These therefore serve most aptly to joyn the times of the old World, (whereof none but the Prophets have written otherwise than fabulously) with the Ages following that were better knowne, and described in course of History. True it is, that of Cyrus and some other Persians, we find in the Bible the same names by which other Authors have recorded them: but of Phul & Salmanassar, with other Assyrian, Chaldean Kings, diversity of name hath bred question of the persons. Therefore, whereas the Scriptures doe speake of Salmanassar, King of Assur, who reigned in the time of Ahaz and Ezechia, Kings of Juda, & of Hosea King of Israel, whom hee carried into captivity: and whereas Ptolomy maketh mention of Nabonassar, speaking precisely of the time wherein he lived; it is very pertinent to shew; that Salmanassar and Nabonassar were one and the same man. The like reason also requireth, that it be shewed of Nabuchadnezzar, that he was the same, whom Ptolomy calleth Nabopolassar.

Of both these points Bucholerus hath well collected sufficient prooffe from the exact calculations of sundry good Mathematicians. For by them it appears, that betwene Nabonassar and the birth of Christ, there passed seven hundred forty and six yeeres: at which distance of time the reigne of Salmanassar was. One great prooffe hereof is this, which the same Bucholerus alledgeth out of Erasmus Reinholdus, in the Pruenick Tables. Mardocempadus King of Babylon (whom Ptolomy, speaking of three Eclipses of the Moone, which were in his time, doth mention) was the same whom the Scriptures call Merodach, who sent Embassadors to Ezechia King of Juda. So that if we reckon backward to the difference of time, betwene Merodach and Salmanassar, we shall finde it the same which is betwene Mardocempadus and Nabonassar. Likewise Funtinus doth the nineteenth of Nabuchadnezzar, we collect out of the Scriptures, the distance of one hundred thirty and three yeeres: the selfe-same distance of time is found in Ptolomy, betwene Nabonassar and Nabopolassar. For whereas Ptolomy seemes to differ from this account, making Nabonassar more ancient by an hundred and forty yeeres, than the destruction of Jerusalem, wee are to understand that he rooke Samaria in the eighth yeere of his reigne; so that the seven foregoing yeeres added to these one hundred thirty and three, make the accompts of the Scriptures fall even with that of Ptolomy. Ptolomies computation is, that from the first of Nabonassar, to the fifth of Nabopolassar, there passed one hundred twenty and seven yeeres. Now if wee adde to these one hundred twenty seven, the thirteene ensuing of Nabuchadnezzars yeeres, before the City and Temple were destroyed, wee have the summe of one hundred and forty yeeres. In so plaine a case more proofes are needlesse, though many are brought, of which this may serve for all, that Ptolomy placeth the first of Nabopolassar one hundred twenty and two yeeres, after the first of Nabonassar, which agreeth exactly with the Scriptures. To these notes are added the consent of all Mathematicians: which in accompt of times I hold more sure than the authority of any History; and therefore I thinke it folly to make doubt, whereas Historians and Mathematicall observations doe so thoroughly concur.

Yet so far as that argument of the learned Scaliger doth rest unanswered, whereby he proved Saladan the Father of Merodach, to have beene this Nabonassar; I will not spare to lose a word or two in giving the Reader satisfaction herein. It is true, that the next observations of the heavenly Bodies, which Ptolomy recorded, after the time of Nabonassar, were in the reigne of Mardocempadus; the second yeere of whose reigne, is according to Ptolomy, concurrent in part with the twenty seven of Nabonassar. For the second of three ancient Eclipses which hee calculates, being in the second yeere of Mardocempadus, was from the beginning of Nabonassar twenty seven yeeres, seventeen dayes, and eleven houres: the accompt from Nabonassar, beginning at high-noon the first day of the Egyptian Moneth Tbot, then answering to the twenty six of February; and this Eclipse being fifty minutes before mid-night, on the eighteenth day of that Moneth, when the first day thereof agreed with the nineteenth of February; so that the difference of time betwene the two Kings Nabonassar and Mardocempadus, is noted by Ptolomy, according to the Egyptian yeers. But how doth this prove, that Mardocempadus or Merodach, was the Sonne of Nabonassar? yea, how doth it prove, that he was his next Successour, or any way of his Linage? It was enough to satisfie me, in this argument, that Scaliger himselfe did afterwards beleve Mardocempadus to have beene rather the Nephew than the Sonne of Saladan, or Nabonassar. For if hee might bee either the Nephew, or the Sonne; hee might perhaps bee neither the one, nor the other. But because our Countreie-man Lidyat hath reprehended Scaliger for changing his opinion; and that both Tornielus, who follows Scaliger herein; and Sethus Calvisius, who hath drawne into forme of Chronology, that learned worke, De Emendatione Temporum, doe hold up the same assertion, confounding Saladan with Nabonassar: I have taken the paines to search, as farre as my leisure and diligence could reach, after any sentence that might prove the Kindred or Succession of these two. Yet

Ctesias and Metasthenes. I will lay the burden upon Eusebius, who lived in a more better furnished than ours, with books of this argument. Let it therefore suffice, that these two Kings (whom I have reckoned as contemporaries with Ezekiah) Medidus and Cardiceus, are found in Eusebius: for whether Cardiceus were Diadorus his Arbaces, I will not stay to search. The Kings of Media, according to Eusebius, reigned in this order.

Arbaces.	28	} years.
Sosarmus.	30
Medidus.	40
Cardiceus.	35
Diocetes.	54
Phraortes.	24
Cyaxares.	32
Astyages.	38

These names, and this course of succession I retain; but adde unto these, Cyaxares the son of Astyages, according to Xenophon; and sometimes follow Herodotus, in setting down the length of a Kings reigne, otherwise than Eusebius hath it: of which variations, I will render my reasons in due place.

The twenty nine years of Ezekiah were concurrent, in part, with the rule of the four first that were chosen Governours of Athens for ten years, that is, of Charops, Erismachus, Eldideus, and Hippones. Touching the first of these I heare nothing, save that Rome was built in his first year; of which perhaps himselfe did not heare. Of the second and third, I find only the names. The fourth made himself known by a strange example of justice, or rather of cruelty, that he shewd upon his own Daughter. For he finding that she had offended in unchastity, caused her to be lockt up with an Horse, giving to neither of them any foode: so the Horse, constrained by hunger, devoured the unhappy Woman.

In Rome, the first King, and founder of that City Romulus, did reigne both before, and somewhat after Ezekiah.

In Lydia, Candaules the last King ruled in the same age. This Region was first called Mæonia. Lydius the son of Atys reigning in it, gave the name of Lydia, if we beleve such authority as we find. This Kingdom was afterward, by the appointment of an Oracle, conferred upon Argon, who came of Aleus the son of Hercules, by Jardana, a bond-woman. The race of these Heraclides continued reigning fifty five years (in which two and twenty Generations passed) the son continually succeeding the father. Candaules the son of Myrsus was the last of his race, who doted so much upon the beauty of his owne wife, that he could not be content to enjoy her, but would needs enforce one Gyges the son of Dasyllus to behold her naked body; and placed the unwilling man secretly in her chamber, where he might see her preparing to bedward. This was not so closely carried, but that the Queen perceived Gyges at his going forth, and understanding the matter, took it in such high disdain, that she forced him the next day to requite the Kings folly with treason. So Gyges being brought again into the same chamber by the Queen, slew Candaules, and was rewarded not only with his Wife, but with the Kingdom of Lydia. He reigned thirty eight years, beginning in the last of Ezekiah, one year before the death of Romulus.

After Gyges, his son Ardys reigned nine and forty yeares; then Sadyattes twelve; Halyattes, fifty seven; and finally Cresus the son of Halyattes, fourteen yeares: who lost the Kingdom, and was taken by Cyrus of Persia.

And here by the way we may note, that as the Lydian Kings, whom Cresus his Progenitor dispossessed, are deduced from Hercules, so of the same Hercules there sprang many other Kings, which governed severall Countreys very long; as in Asia, the Mysians in Greece, the Lacedæmonians, Messenians, Rhodians, Corinthians and Argives; and from the Argives, the Macedonians, as likewise from the Corinthians, the Syracusians: besides many great and famous, though private, Families.

But of the Heraclides that reigned in Lydia, I have not troubled my self to take notice in the time of their severall reignes: for little is found of them beside the bare names, and the folly of this last King Candaules.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the Kings that reigned in Egypt, betweene the deliverance of Israel from thence, and the reigne of Ezekiah in Juda, when Egypt and Juda made a league against the Assyrians.

§. I.

That many names of Egyptian Kings, found in Historie, are like to have belonged onely to Viceroyes. An example proving this out of William of Tyre his Historie of the Holy Warre.

THe emulation and quarrels arising in these times, betweene the mightie Kingdomes of Egypt and Assyria, doe require our pains, in collecting the most memorable things in Egypt, and setting down briefly the state of that Countrey, which had continued long a flourishing Region, and was of great power, when it contended with Assyria for the Mæstrie. Of Cham the son of Noah, who first planted that Countrey, and of Osiris, Orus, and other ancient Kings, that reigned there, untill the Israelites were thence delivered, more hath bin said already than I can stand to; though I hold it no shame to faile in such conjectures. That which I have delivered, in speaking mine opinion of the Egyptian Dynasties, must here againe helpe me. For it may truly be affirmed, That the great number of Kings, which are said to have reigned in Egypt, were none other than Viceroyes or Stewards, such as Jeseph was, and such as were the Soldanes in later ages. Therefore I will not onely forbear to seeke after those, whom Herodotus and Diadorus have reckoned up, from the mouths of Egyptian Priests, delivering them by number, without rehearsing their names; but will save the labour of marshalling them in order, whose names onely are found; the yeares of their reigns, and other circumstances proving them to have bin Kings indeed, being not recorded.

But that I may not seeme before hand to lay an imaginative ground, whereupon after I may build what I list; it were not amisse, to give unto the Reader such satisfaction in this point, as apparent reason, and truth of Historie doth afford. First therefore, we ought not to beleve those numbers of Generations, which the lying Priests have reckoned up, to magnifie their Antiquities. For we know, that from Abraham our Saviour Christ was removed onely fortie two descents; which makes it evident, that in farre shorter time, namely before the Persian Empire, there could not have passed away twice as many successions in Egypt: especially considering, that many of these, whose continuance is expressed, having reigned longer than fortie yeares. It followes that we should square the number of the Egyptian Kings in some even proportion, to those which did beare rule in other Countreys. As for the rest, whose names we finde scattered here and there; any man that will take the paines to reade the nineteenth booke of the holy War, written by William Archbishop of Tyre, may easily perswade himselfe, that it is not hard to find names enow, of such as might be thought to have reigned in Egypt, being none other than Regents or Viceroyes. Yet will I here insert, as briefly as I can, some things making to that purpose for the pleasure and information of such, as will not trouble themselves with turning over many Authors.

When Elahdech the Caliph ruled in Egypt, one Dargan, a powerfull and a subtle man, made himselfe Soldan, by force and cunning, chasing away Sanar an Arabian, who was Soldan before and after him. This Dargan ministred matter of quarrel to Amalrick King of Jerusalem; and sustained, with little losse, an invasion, which Amalrick made upon Egypt. Hereupon he grew so insolent and proud, that Sanar the former Soldan hoped to make his partie good against him, if he could get any forces wherewith to enter Egypt.

Briefly,

Briefly, Sanar sueth to Noradine, King of Damasco, for aide, who sends an Armie of his Turks, under the command of Syraccon, against the Soldan Dargan. So Dargan and Sanar met, and fought: The victorie was Dargans; but he enjoyed it not: for in few dayes after, he was slaine by treason, whereby Sanar did recover his Dignitie: which to chabliſh, he slew all the kindred and friends of Dargan, that he could finde in the great Citie of Cairo.

To all these doings, the Caliph Elhadach, gave little regard: for he thought it little concerned him, which of them lived, and had the administration of the Kingdome, whilst he might have the profit of it, and enjoy his pleasure. But new troubles presently arise, which (one would thinke) do neerly touch the Caliph himselfe. Syraccon with his Turkes, to whom Sanar had gotten to come into Egypt, will not now be intreated there to leave him, and quietly go their way home. They seize upon the Town of Belbeis, which they fortifie, and there attend the arrivall of more companie from Damasco, for the conquest of all Egypt. The Soldan perceives their intent, and findes himselfe not strong enough to expell them, much lesse to repell the Turkish Armie, whom with large promises, he gets to bring him aide, and so drives out the Turkes. Of all this trouble the great Caliph heares nothing, or not so much as should make him looke to the playing of his owngame.

A greater mischief ariseth, concerning the Caliph Elhadach particularly in his owne Title. Syraccon, Captaine of the Turkes that had been in Egypt, goes to the Caliph of Baldach (who was opposit to him of Egypt, each of them claiming as heire to Malom that false Prophet, the Sovereignie over all that were of the Saracen Law) and tels him the weakenesse of the Egyptian, with his owne abilitie of doing service in those parts, offering his best means for the extirpation of the Schismaticall Caliph, and the reduction of all Egypt, with the Western parts, under the subjection of the Babylonian. This motion is readily and joyfully entertained; all the Eastern Provinces are up in Armes, and Syraccon, with a mightie power, descendeth into Egypt. The noyse of this great expedition so affrighteth King Almaricke, that with all his forces he hasteth into Egypt: well knowing how nearely it concerned him and his Kingdome of Jerusalem, to keepe the Saracens from joyning all under one head. Sanar the Soldan perceiving the faithful care of the Christians his friends, welcomes them, and bestirs himselfe in giving them all manner of content, as it behoved him: for by their admirable valour, he finally drawes the enemies out of the Countrey. But this victorie was not so soone gotten, as it is quickly told.

Strange it is (which most concerns our present purpose) that of so desperate a danger, the Caliph, as yet, seemes to know nothing. May we not thinke him to have been King in title, onely, who meddled so little in the Government? The Soldan, finding that the Christians (without whose helpe all was lost) could not well stay so long as his necessities required: makes large offers to King Almaricke, upon condition that he should abide by it. He promiseth a great Tribute (William of Tyre calls it a Tribute; the Saracens, per-haps, called it a Pension) which the Kings of Jerusalem should receive out of Egypt, for this behovefull assistance. But the Christians understanding that the Soldan (how much soever heooke upon him) was subject to a higher Lord, would make no bargain of such importance with any other than the Caliph himselfe. Hereupon Hugh Earle of Caesarea, and a Knight of the Templers, are sent unto Elhadach to ratifie the covenants. Now shall we see the greatnesse of the Caliph and his estate.

These Embassadours were conveyed by the Soldan to Cairo, where arriving at the Palace, they found it guarded by great troupes of Souldiers. The first entrance was through dark Porches, that were kept by many armed bands of Ethiopiens, which with all diligence, did reverence to the Soldan as he passed along. Through these streights the Warders led them, into goodly open Courts, of such beaurie and riches, that they could not retaine the gravitie of Embassadours, but were enforced to admire the things which detained their eyes. For there they saw goodly Marble Pillars, gilded Beames, all wrought over with embossed workes, curious pavements, fith-ponds of marble with cleare waters, and many sorts of strange birds, unknown in those parts of the World, as comming perhaps from the East Indies, which then was undiscovered. The further they went, the greater was the magnificence; for the Caliph his Eunuches conveyed them into other Courts within these, as far excelling the former, as the former did surpasspe ordinarie houses. It were tedious perhaps to rehearse how the further they entered, the more high state they found, and cause of marvaile; suffice it, that the good Archbishop, who wrote these things, was never held a vaine Author. Finally they were brought into the Caliph owne lodgings, which were yet more stately and better guarded; where entering the Prefence, the Soldan having twice prostrated himselfe, did the third time cast off his Sword that he wore about his necke, and throw himselfe on the ground before the curtaine, behinde which the Caliph sat. Presently the traverse wrought with Gold and Pearles was opened, and the Caliph himselfe discovered, sitting with great majesty on a throne of gold, having few of his most inward servants and Eunuches about him. When the Soldan had humbly kissed his Masters feet, he briefly told the cause of his comming, the danger wherein the land stood, and the offers that he had made unto King Almaricke, desiring the Caliph himselfe to ratifie them in presence of the Embassadors. The Caliph answered, That he would throughly perform all which was promised. But this contented not the Embassadors: They would have him to give his hand upon the bargain; which the Egyptians that stood by thought an impudent request. Yet his greatnesse condescended at length, after much deliberation at the earnest request of the Soldan, to reach out his hand. When the Earle of Caesaria saw that the Caliph gave his hand neither willingly nor bare, he told him roundly thus much in effect: Sir, Truth seekes no holes to hide it selfe; Princes that will hold covenant, must deale openly, nakedly and sincerely; Give us therefore your bare hand, if you meane that we shall trust you, for we will make no bargain with your Glove. Much adoe there was about this: for it seemed against the Majesty of such a Prince to yeeld so far. But when it would none otherwise be, with a smiling chaire (though to the great griefe of his Servants) hee vouchsafed to let the Earle take him by the bare hand; and so rehearsing the covenants word by word, as the Earle spake them, he ratified all; dismissing finally the Embassadors with such rewards as testified his greatnesse.

In this Caliph and his Sultan, we may discern the Image of the ancient Pharaoh, and his Viceroy: we see a Prince of great estate, sitting in his Palace, and not vexing himselfe with the great preparations made against him, which terrifie his neighbour Countries: we see his Viceroy, in the meane season, using all Royall power; making war and peace; entreinaining and repelling Armies of strangers; yea, making the Land of Egypt tributary to a forraign Prince. What greater authority was given to Joseph, when Pharaoh said unto him, Thou shalt be over mine house, and as thy word shall all my people be armed, only in the Kingdome will I be above thee. Behold I have set thee over all the Land of Egypt?

I doe not commend this forme of Government; neither can I approve the conjecture of mine Author, where he thinks, that the Egyptians, ever since Josephs time, have felt the burden of that servitude which he brought upon them, when he bought them and their Lands for Pharaoh. Herein I finde his judgement good; that he affirms this manner of the Egyptian Kings, in taking their ease, and ruling by a Viceroy, to be part of the ancient customes practised by the Pharaohs. For we find, that even the Ptolomies (excepting Ptolomaeus Lagi, and his son Philadelphus, founder and etablissher of that race) were given, all of them wholly to please their owne appetites, leaving the charge of the Kingdome to Women, Eunuches, and other ministers of their desires. The pleasures which that Countrey afforded, were indeed sufficient to invite the Kings thereof unto a voluptuous life; and the awfull regard wherein the Egyptians held their Princes, gave them security, whereby they might the better trust their Officers with so ample commission. But of this matter, I will not stand longer to dispute. It is enough to have shewed, that the great and almost absolute power of the Viceroyes governing Egypt, is set down by Moses, and that a lively example of the same is found in William of Tyre, who lived in the same age; was in few yeares after Chancellour of the Kingdome of Jerusalem; and had full discourse with Hugh Earle of Caesaria touching all these matters. Wherefore it remains, that we be not carried away with a vaine opinion, to beleieve that all they were Kings, whom reports of the fabulous Egyptians have honoured with that stile; but rest contented with a Catalogue of such, as we find by circumstance, likely to have reigned in that Countrey; after whom it follows that we should make inquiry.

of Acherres; whether he were Uchoreus that was the eighth from Osymandyas. of Osymandyas and his Tombe.

IN this businesse I hold it vaine to be to curious. For who can hope to attaine to the perfect knowledge of the truth, when as Diodorus varies from Herodotus, Eusebius from both of them; and late Writers that have fought to gather the truth out of these and others, finde no one with whom they can agree? In this case Ammius would doe good service, if a man could trust him. But it is enough to be beholding to him, when others doe either say nothing, or that which may justly be suspected. I will therefore hold my selfe contented with the pleasure that he hath done me, in saying somewhat of Osiris, Isis, Orus, and those antiquities removed so farre out of sight: as for the Kings following the departure of Israel out of Egypt, it shall suffice that Herodotus, Diodorus, and Eusebius have not bene silent, and that Reineccius hath taken paines to range into some good order the names that are extant in these, or else found scattering in others.

From the departure of Israel out of Egypt, unto the reigne of Thuaris (who is generally taken to be the same that the Greeks call Protemus) there is little or no disagreement about the Egyptian Kings. Wherefore I set downe the same which are found in Eusebius, and give to every one the same length of reigne.

Acherres was the first of these, who succeeded unto Chenres, that perished in the Red Sea. This King seemes to Reineccius to be the same whom Diodorus calls Uchoreus, the founder of Memphis. But whereas mention is found in Diodorus of a great King, named Osymandyas, from whom Uchoreus is said to be the eighth; it will either hardly follow, that Timaeus (as Reineccius conjectures) was the great Osymandyas; or else that this Acherres was Uchoreus: for the distance between them was more than eight generations. Mercator judgeth Osymandyas to have bin the husband of Ancheres, Orus the seconds daughter; thinking that Manethon (cited by Iosephus) doth omit his name, and insert its wives into the Catalogue of Kings, because he was King in his wives right. As for Uchoreus, it troubles not Mercator to find him the eighth from this man: for he takes Ogdos, or to signifie in this place of Diodore (as that Greek word else doth) the eighth, but to be an Egyptian name, belonging also to Uchoreus, who might have had two names, as many of the rest had. I will not vex my braines in the unprofitable search of this, and the like inextricable doubts. All that Diodore hath found of this Osymandyas, was wrought upon his monument; the most thereof in figures, which I think the Egyptians did fabulously expound. For whereas there was portrayed a great Army with the siege of a Town, the captivity of the people, and the triumph of the Conqueror; all this, the Egyptians said to denote the conquest of Bactria made by that King: which how likely it was, let others judge. I hold this goodly piece of worke, which Diodore so particularly describes to have bene erected for a common place of buriall to the ancient Kings and Queens of Egypt, and to their Viceroyes; whilst yet they were not so ambitious, as every one to have his owne particular monument, striving therein to exceed all others. This appeares by the many statues therein placed, by the Wars, the judgement seats, the receiving of Tribute, the offering sacrifice to God, the account of revenues, and plenty of all carrell and food; all which were there curiously wrought, shewing the severall Offices of a Governour. On the Tombe of Osymandyas was this inscription. I am Osymandyas King of Kings; If any desire to know what I am, or where I lye, let him exceed some of my workes. Let them that hope to exceed his workes, labour to know what he was. But since by those words, Or where I lye, it should seem that he lay not there interred, we may lawfully suspect that it was Ioseph, whose body was preserved among the Hebrewes, to be buried in the land of Canaan, and this empty Monument might King Orus, who outlived him, erect in honor of his high deserts, among the royal sepulchres. To which purpose the plenty of Cattell, and all manner of viands, had good reference. The name of Osymandyas doth not hinder this conjecture; seeing Ioseph had one new name given to him by Pharaoh, for expounding the dream, and might, upon further occasions, have another, to his increase of honour. As for that stile, King of Kings, it was perhaps no more than Beglerbeg, as the Turkish Bassas are called, that is, Great above the Great.

Now

Now although it be so, that the reckoning falls out right, between the times of Ioseph and Acherres (for Acherres was the eight in order, that reigned after the great Orus, whose Viceroy Ioseph was) yet will I hereby seeke, neither to fortifie mine own conjecture, as well be, that Memphis was built by some such King as was Gebur, Lieutenant unto the Caliph Elcain; who having to his Masters use conquered Egypt, and many other Countreies, did build, not far from old Memphis, the great Citie of Cairo (corruptly so pronounced) naming it Elcabin, that is, an enforcing, or an imperious Mistress, though he himselfe were a Dalmatian slave.

§. III.

of Cherres, Armeus, Ramesses, and Amenophis. Of Myris, and the Lake that beares his name.

WHEN Acherres had reigned eight years, Cherres succeeded and held the kingdom fifteen years: then reigned Armeus five years, and after him Ramesses, threecore and eight. Of Armeus and Ramesses is that Historie understood by Eusebius, which is common among the Greeks, under the names of Danaus and Aegyptus. For it is said that Danaus, being expelled out of Egypt by his brother, fled into Greece: where he obtained the Kingdom of Argos: that he had fiftie Daughters, whom upon seeming reconciliation, he gave in marriage to his brothers fiftie sons, but commanded every one of them to kill her husband the first night; that onely Hypermetra, one of his Daughters, did save her husband Lyncus, and suffered him to escape; finally, That for this fact, all the bloudie sisters, when they dyed, were enjoined this foolish punishment in Hell, to fill a leaking vessell with water.

The reigne of Danaus in Argos was indeed in this age; but that Armeus was Danaus, and Ramesses, Egyptus; is more than Reineccius beleeves: he rather takes Armeus to have bin Myris, or Meris, who causeth the great lake to be made which beares his name. For my own part, as I can easily beleeve, that he which fled out of Egypt into Greece, was a man of such quality as the Soldan Sanar, of whom we spake before; so doe I not find how in so short a reigne, as five years, a worke of that labour could be finished, which was required unto the Lake of Myris, and the Monuments therein; whereof his own Sepulchre and his wives being some part, it is manifest that he was not buried in Argos. Wherefore of Myris, and of all other Kings, whose age is uncertaine, and of whose reignes we have no assurance, I may truly say, that their great works are not enough to prove them of the house of Pharaoh, seeing that greater deeds or more absolute, than were those of Ioseph, who bought all the people of Egypt as bondmen, and all their land for bread; of Gebur, who founded Cairo; and of Sanar, who made the Countrey Tributarie; were performed by none of them.

It shall therefore be enough to set downe the length of their reignes whom we finde to have followed one another in order of succession: but in rehearsing the great acts which were performed, I will not stand to examine, whether they that did them were kings or no.

The Lake of Myris, is, by the report of Diodore and Herodotus, three thousand six hundred furlongs in compass, and fiftie fadomes deep. It served to receive the waters of Nile, when the over-flow, being too great, was harmful to the Countrey: and to supply the defect, by letting out the waters of the lake, when the river did not rise high enough. In opening the flues of this lake, for the letting in or out of waters, were spent fiftie talents; but the Lake it selfe fraied that cost; seeing the tribute imposed upon fish taken therein was every day one talent, which Myris gave to his Wife to buy sweet oynments, and other ornaments for her bodie. In the midst of it was left an Island, wherein were the Sepulchres of Myris and his Wife, and over each of them a Pyramis, that was a furlong, or (according to Herodotus) fiftie paces high; having on the tops their statues, sitting in Thrones. I find not the description of this Lake in Maps, answerable to the report of Herodotus; yet it is very great. The years of Armeus are by Manethon divided, by inserting one Armfis (whom Eusebius omits) that should have reigned one year and odde moneths of the time: but I hold not this difference worthe of examination.

After

After Rameses, his son Amenophis held the Kingdome fortie years. Some give him onely nineteene yeares; and Mercaur thinks him to have been the King that was drowned in the Red Sea: whereof I have already spoken in the first Booke.

§. IV.

Of the Kings that reigned in the Dynastie of the Larties.

Sethosis, or Zethus, reigned after his Father Amenophis, fiftie five yeares. To him are ascribed the famous acts of that ancient Sesoftris. But the state of the world was not such at these times, that so great an expedition as the old Sesoftris made, could have been either easily performed, or forgotten in the Countries through which he passed, had it now been performed; as any man will perceive, if he looke upon my Chronologicall Table, and consider who lived with this Zethus. With this King began the Dynastie of the Larties; which Reimocius conjectures to have had the same signification, wherein the old Kings of Hetruria, were called Lartes, (the Hetrurians being issued out of Lydia, the Lydians out of Egypt) and to have signified as much as Imperator, or General. The wars in which these Kings were Generals, I take to have been against the Aethiopians: for sure I am, that they troubled not the Countrey of Palastina, that lay next unto them on the one hand; nor is it likely that they travelled over the desert lands, on the other hand; to seek matter of conquest, in the poore Countreys of Africa. But these Generals (if the Larties were such) were not many. Five only had that title; and the last of these took it, perhaps, as hereditarie from the first; in such sort as the Romane Emperours were proud, for a while, to be called Antonini, till the most unfavourable conditions of Helioabalus, made his successors forbear the name.

Here it may be objected, that the Dynasties (as appears by this particular) took name from the Kings; that the Kings also did administer the government themselves, and that therefore I am deceived in ascribing so much unto the Viceroyes. But it is to be considered, that what is said of these Larties, depends only upon conjecture, and that the authority of the Regents, or Viceroyes, might be great enough, though some few Kings took the conduct of Armies into their owne hands. For so we finde in John Leo, that the Soldan of Egypt (after such time as the Soldan Saladine, murdering the Caliph, got the Sovereignty to himselfe) had under him a Viceroy, styled Eddagadare, who had authority to place, or displace, any Magistrates, or Officers; and that this mans Familie was almost as great, as the Soldans owne. Yet was there also the Amir Cabir, or Lord Generall of the Soldans forces, who had the charge of defending the Land, and might, as he thought good, spend of the Soldans treasure. So might the office of the Viceroyes continue, though the Kings themselves, taking the charge, or title of Generals upon them, did somewhat abridge the greatnesse of that second place. As for the names of the Dynasties, it skills not whence they were drawn; whether from their Countrey, as those of the Thebans and Diopolitans; or from some eminent men, or man, who ruled in that time; as many think, that the seventeenth Dynastie was called of the Shepherds, because Joseph governed in part thereof; or from the Kings themselves that reigned; as this was said to be of the Larties or Generals. The next, as Manetho (but Annius his Manetho) hath it, was without any Larties or Generals, yet was it not without Kings, forasmuch as Vaphres, and Sesac, reigned therein, if many others did not. But let us now return to the business which we left.

Rameses was King after Zethus, or Sethosis, threescore and sixe yeares. He is mistaken for that second Sesoftris, of whom I have spoken in the first Booke. I find nothing worth rehearfall of this Rameses, or of Amenophis and Annemenes, that followed him in order, the former of which reigned fortie, the latter sixe and twentie yeares. Wherefore it may very well be, that the name which Zethus had from valour, was taken by these as hereditarie.

Thuris, the last of the Larties, reigned only seven yeares; yet is he thought to have bin that Proteus, of whom Herodotus hath mention, saying, That he took Helena from Paris, and after the sack of Troy, restored her to Menelaus. I need say no more in refutation of this, than that the time of Thuris his reign lasted not so long as from the Rape of Helena to her restitution.

This Proteus or Cetes (as he is named by some) together with Thon, and others, mentioned by Greek Writers in this business, or in other such matters, may seeme to be under-Officers: for such only are like to have had their residence about Pharos, and the sea-coast where Menelaus arrived.

Of Proteus, who detained Helena, it is said that he could foretell things to come, and that he could change himselfe into all shapes: whereby is signified his crafty head, for which he is grown into a Proverb. The Poets fained him a Sea-God, and keeper of Nephtes Scale-fishes, for belike he was some under-Officer to the Admirall, having charge of the Fishing about the Isle of Pharos, as was said before.

Amphus the Son of Proteus, is reckoned the next King, by Diadore, as also by Herodotus, who calls him Ramsinitus, and tells a long tale fit to please children, of his covetousnesse, and how his treasure-house was robbed by a cunning thief, that at last married his Daughter. But of this a man may believe what he list. How long this King reigned I know not, nor think that either he or his father did reigne at all.

§. V.

Of the Egyptian Kings, whose names are found scattering in sundry Authors, their times being not recorded. The Kings of Egypt, according to Cedrenus, of Vaphres and Sesac.

MAny other names of Egyptian Kings, are found scattered here and there; as Tonapher Jobis, of whom Suidas delivers onely the bare name and title; Senemures, mentioned in Macrobius, who perhaps was the same that by Suidas is called Symes, or Euenes, noted by occasion of a great Physician that lived under him; Banchyris, recorded by the same Suidas for his great justice; and Thulis, of whom Suidas tells great matters; as, that his Empire extended to the Ocean Sea; that he gave name to the Isle of Thule, which some take to be Iseland; and that he consulted with the Divell, or (which is all one) with Seraphis, desiring to know, who before him had bene, or after him should be so mighty as himselfe. The answer or confession of the Divell was remarkable; which I find Englished in the translation of Plinius his work, Of the trueesse of Christian Religion. The Greek Verses are somewhat otherwise, and much more imperfect in those Copies that I have of Cedrenus and Suidas, but the sense is all one; which is this:

First God, and next The Word, and then The Spirit,
Which three be One, and joyne in One all three:
Whose force is endlesse. Get thee hence fraile wight,
The man of Life unknowne excelleth thee.

I should have thought that Suidas had borrowed all this of Cedrenus, had I not found somewhat more in Suidas than Cedrenus hath hereof; as the forme of invocation which Thulis used, and that clause of his giving name to the Iland: though in this last point I hold Suidas to be deceived; as also Cedrenus is, or (at least) seems to me, in giving to this King such profound antiquity of reigne. Indeed the very name of that booke, cited often by Cedrenus, which he calls Little Genesis, is alone enough to breed suspicion of some imposture: but the Frierly stuffe that he alledgeeth out of it, is such as would serve to discredit himselfe, were it not otherwise apparent that he was a man both devout and of good judgement in matters that fell within his compasse. I will here let downe the List of old Egyptian Kings delivered by him, and leave the censure to others.

The first King of Egypt that he sets downe, is Mizraim the sonne of Cham. After him he finds many of a new race, deriving their pedigree thus: Nimrod the sonne of Chus was also called Orion, and further took upon him the name of the Planet Saturne, had to wife Semiramis, who was of his owne Linage, and by her three sons; Picus, surnamed Jupiter, Belus and Ninus. Picus chafing his father out of Affrica into Italie, reigned in his stead thirtie yeares, and then gave up that Kingdome to Juno his sister and wife, and to Belus his son: after which Belus, who reigned onely two yeares, Ninus had the Kingdome, and married his owne Mother Semiramis. But Picus went into Italie to visit his old Father Saturne; Saturne forth-with resigned the Kingdome unto him. Picus Jupiter reigned in Italie threescore and two yeares, had threescore and twene Wives or Concubines, and about as many children: finally dyed, and lyes buried in the Isle of Crete.

The

The Principall of Jupiters sons were Faunus, Perseus, and Apollo. Faunus was called by the name of the Planet Mercurie: he reigned in Italie, after his Father, five and thirty years: and then (finding that all his brethren confired against him) he went to Egypt, with abundance of Treasure; where, after the death of Misraim, he got the Kingdom, and held it nine and thirty years. After Mercury, Vulcan reigned in Egypt, a foure yeares and a halfe. Then Sol, the sonne of Vulcan, reigned twenty yeares and a halfe. There followed in order Solis, Ofiris, Orus and Thules, of whom we spake before: the length of their severall reignes is not set downe. After Thules, was the great Sesir, King twenty yeares. His successor was Pharaob, called Narecho, that held the Crowne fifty yeares, with which there passed from him the surname of Pharaob, to a very long posteritie.

These reports of Cedrenus I hold it enough to set downe as I find them : let their credit rest upon the Author.

Others yet we find, that are said to have reigned in Egypt, without any certaine note, when, or how long: about whom I will not labour, as fearing more to be reprehended of vaine curiosities, in the search made after these already rehearsed, than of negligence, in omitting such as might have been added.

in omitting such as might have been added. Vaphres, the father in law to Salomon, and Sejac, the afflicter of Rehoboam, lead us again into fairy way, but not farre. The name of Vaphres is not found in the Scriptures; but we are beholding to Clemens Alexandrinus and Eusebius for it. These give us not the length of his reign; but we know that he lived in the times of David and of Salomon. He came into Palestina with an Armie, took Gezar from the Canaanites, and gave it to his daughter, Salomon's wife: though for her sake perhaps it was, that in time following either he, or (as I rather take it) Sejac his son did favour the enemies of Salomon, who kept so many Wives and Concubines, besides this Egyptian Princeffe. In the life of Rehoboam all hath bin written that I find of Sejac, excepting the length of his reign, which must have bin fixe and twenty years, if he were that Smendis with whom Eusebius begins the one and twentieth Dynastie.

twentieth Dynasty.

Now forasmuch as it would serve to no great purpose, that wee knew the length of Sefac his reigne, and of theirs that followed him, unlesse therewithall we knew the beginning of Sefac, unto which the rest have dependance; this course I take. From the fourth year of Jeboakim king of Juda, in which Pharao Neco was slain, I reckon upwards the yeares of the fame Neco, and of his Predecessors, unto the beginning of Sefac: by which account, the first year of Sefac is found concurrent with the twentieth of Salomons reigne, and the twenty six of Sefac with the fifth of Roboam: wherein Sefac spoyled the Temple, and dyed, enjoying the fruits of his Sacrilege no longer than Joss the Israhelite, and Craffus the Romane did; who after him spoyled the Temple of Jerusalem.

And thus much of Sefac and of those that followed him. I have rather taken their kings that I find

To fill up the time between Sefse and Neco, I have rather than those things that I find in the Greeke Historians, than them which are in Eusebius his Catalogue. For of those that are delivered by Eusebius, we find no Name nor Act recorded elsewhere, save only that of Baalhoris, who is remembered by Diodore, Plutarch, and others, much being spoken of him, that makes him appear to have been a King. Hereunto I may add, that the succession is often interrupted in Eusebius by *Ethiopi*ans, which got the kingdom often, and held it long: whereas contrariwise it appears by the Prophet Esaie, that the Counsellors of Pharash did vaunt of the long and flourishing continuance of that house, inasmuch as they said of Pharash, I am the sonne of the wife, I am the sonne of the ancient King. But that which overthrowes the reckoning of Eusebius, is the good agreement of it with his mistaken times of the Kings of Juda. For though it please him well to see how the reigns of Josias and Neco meet by his computation, yet this indeed marres all; the reign of Josias being misplaced. This error growes from his omitting to compare the reignes of the Kings of Juda with theirs of Israel: by which occasion Joram King of Israel, is made to reign three yeares after Ahab of Juda; Samaris is taken by Salmanassar before Hezekias was King: and in a word, all most of the Kings have their beginnings placed in some other yeare, of their collateralas than the Scriptures have determined.

§. VI.

of Chemmis, Cheops, Cephrenes, and other Kings recited by Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, which reigned betwene the times of Rehoboam and Ezechia.

Following therefore the Greeke Historians, I place Chemmis, or (according to Diodore) Chemis, first in the ranke of those that were Kings after Sesac. Hee reigned fiftie yeares, and built the greatest of the three Pyramides, which was accounted one of this worlds Wonders. The Pyramis hath his name from the shape, in that it resembleth a flame of fire, growing from the bottome upwards narrower and narrower to the top. This of Chemmis being foure-square, had a Base of seven acres every way, and was about sixe acres high. It was of a very hard and durable stone, which had lasted, when Diodore saw it, about a thousand yeares, without complaining of any injurie that it had suffered by weather in so long space. From the reigne of Chemmis, unto the age of Augustus Cæsar, wherein Diodore lived, are indeed a thousand yeares, which doth give the better likelihood unto this time wherein Chemmis is placed. As for this and other Pyramides, late Writers doe testifie, that they have seene them yet standing.

After Chemmis, Diodore placeth Cephrenes his brother ; but doubtfully, and inclining rather to the opinion, that his son Chabrens succeeded. Herodotus hath Cheops (who might be Chabrens) and Cephrenes after him. These are said to have been brethren ; but the length of their reignes may argue the latter to have been sonne to the former : for Cheops reigned fifty yeares ; Cephrenes fifty fixe. These were, as Chemmis had bene, builders of Pyramides, whereby they purchas'd great hatred of their people, who already had over-laboured themselves in erecting the first. These Pyramides were ordained to be Tombs for those that raised them ; but the malice of the Egyptians is said to have cast out their bodies, & to have called their Monuments by the name of an Heards-man, that kept his Beasts thereabouts. It may be, that the robbing them of their honour, and entitling a poore fellow to their works, was held to be the casting out of their bodies ; otherwise it is hard to conceive how it might be, that they, who had not power to avoid the like slavery laid upon them by the younger brother or sonne, should have power or leisure to take such revenge upon his Predecessor. To the like malice may be ascribed the tale devised against Cheops his Daughter ; That her Father wanting money, did prostitute her, & that the getting of every man that accompanied her, one stone, did build with them a fourth Pyramid, that stood in the midst of the other three. Belike she was an insolent Lady, and made them follow their drudgery for her sake, longer a while than they thought to have done, in raising a Monument with the superfluity of her Fathers provisions.

Myserinus the son of Cephrens reigned after his Father sixe yeares. He would have built his fore-goers did, but prevented by death, finished not what he had begun. The people thought him a good King, for that he did set open the Temples which Cheops and Cephrens had kept shut. But an Oracle threatned him with a short life of sixe yeares only, because of this his devotion; For (said the Oracle) Egypt should have bene afflicted an hundred and fiftie yeares, which thy Predecessors knew, and performed for their parts; but thou hast released it, therefore shalt thou live but sixe yeares. It is very strange, that the gods should be offended with a King for his piety; or that they should decree to make a Countrey impious, when the people were desirous to serve them; or that they having so decreed, it should lye in the power of a King to alter destinie, and make the ordinance of the gods to faile in taking full effect. But these were Egyptian gods. The true God was doubtlesse more offended with the institution of such Idolatry, than with the interruption. And who knows whether Chemmis did not learne somewhat at Jerusalem in the last yeare of his Father Sesac, that made him perceive, and deliver to those that followed him, the vanity of his Egyptian superstition? Most true it is, that his reigne, and the reignes of Cheops and Cephrens were more long and more happy than that of Myserinus, who, to delude the Oracle, revelled away both dayes and nights, as if by keeping candles lighted, he had changed his nights into dayes, and so doubled the time appointed: a service more pleasing to the Divell, than the restitution of Idolatry durst then seeme, when it could speed no better. I finde in Rarnecius fiftie years assigned to this King; which I verily believe to have bin some error of the print, though I find it not corrected among other such oversights: For I know no Author that gives him so many years, and Reimicus himselfe takes notice of the Oracle, that threatened Myserinus with a short life, as is before shewed.

Bocchorus is placed next unto Myserinus, by Diodore, who speaks no more of him than this, that he was a strong man of body, & excelling his predecessors in wit. He is spoken of by Suidas Authors, as one that loved justice; and may be taken for that Banchyrin whom Diodorus commends in that kinde: Eusebius reckons 44. years of his reigne.

After Bocchorus, one Sabacus an Ethiopian follows in the Catalogue of Diodore; but certaine ages after him. Herodotus quite omitting Bocchorus, hath Afyshis; who made a law in sharpe law (as it was then held) against bad debtors, that their dead bodies should be in the creditors disposition, till the debt were paid. This Afyshis made a Pyramid of brick, more costly and faire, in his owne judgement, than any of those that the former Kings had raised. Besides this Afyshis, Herodotus placeth one Anysis, a blind man, before the Ethiopian. The reignes of these two are perhaps those many ages which the Egyptians, to magnifie their antiquities, accounted between Bocchorus and him that followed them. But all this could make but fixe years; and so long doth Funimis, so long doth Reimicus hold, that these two Kings between them both did govern. If any man would lengthen this time, holding it improbable that the reignes of two Kings should have bin so soone spent; he may do it by taking some yeares from Setson or Psammiticus, and so adding them to either of these. To adde unto these without subtracting from some other, would breed a manifest inconvenience: forasmuch as part of Sesac his reigne, must have beene in the fifth of Rehoboam, as also the last of Pharao Neco was the fourth of Jehoiakim, and the first of Nebuchadnezzar. For mine owne part, I like it better to allow fixe years only to these two Kings, than to lose the witnesse of Herodotus, who concurring herein with the Scriptures, doth speak of Sennacheribs war: at which time Setson was King of Egypt. I will not therefore adde years unto these obscure names; for by adding unto these men three years, we shall thrust the beginning of Setson out of place, and make it later than the death of Sennacherib. In regard of this agreement of Herodotus with the Scriptures, I am the more willing to hold with him in his Egyptian Kings. Otherwise, if it were a matter of no great envie to leave both Afyshis and Anysis out of the roll; which were easily done, by placing Sesac lower, and extending his life yet fixe years further, or more (if the like abridgement shall be required of Psammiticus his reigne) into the years of Rehoboam.

Of Sabacus the Ethiopian, who took the Kingdome from Anysis, it is agreed by the most, that he reigned fiftie years. He was a mercifull Prince, not punishing all capitall offences with death, but imposing bondage and bodily labour upon malefactors; by whose toile he both got much wealth into his owne hands, letting out their service to hire, and performed many works of more use than pompe, to the singular benefit of the Country. Zonaras calls this King Sas; the Scriptures call him So, Hofea, the last King of Israel, made a league with him against Salmanassar, little to his good: for the Egyptians was more rich than warlike, and therefore his friendship could not preserve the Israelites from destruction.

It seemes, that the encroaching power of the Affryan grew terrible to Egypt about these times; the victories of Tiglath Phulassar and Salmanassar having eaten so farre into Syria, in the reigne of this one King So or Sabacus. Yea, perhaps it was in his daies (for his reigne began in the fourth of Menabem) that Phul himselfe did make the first entrance into Palestina. This caused So to animate the halfe subdued people against their Conquerors; but the helpe which he and his Successor gave them was so faint, that Sennacheribs Embassador compared the Egyptian succour to a broken staffe of Reed. Thus supported by the strong staffe of him that ruleth all Nations with a rodde of yron. It appeareth by the words of Isaiah, that the opinion was great in Juda, of the Egyptian forces, for Chariots and Horse-men; but this power, whatsoever it was, grew needfull, within a little while, for the defence of Egypt it selfe, which So left unto Setson his Successor, having now fulfilled the fifty years of his reigne. Herodotus and Diodorus have both one tale, from the relation of Egyptian Priests, concerning the departure of this King; saying, that he left the Country, and willingly retired into Ethiopia, because because it was often signified unto him in his dreames, by the god which was worshipped at Thebes, that his reigne should be neither long nor prosperous, unless he slew all the Priests in Egypt; which rather than to do, he reigned his Kingdome. Surely, these Egyptian gods were of a strange quality, that so ill rewarded their servants, and invited Kings to doe them wrong. Well might the Egyptians (as they likewise did) worship Dogs as gods, when their chiefe gods had the property of Dogs, which love their Masters the better for beating them. Yet to what end the Priests should have feigned this tale, I cannot tell; and therefore I thinke that it might be some device of the fearefull old man, who seeing his Realme in danger of an invasion, sought an honest excuse for his departure out of it, and with-drawing himselfe into Ethiopia, where he had bin bred in his youth. What if I should say, that the Ethiopia into which he went, was none other than Arabia, whereof Tirhaka the King (perhaps at the instigation of this man) raised an Armie against Sennacherib, when he meant to invade Egypt within two or three years after; but I will not trouble my selfe with such enquire. This I hold, that So, or Sabacus was not indeed an Ethiopian (for in his time lived the Prophet Esay, who mentioneth the antiquity of Pharaohs house) but only so furnamed for his education, and because issuing from thence, he got the kingdome from Anysis, who was his opposit. The quiet and milde form of his government, his holding the kingdome so long without an Army, and many other circumstances argue no lesse. But whether finally he betooke a private life, or whether he fore-went his life and kingdome at once, being now very old, it is time that we leave him, and speake of Setson his next Successor, who is omitted by Diodore, but remembered by Herodotus, by a fire token of his having been King.

Of Setson who reigned with Ezechia, and sided with him against Sennacherib.

THE first yeare of Setsons reigne falls into the twelfth of Ezechia, which was the fift of Sennacherib. It was a troublesome age, and full of danger; the two great Kingdomes of Affryia and Egypt, being then engaged in a warre, the issue whereof was to determine, whether of them should rule or serve. The Affryan had the better men of Warre; the Egyptian better provision of necessaries: the Affryan more Subjects; the Egyptian more Friends: and among the new conquered halfe Subjects of Affry, many that were Egyptian in heart, though Affryan in outward shew.

Of this last sort were Ezechia and his people; who knowing how much it concerned Pharao, to protect them against his owne great Enemy, preferred the friendship of so neare and mighty a Neighbour, before the service of a terrible, yet farre removed King. But herein was great difference betweene Ezechia and his Subjects: For the good King fixing his especial confidence in God, held that course of policy, which he thought most likely to turne to the benefit of his Country: the multitude of Judea looking into the faire hopes which this Egyptian league promised, were puffed up with vaine conceits, thinking that all was safe, and that now they should not need to feare any more of those injuries which they had suffered by the Affryans, and so became forgetfull of God, taking counsell, but not of him. The Prophet Esay complained much of this presumption; giving the people of Judea to understand, That the Egyptians were men, and not God, and that Affry should fall by the sword, but not of man. As for the Egyptians (saide the Prophet) they are vanity, and they shall help in vaine, their strength is so fit still.

According to the prophets words it came to passe. For in the treaty of Confederacy that was held at Zaan, all manner of contentment and assurance was given to the Jewes by Setson, or his Agents, who filled them with such reports, of Horses and Chariots, that they did not looke (as Esay saith) unto the holy One of Israel, nor seek unto the Lord. But he yet is wisest.

After a while came Sennacherib with his Army, & wakened them out of these dreames; for Setson their good Neighbour, as neare as he was, did seeme farre off, being unready, when his helpe was most needfull. It may seeme that he purposed rather to make Palestina than Egypt, the stage whereon this great Warre should be acted, and was not without hope, that the Affryans and Jewes, weakening one another, should yeeld unto him a faire faire advantage over both. Yet he fought with monie; for he sent Horses and Camels laden with treasure, to hire the Arabians, whom Esay calleth a people that cannot profit. These Arabians did not profit indeed; for (besides that it seemes by the same place of Esay, that the rich treasures miscarried, and fell into the enemies hands before any helpe appeared from Tirhaca), all the strong Cities of Juda were taken by Senacherib, except Libna, Lachis, and Jerusalem it selfe, which were in sore distresse, till the sword of God and not of Man, defeated the Assyrian, who did goe, for feare, to his Tower, that is, he fled to Nineve, where he was slaine.

Concerning this expedition of Senacherib, Herodotus takes this notice of it: That it was purposed against Egypt, where the men of warre, being offended with Setson their King, who had taken away their allowance, refused to beare armes in defence of him and their Countrey; that Setson being Vulcan Priest, bemoaned himselfe to his god, who by their Countrey, that Setson being Vulcan Priest, bemoaned himselfe to his god, who by dream promised to send him helpers; that hereupon Setson, with such as would follow him, (which were craft-men, shop-keepers, and the like), marched towards Pelafium, and that a great multitude of field-mice entering the Campe of Senacherib by night, did gnaw the bowes, quivers, and straps of his mens armour, that they were faine thence day to die away in all haste, finding themselves disarmed. In memorie hereof (saith Herodotus) the statue of this King is set up in the Temple of Vulcan, holding a Mouse in his hand, with this inscription: Let him that holds mee serve God. Such was the relation of the Egyptian Priests, wherein how farre they swarved from the truth, being detraitors to the Image of their owne King, it may easily be perceived. It seemes that this Image of Setson was fallen down, and the tale forgotten in Diodorus his time, or else perhaps, the Priests did forbear to tell him (which caused him to omit it) for that the nation of the Jewes was then well knowne to the world, whereof every childe could have told, how much falsehood had bene mingled with the truth.

We find this historie agreeable to the Scriptures, thus farre forth; That Senacherib King of the Assyrians and Arabians, (so Herodotus calleth him: the Syrians, or peradventure some borderers upon Syria, being meant by the name of Arabians) lived in this age, made Warre upon Egypt, and was miraculously driven home. As for that exploit of the Mice, and the great pleasure that Vulcan did unto his Priest; happie it was (if Setson were a Priest) that he tooke his god now in so good a moode. For within three or four years before this, all the Priests in Egypt should have been slaine, if a mercifull King had not spared their lives, as it were halfe against the gods will. Therefore this last good turne was not enough to serve as an example, that might stir up the Egyptians to pietie, seeing that their devotion, which had lasted so long before, did bring all the Priests into danger of such a bad reward. Rather I thinke, that this Image did represent Senacherib himselfe, and that the Mouse in his hand, signified Hieroglyphically (as was the Egyptian maner of expressing things) the shamefull issue of his terrible expedition, or the destruction of his Armie, by means which came, no man knew from whence. For the vengeance of God, shewed upon this ungodly King, was indeed a very good motive to pietie. But the Embleme, together with the Temple of Vulcan (being perhaps the chiefe Temple in that Towne where this Image was erected) might give occasion to such a fable; the Divell helping to change the truth into a lie, that God might be robbed of his honour. Yet that we may not belie the Divell, I hold it very likely, that Setson finding himselfe in danger, did call upon his gods, that is, upon Vulcan, Seraph, or any to whom he had most devotion. But so had other of his predecessors done in like need: yet which of them had obtained succour by the like miracle? Surely the Jewes (even such of them as most were given to Idolatrie) would have bin ashamed of the confidence which they reposed in the Chariots of Egypt, because they were many, as in the Horsemen, because they were very strong; had it bin told them, that Setson, in stead of sending those Horse-men and Chariots, was beseeching Vulcan to send him and thence good lucke; or else (for these also were Egyptian gods) addressing his prayers to some Onyon or Cat. Howsoever it was, doubtlesse the Prophecie of Esay tooke effect, which said, They shall be all ashamed of the people that cannot profit them, nor help, nor doe them good, but shall be a shame and also a reproach. Such is commonly the issue of humane wisdom, when resting secure upon provision that it self hath made, it will no longer seem to stand in need of God.

Some there are who take Setson to have bin set down by Eusebius under the name of Tarachus.

Tarachus the Ethiopian; and therefore the twenty years which are given to Tarachus, they allow to the reigne of Setson. These have well observed that Tarachus the Ethiopian is mentioned in the Scriptures, not as a King of Egypt, but as a friend to that Countrey, or at least an enemy to Senmacherib, in the war last spoken of; the Ethiopians (as they are englished) over which he reigned, being indeed Chusites or Arabians. Hereupon they suppose aright, that Eusebius hath mistaken one king for another. But whereas they think that this Tarachus or Tirhaca is placed in the roome of Setson, and therefore give to Setson the twenty years of Tarachus, I hold them to have erred on the other hand. For this Ethiopian (as he is called) began his reigne over Egypt, by Eusebius his account, after the death of Senmacherib and of Ezechia, in the first year of Manasse King of Juda. Therefore he or his years have no reference to Setson.

Herodotus forgets to tell how long Setson reigned; Funfins peremptorily, citing no author, nor alledging reason for it, sets him downe thirty three yeares; many omit him quite; and they that name him, are not carefull to examine his continuance. In this case, I follow that rule which I propounded unto my self at the first, for measuring the reigns of these Egyptian Kings. The years which passed from the fifth of Rehoboam, unto the fourth of Jehoiakim, I so divide among the Egyptians, that giving to every one the proportion allowed unto him by the Author in whom he is found, the rest is to be conferred upon him whose length of reigne is uncertaine; that is, upon this Setson. By this account I find the thirty three years that are set downe by Funfins, to agree very nearely, if not precisely, with the time of Setsons reigne; therefore I conforme my owne reckoning to his, though I could be content to have it one yeare lesse. The reason of this computation I shall render more at large, when I arrive at the time of Pammoniscus, whereupon it hath much dependance, and whereinto the course of this History will shortly bring me, the Egyptian affaires growing now to be interlaced with the matters of Juda, to which it is meet that I returne.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of Manasse and his Contemporaries.

S. I.

The wickednesse of Manasse. His imprisonment, repentance and death.

Manasse the Sonne of Ezechias, forgetting the piety of his Father, and the prosperity which followed him, set up, repaired, adorned and furnished all the Altars, Temples and high Places, in which the Divell was by the Heathen worshipped. Besides, he himselfe esteemed the Sun, the Moone, and the Starres, with all the Host of heaven, as gods, and worshipped them: and of all his acts the most abominable was, that he burnt his sons for a Sacrifice to the Divel Moloch, or Moloch, in the Valley of Hinnon, or Benhinnon: where in was kindled the fire of Sacrifice to the Divels.

He also gave himselfe to all kind of Witchcraft and Sorcery, accompanied and maintained those that had familiar Spirits, and all sorts of Enchanters: besides, he shed so much innocent blood, as Jerusalem was replenished therewith, from corner to corner. For all his vices and abominations, when he was reprehended by that aged and reverent Prophet Esay (who was also of the Kings race, and as the Jewes affirm, the Father-in-law of the King) he caused the Prophet neer unto the Fountain of Siloa, to be sawne in sunder with a wodden Saw, in the eightieth year of his life: a cruelty more barbarous and monstrous than hath bene heard of. The Scriptures indeede are silent hereof, yet the same is confirmed by Epirphanes, Isidore, Eusebius, and others, too many to rehearse, and too good to be suspected. Therefore the Lord brought upon them the Captaines of the Host of the Kings of Asshur, which took Manasse, and put him in fetters, and bound him in chains, and carried him to Babel: Where, after he had lyen twenty yeares as a captive, and disappointed of all honour and hope; yet to his hearty repentance and continuall prayer, the

God

God of infinite mercy had respect, and moved the Assyrians heart to deliver him.

It is also likely that Merodach, because he loved his father Exechias, was the easilier perswaded to restore Manasse to his liberty and estate. After which, and when he was againe established, remembering the miseries which followed his wickednesse, and Gods great mercies toward him, he changed forme, detested his former foolish and divellish Idolatry, and cast downe the Idols of his owne erecting, prepared the Altar of God, and sacrificed thereon. He repaired a great part of Jerusalem: and dyed after the long reigne of fiftie five yeares. Glycas and Suidas report, that Manasse was held in a cage of yron by the Assyrians: and therein fed with bread of bran and water, which men may beleeve as it shall please their fancies.

§. II.

Of troubles in Egypt following the death of Sethon. The reigne of Psammiticus.

THAT the wickednesse of King Manasse was the cause of the evill which fell upon his Kingdome and Person, any Christian must needs beleeve: for it is affirmed in the Scriptures. Yet was the state of things in those parts of the World such, at that time, as would have invited any Prince (and did perhaps invite Merodach, who fulfilled Gods pleasure, upon respect borne to his owne ends, desirous to enlarge his Empire) to make attempt upon Juda. For the kingdome of Egypt, which was become the pillar whereon the state of Juda leaned, about these times was miserably distracted with civill diffention, and after two yeares ill amended by a division of the government betweene twelve Princes. After some good agreement betweene these, eleven of them fell out with the twelfth of their colleagues, and were all finally subdued by him, who made himselfe absolute King of all. This Inter-regnum, or meere Anarchie that was in Egypt, with the division of the Kingdome following it, is placed by Diodore, who omitteth Sethon, between the reigne of Sabacus and Psammiticus: but Herodotus doth set the Aristocratie, or twelve Governours immediately before Psammiticus, who was out of them, and after Sethon.

The occasion of this diffention seems to have bin the uncertainty of title to that kingdome, for that the crowne of Egypt passed by succession of blood, I have often shewed) which ended for a while, by the partition of all among twelve, though things were not settled untill one had obtained the Sovereignty.

These twelve Rulers governed fiftene yeares in good seeming agreement, which to preserve, they made strait covenant & alliances one with another, being jealous of their estate, because an Oracle had foretold, that one of them should depose all the rest, noting him by this token, that he should make a drink-offering in Fulcans Temple, out of a Copper goblet. Whilest this unity lasted, they joyned together in raising a Monument of their Dominion, which was a Labyrinth, which (as Herodotus, who beholding it, affirms) no words could give it commendation answerable to the strangenesse of the worke it selfe. I will not here set downe that imperfect description which Herodotus makes of it, but think enough to say that he preferres it farre before the Pyramides, one of which (as he saith) excelled the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, or any of the fairest workes in Greece. Diodorus reports this Labyrinth to have bin the worke of Marus or Menides, a King which lived five generations before Proteus, that is, before the warre of Troy; and from this Labyrinth (saith he) Dadalus took the pattered of that which he made for Minos; Minos was, I cannot tell. Reineccius takes him to have bin Annenes, which reigned immediately before Thoris. But this agrees not with Diodore: for Dadalus & Minos were both dead long before Annenes was King. Belike Reineccius, desiring to accommodate the fabulous relations of Manethon, Chavemon, & others, that are found in Iosephus, touching Amenophis and his children, to the story of Amasis and Adisanes the Ethiopian, mentioned by Diodore; held it consequent, after he had conjectured Manethons Amenophis to be Diodorus his Amasis; that Sethon should be Adisanes, and that Annenes should be Marus. If in this case I might intrude a conjecture, the times which we now handle are those about which Reineccius hath erred in making search; Amasis was Amasis, Adisanes was Sabacus; & Marus was one of these twelve Princes to whom Herodotus gives the honour of building this famous Labyrinth. For Adisanes the Ethiopian deposed Amasis; Sabacus the Ethiopian deposed Amasis; Adisanes governed well, and was milde in punishing offenders; so likewise was Sabacus; Marus the next King after Adisanes built this Labyrinth; and the next (saving Sethon, whom Diodore omits, as having not heard of him) that ruled after Sabacus, performed the same worke, according to Herodotus, who was more likely to heare the truth, as living nearer to the Age wherein it was performed. The variety of names, and difference of times wherein Diodore beleeved the Priests, might be a part of the Egyptian vanity, which was familiar with them in multiplying their Kings, and boasting of their antiquities. Here I might adde, that the twelve great Halls, Parlours, and other circumstances remembered by Herodotus, in speaking of this building, doe helpe to prove that it was the worke of these twelve Princes. But I hasten to their end.

At a solemne feast in Fulcans Temple, when they were to make their drinke-offerings, the Priest, forgetting himselfe, brought forth no more than eleven Cuppes. Hereupon, Psammiticus, who standing last, had not a Cup, tooke off his brazen Helmet, and therewith supplied the want. This caused all the rest to remember the Oracle, and to suspect him as a Traytor; yet, when they found that it was not done by him upon set purpose or ill intent, they forbore to kill him, but being jealous of their estate, they banished him into the marish Countries by the Sea side. This Oracle, and the event is held by Diodore as a fable, which I beleeve to have bin none other: In the rest Herodotus and Diodore agree, saying, that Psammiticus hired Souldiers out of Caria and Ionia, by whose aide he vanquished his Companions, and made himselfe sole King.

The yeares of his reigne, according to Herodotus, were fiftie foure; according to Eusebius, forty foure; Mercator, to reconcile these two, gives forty yeares to his single reigne, and ten to his ruling joyntly with the Princes before spoken of. Indeepe, he that was admitted, being a man growne (for he cannot in reason be supposed to have bene then a young fellow) into the number of the twelve Governours, must be thought to have lived unto extreme age, if he ruled partly with others, partly alone, three score and nine yeares. I therefore yeeld rather to Eusebius; but will not adventure to cut five yeares from the Aristocratie: though peradventure Psammiticus was not at first one of the twelve, but succeeded (either by election, or as next of blood) into the place of some Prince that dyed, and was ten yeares companion in that government.

Another scruple there is, though not great, which troubles this reckoning. The yeares of the Egyptians, as we finde them set downe, are more by one, than serve to fill up the time between the first of Rehoboam and the fourth of Jehojakim. This may not be. Wherefore either we must abate one yeare from Sethons reigne, that was of uncertain length; or else (which I had rather doe; because Fanctius may have followed better authority than I know, or than himselfe alledgeth, in giving to Sethon a time so nearly agreeing with the truth) we must confound the last yeare of one reigne with the first of another. Such a supposition were not insolent. For no man can suppose, that all the Kings, or any great part of them, which are set downe in Chronological tables, reigned precisely so many yeares as are prescribed unto them, without any fractions: it is enough to thinke that the surplusage of one mans time supplied the defect of anothers. Wherefore I confound the last yeare of those fiftene, wherein the twelve Princes ruled, with the first of Psammiticus; who surely did not fall out with his Companions, fight with them, and make himselfe Lord alone all in one day.

Concerning this King, it is recorded, that he was the first in Egypt who entertained any strait amity with the Greekes; that he retained in pay his Mercenaries of Caria, Ionia, and Arabia, to whom he gave large rewards and possessions; and that he greatly offended his Egyptian Souldiers, by bestowing them in the left wing of his Armie, whilest his Mercenaries held the right wing (which was the more honourable place) in an expedition that he made into Syria. Upon this disgrace it is said, that his Souldiers, to the number of two hundred thousand, forsook their naturall Countrey of Egypt, and went into Ethiopia, to dwell there: neither could they be revoked by kind Messiges, nor by the King himselfe, who over-tooke them on the way; but when he told them of their Countrey, their Wives and Children, they answered, that their weapons should get them a Countrey, and that nature had enabled them to get other Wives and Children.

It is also reported of him, That he cauled two Infants to be brought up in such sort, as they might not heare any word spoken; by which means, he hoped to find out what Nation or Language was most ancient; forasmuch as it seemed likely, that nature would teach the children to speake that Language which men spake at the first. The issue hereof was, that the children cryed, Beccus, Beccus, which word being found to signifie Bread in the Phrygian tongue, served greatly to magnifie the Phrygian antiquity. Gorepius Beccus makes no small matter of this, for the honour of his Low-Dutch; in which the word Becker signifies (as Baker in English) a maker of bread. He that will turne over any part of Gorepius his works, may find enough of this kind, to perswade a willing man, that Adam and all the Patriarks used none other tongue than the Low-Dutch, before the confusion of languages at Babel; the name it self of Babel being also Dutch, and given by occasion of this confusion; for that there they began to babble and talke one knew not what.

But I will not insit upon all that is written of Psammiticus. The most regardable of his acts was the siege of Azotus in Palestina, about which he spent nine & twenty years. Never have we heard (saith Herodotus) that any City endured so long a siege as this; yet Psammiticus carried it at the last. This Towne of Azotus had been won by Tartan, a Captain of Sennacherib, and was now, as it seemeth, relieved, but in vaine, by the Babylonian, which made it hold out so well.

§. III.

What reference these Egyptian matters might have to the imprisonment and enlargement of Manasses. In what part of his reigne Manasses was taken prisoner.

WERE it certainly knowne, in what year of his reigne Manasses was taken prisoner, and how long it was before he obtained liberty; I thinke we should finde these Egyptian troubles to have been no small occasion, both of his captivity and enlargement: God so disposing of humane actions, that even they, who intended onely their owne businesse, fulfilled onely his high pleasure. For either the civill Warres in Egypt that followed upon the death of Setbon, or the renting of the 30 Kingdome, as it were, into twelve pieces, or the Warre betweene Psammiticus and his Colleagues, or the expedition of Psammiticus into Syria, and the siege of Azotus, might minister unto the Babylonian, either such cause of hope to enlarge his Dominion in the South parts; or such necessity of sending an Armie into those parts, to defend his owne, as would greatly tempt him to make sure worke with the King of Juda. The same occasion sufficed also, to procure the deliverie of Manasses, after he was taken. For he was taken (as Josaphus hath it) by subtilty, not by open force, neither did they that apprehended him, winne his Countrey, but onely waite it. So that the Jews, having learned wit by the ill successe of their folly, in redeeming Amazias, were like to be more circumspect, in making their bargain upon such another accident: and the Babylonian (to whom the Egyptian matters presented more weighty arguments of hope and feare, than the little Kingdome of Juda could afford) had no reason to spend his forces in pursuing a small conquest, but as full of difficulty as a greater, whereby he should compell his mightiest enemies to come to some good agreement; when by quitting his present advantage over the Jews, he might make his way the surer into Egypt.

Now concerning the year of Manasses his reigne, wherein he was taken prisoner; for concerning his captivity it selfe, how long it lasted, the Scriptures are silent, and Josaphus gives no information. Yet I find cited by Tornellus three opinions; the one of Bellarmino, who thinks that Manasses was taken in the fifteenth year of his reigne; the other of the Author of the greater Hebrew Chronologie, who affirms, that it was in his twentieth seventh year; the third of Rabbi Kimbi upon Ezechiel, who saith, that he was forty yeares an Idolater, and lived fifteene yeares after his repentance. The first of these conjectures is upheld by Tornellus, who rejects the second, as more unprobable, and condemnes the third as most false. Yet the reasons alledged by Tornellus in defence of the first, and refutation of the last opinion, are such, as may rather prove him to favour the Cardinall as farre as he may, (for where neede requires, he doth freely dissent from him) than to have used his accustomed diligence in examining the matter, before before he gave his judgement. Two arguments he brings to maintaine the opinion of Bellarmino: the one, that Ammon the Sonne of Manasses, is said by Josaphus to have followed the workes of his fathers youth; the other, that had Manasses growne old in his finnes, it is like that he should have continued, as he did, in his amendment unto the end of his life. Touching the former of these arguments, I see no reason why the finnes of Manasses might not be distinguished from his repentance in his old age, by calling them workes of his youth, which appeared when he was twelve yeares old; though it were granted that he continued in them (according to that of Rabbi Kimbi) until he was but fifteene yeares from death. Touching the second, howsoever it be a fearefull thing, to cullott into the last those good motions unto repentance, which we know not whether ever God will offer unto us againe; yet were it a terrible hearing, That the sins which are not forsaken before the age of two and fiftie yeares, shall be punished with finall impenitencie. But against these two collections of Tornellus, I will lay two places of Scripture, whence it may be inferred, as not unlikely; That Manasses continued longer in his wickednesse than Bellarmino hath intimated, if not as long as Rabbi Kimbi hath affirmed. In the second Booke of Kings, the evill which Manasses did, is remembered at large, and his repentance utterly omitted; so that his amendment may seeme to have taken up no great part of his life; the storie of him being thus concluded in the one and twentieth Chapter: Concerning the rest of the Acts of Manasses, and all that he did, and his sin that he sinned, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Juda? The other place is in the foure and twentieth Chapter of the same Booke, where, in rehearsing the calamities with which that Nation was punished in the time of Jehojakim, the great Grand-child of this Manasses, it is said; Surely by the commandment of the Lord came this upon Juda; that he might put them out of his sight, for the finnes of Manasses, according to all that he did; for the innocent blood that he shed (for he filled Jerusalem with innocent blood) therefore the Lord would not pardon it. Who so considers well these places, may find small cause to pronounce it most false. That the repentance and amendment of Manasses was not earlier than fifteen yeares before his death; or most probable, That when he was thwentie seven yeares old, he repented, and becoming a new man, lived in the feare of God fortie yeares after. I will no longer dispute about this matter, seeing that the truth cannot be discovered. It sufficeth to say, that two yeares of civill dissention in Egypt, fourteen or fifteene yeares following, wherein that Kingdome was weakened by partition of the Sovereigntie: the warre of Psammiticus against his Associates: and foure and twentie yeares of the nine and twentie, wherein the siege of Azotus continued; being all within the time of Manasses, did leave no one part of his reigne (after the first fifteen yeares) free from the danger of being oppressed by the Babylonian, whose men of warre had continuall occasions of visiting his Countrey. All which I will adde hereto, is this; that the fifteenth of Manasses was the last yeare of Setbon in Egypt, and the one and thirtieth of Merodach his reigne, or (accounting from the death of Asarhaddon) the twentieth. The seven and twentieth of Manasses was the tenth of the twelve Princes, and the three and fortieth of Merodach: his fortieth, was the twentieth third of Psammiticus, and the fift of Nabulassar, the sonne of Merodach, in Babylon: but which of these was the yeare of his imprisonment, or whether any other, I forbore to shew mine opinion, lest I should thereby seeme to draw all matters over-violently to mine owne computation.

This was the first great mactrie that the Babylonians had of the kingdome of Juda. For though Achaz promised Tribute to Salmanassar yet Ezechias never payed it. True it is, that he hoped to stay Sennacherib enterprise against him, by presenting him with three hundred talents of silver, and thirtie of gold, besides the place which covered the doores and pillars of the Temple.

But Manasses being pressed with greater necessitie, could refuse no tolerable conditions, that the Babylonian would impose upon him; among which it seems, that this was one, (which was indeed a point of servitude) that he might not hold peace with the Egyptians, whilst they were enemies to Babylon. This appeares not only by his fortifying with men of warre all the strong Cities of Juda after his return (which was rather against Psammiticus, whose partie he had forsaken, than against the Babylonian, with whom he had thenceforth no more controversie) but likewise by that opposition, which Josias made afterwards to Pharas Neco, in favour of Nabulassar, which had bene against all reason reason and policie, if it had not bin his dutie by covenant. Of this I will speake more in convenient place.

§. IV.

Of the first and second Messenian Wars, which were in the reignes of Ezechia and Manasse, Kings of Juda.

NOW concerning such actions as were performed abroad in the world, about these times of Manasse, the most remarkable were the Messenian Wars; which happened in this age, and being the greatest action performed in Greece, betweene the Trojan and Persian Wars, deserve not to be passed over with silence.

The first Messenian Warre began and ended in the daies of Ezechia; the second in the reign of Manasse: but to avoyd the trouble of interrupting our Historie, I have thought it best, to rehearse them both in this place. Other introduction is needlesse, than to say, that the posteritie of Hercules, driving the issue of Pelops and the Achaens out of their seats, divided their lands between themselves, and erected the kingdomes of Lacedaem, Argos, Messene, and Corinth; all which agreeing well together a while, did after wards forget the bond of kindred, and fought one anothers ruine with bloudie wars; whereof these Messenian were the greatest.

The pretended grounds of the Messenian War are scarce worth remembrance, they were so sleight. Ambition was the true cause of it: wherewith the Lacedaemonians were so transported, that any thing served them as a colour to accomplish their greedie desires. Yet another matter was alledged; namely, that one Polychares a Messenian had slain many Lacedaemonians, for which the Magistrates of Sparta desiring to have him yielded into their hands, could not obtain it. The Messenians on the other side, excused Polychares, for that he was grown frantick, through injuries received from Euphros a Lacedaemonian. This Euphros had bargained to give pasture to the Cattell of Polychares, & was therefore to receive part of the increase: but not contented with the gain appointed, he sold the Cattell, & slaves that kept them, to Merchants; which done, he came with a faire tale to his friend, saying, that they were stolen. Whilst the lye was yet scarce out of his mouth, one of the slaves that had escaped from the Merchants came in with a true report of all. The Lacedaemonian being thus deprehended, confessed all, and promised large amends; which to receive he carried the son of Polychares home with him; but having him at home, he villainously slew him. Wherefore the Lacedaemonians having refused, after long suite made by the wretched Father, to do him right against this Theefe and Murderer, sought not to pick matter of quarrel out of those things which he did in that madnesse, whereinto they themselves had cast him. So said the Messenians, and further offered to put the matter to compromise, or to stand unto the judgement of the Amphithyones, who were as the generall Counsell of Greece, or to any other faire course. But the Lacedaemonians, who had a great desire to occupie the fair Countrie of Messene, that lay close by them, were not content with such allegations. They thought it enough to have some shew for their doings, which the better to colour, they reckoned up many old injuries, and so without sending any defiance, secretly took an oath to hold war with Messene till they had mastered it: which done, they seized upon Amphisa, a frontier Town of that Province, wherein they put all to the Sword without mercie, very few escaped.

Hereupon the Messenians tooke Armes, and were met by the Enemy. A furious battell was fought between them, which ended not untill darke night, with uncertaine victorie. The Messenians did strongly encampe themselves; The Lacedaemonians, unable to force their Campe, returned home. This Warre began in the second year of the ninth Olympiad, and ended in the first of the fourteenth Olympiad, having lasted twentie yeares. The two enemy Nations tried the matter, for a while, with their proper forces; the Lacedaemonians wasting the inland parts of Messene; and the Messenians, the Sea-coast of Laconia. But it was not long ere friends, on both sides, were called in to help. The Arcadians, Argives, and Sicyonians, tooke part with Messene; the Spartans had, besides many Subjects of their owne, aide from Corinth, and hired Souldiers out of Crete. So a second, third, and fourth battell, were fought, with as great obstinacie as the first, saving that in the fourth battell the Lacedaemonians were enced to turn their backs; in the other fights, the victorie was still uncertain, though in one of them the Messenians lost Enphros their King, in whose stead they chose Aristodemus.

Many years were spent ere all this bloud was shed; for pestilent diseases, and want of money to entertaine Souldiers, caused the warre to linger. And for the same reasons, did the Messenians forsake all their inland towns, excepting Ithome, which was a Mountaine with a Town upon it, able to endure more than the enemies were likely to doe. But, as some Authors tell us, the Lacedaemonians were so obtinate in this War, because of their vow, that having absented themselves ten yeares from Sparta, their wives sent them word, that their Citie would grow unpeopled, by reason that no children had been borne them in all that time: Whereupon they sent backe all their ablest young men, to promiscuously to accompany the young women, who go: so many of them with child, as they became a great part of their Nation, and were called Parthenians. Diodorus relates the begetting of these Parthenians to a former time. But in processe of this Messenian Warre, when the Divell in an Oracle had advised the Messenians to sacrifice a Virgin of the stocke of Aegyptus, that so they might be victorious against the Lacedaemonians; the lot falling upon the Daughter of one Lyciscus; Epibolus the Priest, willing to save her, said, she was only a fostered childe, and not borne of the wife of Lyciscus:

which answer giving delay to the execution of the Maide, Lyciscus secretly fled away with her into Sparta. Then Aristodemus, which afterwards was King, voluntarily offered his owne Daughter: but a young Nobleman; being in love with the Maide, when otherwise he could not prevail, said openly that she was no Virgin, but that he had deflowered her, and got her with childe: whereupon the Father in a rage ripped up his innocent Daughters belly, to disprove the Lovers slander: at the grave of which Daughter of his, after wards falling, by other superstitions, into despair of prevailing against the Lacedaemonians, he slew himselfe, to the great hurt of his Country, which he loved most dearly. For after his death the Messenians lost their courage, and finding themselves distressed by many waies, especially of victuals, they craved peace, which they obtained with most rigorous conditions. Halfe the yearly fruits of their Land they were bound to send unto Sparta; and they, with their Wives, to make solemne lamentations at the death of every Spartan King; they were also sworne to live in true subjection to the Lacedaemonians; and part of their Territorie was taken from them, which was given to the Almai, and such as had followed the Spartans in this Warre.

This peace being made upon so uneven termes, was not like to hold long. Yet nine and thirtie yeares it continued (the Messenians not finding how to help themselves) and then brake out into a new and more furious Warre than the former. The able young men, that were growne up in the roome of those Messenians whom the former Warre had consumed, began to consider their owne strength and multitude, thinking themselves equall to the Lacedaemonians, and therefore scorned to serve such Masters as had against all right, oppressed their Fathers. The chiefe of these was Aristomenes, a Noble Gentleman, of the house of Aegyptus; who perceiving the uniform desires of his Country-men, adventured to become their Leader. He therefore founding the affections of the Argives and Arcadians, which he found thoroughly answerable to his purpose, began open warre upon the State of Lacedaemon. This was in the fourth year of the three and twentieth Olympiad; when the Lacedaemonians hastened to quench the fire before it should grow too hot, with such forces as they could raise of their owne, without troubling their friends, meaning to deal with their enemies, ere any succour were lent them. So a strong battell was fought between them, and a doubtfull, save that the Messenians were pleased with the issue, inasmuch as they had thereby taught their late proud Lords, to thinke them their equals. Particularly, the valour of Aristomenes appeared such in this fight, that his people would have made him their King: but he, refusing the honour of that name, accepted of the burthen, and became their General.

Within one yeare another battell was fought, whereinto each part came better provided. The Lacedaemonians brought with them the Corinthians, and some other friends to help: the Messenians had the Argives, Arcadians, and Sicyonians. This also was a long and bloudie fight; but Aristomenes did so behave himselfe, that finally he made the Enemies runne for their lives. Of such importance was this victorie, that the Lacedaemonians began to bechinke themselves, of making some good agreement.

But one Tyrant an Asbenian Poet, whom by appointment of an Oracle they had gotten to direct them, re-inforced their spirits with his Verses. After this, Aristomenes took by surprise a Town in Laconia, and vanquished in fight Anaxander King of Sparta, who did set upon him in hope to have recovered the booty.

But all these victories of Aristomenes perished, in the losse of one battell, whereof the honour (if it were honour) or surely the profit, fell upon the Lacedæmonians, through the treason of Arifocrates, King of Arcadia, who being corrupted by the enemies with money, fled away, and left the Messenians exposed to a cruell butcherie. The losse was so great, that together with Andania their principall Citie, all the Towns of Messene, standing too farre from the Sea, were abandoned for lack of men to defend them, and the Mount Era fortified, whither the multitude, that could not be safe abroad, was conveyed into a place of safetie. Here the Lacedæmonians found a tedious work, that held them eleven years. For besides that Era it selfe was a strong peece, Aristomenes with three hundred stout Souldiers, did many incredible exploits, that wearied them, and hindered their attendance on the siege. He waited all the fields of Messene, that were in the enemies power, and brake into Laconia, taking away Corn, Wine, Cattell, and all provisions, necessary for his owne people; the Slaves and household stuffe he changed into money, suffering the owners to redeem them. To remedy this mischief, the Lacedæmonians made an Edict, that neither Messene, nor the adjoining parts of their owne Countrey, should be tilled or husbanded; which bred a great tumult among private men, that were almost undone by it. Yet the Poet Tyrant appeased this uprore with pleasing Songs. But Aristomenes grew so bold, that he not only ranged over all the fields, but adventure upon the Towns, surprised, and sackt Amyle, and finally caused the enemies to encrease and strengthen their Companies; which done, there yet appeared no likelihood of taking Era.

In performing these and other services, thrice Aristomenes was taken prisoner; yet still he escaped. One escape of his deserves to be remembered, as a thing very strange and marvellous. He had with too much courage adventured to set upon both the Kings of Sparta; and being in that fight wounded, and felled to the ground, was taken up senselesse, and carried away prisoner, with fiftie of his Companions. There was a deep natural Cave into which the Spartans used to cast head-long such as were condemned to dye for the greatest offences. To this punishment were Aristomenes and his companions adjudged. All the rest of these poore men dyed with their fals; Aristomenes howsoever it came to passe, took no harme. Yet was it harme enough to be imprisoned in a deepe Dungeon, among dead carcasses, where he was like to perish through hunger and stench. But after a while he perceived by some small glimmering of light (which perhaps came in at the top) a Foxe that was gnawing upon a dead bodie. Hereupon he bethought himselfe, that this beast must needs know some way to enter the place and get out. For which cause he made shift to lay hold upon it, and catching it by the taile with one hand, saved himselfe from biring with the other hand, by thrusting his coate into the mouth of it. So letting it crepe whither it would, he followed, holding it as his guide, untill the way was too strait for him; and then dismissed it. The Foxe being loost, ran through an hole at which came in a little light; and there did Aristomenes delve so long with his nailes, that at last he clawed out his passage. When some fugitives of Messene brought word to Sparta, that Aristomenes was returned home, their tale sounded alike, as if they had said, that a dead man was revived. But when the Corinthian forces, that came to helpe the Lacedæmonians in the siege of Era, were cut in pieces, their Captains slain, and their Camp taken; then was it easily beleevd, that Aristomenes was alive indeed.

Thus eleven years passed whilest the enemies hovering about Era, saw no likelihood of getting it; and Aristomenes with small forces did them greater hurt than they knew how to requite. But at the last, a slave, that had fled from Sparta, betrayed the place. This fellow had enticed to lewdnesse the wife of a Messenian, and was entertained by her, when her husband went forth to watch. It happened in a rainie-winter-night, that the husband came home unlooked for, whilest the Adulterer was within. The Woman hid her Paramour, and made good countenance to her husband, asking him by what good fortune he was returned so soone. He told her, that the storme of foule weather was such, as had made all his fellowes leave their Stations, and that himselfe had done as the rest did; as for Aristomenes, he was wounded of late in fight, and could not look abroad; neither was it to be feared, that the enemies would stirre in such a darkie rainie night as this was. The slave that heard these tidings, rose up secretly out of his lurking hole, and got him to the Lacedæmonian Campe with the newes. There he found Emperamus his Master commanding in the Kings absence. To him he uttered all; and obtaining pardon for his running away, guided the Army into the Town. Little or nothing was done that night. For the Allarme was presently taken; and the extreme darknesse, together with the noise of winde and rain, hindered all directions. All the next day was spent in most cruell fight; one part being incited by mere hope of ending a long worke; the other enraged by mere desperation. The great advantage that the Spartans had in numbers, was recompenced partly by the assistance, which women and children (to whom the hatred of servitude had taught contempt of death) gave to their husbands and fathers; partly by the narrownesse of the streetes and other passages, which admitted not many hands to fight at once. But the Messenians were in continuall toyle; their Enemies fought in course, refreshing themselves with meate and sleep, and then returning supplied the place of their wearie fellows with fresh Companions. Aristomenes therefore, perceiving that his men for want of reliefe were no longer able to hold out, (as having bene three dayes and three nights vexed with all miseries, of labour, watchings, fighting, hunger and thirst, besides continuall rain and cold) gathered together all the weaker fort, whom he compassed round with armed men, and so attempted to breake out through the midst of the Enemies. Emperamus General of the Lacedæmonians was glad of this: and to further their departure, caused his Souldiers to give an open way, leaving a faire passage to these desperate mad-men. So they issued forth, and arrived safe in Arcadia, where they were most lovingly entertained.

Upon the first bruit of the taking of Era, the Arcadians had prepared themselves to the rescue: but Arifocrates their false-hearted King, said it was too late, for that all was already lost. When Aristomenes had placed his followers in safetie, he chose out five hundred the lustiest of his men, with whom he resolved to march in all secret haste unto Sparta, hoping to finde the Towne secure, and ill manned, the people being runne forth to the spoyle of Messene. In this enterprize, if he sped well, it was not doubted, that the Lacedæmonians would be glad to recover their owne, by restitution of that which they had taken from others; if all failed, an honourable death was the worst that could happen. There were three hundred Arcadians that offered to joyne with him; but Arifocrates marred all, by sending speedie advertisement thereof to Anaxander King of Sparta. The Epistle which Anaxander sent back to Arifocrates was intercepted by some that mistrusted him to whom it was directed. Therein was found all his falshood, which being published in open assemble, the Arcadians stoned him to death, and casting forth his bodie unburied, erected a monument of his treacherie, with a note; That the Perjurer should deceive God.

Of Aristomenes no more is remaining to be said, than that committing his people to the charge of his son Gorgus and other sufficient Governors, who should plant them in some new seat abroad, he resolved himselfe to make abroad in those parts, hoping to finde the Lacedæmonians work at home. His daughters he bestowed honourably in marriage. One of them Demagetus, who reigned in the Ile of Rhodes, tooke to wife, being willed by an Oracle, to marry the daughter of the best man in Greece. Finally, Aristomenes went with his daughter to Rhodes, whence he purposed to have travelled unto Ardys the Sonne of Gyges King of Lydia, and to Phraortes King of Media; but death prevented him at Rhodes, where he was honourably buried.

The Messenians were invired by Anaxilus (whose great Grandfather was a Messenian, and went into Italie after the former war) being Lord of the Rhegiens in Italie, to take his part against the Zancleans in Sicilie, on the other side of the Straights. They did so; and winning the Towne of Zancle, called it Messene, which name it keeps to this day.

This second Messenian warre ended in the first year of the twentie eighth Olympiad. Long after which time, the rest of that Nation, who staying at home served the Lacedæmonians, found meanes to rebell; but were soone vanquished, and being driven to forsake Peloponnesus, they went into Acarnania; whence likewise, after few ages, they were expelled by the Lacedæmonians, and then followed their ancient Country-men into Italic and Sicilies; some of them went into Africa, where they chose unto themselves a seat.

It is very strange, that during two hundred and fourescore years, this banished Nation retained their name, their ancient customes, language, hatred of Sparta, and love of their forsaken Country; with a desire to return unto it. In the third year of the hundred and second Olympiad, that great Epinonondas, having tamed the pride of the Lacedæmonians, revoked the Messenians home, who came flocking out of all quarters where they dwelt abroad into Peloponnesus. There did Epinonondas restore unto them their old possession, and help them in building a fair Citie; which by the name of the Province, was called to Messene, and was held by them ever after, in despite of the Lacedæmonians, of whom they never from thenceforth stood in feare.

§. V.

Of the Kings that were in Lydia and Media, while Manasses reigned. Whether Deioces the Mede were that Arphaxad which is mentioned in the Booke of Judith. Of the historie of Judith.

ARDYS King of Lydia, and Phraortes of the Medes, are spoken of by Pausanias, as reigning shortly after the Messenian war. Ardys succeeding unto his father Ogyes, began his reign of nine and fortie yeares, in the second of the five and twentieth Olympiad. He followed the steps of his father, who encroaching upon the Ionians in Asia, had taken Colophon by force, and attempted Miletus and Smyrna. In like manner Ardys wan Priene, and assailed Miletus, but went away without it. In his reign, the Cimmerians, being expelled out of their own country by the Scythians, over-ran a great part of Asia, which was not freed from them before the time of Alyattes this mans Grandchilde, by whom they were driven out. They had not only broken into Lydia, but wan the Citie of Sardes; though the Castle or Citadell thereof was defended against them, and held still for King Ardys; whose long reign was unable, by reason of this great storme, to effect much.

Phraortes was not King untill the third year of the nine and twentieth Olympiad, which was fixe yeares after the Messenian war ended; the same being the last year of Manasses his reign over Juda.

Deioces the father of this Phraortes, was King of Media, three and fiftie of these five and fiftie yeares in which Manasses reigned. This Deioces was the first that ruled the Medes in a strict forme, commanding more absolutely than his Predecessours had done. For they, following the example of Arbaces, had given to the people so much licence, as caused every one to desire the wholesome severitie of a more Lordly King. Herein Deioces answered their desires to the full. For he caused them to build for him a stately Palace; he tooke unto him a Guard, for defence of his person; he seldom gave presence; which also when he did, it was with such austeritie, that no man durst presume to spit or cough in his sight. By these and the like ceremonies he bred in the people an awfull regard, and highly upheld the Majestie, which his predecessors had almost letten fall, through neglect of due comportments. In execution of his Royall Office, he did uprightly and severely administer justice, keeping secret spies to informe him of all that was done in the Kingdome. He cared not to enlarge the bounds of his Dominion, by encroaching upon others; but studied how to govern well his own. The difference found between this King and such as were before him, seems to have bred that opinion which Herodotus delivers, that Deioces was the first who reigned in Media.

This was he that built the great Citie of Ecbatane, which now is called Tauris; and therefore he should be that king Arphaxad, mentioned in the storie of Judith, as also Ben Merodach, by the same account, should be Nabuchodonosor the Assyrian, by whom Arphaxad was slaine, and Holofernes sent to worke wonders upon Phul and Lad; and I know not what other Countries. For I reckon the last year of Deioces to have been the nineteenth of Ben Merodach; though others place it otherwise, some earlier, in the time of Merodach Baladan, some later, in the reign of Nabulassar, who is also called Nabuchodonosor.

Herod. lib. i.

In fitting this book of Judith to a certainetime, there hath much labour beene spent with ill successe. The reignes of Cambyses, Darius Hystaspis, Xerxes, and Ochus, have been fought into; but afford no great matter of likelihood: and now of late, the times, foregoing the destruction of Jerusalem, have beene thought upon, and this age that we have in hand, chosen by Bellarmine, as agreeing best with the storie; though others herein cannot (I speake of such as faine would) agree with him. Whilest Cambyses reigned, the Temple was not re-built, which in the storie of Judith is found standing and dedicated. The other two Persian Kings, Darius and Xerxes, are acknowledged to have beene very favourable to the Jewes; therefore neither of them could be Nabuchodonosor, whose part they refused to take, & who sent to destroy them. Yet the time of Xerxes hath some conveniences, aptly fitting this Historie; and above all, the opinion of a few ancient Writers (withour whose judgement the authoritie of this Booke were of no value) having placed this argument in the Persian Monarchie, inclines the matter to the raigne of this vainglorious King. As for Ochus, very few, and they faintly, entitle him to the businesse. Manifest it is, and granted, that in the time of this Historie, there must be a returne from captivitie lately foregoing, the Temple rebuilt; Joachim High Priest; and a long peace of threescore and ten yeares or thereabout, ensuing. All these were to be among the Jewes. Likewise on the other side, we must find a King that reigned in Nineve, eighteen yeares at the least; that vanquished and slew a King of the Medes; one whom the Jewes refused to assist, one that fought generally to be adored as God, and that therefore commanded all temples, of such as were accounted gods, to be destroyed; one whose Vice-roy or Captain General knew not the Jewish Nation, but was faine to learn what they were of the bordering people.

Of all these circumstances; the Priesthood of Joachim, with a returne from captivitie, are found concurring, with either the time of Manasses before the destruction of Jerusalem, or of Xerxes afterward: the re-building of the Temple a while before, and the long peace following, agree with the raigne of Xerxes; the rest of circumstances requisite, are to be found all together, neither before nor after the captivitie of the Jewes, and dissolution of the Citie. Wherefore the briefe decision of this controversie is, I hat the booke of Judith is not Canonically. Yet hath Torniellus done as much, in fitting all to the time of Xerxes, as was possible in so desperate a case. For he supposeth, that under Xerxes there were other Kings, among which Arphaxad might be one (who perhaps restored and re-edified the Citie of Ecbatane, that had formerly beene built by Deioces) and Nabuchodonosor might be another. This granted; he adds, that from the twelfth yeare to the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor, that is, five or fixe yeares, the absence and ill fortune of Xerxes in his Grecian expedition (which he supposeth to have beene so long) might give occasion unto Arphaxad, of rebelling: and that Nabuchodonosor, having vanquished and slaine Arphaxad, might then seeke to make himselfe Lord of all, by the Armie which he sent forth unto Holofernes. So should the Jewes have done their dutie, in adhering to Xerxes their Sovereigne Lord, and resisting one that rebelled against him; as also the other circumstances rehearsed before, be well applied to the argument. For in these times, the affaires of Jurie were agreeable to the Historie of Judith, and such a King as this supposed Nabuchodonosor, might well enough beignorant of the Jewes, and as proud as we shall need to thinke him. But the silence of all Histories, takes away belief from this conjecture: and the supposition it selfe is very hard, that a Rebelle, whose King was abroad, with an Armie consisting of seventene hundred thousand men, should presume so farre, upon the strength of twelve hundred thousand foot, and twelve thousand Archers on horsebacke, as to thinke that he might doe what he list, yea that there was none other God than himselfe. It is indeed easie to finde enough that might be said against this device of Torniellus: yet if there were any necessitie of holding the booke of Judith to be Canonically, I would rather choose to lay aside all regard of prophane Histories, and build some defence upon this ground; than, by following the opinion of any other, to violate, as they all doe, the text it self. That Judith lived under none of the Persian Kings, Bellarmino (whose workes I have not read, but find him cited by Torniellus) hath proved by many arguments. That she lived not in the Raigne of Manasses, Torniellus hath proved very substantially, shewing how the Cardinal is driven, as it were to breake through a wall, in saying that the text was corrupted, where it spake of the destruction of the Temple foregoing her time. That the Kings Arphaxad and Nabuchodonosor, chodonofo, found out by Ternellus, are the children of meere fantasie, it is so plaine that it needs no prooffe at all. Wherefore we may truly say, that they, which have contended about the time of this Historie, being well furnished of matter, wherewith to confuted each other, but wanting wherewith to defend themselves (like naked men in a stoffe field) have chased Holofernes out of all parts of time, and left him and his great expedition, Extra anni solisque vias, in an age that never was, and in places that were never known.

Judin. 2. 23. & 25.

Surely, to find out the borders of Japheth, which were towards the South, and over against Arabia; or the Countries of Phul and Lud, that lay in Holofernes his way; I think it would as much trouble Cosmographers, as the former question hath done Chronologists. But I will not busie my selfe herewith; having already so farre digressed, in logers. But I thinke it high time to returne unto mine shewing who lived not with Manasses, that I thinke it high time to returne unto mine owne worke, and rehearse what others I finde, to have had their part, in the long time of his Raigne.

§. VI.

Of other Princes and actions that were in these times.

THE first yeare of Manasses was the last of Romulus; after whose death, one yeare to the Romanes wanted a King. Then was Numa Pompilius a Sabine chosen, a peaceable man and seeming very religious in his kinde. He brought the rude people, which Romulus had employed onely in warres, to some good civillitie, and a more orderly fashion of life. This he effected by filling their heads with superstition; as perswading them, that he had familiaritie with a Nymph called Egeria, who taught him a many of Ceremonies which he delivered unto the Romanes as things of great importance. But all these devices of Numa were, in his owne judgement, no better than meere delusions, that served onely as rudiments to bring the savage multitude of theeves, and un-laws, gathered into one bodie by Romulus, to some forme of milder discipline, than their boisterous and wilde natures was otherwise apt to entertaine. This appeared by the Books¹⁰ that were found in his grave, almost fixe hundred yeares after his death, wherein the Superstition taught by himselfe was condemned as vaine. His grave was opened by chance, in digging a piece of ground that belonged to one L. Petilius a Scribe. Two Coffines or Chests of stone were in it, with an inscription in Greeke and Latine letters, which said, That Numa Pompilius the son of Pompo, King of the Romanes lay there. In the one Coffin was nothing found; his bodie being utterly consumed. In the other were his Bookes, wrapped up in two bundels of waxe; of his owne constitutions seven, and other seven of Philosophie. They were not only uncorrupted, but in a manner fresh and new. The Pretour of the Citie desiring to have a sight of these Books, when he perceived wherunto they tended, refused to deliver them back to the owner, and offered to take a solemn oath that they were against the Religion then in use. Hereupon the Senate, without more ado, commanded them to be openly burnt. It seems that Numa did meane to acquite himselfe unto wiser ages, which he thought would follow, as one that had not beene so foolish as to beleeve the Doctrine wherein he instructed his owne barbarous times. But the poyson wherewith he had infected Rome, when he sat in his Throne, had not left working, when he ministred the Antidote out of his grave. Had these Bookes not come to light, untill the dayes of Tully and Cesar, when the miste of ignorance was somewhat better disuffed; likely it is that they had not onely escaped the fire, but wrought some good (and peradventure generall) effect. Being as it was, they served as a confusion, without remedie, of Idolatrie that was inveterate.

Numa reigned three and fortie yeares in continuall peace. After him Tullus Hostilius the third King was chosen, in the fixe and fortieth of Manasses; and reigned two and thirtie yeares, busied for the most part, in warre. He quarrelled with the Albanes, who met him in the field; but in regard of the danger, which both parts had cause to feare, that might grow unto them from the Thybanes, caused them to bethinke themselves of a counsell, whereby without effusion of so much blood, as might make them too weak for a common enemy, it might be decided, who should command, and who obey.

There

There were in each Campe three Brethren, Twins, borne at one birth (Dionysius sayes that they were Cousin Germans) of equally yeares and strength, who were appointed to fight for their severall Countries. The end was, that the Horatii, Champions for the Romanes got the victorie, though two of them first lost their lives. The three Curatii that fought for Alba (as Livie tells it) were all alive, and able to fight, yet wounded, when two of their opposites were slain; but the third Horatius, pretending feare, did runne away, and thereby drew the others, who by reason of their hurts, could not follow him with equall speed, to follow him at such distance one from another, that returning upon them, he slew them, as it had been in single fight, man after man, ere they could joyne together and set upon him all at once. Dionysius reports it somewhat otherwise, telling so very particularly, what wounds were given and taken, and saying, that first one of the Horatii was slaine, then one of the Curatii, then a second Horatius, and lastly the two Curatii, whom the third Horatius did cunningly sever the one from the other, as is shewed before.

This is one of the most memorable things in the old Roman Historie, both in regard of the action it selfe, wherein Rome was laid, as it were, in a wager, against Alba, and in respect of the great increase which thereby the Roman State obtained. For the Citie of Alba did immediately become subject unto her owne Colonie, and was shortly after, upon some treacherous dealing of their Governour, utterly razed, the people being removed unto Rome, where they were made Citizens. The strong Nation of the Latines, wherein of Alba, as the mother Citie, had been chiefe, became ere long dependant upon Rome, though not subject unto it, & divers petty States adjacent, were by little and little taken in: which additions, that were finally yet many, I will forbear to rehearse (as being the workes of sundry ages, and few of them remarkable considered apart by themselves) untill such time as this fourth Empire, that is now in the infancie, shall grow to be the main subject of this Historie.

The seventh yeare of Hippomenes in Athens, was current with the first of Manasses. Also the three last Governours for ten yeares, who followed Hippomenes, were in the same Kings time. Of these I finde only names, Leocrates, Absander, and Erixius. After Erixius yearly Rulers were elected.

These Governours for ten yeares, were also of the race of Medon and Codrus, but their time of rule was shortened, and from term of life reduced unto ten yeares; it being thought likely that they would govern the better, when they knew that they were afterwards to live private men under the command of others. I follow Dionysius of Halicarnassus, in applying their times unto those yeares of the Olympiads, wherein the Chronological Table, following this work, doth set them. For he not only professeth himselfe to have taken great care in ordering the reckoning of times; but hath noted always the yeares of the Greeks, how they did answer unto the things of Rome, throughout all the continuance of this Historie. Whereas therefore he placeth the building of Rome, in the first year of the seventh Olympiad, and affirms, that the same was the first yeare of Charops government of Athens; I hope I shall not need excuse, for varying from Pausanias, who sets the beginning of these Athenians somewhat sooner.

In the reign of Manasses it was, that Midas, whom the Poets fained to have had Asses eares, held the kingdome of Phrygia. Many fables were devised of him; especially that he obtained of Bacchus, as a great gift, that all things which he should touch, might immediately be changed into Gold: by which meane he had like to have been starved (his meate and drinke being subject to the same transformation) had not Bacchus delivered him from this miserable facultie, by causing him to wash himselfe in the River Pactolus, the streame whereof hath ever since, forsooth, abounded in that precious metall. Finally, it is said he dyed by drinking Bulls blood; being invaded by the Scythians.

In this age flourished that Antimachus, who (saith Plutarch in the life of Romulus) observed the Moones Eclipse at the foundation of Rome.

The Milesians, or, (as Eusebius hath it) the Athenians having obtained some power by Sea, founded Macedonia a Citie on the East of Egypt. Psammiticus herein seems to have assisted them, who used all meanes of drawing the Greeks into Egypt, accounting them his surest strength. For neither Miletus nor Athens were now of power sufficient to plant a Colonie in Egypt by force.

About

Philos. Euseb.

About this time Archias with his companion Miscellus, and other Corinthians founded Syracusa in Sicilie, a Citie in after times exceeding famous.

* Whence in Strabo there is

The Citie of Nicomedia sometime* Astacus, was enlarged and beautified in this age by Zipartes native of Thrace. Sybilla of Samus, according to Pausanias, lived much about this time.

About these times also was Croton founded upon the Bay of Tarentum by Miscellus, the companion of Archias that built Syracuse. Strabo makes it somewhat more ancient: and so doth Pausanias.

About the same time the Parthenians being of age, and banished Lacedæmon, were conducted by Phalantus into Italie; where it is said they founded Tarentum: but Justine and Pausanias finde it built before, and by them conquered and amplified: and about the same time, Manasse yet living, the Citie Phaselis was founded in Pamphylia, Gela in Sicilie, Interamne in the Region of the Embriv, now Urbini in Italie. About which time also Chalcedon in Asia, over against Byzantium (now Constantinople) was founded by the Megarenses: who therefore were upbraided as blind, because they chose not the other side of Bosphorus. It were a long work to rehearse all that is said to have bin done in the five and fiftie yeares of Manasses: that which already hath been told is enough: the rest being not greatly worth remembrance, may wel be omitted, reserving only Ben Merodach, and Nabulassar, to the business that will shortly require more mention of them.

CHAP. XXVIII.

§. I.

Of Ammon and Josias.

1 Kin. 22.
2 Chron. 33.

Ammon the sonne of Manasse, a man no lesse wicked than was his Father before his conversion, restored the exercise of all sorts of Idolatry: for which God hardened the hearts of his owne servants against him: who slew him after he had reigned two yeares. Phil. Eusebius, and Nicephorus give him ten yeares, following the Septuagint.

2 Chron. 34.

Josias succeeded unto Ammon, being but a child of 8. yeares old, he began to seek after the God of David his Father; and in his twelfth yeare he purged Juda and Jerusalem from the high places, and the groves, and the carved and molten Images: and they brake downe in his sight the Altars of Baalim: He caused all the Images, as well those which were graven, as molten, to be stamped to powder, and strewed on their graves that had erected them; and this he commanded to be done throughout all his dominions. He also slew those that sacrificed to the Sun and Moon, and caused the Chariots and horses of the Sun to be burnt. Of Josias it was prophesied in the time of Jeroboam the first, when he erected the Golden Calfe at Bethel, that a child should be born unto the house of David, Josias by name, and upon thee (said the Prophet speaking to the Altar) shall he sacrifice the Priests of the high places, that burne incense upon thee: a propheticke very remarkable.

1 Kin. 23.

In the eighteenth yeare of his raigne, he re-built and repaired the Temple, at which time Helkiah the Priest found the Booke of Moses, called Deuteronomie, or, of the Law, which he sent to the King: which when he had caused to be read before him, and considered of the severe commandments therein written, the prosperitie promised to those that observe them, and the sorrow and extirpation to the rest, he reat his garments, and commanded Helkiah, and others, to aske counsell of the Prophetesse Huldah; or, Olda, concerning the Booke, who answered the messengers in these words: Thus saith the Lord, Behold, I will bring evill upon this place, and upon the inhabitants thereof, even all the curses that are written in the Book, which they have read before the King of Juda, because they have forsaken me, and burnt incense to other gods. Only for the King himselfe, because he was a lover of God and his Lawes, it was promised that this evill should not fall on Juda and Jerusalem in his dayes, but that he himselfe should inherit his grave in peace.

Josias assembled the Elders, caused the Booke to be read unto them, made a covenant with the Lord, and caused all that were found in Jerusalem and Benjamin to doe the like, promising thereby to observe the Lawes and Commandments in the Book contained.

The execution done by Josias upon the Altar, idols, monuments, and bones of the false Prophets at Bethel, argueth his Dominion to have extended unto those Countries, that had beene part of the Kingdome of the ten Tribes. Yet I doe not thinke, that any victory of Josias in war got possession of these places; but rather that Ezechias, after the flight & death of Sennacherib, when Merodach opposed himselfe against Asarhaddon, did use the advantage which the faction in the North presented unto him, and laid hold upon so much of the Kingdome of Israel, as he was able to people. Otherwise also it is not improbable, that the Babylonian finding himselfe unable to deale with Psammetichus in Syria (as wanting power to raise the siege of Alexis, though the Towne held out nine & twenty yeares) did give unto Manasses, together with his liberty, as much in Israel as himselfe could not easily defend. This was a good way to breake the amity that the Kings of Juda had so long held with those of Egypt, by casting a bone between them, and withall by this benefit of enlarging their Territories with addition of more than they could challenge, to redeem the friendship of the Jewes, which had been lost by injuries done in seeking to bereave them of their owne. When it is said, that Manasses did after his deliverance from imprisonment, put Captaines of War in all the strong Cities of Juda, it may be that some such business is intimated, as the taking possession, and fortifying of places delivered into his hands. For though it be manifest that he tooke much paines, in making Jerusalem it selfe more defensible; yet I should rather belevee, that he, having already compounded with the Babylonian, did fortifie himselfe against the Egyptians, whose side he had forsaken, than that he travelled in making such provisions only for his mindes sake. The earnestnesse of Josias in the King of Babel his quarrell, doth argue, that the composition which Manasses had made with that King or his Ancestor, was upon such friendly termes, as required not onely a faithfull observance, but a thankfull requital. For no persuasions could suffice to make Josias sit still, and hold himselfe quiet in good neutrality, when Pharao Necho King of Egypt passed along by him, to war upon the Countries about the River of Euphrates.

The last yeer of Josias his reigne it was, when as Necho the son of Psammetichus, came with a powerfull Army towards the border of Judea, determining to passe that way, being the nearest toward Euphrates, either to strengthen the passages of that River about Carchemish, or Cercusium, for the defence of Syria (as long after this, Dioclesian is said by Ammianus Marcellinus to have done,) or perhaps to invade Syria it selfe. For it seemeth that the travaile of Psammetichus had not beene idly consumed about that one Towne of Alexis, but had put the Egyptians in possession of no small part of Syria, especially in those quarters, that had formerly belonged unto the Adades Kings of Damasco.

Neither was the industry of Necho lesse than his Fathers had bin, in pursuing the war against Babel. In which warre, two things may greatly have availed the Egyptians, and advanced their affaires and hopes: the extraordinary valour of the mercenary Greekes, that were far better Souldiers than Egypt of it selfe could afford; & the danger wherein Assyria stood, by the force of the Medes, which under the command of more absolute Princes, began to feele it selfe better; and to shew what it could doe. These were great helps, but of shorter endurance than was the warre; as in place more convenient shall be noted. At the present it seems, that either some preparation of the Chaldeans to reconquer, did enforce, or some disability of theirs to make resistance, did invite the King of Egypt, into the Countries bordering upon Euphrates; whither Pharao Necho ascended with a mighty Army.

These two great Monarchs, having their swords drawne, and contending for the Empire of that part of the World, Josias advised with himselfe to which of these he might adhere, having his Territory set in the mid-way between both, so as the one could not invade the other; but that they must of necessity tread upon the very face and body of his Country. Now though it were so that Necho himselfe desired by his Embassadors, leave leave to passe along by Judea, protesting that he directed himselfe against the Assyrians only, without all harmefull purpose against Josias; yct all sufficed not, but the King of Israel would needs fight with him.

Many examples there were, which taught, what little good the friendship of Egypt could bring to those that had affiance therein: as that of Hosea the last King of Israel, who when he fell from the dependance of the Assyrian, and wholly trusted to Sabacus, or Sons King of Egypt, was utterly disappointed of his hopes, and in conclusion lost both his life and estate, which the Assyrian so rooted up and tare in pieces, as it could never after be gathered together or replanted. The calamities also that fell upon Juda in the thirteenth and fourteenth years of Ezechia, whilest that good king and his people relied upon Seibon; and more lately, the imprisonment of Manasses, were documents of sufficient proofe, to shew the ill assurance, that was in the helpe of the Egyptians, who (neare neighbors though they were) were alwaies unreadie, when the necessities of their friends required their assistance. The remembrance hereof might be the reason why Neco did not seeke to have the Jewes renew their ancient league with him, but only craved that they would be contented to sit still, and behold the pastime between him and the Assyrians. This was an easie thing to grant; seeing that the countenance of such an Assyrian did, soone after this, out-face Nabulassar upon his own borders, left unto the Jewes, a lawfull excuse of feare, had they forborne to give it any checke upon the way. Wherefore I beleeve that this religious and vertuous Prince Josias, was not stirred up only by 20 politick respects, to stop the way of Neco; but thought himself bound in faith and honor, to doe his best in defence of the Babylonian Crown; whereunto his Kingdome was obliged, either by covenant made at the enlargement of Manasses, or by the gift of such part as he held in the Kingdome of the ten Tribes. As for the Princes and people of Juda, they had now a good occasion to shew, both unto the Babylonians, of what importance their friendship was, and to the Egyptians what a valiant Nation they had abandoned, and thereby made their enemie.

Some think that this action of Josias was contrary to the advice of Jeremie the Prophet, which I doe not find in the Prophecie of Jeremie, nor can find reason to beleeve. Others hold opinion that he forgot to ask the counsell of God: and this is very likely; seeing he 30 might beleeve that an enterprize grounded upon fidelitie and thankfulness due to the King of Babel, could not but be displeasing unto the Lord. But the wickedness of the people (in whom the corruptions of former times had taken such root, as all the care of Josias in reforming the Land, could not pluck up) was questionlesse far from hearkening how the matter would stand with Gods pleasure, and much farther from enquiring into his secret will, wherein it was determined that their good king, whose life stood between them and their punishment, should now be taken from among them, and that in such sort, as his death should give an entrance to the miseries ensuing. So Josias levying all the strength he could make, neare unto Megiddo, in the halfe Tribe of Manasses, encountered Neco; and there he received the stroke of death, which lingring about him till he came to Jerusalem, 40 brought him to the Sepulchres of his Ancestors. His losse was greatly bewailed of all the people and Princes of Juda, especially of Jeremie the Prophet, who inserted a sorrowfull remembrance thereof in his Book of Lamentations.

§. II.

Of Pharao Neco that fought with Josias: Of Jehoahaz and Jehojakim Kings of Israel.

Of these warres, and particularly of this victorie, Herodotus hath mention among 50 the acts of Neco. He tels us of this King, that he went about to make a channell, whereby Ships might passe out of Nilus into the Red Sea. It should have reached above an hundred miles in length, and been wide enough for two Gallies to row in front. But in the middle of the worke, an Oracle foretold that the Barbarians should have the benefit of it, which caused Neco to desist when halfe was done. There were consumed in this toyle some businesse twelve hundred thousand Egyptians; a losse great enough to make the King forsake his enterprize, without troubling the Oracle for admonition. Howsoever it were, he was not a man to be idle; therefore he built a Fleet, and and levied a great Armie, wherewith he marched against the King of Babel. In this expedition, he used the service, as well of his Navie, as of his land-forces; but no particular exploits of his therein are found recorded, save only this victorie against Josias, where 10 Herodotus calls the place Magdolos, and the Jewes Syrians; which is a small error, seeing that Judea was a Province of Syria, and Magdolos or Magdala is taken to have bin the same place (though diversly named) in which this battell was fought. After this, Neco himselfe Lord, in a manner, of all Syria, as Josephus witnesseth. Jos. Ant. Jud. lib. 10. cap. 7.

Particularly we find, that the Phenicians, one of the most powerful Nations in Syria, Herod. 4. were his Subjects, and that by his command they surrounded all Africa, setting sail from 10 the gulf of Arabia, and so passing along all the coast, whereon they both landed, as need required, and sowed corne for their sustenance in that long voyage, which lasted three years. This was the first Navigation about Africa, wherein that great Cape, now called of good Hope, was discovered, which after was forgotten, until Vasco de Gama the Portingall found it out, following a contrarie course to that which the Phenicians held; for they, beginning in the East, ranne the way of the Sun, South and then Westward, after which they returned home by the pillars and streights of Hercules (as the name was then) 20 called now the streights of Gibraltar, having Africke still on the right hand; but the Portingalls, beginning their voyage not far from the same streights, leave Africke on the Larbord, and bend their course unto the East. That report of the Phenicians, which Herodotus durst not beleeve, how the Sun in this journey was on their right hand, that is, on the North side of them, is a matter of necessary truth; and the observation then made hereof, makes me the better to beleeve, that such a voyage was indeed performed. But leaving these discourses of Neco his magnificence, let us tell what he did, in matters more importing his Estate. The people of Juda, while the Egyptians were busie at Charchemish, had made Jehoahaz their King, in the room of his father Josias. The Prophet 30 Jerome calls this new King Shallum, by the name of his younger brother; alluding perhaps to the short reigne of Shallum King of the ten Tribes: for Shallum of Israel reigned but one month; Jehoahaz no more than three. He was not the eldest son of Josias: Wherefore it may seem that he was set up as the best affected unto the King of Babel; the rest of his house being more inclined to the Egyptians, as appears by the sequel. An 40 Idolater he was, and thrived accordingly. For when as Neco had dispatched his business in the North parts of Syria, then did he take order for the affaires of Judea. This Countie was now so far from making any resistance, that the King himselfe came from Riblah in the land of Hamath, where the matter went so ill on his side, that Neco did cast him into bonds, and carry him prisoner into Egypt, giving away his Kingdome to Eliakim his elder brother, to whom of right it did belong. The Citie of Riblah, in after times called Antiochia, was a place unhappy to the Kings and Princes of Juda, as may be observed in divers examples. Yet here Jehojakim, together with his new-name, got his 50 Kingdome; an ill gain, since he could no better use it. But how-ever Jehojakim thrived by the bargain, Pharao sped well, making that Kingdome Tributarie, without any stroke stricken; which three moneths before was too stout to give him peace, when he desired it. Certaine it is, that in his march outward, Neco had a greater taske lying upon his hands, than would permit him to waite his forces upon Judea; but now the reputation of his good success at Megiddo, and Charchemish, together with the diffention of the Princes Josias his sonnes (of whom the eldest is probably thought to have stormed at the preferment of his younger brother) gave him power to doe even what should please himselfe. Yet he did forbear to make a conquest of the Land, perhaps upon the same reason, which had made him so earnest in seeking to hold peace with it. For the Jewes 60 had suffered much in the Egyptians quarrell, and being left by these their friends, in time of need, unto all extremities, were driven of necessitie to forsake that partie, and to joyn with the enemies; to whom if they shewed themselves faithfull, who could blame them? It was therefore enough to reclaim them; seeing they were such a people as would not upon every occasion shift side, but endure more than Pharao, in the pride of his victories, thought that any henceforth should lay upon them: so good a Patron did he meane to be unto them. Neverthelesse he laid upon them a Tribute, of an hundred Talents of silver, and one Talent of gold; that so he might both reap the present some fruit of his paines taken, and leave unto them some document in the future, of greater greater punishment than verball anger, due to them, if they should rebell. So he departed, carrying along with him into Egypt the unfortunate King Jehoaabaz, who died in his Captivity.

The reign of Jehoaabaz was included in the end of his Fathers last yeare; otherwise it would hardly be found, that Jehojakim his successor, did reign ten whole yeares; whereas the Scriptures give him eleven, that are current and incomplete. If any man will rather cast the three moneths of this short reign, into the first yeare of the brother, than into the fathers last; the same arguments that shall maintaine his opinion, will also prove the matter to be unworthie of dispute; and so I leave it.

Jehojakim in impietie was like his brother, in faction he was altogether Egyptian, as having received his Crown at the hand of Pharao. The wickednesse of these last Kings, being expressed in Scriptures none otherwise, than by generall words, with reference to all the evill that their Fathers had done; makes it apparent, that the poyson wherewith Abaaz and Manasse had infected the Land, was not so expelled by the zealous goodnesse of Josias, but that it still cleaved unto the chiefe of the people, Tea unto the Priest: alis; and therefore it was not strange, that the Kings had their parts therein. The Royall authoritie was much abated by the dangers wherein the Countrey stood, in this trouble-some age: the Princes did in a manner what they listed; neither would the Kings forbear to professe, that they could deny them nothing. Yet the beginning of Jehojakim had the countenance of the Egyptian to grace it, which made him insolent and cruel, as we finde by that example of his dealing with Uria the Prophet: though herein also the Princes do appeare to have been instigators. This holy man denounced Gods judgments against the Citie and Temple, in like sort as other Prophets had formerly done, and did in the same age. The King with all the men of power, and all the Princes, hearing of this, determined to put him to death. Hereupon the poore man fled into Egypt: but such regard was had unto Jehojakim, that Uria was delivered unto his Embassadour, and sent backe to the death; contrarie to the custome used, both in those dayes, and since among all civill Nations, of giving refuge unto strangers, that are not held guiltie of such inhumane crimes, as for the generall good of mankind should be exempted from all privilege.

It concerned Pharao to give all contentment possible to Jehojakim: for the Assyrian Lyon, that had not stirred in many yeares, began about these times to roare so loud upon the banks of Euphrates, that his voice was heard unto Nilus, threatening to make himselfe Lord of all the Forreist. The causes that hitherto had withdrawn the house of Merodach from opposing the Egyptian in his conquest of Syria, require our consideration in this place; before we proceed to commit them together at Carchemish, where shortly after this the glory of Egypt is to fall.

§. III.

Of the Kings of Babylon and Media. How it came to passe, that the Kings of Babel could not give attendance on their businesse in Syria; which caused them to lose that Province.

Merodach the sonne of Baladan, who taking the advantage that *Senacherib*s misadventure and death, together with the dissention between his children, presented, made himselfe King of Babylon, was eleven yeares troubled with a powerfull Enemy, Asarhaddon the son of Senacherib, reigning over the Assyrians in Nineve, from whom whilst he could not any other way divert his cares, he was faine to omit all businesse in Syria, and (as hath beene formerly shewed) to make over unto Ezechias, some part of the Kingdome of the ten Tribes. From this molestation, the death of Asarhaddon did not only set him free, but gave unto him some part of Syria, if not (as is commonly, but lesse probably thought) the whole Kingdome. How greatly this was to the liking of the Assyrians, I will not here stand to enquire: his long reigne following, & his little intermeddling in matters of Syria, make it plain, that he had work enough at home, either in defending or in establishing that which he had gotten. Josaphat gives him the honour of having wonne Nineve it selfe, which we may believe; but surely he did not hold it long. For in the times soone following, that great Citie was free, and vanquished Phraortes the Median. Perhaps it yielded upon some capitulation: and and refused afterwards to continue subject, when the Kings, being of the Chaldean race, preferred Babylon before it.

Some thinke that this was the Assyrian King, whose Captaine tooke Manasse prisoner; but I rather beleeve those that hold the contrary, for which I have given my reasons in due place. To say truth, I finde little cause why Merodach should have looked into those parts, as long as the Jewes were his friends, and the Egyptians, that maligned the Northern Empire, held themselves quiet at home, which was untill the time of Psammetichus, about the end of this Kings Reigne, or the beginning of his son.

Ben Merodach the son and successour of this King, is not mentioned in the Scriptures; yet is he named by good consent of Authors, and that speake little of his doings. The length of his Reigne is gathered by inference to have bene one and twenty yeeres; for so much remaineth of the time that passed betwene the beginning of his Fathers and his Nephewes Reignes (which is a knowne summe) deducting the yeeres of his Father, and of his sonne Nabulassar. This (as I take it) was he that had Manasse Prisoner, and released him. Hee sped ill in Syria; where Psammetichus, by the vertue of his Mercenary Greekes, did much prevaille. This may have been some cause that hereafter Manasse, and did put into his hands some part more of the Kingdome of Samaria: which is made probable by circumstances alledged before.

Nabulassar that reigned in Babylon after his father Ben Merodach, had greater businesse in his owne Kingdome, than would permit him to looke abroad: inso much as it may be thought to have been a great negligence or over-sight of Psammetichus & Neco, that they did not occupy some good part of his Dominions beyond Euphrates. For it was in his time, that Phraortes King of the Medes invaded Assyria, and besieged Nineve; from whence he was not repelled by any force of Nabulassar, but constrained to remove by the coming of the Scythians, who in these ages did overflow those parts of the world, laying hold upon all that they could master by strong hand. Of these Scythians, and the Lordship that they held in Asia, it is convenient that I speak in this place; shewing briefly afore-hand, how the Medes, upon whom they first fell, were busied in the same times with hopes of conquering Assyria.

Phraortes, the sonne of Deioces, King of the Medes, having by many victories enlarged his Dominions, conceived at length a faire possibility of making himselfe Lord of Nineve.

That City (as Herodotus reports it) having been a Sovereigne Lady, was not forsaken of all her dependants; yet remained in such case, that of her selfe she was well enough.

This makes it plain, that howsoever Merodach had gotten possession of this imperiall seat, and made it subject as was the rest of the Countrey; yet it found the means to set it selfe at liberty: as after this againe it did, when it had been regained by Nabulassar his Grande-child.

Sharpe warre, and the very novelty of suddaine violence, use to dismay any State or Country, not inured to the like: but custome of danger hardeneth even those that are unwarlike. Nineve had been the Palace of many valiant Kings lately reigning therein; it had suffered, and resisted, all the fury, wherewith either Domestickall tumults between the sons of Senacherib, or forreigne war of the Babylonians, could afflict it: and therefore it is the lesse wonderfull, that Phraortes did speed so ill in his journey against it. He and the most of his Army perished in that expedition: whereof I finde no particular circumstances (perhaps hee undervalued their forces, and brought a lesse power than was needfull.) It is enough, that herein we may beleeve Herodotus.

Cyaxares the son of Phraortes, a braver man of war than his Father, was as much of Asia the lesse, as lay Eastward, from the River of Halys; hee sought revenge upon the Assyrians for the death of his father, & besieged Nineve it selfe, having a purpose to destroy it. I rather beleeve Eusebius, that hee tooke the City, and fulfilled his displeasure upon it, than Herodotus, that the Scythian Army came upon him whilst hee lay before it. For where equall authorities are contradictory (as Eusebius, though far later than Herodotus, yet having seen other Authors that are now lost, it is to be valued according to his great reading) there do I hold it best, to yeeld unto the best likelihoods.

To thinke that the Scythians came upon Cyaxares, whilst he lay before Nineve, were to accuse him of greater improvidence, than ought to be suspected in one commended as a good Souldier. But to suppose that he was faine to leave the Towne, when a Warre so dangerous fell upon his owne Country, doth well agree both with the condition of such businesse as that Scythian expedition brought into those parts, and with the State of the Chaldean and Assyrian affaires ensuing.

The destruction of this great City is both foretold in the Booke of Tobit, and there set down as happening about these times; of which book whosoever was the Author, he was ancient enough to know the Story of those ages, & hath committed no such error in reckoning of times, as should cause us to distrust him in this. As for the Prophecie of Nabum, though it be not limited unto any certaine terme, yet it appears to have taken effect, in the finall destruction of Nineve by Nabuchodonosor, according to the common opinion. For the Prophet hath mention of a conquest of Egypt, foregoing this calamity, to whereof we will speake in due place. Some that ascribe more authority than the reformed Churches yield, to the booke of Tobit, are carefull, as in a matter of necessity, to asseme, that about these times, Nineve was taken; but they attribute (conjecturally) the victory over it to Ben Merodach: a needles conjecture, if the place of Eusebius bewel considered. Yet I hold it probable, that Nabulassar the son of Ben Merodach, did seize upon it, and place a King or Vice-roy therein, about such time as the Country of Assyria was abandoned by Cyaxares, when the Scythian Warre over-whelmed Media. For then was the Conquest wrought out ready to his hand; the swelling spirks of the Ninevites were allayed, and their malice to Babylon so much asswaged, that it might be though a great favour, if Nabulassar, appointing unto them a peculiar King, tooke him & to them into protection: though afterwards to their confusion, this unthankfull People and their King rebelled againe, as shall be shewed in the Reigne of Nabuchodonosor.

§. I V.

The great expedition of the Scythians, who ruled in Asia eight and twenty yeeres.

†. I.
The time of this expedition.

NOW that I have shewed what impediment was given by the Assyrians and the Medes, to the Babylonians, who thereby were much disabled to performe any action of worth upon the Egyptians in Syria; it is time that I speake of that great Scythian expedition, which grievously afflicted not only the Babylonians, but the Medes & Lydians, with the Countries adjacent, in such wise, that part of the trouble redounded even to the Egyptians themselves. Of the Scythian people in generall, Herodotus makes very large discourse, but interlaced, as of matter ill knowne, with many Fables; of this expedition he tels many particulars, but ill agreeing with consent of time. Concerning his fabulous reports, it will be needlesse to recite them; for they are farre enough distant from the businesse in hand. The computation of times which by inference out of his relations, may seeme very strange, needeth some answer in this place: lest otherwise I should either seeme to make my selfe too bold with an Author, in citing him after a manner different from his owne tale; or else to bee too forgetfull of my selfe, in bringing to act upon the Stage, those persons, which I had already buried. Eight and twenty yeeres, hee saith, that the Scythians reigned in Asia, before Cyaxares delivered the Countrey from them. Yet hee reports a warre betweene Cyaxares and Halyattes the Lydian, as foregoing the siege of Nineve; the siege of Nineve being ere the Scythians came. And further he tels, how the Scythians, having vanquished the Medes, did passe into Syria, and were encountered in Palestina by Psammiticus King of Egypt, who by gifts and entreaty procured them to depart from him. These narrations of Herodotus may, every one of them, be true; though not in such order of time, as he hath marshalled them. For Psammiticus was dead before Cyaxares began to reigne: and Cyaxares had spent halfe of his forty yeeres, ere Halyattes was King of Lydia, so that hee could not, after those Lydian Warres, reigne eight and twenty yeeres together with the Scythians. It is true, that Eusebius doth also call Psammis the sonne of Phrao Neco, by the name of Psammiticus; and this King Psammis may, by some strained conjecture, be thought to have bene he that met with the Scythians: for he liveth with.

with both Cyaxares and Halyattes. But Eusebius himselfe referres all that businesse of the Scythian irruption into Palestina, to Psammiticus the Father of Neco, whom he leaves dead before the Reigne of Halyattes. Therefore I dare not relye upon Herodotus, in this matter, otherwise than to beleieve him, that such things were in these ages, though not in such order as he sets them downe.

It remains, that I collect as well as I can, those memorials which I finde of this expedition scattered in divers places: a worke necessary, for that the greatneesse of this action was such, as ought not to be omitted in a generall History; yet not easie, the consent of those that have written thereof, being nothing neare to uniformity.

I have noted before, that in the reigne of Arads King of Lydia, the Cimmerians overran that Kingdome, and were not expelled, untill Halyattes the Nephew of Arads got the upper hand of them. In these times therefore of Arads, Sadiattes, and Halyattes, are we to finde the eight and twenty years, wherein the Scythians reigned over Asia. Now so much as Psammiticus the Egyptian had some dealings with the Scythians, even in the height of their prosperity, we must needs allow more than one or two of his last yeeres unto this their Dominion. But the beginning of Halyattes his Reigne in Lydia, being three and twenty yeeres compleat after the death of Psammiticus, leaves the space very scant, either for the great victories of the Scythians, necessarily supposed before they could meete the Egyptian in Syria, or for those many losses, which they must have received ere they could be driven quite away. To increase this difficulty, the victorious Reigne of Nabuchodonosor in Babylon, is of no small moment. For how may we thinke it possible, that hee should have adventured the strength of his Kingdome against the Egyptians & Jewes, had he stood in daily feare of losing his owne, to a more mighty nation, that lay upon his necke? To speake simply as it appears to me, the victories ascribed to Cyaxares and Halyattes over these warlike people, were not obtained against the whole body of their Army, but were the defeatures of some troopes, that infected their severall Kingdomes; other Princes, and among these, Nabulassar, having the like successe, when the pleasures of Asia had mollified the courages of these hardy Northern Laddes. Wherefore we may probably annexe the eight and twenty years of the Scythians rule, to as many almost the last of Nabulassar's Reigne, in compasse whereof their power was at the greatest. This is all that I can say of the time, wherein Asia suffered the violence of their oppressors.

†. II.

What Nations they were that brake into Asia; with the cause of their Journie.

TOUCHING the expedition it selfe, Herodotus tels us, that the Cimmerians being driven out of their Country by the Scythians, invaded and wasted some part of Asia; & that the Scythians, not contented with having won the land of the Cimmerians, did follow them; I know not why, into farre removed quarters of the world, so (as it were by chance) falling upon Media & Egypt, in this pursuit of men that were gone another way into Lydia. Hereby we may gather that the Cimmerians were an odious & base people; the Scythians, as mischievous & foolish; or else Herodotus, & some other of this Country-men, great slanderers of those, by whom their Nation had been beaten, and Ionia, more than once, grievously ranfact. The great valour of the Cimmerians or Cimbrians is so well known, and their many Conquests so well testified in Histories of divers Nations, that the malice of the Greekes is insufficient to staine them with the note of Cowards. These were the posterity of Gomer, who peopled the greatest part of our Westerne World; and whose re-flow did overwhelm no small portion of Greece & Asia; well before and after, as in the age whereof we do now entreat. He that would more largely informe himselfe of their original and actions, may peruse Goropius Becanus his Amazonia; of many things in which Booke, that may be verified, which the learned Ortelius is said to have spoken, of all Goropius his works, that it is easie to laugh at them, but hard to confute them: There we finde it proved, by such arguments and authorities, as are not lightly to be regarded, that the Cimmerians, Scythians and Sarmatians, were all of one Linage and Nation; howsoever distinguished in name, by reason of their divers tribes, professions, or perhaps dialect of speech. Homar indeed hath mention of the Cimmerians; whose Country whether he placeth in the West, as neare unto the Ocean and bounds of the Earth, or in the North, as being farre from the Sunne, and covered with eternall darknesse; certain it is that he would have them near neighbours to Hell: for hee had the same quarrell to them which Herodotus had, and therefore belike would have made them seeme a kinde of Goblins. It was the manner of this great Poet (as Herodotus writing his life affirms) to insert into his works the names of such as lived in his owne time, making such mention of them, as the good or ill done by them to himselfe deserved. And for this reason it is proved by Eusebius, that the Cimmerians were so disgraced by him, because they had wasted his Country. Perhaps that invasion of Phrygia by the Amazons, wherof Homer puts a remembrance into Priamus his discourse with Helen, was the very same, which Eusebius noteth to have happened somewhat before the age of Homer, at what time the Cimmerians with the Amazons, together invaded Asia.

This is certain, that both the Amazons & the Cimmerii (who in after-times were called Cimbri) did often breake into Greece and Asia; which though it be not in expresse termes written, that they did with joynnt-forces, yet seeing they invaded the selfe-same places, it may well be gathered, that they were companions. One journey of the Amazons into Greece, mentioned also by Eusebius, was by the streights of the Cimmerians, as we finde in Diodore, who further telleth us, that the Scythians therein gave them assistance. The same Authour, before his entry into those discourses of the Amazons, which himselfe acknowledgeth to be fabulous, doth report them to have bene wives of the Scythians, and no lesse Warre-like than their Husbonds; alledging the example of that Queen who is said to have slaine the great Persian Cyrus. That it was the manner of the Cimbri to carry their wives along with them to the warres; and how desperate the courage was of those Women; the terrible descent of them into Italy, when Marius the Romane overthrew them, gives prooffe sufficient. I will not here enter into a discourse of the Amazons; another place will give me better leisure to speake of them: but seeing that they are noted by divers Historians to have belonged unto the Cimmerians, to the Scythians, and to the Sarmatians, we may therefore the better approve Goropius his conclusion, That these three nations were one, at least that they were neare allies.

Now as concerning the expulsion of the Cimmerians by the Scythians, it appeares to have bene none other than the sending a Colony of them forth into Asia, with an Army of Scythians to helpe them, in purchasing a new seat, and establishing the plantation.

The Sarmatians also were companions in this journey. For the City of Novogradin Russia (which Country is the same that was called Sarmatia) stood in their way homewards, as shall anon bee further shewed. So that all the North was up in Armes: and therefore it is no marvell though many Countries felt the weight of this great inundation. Such another voyage was that, which the same people made five hundred years and more after this, when they were encountered by the Romans. For they issued from the parts about the Lake Maotus; they were then likewise assisted (saith Plutarch in the most likely report of them) by the Scythians their neighbours; they had in their Armie above three hundred thousand fighting men, besides a huge multitude of women and children: they wandered over many Countries, beating all downe before them; and finally, thinking to have settled themselves in Italy, they divided their Company, for the more easie passage thither, and were consumed in three terrible battailes by the Roman Consuls. Meere necessity enforced these poore Nations to trouble the World, in following such hard adventures. For their Country being more fruitfull of men than of sustenance, and shut up on the North side with intolerable cold, which denied issue that way to their over-swelling multitudes; they were compelled to discharge upon the South, and by right or wrong to drive others out of possession, as having title to all that they had power to get, because they wanted all, that weaker, but more civill, people had. Their sturdy bodies, patient of hunger, cold, and all hardnesse, gave them great advantage over such as were accustomed unto a more delicate life, and could not be without a thousand superfluities. Wherefore most commonly they prevailed very farre; their next neighbours giving them free passage, that they might the sooner bee ridde of them; others giving them, besides passage, victuals and guides to conduct them to more wealthy places; others hiring them to depart with great presents; so as the farther they went on, the more pleasant Lands they found, and the more effeminate people.

Of the Cimmerians warre in Lydia.

The first Company of these, consisting for the most part of Cimmerians, held the way of the Euxine Seas, which they had still on the right hand; leaving on the other side, & behinde them, the great Mountains of Caucasus. These having passed through the Land of Colchis, that is now called Mengrelli, entered the Country of Pontus, & being arrived in Paphlagonia, fortified the Promontory, whereon Synope, a famous Haven Towne of the Greeks, was after built. Here it seemes that they bestowed their carriages, under some good guard: as drawing near to those Regions, in conquest wherof they were to trie the utmost hazzard. For in like sort afterwards did the Cimbri (of whom I spake even now) dispose of their impediments, leaving them in a place of strength, where Antwerpe now stands, when they drew neare unto Gaule, uppon which they determined to adventure themselves in the purchase. From Sinope, the way unto Phrygia, Lydia, and Ionia, was faire and open to the Cimmerians, without any ledge of Mountaines, or any deep Rivers at all to stay their march: for Iris and Halys they had already passed.

What battels were fought between these invaders and the Lydians, & with what variable successe the one or other part wanne and lost, I finde not written, nor am able to conjecture. This I find, that in the time of Arads, the Cimmerians got possession of Sardes the capitall City of Lydia; only the Castle holding out against them. Further I observe, that whereas Herodotus tells of the acts performed by Gyges and Arads Kings of Lydia, before this invasion, and by Halyattes and Crasus in the times following, all that Arads did against the Cimmerians, and all, save burning the Milesians Corn fields, that was done in twelve years by Sadyattes his Son (who perhaps had his hands so full of this businesse, that he could turne them to nothing else) is quite omitted: whereby it may seeme, that neither of the two did any thing worthy of remembrance in those wars, but were glad enough that they did lose all.

Certainly the miseries of war are never so bitter and many, as when a whole Nation, or great part of it, forsaking their owne seats, labour to root out the established possessor of another Land; making roome for themselves, their wives and children. They that fight for the mastery, are pacified with tribute, or with some other services and acknowledgements; which had they bene yielded at the first, all had been quiet, and no sword bloodied. But in these migrations, the assailants bring so little with them, that they need all which the defendants have, their Lands and Cattell, their houses and their goods, even to the cradles of the sucking infants. The mercilesse termes of this controversie arme both sides with desperate resolution: seeing the one part must either winne, or perish by famine; the other defend their goods, or lose their lives without redemption. Most of the Countries in Europe have felt examples thereof; and the mighty Empire of Rome was overthrowne by such invasions. But our Isle of Britaine can best witness the diversity of Conquests; having by the happy victory of the Romans, gotten the knowledge of all Civill Arts, in exchange of liberty, that was but slenderly intrusted therein before; whereas the issue of the Saxon and Danish Wars, was, as were the causes, quite contrary. For these did not seeke after the Dominion only, but the entire possession of the Country, which the Saxons obtained, but with horrible cruelty, eradicating all of the British Race, & defacing all memoriall of the ancient inhabitants through the greater part of the Land. But the Danes (who are also of the Cimmerian blood) found such end of their enterprize, as it may seem that the Cimmerians in Lydia, & Scythians in the higher Asia, did arrive unto. So that by considering the proesse of the one, we shall the better conceive the fortune of the other. Many battailes the Danes wonne; yet none of such importance, as sufficed to make them absolute Conquerours: Many the Saxons won upon the Danes, yet not so great, as could drive them quite away, and backe from hence, after they had gotten firme footing. But in course of time, the long continuance even of utter enmity, had bred such acquaintance betweene them, as bowing the natures of both the people, made the one more pliant unto the other. So their disagreeable qualities, both ill and good, being reduced into one milde temper, no small number of the Danes became peaceable cohabitants with the Saxons in England, where great slaughter had made large room; others returning home, found their owne Country wide enough to receive them, as having disburthened it selfe of many thousands, that were sent to seeke their graves abroad. And such (as I thinke) was the end of the Cimmerian warre in Lydia; whereunto though some victory of Halysates may have hastened the conclusion, yet the wearisome length of time seems to have done most, in compelling them to desire of rest. I know not why I should leave to adde hereunto my further conjecture; which is, that the matter was so compounded between the Cimmerians & Halysates, that the River of Halys should divide their Territories. For Halys was henceforth the border of the Lydians, and on the Easterne side of the River was the Country of the Amazons, that is indeed, of the Cimmerians and other Scythian people; whose wives and daughters these warlike women are supposed to have been.

And hereunto the quarrell ensuing betweene Halysates and Cyaxares the Mede, hath very good reference. For Halysates (as is said) fought in defence of certain Scythians, upon whom the Median sought revenge. And it stands with reason, that the Lydians and Cimmerians, being much weakened with mutuall slaughters, should have joyned in a league of mutuall defence for their common safety: though otherwise it had been dangerous to Halysates, if hee had permitted the Median to extend his Kingdome so farre Westward, whatsoever the pretences might be, of taking revenge upon such as had spoiled each of their Countries. As for that occasion of the Warre betweene these two Kings, which Herodotus relates, I finde it of little waight, and lesse probability. He tells of Scythians, that being chased out of their Country by faction, came unto Cyaxares; who committed unto them certaine Boyes, to be instructed in the Scythian tongue, and feare of Archery. Now it so fell out (saith he) that these Scythians using much to hunt, & commonly bringing home somewhat with them, did neverthelesse other-whiles misse of their game, and came home as they went. Hereupon the King being froward & cholericke, bitterly reviled them; & they, as impatient as he, killed one of the Boyes; that was under their charge, whom dressing like Venison, they presented unto him; which done, they fledde unto Halysates. This Herodotus delivers, as the ground of a war that lasted sixe yeeres betweene the Medes and Lydians; the one King demanding these fugitives to be delivered into his hand, the other refusing to betray such men as were become his suppliants. To this I will say no more, than that I see no cause that might induce the Scythians to betake themselves to either of these Kings, unto whom their Nation had wrought so much displeasure. Particularly, they had reason to distrust Cyaxares, for the treachery that he shewed in the massacring of their Country-men that were in his Kingdome, of whom it is now meet that we should speake.

†. IV.

The Warre of the Scythians in the higher Asia.

AS the Cimmerians held their course westerly, along the shores of the Euxine Sea; so the Scythians & Sarmatians took the other way, & having the Caspian Sea on their left hand, passed between it & Caucasus through Albania, Colchene, and other obscure Nations, where now are the Countries of Servan and Georgia, & so they entered into Media. The Medes encountered them in Armes; but were beaten, & therupon glad to come to any agreement with them. This was in the time of Phraortes, whilst Plammiticus reigned in Egypt. If it were in the sixt yeere of Nabulassars Reigne over Babylon (supposing him to have reigned five & thirty; otherwise we must allow to Ben Merodach what we take from him) then doe the eight & twenty yeeres of their Dominion end, one year before the great Nabuchodonosor was King; so giving him good leave to provide securely for the invasion of Syria; which expedition hee began while his Father yet lived, as Iosephus out of Berephus relates the History.

Now the Medes, desirous to save themselves as well as they might, from this terrible nation, which when they had no lust to a second trial of the sword, refused not to under-goe the burthen of a Tribute, but thought nothing dishonourable, that would serve to remove these troublesome guests into some other lodging. On the other part, the Scythians finding still the Countries pleasanter & better, the further that they marched into the South, did suffer themselves to be perswaded, that a little more travaile would adde a great deale more to their content. For they relied so much upon their owne valour, that they feared no resistance; & being the bravest men, they thought it reason that they should dwell in the best Region. That Phraortes perswaded them into Egypt, I doe not think: Babylon was neare enough; whether if he could send these Locusts to graze, then should not his unfriendly Neighbours have cause to laugh at his misfortune. What shift Nabulassar made with them, or that at all he had any dealings with them, I doe not reade. But it is well known that his Dominions lay in the middest betweene Media & Egypt; as also, that they made all those parts of Asia Tributary; wherefore we may very well believe, that they watered their horses in his Rivers, and that he also was content to give them provender.

Plammiticus hearing of their progresse (like the jealous Husband of a faire Wife) took care that they might not looke upon Egypt; lest the sight thereof should more easily detain them there, than any force or perswasion that hee could use, would send them going. Therefore hee met them in Syria, presuming more on the great gifts which he meant to bestow upon them, than on his Army that should keepe them backe. Egypt was rich; and halfe the riches had not been ill spent in saving all. Yet Plammiticus tooke the most likely course, whereby to make his part good against them by strong hand, in case they had been so obstinate as to refuse all indifferent composition. For he lay close upon the edge of the Wildernesse in Gaza (as I take it) the Southermost border of Palestina: whence he never advanced to meete with the Scythians; but gave them leave to feede as much of the scalding Sunne-beames, ill agreeing with their temper, as all the length of Syria could beare upon them. When they were come as farre as Ascalon, the next City to Gaza, then did he assay them with goodly words, accompanied with gifts, which were likely to work so much the better, by how much the worse they were pleased with the heate of a Climate so farre different from their owne. Plammiticus had at his backe a vast wildernesse, over the scorching sands whereof, the Scythians more patient of cold and wet, than of the contrary diffempers, could ill have endured to pursue him through unknowne wayes, had they fought with him and prevailed: especially the Kingdome of Egypt being ready to entertaine him with reliefe, and them with new trouble at the end of their weary journey. Wherefore they were content to be intreated, & taking in good part his courteous offers, returned back to visit their acquaintance in the high Countries: The Egyptian King (besides that hee preserved his owne Estate from a dangerous adventure, by hyring this great Army to depart from him) found all his Coast well repayed in the proceesse of his wars in Syria, where the Nations beyond Euphrates had no power to molest him, being more than ever troubled themselves with the returne of their oppressors. For the Scythians, resolving now to seeke no further, began to demand more than the Tribute formerly imposed. And not contented to fleece the Naturals with grievous exactions, they presumed to live at discretion upon the Country, taking what they listed from the Owners; and many times (as it were to save the labour of taking often) taking all at once. This Tyrannous Dominion they long used over the higher Asia, that is, over the Country lying betweene the Caspian and Red Seas; and betweene India and Asia the lesse. Happy it was for the poore people, that in so large a space of ground, there was room enough for these new comers; otherwise the calamity that fell, as it were by chance, upon those private men, to whose wealth any Scythian did beare a fancy, would have lighted in generall upon all at one clap, leaving few alive, and none able to relieve their fellows. Yet it seemes that the heaviest burthen lay upon Media; for it was a fruitfull Countrey not farre from their owne home, and lay under a Climate well agreeing with the constitution of their bodies; therefore it was that they had the farall blow, by which their insolent Rule was taken from them.

Cyaxares King of the Medes, who in this extremity was no better than a Rent-gatherer for the Scythians, perceiving that his Land lay unmanured and waste, through the negligence of his people, that were out of heart by daily oppressions, and that the matter could not be remedied by open force, resolved to prove what might be done by stratagem. The manging of the businesse is thus delivered in briefe; That he, and his Medes, feasted the better part of the Scythians, made them drunke, and slew them; recovering hereby the possession of all that they had lost.

Such another slaughter was committed upon the Danes in England; but it was revenged by their Countymen, with greater cruelty than ever they had practised before. That the Scythians which escaped this bloody feast, made any stirre in Media, I do not find; neither do I reade that either in revenge hereof, or upon other pretence, the Medes were troubled by invasion from Scythia in time following.

This is the more strange, for that the Army returning home out of Media, was very strong, & encountered with opposition (as Herodotus reports it) no lesse than it had found abroad. Wherefore it may be, that the device of Cyaxares to free his Country, took good effect, with lesse blood-shed than hath been supposed. For if he surpris'd all the chiefe of them, it was no hard matter to make a good composition. Many of them doubtlesse in eight and twenty years had so well settled themselves, that they were desirous of rest, and might be permitted, without any danger, to remaine in the Country; many (of whom I shall speake anon) having done what they could in the businesse, for which they came forth, were willing to returne home with what they had gotten; such as were not pleased with either of these two courses, might goe joyne with the Cimmericians in Lydia, or seeke their fortunes in other Provinces among their owne Companions. Whereas all the Families of the North are said to have bin with Nabuchadnezzar, it may be understood, that a great part of the Scythians, upon hope of gaine, or desire to keepe what they had already gained, were content to become subject unto Nabuchadnezzar: mens love of their wealth being most effectuell, in taming the more unquiet love of inordinate liberty. This is certaine, that Nabuchadnezzar, as ever after, so in his first beginning of warre, did beate the Egyptians, who in ages foregoing had been accustomed to deale with the Babylonians after another fashion: & this new successe of that King may be imputed, in regard of humane meanes, to such addition as this of new forces.

Of the Scythian Army returning out of Media, divers Authors report a Story, which confirms me in the opinion, that this Company went forth to assist their kinned and friends, in acquiring a new feare, and establishing their plantation. For these had left their wives behinde them; a good argument to prove that they meant to come againe. The Scythian women, to comfort themselves in their husbands absence, became bed-fellows to their slaves. These got a lusty brood of youths, that were loth to be troubled with Fathers-in-Law, & therefore prepared to fight with them at their returne. If they were onely the children of slaves, which compounded an Army (as Herodotus would have it, who tels us, that the Scythians were wont to pull out all their bond-mens eyes) it must needs be that they were very Boyes, or else that the Women did very little while continue chaste. Wherefore I rather beleeve that tale as it is told by the Russes themselves, who agreeing in the rest with the content of Histories, make that report of their Ancestors returning homewards, which I will set down, as I finde it in Maister Doctur Fleischer his exact discourse of the Russe Common-wealth. They understood by the way, that their Chiefteyn, or Bond-slaves, whom they left at home, had in their absence possessed their wives, lands, houses, wives, and all. At which newes being somewhat amazed, and yet disdaining the silliness of their servants, they made the more speed home: and so not farre from Novogradmes them in warlike manner marching against them. Whereupon advising what was best to be done, they agreed also to set upon them with no other them of weapon but with their horse-whips (which, as their manner is, every man rideth with) to put them in remembrance of their servile condition, thereby to terrifie them, and abate their courage. And so marching on, slaying all together with their whips in their hands, they gave the onset: which seemed so terrible in the eyes of their Villaines, and strooke such a sense into them of the smart of the whip, which they had felt before, that they fled altogether like Sheep before the Drivers. In memory of this victory, the Novogradians ever since have stamped their Coine (which they call a Dingio Novogradsky, current through all Russia) with the figure of a Horseman shaking a whip aloft in his hand. It may seeme, that all the women of that Country have fared the worse ever since, in regard of the universall fault: for such a Pudkey or whip, as terrified those slaves, curiously wrought by her selfe, is the first present that the Moscovian wife, even in time of wooing, sends to him that shall be her husband, in token of subjection; being well well assured to feele it often on her own loines. But this was a Document unto the Scythians, or rather Sarmatians (for Novograd stands in the Country that was called Sarmatia) to beware of absenting themselves any more so long from their wives; which affter this, I finde not that they did.

This much I thought good to set down of the Scythian expedition; not only because it is the most memorable act performed abroad by that Nation, famous in Histories, and terrible to many Countries; but for that it appears to have been a great cause of the Egyptians prevailing hitherto in Syria, and about Judæa, which continues yet a while the center of our discourse.

§. V.
Of Princes living in divers Countries, in these ages.

Having thus far digressed from the matters of Juda, to avoide all further occasion of doing the like, I will here insert a note of such Kings, and men of mark, as were betwene the death of Manasses, and the ruine of Jerusalem. Of the Egyptians, Babylonians, Medes, and Lydians, I have spoken as much as I thought needfull. In Rome, Tullus Hostilius held the Kingdome, untill the one and twentieth yeere of Josias; at which time Ancus Martius succeeding, reigned foure and twenty yeeres. After him L. Tarquinius Priscus, a new-come stranger, but very rich, prevailed so farre, by his graciousnesse among the people, that he got the Kingdome to himselfe, disappointing the sonnes of Ancus, over whom he was Tutor. He began in the fourth yeere of Zedekias, and reigned eight and thirty yeeres. In this time it was, namely, in the second year of the thirtieth Olympiad, that the Lacedæmonians bethinking them how to be avenged of the Arcadians, who gave succour to the Messenians against them in the former war, entred their Territory, took the City of Phigalia or Phalia, from whence their Garrisons were soone after beaten out. Cypselus expelling the race of the Bacidae, made himselfe Lord of Corinth about these times, & governed it in peace thirty yeeres, leaving for successeur his sonne Periander, one of the seven Sages, but a cruell Tyrant: who among other vile acts, slew his owne wife, & afterwards, as in her honour, stripped all the Corinthian women stark naked, burning their apparell, as an acceptable offering to her Ghost. Hereby we may perceive, that the wisdome of the Greekes was not excellent in those dayes, when such a one as this could bee admired as excelling all the Country.

In these times also were Zaleucus & Draco, famous Lawgivers, the one among the Locrians in Italy, the other in the City of Athens. The Lawes of Draco were so rigorous, that he was said to have written them with blood: for he rewarded every small offence with death. Wherefore his Constitutions were soon abrogated, & power given to Solon by the Athenians, to make new in their stead. But the Lawes of Zaleucus were very mild: He forbade any Gentlewoman to walk abroad with more than one Bond-woman attending on her, unless it were when she was drunke; or to goe forth of the Towne by night, unless it were to some sweet-hearts bed; or to dresse her selfe up in immodest bravery, unless it were to inveigle a lover. By which pleasant Ordinances he effected his desire; for none would feeme, in breaking the Statutes, to be in such case as challenged the dispensation. It is noted in this man as a singular example of justice, that when his own son had committed adultery, and was therefore to lose both his eyes, he did not cause him to be pardoned, but gave one eye of his owne to save the young man (who also lost one) from utter blindness.

I shall not henceforth neede so farre to wander, as hitherto I often have done, in pursuing of actions collateral to the History, for inserting them in their order of time. The Chaldeans will soon fall under the Persians; ere long, encounter with the Greeks; the Greeks, with the Romans; the Romans, with many Nations. Concerning all these, as they shall successively present themselves, in their flourishing Estate, it will be enough to recapitulate the most memorable accidents, that befall them in their Minority. But in the long space of more than thirteen hundred yeeres, which passed betwene the calling of Abraham, and the destruction of Jerusalem, wee finde little matter, wherein the History of Israel had any dealing with other Nations, than the very nearest borderers. Yet read we of many Kingdomes, that in these many ages were erected, and and throwne downe; as likewise, many memorable acts were performed in Greece and elsewhere, though not following one another at any neare distance; all which must have beene quite omitted, or else referred unto a very unseasonable rehearfall, had they not beene disposed in this method, whereof he that will not allow the conveniency, may pardon the necessity.

§. VI.

The oppression of Judaa, and destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans.

NOW to returne to the Jewish Story, from whence we have so farre digressed. In the third year of Jehojakim, Nabuchodonosor the second, his Father yet living, entered Judaa with a great Army, who besieging and forcing Jerusalem, made Jehojakim his Vassall in despite of Necho, that had established him King, and tooke with him for pledges Daniel, being as yet a child, with Ananias, Misael, and Azarias. Also he tooke a part of the Church treasures; but stayed not to search them thoroughly; for Necho hastned to the succour of Jehojakim, hoping to find Nabuchodonosor in Judaa: where in this great Babylonian had no disposition to hazard himselfe and his Army, it being a Country of an evill affection towards him, as also far off from any succour or sure place of retreat. If he had, as may be supposed, any great strength of Scythian horse-men in his Army; it was the more wisely done of him, to fall backe, out of the rough, mountainous, and over-hot Country, into places that were more even and temperate. But besides all these reasons, the death of his father happening at the same time, gave him just occasion to returne home, and take possession of his owne Kingdome, before he proceeded further in the second care, of adding more unto it. This hee did at reasonable good leisure: for the Egyptian was not ready to follow him so farre, and to bid him battaile, untill the new yeere came in; which was the fourth of Jehojakim, the first of Nabuchodonosor, and the last of Necho. In this yeere the Babylonian lying upon the Bank Euphrates (his owne Territory bounding it on the North-side) attended the arrival of Necho. There, after a resolved contention for victory, Necho was slaine, and his Army remaining forced to save it selfe, which full ill it did, by a violent retreat. This victory, Nabuchodonosor so well pursued, as he recovered all Syria, and whatsoever the Egyptians held out of their proper Territory towards the North. The Egyptians being in this conflict beaten, and altogether for the present discouraged, Jehojakim held himselfe quiet, as being friend in heart unto the Egyptian, yet having made his peace with the Chaldean the year before; who contented with such profit as hee could then readily make, had forborne to lay any Tribute upon Juda. But this coole reservednesse of Jehojakim, was, on both sides, taken in ill part. The Egyptian King Psammetichus, who succeeded unto Necho, began to thinke upon restoring Jehoahaz, taken prisoner by his Father, and setting him up as a Domestickall Enemy, against his ungratefull brother. Against all such accidents, the Judaan had prepared the usuall remedy, practised by his fore-fathers: for hee had made his owne sonne Jechonias King with him long before, in the second yeere of his owne Reigne, when the 7th year was but eight years old. As for this rumour of Jehoahaz's returne; the Prophet Jeremy foretold, that it should prove idle, saying: He shall not returne thither, but he shall die in the place whither they have led him captive, and shall see this Land no more. The Egyptians indeede, having spent all their Mercenary forces, and received that heave blow at Carchemish, had not remaining such proportion of sharpe Steele, as of faire gold, which without other helpe, is of little effect. The valour of Necho was not in Psammetichus Apries, who reigning after Psammetichus, did once adventure to shew his face in Syria; but after a bigge looke, hee was glad to retire, without adventuring the hazard of a battaile. Wherefore this decaying Nation fought only with brave words, telling such frivolous tales, as men that meane to doe nothing use, of their glorious acts fore-past, against Josias & Jehoahaz. In this case it was easie for Jehojakim to give them satisfaction, by letting them understanding the sincerity of his affection towards them, which appeared in time following. But Nabuchodonosor went to worke more roundly. He sent a peremptory message to Jehojakim, willing him not to stand upon any nice points, but acknowledge himselfe a Subject, and pay him Tribute: adding hereunto such fearefull threats, as made the poore Judaan lay aside all thought of Jehoahaz, and yeeld to doe, as the more mighty would have him. So hee continued in the obedience of Nabuchodonosor three years. At this time Jeremy the Prophet cried out against the Jewes, putting them in minde that he had now three and twenty yeares exhorted them to repentance, but because they had stopt their eares against him, and the rest of the Prophets, hee now pronounced their captivity at hand, and that they should endure the yoke of bondage full seventy yeares. The same calamity hee threatened to all the neighbouring Nations, to the Egyptians, Moabites, Ammonites, Idumaeans, & the rest; foretelling that they should all drink out of the Babylonian Pitcher, the wine of his fury, whom they had forsaken; and after the seventy yeeres expired, that the Babylonians themselves should taste of the same Cup, and be utterly subverted by the Medes, & Jeremy, 25: 10 the Judaeans permitted to returne againe into their owne Fields and Cities. The first imprisonment of the Prophet Jeremy seemes to have been in the fourth yeere of this Jehojakim, at which time Baruch the Scribe wrote all his Prophecies out of his mouth, whom he sent to reade them unto the People, and afterward to the Princes, who offered them to the King: but fearing the Kings fury, they had first fet Jeremy at liberty, and advised him and Baruch to hide themselves.

Jehojakim, after he heard a part of it & perceived the ill newes therein delivered, made no more adoe, but did cut the Booke in peeces and cast it into the fire. All which Jeremy caused to be new written with this addition; that the dead body of Jehojakim should be cast out, exposed in the day to the heat, and in the night to the frost, & there should be none of his seed to sit on the Throne of David.

Time thus running on, while Jehojakim rested secure of all danger, as Tributary to the Babylonian, yet well thought of by the Egyptian; the mighty City of Tyre opposed it selfe against the Chaldean forces; & upon just confidence of her own strength, despised all preparation that could be made against her. Now forasmuch as the terme of seventy yeeres was prescribed unto the desolation, as well of Tyre, as of Jerusalem, and other towns & countries; it is apparent, that they which referred the expugnation of this City unto the nineteenth yeere of Nabuchodonosor, have sure authority for their warrant. Whereupon likewise it followes of necessity, that the siege thereof began in the seventh of his Reigne; as having lasted thirteen yeeres.

Here I will take leave to intrude a briefe note, concerning the severall beginnings that are reckoned of this great Prince his Rule, whereupon hath risen much disputation. The third yeere of Jehojakim, was the last of Nabulassar, who being delivered from other cares, tooke notice of such as had revolted from him unto Pharao Necho, and sent this Noble Prince his sonne, with an Army into Syria, to reclaime them. In this expedition was Daniel carried away, who therefore makes mention of the same year. The year next following, being the fourth of Jehojakim, was the first of Nebuchadnezzar; which Jeremy affirmeth in expresse words; and from this we reckon all his time and actions that follow. In his three and twentieth yeere he conquered Egypt; and then began to reigne as a great Monarch, finding none that durst offend him. The second from this yeere it was, wherein hee saw that vision, of the Image consisting of sundry Metals; which did prefigure the succession of great Kingdomes, that should rule the Earth, before the coming of Christ. I will not stand to dispute about this, which is the best conclusion that I finde, of long disputations: but returne unto the siege of Tyre, which began in the seventh of his Reigne.

The City of Tyre covered all the ground of an Island, that was divided from the maine, by a deep and broad channell of the Sea. The Chaldeans had no Fleet, and were no Sea-men; the Tyrians, in multitude of goodly Ships, & skill to use them, excelled all other Nations; and every winde, from one part or other, brought needfull provisions into the City. Wherefore neither force, nor famine could greatly hurt the place; whereof nevertheless the judgements of God denounced against it by Ezay, Jeremy, & Ezechiel. Ezay 23: Jeremy 25: Ezechiel 26: had threatened the destruction; and the obstinate resolution of Nabuchodonosor, had fully determined to performe it. This high-minded King, impatient of resistance, undertooke a vast piece of worke, even to fill up the Sea, that parted the Island from the Continent. The City of old Tyre, that stood opposite to the new, upon the firme Land, and the mountain of Libanus near adjoining that was loaden with Cedars, and abundance of other trees, might furnish him with materials. Thirteen yeeres were spent in this laborious, and almost hopelesse business. Which needeth not seeme strange: for Alexander working upon that foundation which was remainyng of Nabuchodonosor's Peere; and being being withall assisted by a strong Fleet, was yet seven moneths ere he could make way into the City. Wherefore, if the raging of the Sea was able to carry away that wherewith Alexander laboured to cover a thieve; with much more violence could it overturn, and as it were consume, the worke of Nabuchodonosor, who laid his foundations in the bottome of the deepe; striving as it were, to fill the empty belly of this Cormorant, whereas the Macedonian did only stop the throat of it. Every man knowes, God could have furthered the accomplishment of his owne threats, against this place (though it had not pleased him to use, either miracle, or such of his more immediate weapons, as are Earthquakes, and the like) by making at least the Seas calme, and adding the favourable concurrence of all second helps. But so it pleaseth him oftentimes, in chastising the pride of man, to use the hand of man; even the hand of man striving, as may seem, against all resistance of nature and fortune. So in this excessive labour of the Chaldeans, Every head was made bald, and every shoulder was made bare. Yet Nabuchodonosor would not give over till he was master of the Towne.

Ezek. 29.

Josph. Antiq.
Jud. lib. 10. c. 7.

When he was entered upon this desperate service; whether it were so, that some losses received, some mutiny in his Army, or (which is most likely; & so Josephus reports) some glorious rumours of the Egyptians, gave courage to his evill willers; Jehojakim renounced his subjection, & began to hope for the contrary of that which quickly fell out. For Nabuchodonosor gave him no leisure to doe much hurt: but with part of his Army marched directly into Judaea, where the amazed King made so little resistance (the Egyptians having left him, as it were, in a dream) that he entred Jerusalem, and layed hands on Jehojakim: whom he first bound & determined to send to Babylon, but changing counsell, hee caused him to be slaine in the place, and gave him the Sepulchre of an Aile, to be devoured by beasts and ravenous birds, according to the former Prophecies: leaving in his place, Jehojakim or Jechonias his sonne; whom, after three moneths & tendies, Nabuchodonosor removed, and sent prisoner to Babylon, with Ezekiel, Marobechus, & Jedech, the high Priest. The mother of Jechonias, together with his servants Eunuchs, and all the ablest men, and best Artificers of the Land, were also then carried away Captives. This Jechonias, following the counsell of Jeremy the Prophet, made no resistance; but submitted himselfe to the Kings will: wherein hee both pleased God, and did that which was best for himselfe; though at the present it might seeme otherwise, to such as considered the evil that befell him, rather than the greater evil that he thereto avoided. This only particular of his is recorded; which was good. But it seems that hee was partaker, at least of his Fathers faults, if not an instigator: which was the cause, that his submitting himselfe to Gods pleasure did not preserve his Estate: for so we read in generall words, that he did evil in the sight of the Lord, according to all that his Father had done. In his stead Nabuchodonosor established Masania his Uncle in the Kingdome of Judaea, and called him Zedechias, which is as much to say, as the justice of God. For like as Nero King of Egypt had formerly displaced Jehoaahaz, after his Father Josias was slaine, & set up Jehojakim, the son of another mother; so Nabuchodonosor slew Jehojakim, who depended on the Egyptians, and carrying his son Jechonias Prisoner to Babel, gave the Kingdome to this Zedechias, that was whole Brother to that Jehoaahaz, whom Nero tooke with him into Egypt. From Zedechias he required an oath for his faithful obedience, which Zedechias gave him, and called the living God to witnesse in the same, that he would remaine assured to the Kings of Chaldaea.

In the first yeere of Zedechias, Jeremy saw and expounded the Vision of the ripe and rotten Grapes, the one signifying those Judaeans that were carried away captive, the other those that stayed and were destroyed.

In the fourth of Zedechias, Jeremy wrote in a booke all the evill that should fall upon Babylon, which booke or scrole he gave to Sheraia, when he went with the King Zedechias to Babylon, to visit Nabuchodonosor; willing him first to read it to the Captive Jewes, and then to binde it to a stone, and cast it into Euphrates, pronouncing these words: Thus shall Babel be downed, and shall not rise from the evil that I will bring upon her. This journey of Zedechias to Babel is probably thought to have beene in way of visitation, carrying some presents. But I further thinke, that he had some suite there to make, which his Lordly Master refused to grant, and sent him away discontented. For at his returne all the bordering Princes sent Messengers to him, inciting him (as it seemes) to those unjust courses, from which Jeremy deterred both him and them. The Prophet, by Gods appoint-appointment, made bonds and yokes, one of which he wore about his own neck, others he sent unto the five Kings, of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre and Zidon, by those Messengers which came to visit Zedechias: making them know, that if they and the Kings of Juda abode in the obedience of Babylon, they should then possesse and enjoy their own countries; if not, they should assuredly perish by the sword, by fire, and by pestilence.

He also foretold them, that those Vessels which as yet remained in Jerusalem, should also travell after the rest, and at length they should be restored againe.

The same yeare Ananias, the false Prophet, rooke off the wooden Chaine which Jeremy wore in signe of the Captivity of the Jewes, and brake it: Vaunting, that in like manner, after two years God would breake the strength of Babel, and the yoke which he layd on all Nations; restore Jechonias and all the Jewes, with the Vessels and riches of the Temple, and give an end to all these troubles. But Jeremy, in stead of his woollen yoke, wore a Coller of yron: and in signe that Ananias had given a deceitfull and false hope to the people, he foretold the death of this cold Prophet, which seized upon him in the second Moneth. After this, when Zedechias had wavered long enough between Faith and Passion, in the eighth yeare of his reigne he practised more seriously against Nabuchodonosor, with his Neighbours the Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites, Tyrrians, and others that were promised great aydes of the Egyptians: in confidence of whose resistance, he determined to shake off the Babylonian yoke. He ere of when Nabuchodonosor had knowledge, he marched with his Army in the dead of Winter, toward Jerusalem, and besieged it. Jeremy perswaded Zedechias to render the City and himselfe: but being confident of the helpe from Egypt, and being perswaded by his Counsellors and false Prophets, that it was impossible that the Kingdome of Juda should be extirpate, untill the coming of Silo (according to the Prophecy of Jacob) he despised the words of Jeremy, Gen. 49. 10. and imprisoned him. For Jeremy had told the King that the City should be taken and burnt; that the King should not escape, but be taken prisoner, and brought to the presence of Nabuchodonosor; that he should not perish by the sword, but being carried to Babel, die his naturall death.

Jerusalem being the following yeare surrounded by Nabuchodonosors Armie; the King of Egypt, Pharao Hophra, according to Jeremy, (Herodotus calleth him Apries) entered the border of Juda with his Army to succour Zedechias, of whose revolt he had bene the principall Author. But Jeremy gave the Jewes faithful counsell, willing them not to have any trust in the succours of Egypt: for he assured them that they should returne againe, and in no sort relieve them. And it fell out accordingly. For when the Chaldeans removed from Jerusalem to encounter the Egyptians, these vaunting Parrons abandoned their enterprise, and taking Gaza in their way homeward, returned into Egypt, as if they had already done enough; leaving the poore people of Jerusalem to their destined miseries.

In the meane while the Jewes, who in their first extremity had manumifed their Hebrew Bond-men (as Gods Law required at the year of Jubile) and made them free, thereby the better to encourage them to fight; did now upon the breaking up of the Chaldaean Army, repent them of their Chariry: and thinking all had bene at an end, held them perforce to their former slavery. But the Chaldees being returned to the siege, the Prophet Jeremy, when the State of Jerusalem began now to grow to extremity, counselled Zedechias to render himselfe unto them; assuring him of his owne life, and the safety of the Citie, if he would so do. But his obstinate heart conducted him to that wretched end, which his neglect of God, and his infidelitie and perjury, had provided for him.

Three and twenty Moneths (as some do reckon it) or, according to Josephus, eighteen, the Babylonian Army lay before Jerusalem, and held it exceeding straightly besieged. For they built Forts against it round about, or (as P. Marius hath it) extruxerunt contra eam turres King. 25. 12. remigam per circuitum: They surrounded the Citie with wooden Towers, so as the besieged could neither fall out, nor receive into the Citie any supply of men or victuals. Josephus reports, that they over-topped the Walls with high Towers raised upon Mounts; from which they did so bear upon the Wall with their Engines, that the defendants were compelled to forsake their Stations. Now although it were so that the besieged also raised Counter-buildings, like unto these, yet the great King of Babel, who commanded all the Regions thereabouts, and had the Woods and Rivers to obey him, found means to overthrow all the Citizens endeavours; and to beat down as fast from without, as they raised from within; the body and foundation of his owne workes being guarded by the Wallles of Jerusalem interposed; and theirs within, layd open to their enemies disturbance. Besides, both Famine and Pestilence (which commonly accompany men straitly besieged) grew on fast upon them, whereby, when the number, strength, and courage of the Jewes failed, the Chaldeans made a breach, and forcing an entry, their Princes did fear themselves, as Lords of the Towne, in the middle gate. Zedechias beholding this uncomfortable sight, and finding no remedy of the danger present, lost both his courage and his hope at once; and shuted himselfe, together with his Wives, Children, Princes, and principall servants, out of the Citie, by a way to under ground; leaving his amazed and guidelesse people, to the mercilesse sword of their enemies. Thus he, who, when Jeremy the Prophet perswaded him to render himselfe, despised both the counsell of God and the force of Nabuchodonosor; used now that remedy, which Wolphius truly termeth, Triste, turpe, & infelix: Wofull, shamefull, and unfortunate.

By this secret subterranean vault, Zedechias making his stealth, recovered (by the helpe of the darke night) the Plaines or Defarts of Jericho: but by reason of the train that followed him and his (every one leading with him those whom they held most deare unto them) he was easily traced and pursued. How great soever the company was that attended on him, yet, as Josephus reports it, they, on whose fidelity he most reposed himself, no sooner beheld the Chaldeans approach, but they all abandoned his defence, and shuted themselves into the Defarts as they could. For whom God had forsaken, no man followed, but the ministers of his vengeance; by whom Zedechias being made Prisoner, with his Children and Princes, he was conveyed to Rebla or Reblash, a City (as some thinke) of Neptalim, where Nabuchodonosor then lay, as a place indifferent between Jerusalem and Tyre, with both which at once he had to doe.

Now after Nabuchodonosor had layd before Zedechias the many graces and benefits conferred upon him, together with the notable falsehood and perjury, wherewith he had requited them; he commanded his Children, Princes and Friends to be slaine before his face. This being done, to the end that so lamentable a spectacle should bee the last that ever he should behold in the World, he caused his eyes to be torne out of his head, and so carried him in a slavish manner to Babel, where he consumed the rest of his wretched life in perpetual imprisonment. Herein this most marvellous Prophecy of Ezechiel was performed; Adducam eum in Babyloniam, & isam now videbit: I will bring him into Babylon, and he shall not see it.

Thus in the eleventh and last year of Zedechias, which was the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor, the Chaldeans entred the City by force, where sparing no sexe nor age, they committed all to the sword that they therein found.

In the year next following, Nabuзарadan Generall of the Army, burnt the Kings Palace, and the rest of Jerusalem: and after this fire had lasted from the seventh to the tenth day, he also burnt the Temple of God to the ground, when it had stood foure hundred thirty and one years.

After this, upon a second search, Nabuзарadan (not yet satiated with blood) commanded seventy and two others to be slaughtered, which had hidden themselves from the first fury, to wit, the chiefe and the second Priest, two Commanders of Zedechias his men of Warre, five of his House-hold servants, and others to that number; carrying away to Babylon the ablest of the people throughout all Judea; and leaving the poorest labouring soules, with some that followed the party of Nabuchodonosor, to till the ground: over whom he left Governour, Godolia the Nephew of that Saphan, whom Josias had formerly employed in the reformation of Religion, who is, for his justice and equity, by Josephus highly commended. This man, a Jew by Nation, left Zedechias, as it seemeth, in the beginning of the Warre: and by Jeremies desire to live with him, it appeareth that he had embraced the same advice which the Prophet gave unto Zedechias; which was, to submit himselfe altogether to the Babylonian; who being ordained by God to exercise his justice, was therefore resistlesse. The Prophet Jeremy being left to his own choice, either to live in Chaldea or elswhere, he made election of Godolia, to whom he was recommended; who not only embraced Jeremy, but gave comfort to all the other Jewes that were left under his charge, promising them favour & liberty, so long as they remained obedient subjects to Nabuchodonosor, by whom he was established Provinciaall Governour of his owne Nation.

But ere that year was expired, a Prince of the late Kings house (who during the siege of Jerusalem, had kept himself out of the storme, with Baalis King of the Ammonites) being followed by ten other chosen men, while Godolia feasted them in Mispha or Mispha, the City of his residence, trayterously slew him, together with divers Chaldeans and Jewes that accompanied him. This done, he made an escape, and in his way encountering with eighty persons, repairing towards Godolia with presents, he slew the most of them; and spared the rest, because they promised to discover unto him some Treasures hidden in the fields during the war. He also took with him a Daughter of Zedechias, committed to the care of Godolia by Nabuchodonosor. This practice and intent of Ismael had bene formerly discovered unto Godolia by Johanan, one of the Leaders of the few remaining Jewes; but Godolia was incredulous.

Judea being now left without a Governour (for Ismael durst not take it upon him, but retired himselfe, or rather fled as fast as he could to the Ammonites) the residue of the Jewes, fearing the revenge of the Chaldeans, resolved to flye away into Egypt, and besought Jeremy to aske counsell of God for them: who readily made them answer, that if they remained in Judea, God would provide for them, and shew them mercy; but if they sought to save themselves in Egypt, that they should then undoubtedly perish. Notwithstanding this advice, the Jewes held their determination; and despising the Oracle of God, and constraining Jeremy and Baruch to accompany them, they travelled into Egypt, and inhabited by the permission of Pharao, neare unto Taphnes: where when Jeremy often reprehended them for their Idolatry, foretelling both the destruction of themselves, and the Egyptians also, hee was by these his owne hard-hearted and ungratefull Country-men, stoned to death; and by the Egyptians, who greatly revered him, buried neare the Sepulchre of their own Kings.

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORIE OF THE VVORLD:

Intreating of the Times from the destruction of Jerusalem, to the time of PHILIP of MACEDON.

THE THIRD BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

Of the time passing between the destruction of Jerusalem, and the fall of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.

Of the connexion of sacred and prophane Historie.

THE course of Time, which in profane Historie might rather be discerned through the greatest part of this way, hitherto passed in some out-worne foot-steps, than in any beaten path, having once in Greece by the Olympiads, & in the Easterne countries by the account from Nabuchadnezzar, left surer marks, & more applicable to actions concurrent, than were the war of Troy, or any other token of former dates; begins at length in the ruine of Jerusalem to discover the connexion of antiquity fore-spent, with the story of succeeding ages. Manifest it is, that the original and progresse of things could ill be sought in those that were ignorant of the first creation: as likewise that the affaires of Kingdomes and Empire afterwards growne up, are not to be found among those that have now no state nor policy remaining of their own. Having therefore pursued the story of the World unto that age, from whence the memory of succeeding accidents is with little interruption of fabulous discourse derived unto us, I hold it now convenient briefly to shew by what means & circumstances the History of the Hebrews, which of all other is the most ancient, may be conjoynd with the following times, wherein that Image of sundry metalls, discovered by God unto Nebuchadnezzar, did reigne over the earth, when Israel was either none, or an unregarded Nation.

Herein I doe not hold it needfull to insist upon those authorities which give, as it were by heare-say, a certaine year of some old Assyrian King unto some action or event, whereof the time is found expressed in Scripture: for together with the end of Ninus his line in Sardapanalus, if not before, all such computations were blotted out; the succession of Belochus & his issue that occupied the kingdome afterwards, depending upon the uncertaine relations of such as were neither constant in assigning the years of his beginning, nor of credit enough for others to relye upon. Let it therefore suffice that the consent and harmony which some have found in the years of those over-worne Monarchs, doth preserve their names, which otherwise might have been forgotten. Now concerning the later Kings of that Nation, howsoever it be true that we finde the names of all or most of them in Scriptures, which are recorded by prophane Historians, yet hereby could we only learne in what age each of them lived, but not in what year his reigne began or ended, were it not that the reigne of Nabuchadnezzar is more precisely applied to the times of Jehojakim and Zedechia. Hence have we the first light whereby to discover the meanes of connecting the sacred and prophane Histories. For under Nabuchadnezzar was the beginning of the captivity of Juda, which ended when 70. years were expired; and these 70. years took end at the first of Cyrus, whose time being well knowne, affords us meanes of looking back into the ages past, and forwards into the race of men succeeding. The first year of Cyrus his reigne in Persia, by generall consent, is joynd with the first year of the 55. Olympiad, where, that he reigned three and twenty years before his Monarchy, and seven years afterwards, it is apparent, and almost out of controversie. Giving therefore foure hundred and eight years unto the distance between the fall of Troy, and the instauration of the Olympiads by Iphitus, we may easily arrive unto those antiquities of Greece, which were not merely fabulous. As for Princes ruling the whilest in sundry parts of the world, S. Augustine and others may be trusted in setting down their times, which they had by Tradition from Authors of well-approved faith and industry.

From Cyrus forwards, how the times are reckoned unto Alexander, and from him to the battell of Actium, it were (peradventure) in this place impertinent to set downe. But seeing that the beginning and end of the Babylonian captivity are marks whereby we are chiefly directed, in passing from the first unto the latest years of the world through any story, with least interruption; it is very expedient that wee take some paines to informe our selves truly of the 70. years during which it continued, even from Nabuchadnezzar unto Cyrus.

§. II.

A briefe hear-say of two opinions touching the beginning of the captivity: with an answer to the cavills of Porphyrie, inveighing against S. Matthew and Daniel, upon whom the later of these opinions is founded.

Many Commentators, and other Historians and Chronologers finde that the captivity then began when Jeconias was carried prisoner into Babylon, eleven years before the final destruction of Jerusalem under Zedechias. This they prove out of divers places in Ezekiel, especially out of the fourteenth chapter, where he makes a plaine distinction between the beginning of the Captivity, and utter destruction of Jerusalem by Nabuchadrezzar, in these words: In the five and twentieth year of our being in Captivitie, in the beginning of the year, in the tenth day of the month, in the fourteenth year after that the Citie was smitten. In which words hee begetteth the captivity in plaine termes, eleven years before the City was destroyed. Beroaldus is of opinion that it began in the first of Nabuchodonosor, and the fourth of Joakim; which he endeavours to prove out of the second of Chronicles, but more especially out of Saint Matthew and Daniel, whose words afford matter of disputation, but serve not to make good so much as Beroaldus would enforce. That place of S. Matthew, and the whole booke of Daniel have ministred occasion of scoffing and railing at the Christian Religion to that wretched man Porphyrie, who, not understanding how the sonnes of King Josias were called by divers names, as Epiphanius hath shewed at large, thought that the Apostle had spoken he knew not what in reckoning the sonnes, or, according to some Translations, the Sonne and Nephewes of that good King, begotten about the time of the Captivity. Upon Daniel also the same Porphyrie doth spend the twelfth of his malicious bookes written against the Christians, affirming, that these prophecies and visions remembered by Daniel, were written long after his death, and at, or neare the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. This fond supposition of his Eusebius, Apollonius, and others, have sufficiently answered. For the seventy Interpreters, who converted the old Testament about an hundred years before Epiphanes, did also turne this booke of Daniel out of Hebrew into Greek, as a part of Scripture received. And were there no other argument to confound Porphyrie, than that of Alexander Macedon, it were sufficient, who lived divers years before Antiochus Epiphanes. For Jaddus the high Priest shewed that great Conquerour, when he came towards Jerusalem to have destroyed it, this booke of Daniel, wherein he beheld his owne glory foretold, as the same was plainly expounded unto him; which not only stayed his hand from the harme of that City and people, but his assurance and resolution was so confirmed and strengthened thereby, as despising all future perill and resistance, hee conquered Darius, and the Eastern Empire in a shorter time than Nabuchodonosor had done one City, to wit, Tyre in Phoenicia.

It is true indeed that the Jewes themselves give lesse authority to Daniel, than to Moses and the Prophets, accompting his booke among those which they call Cetaphim, or Hagiographa, or holy Writings, which they say *Esdra*s and the Seniors of the Synagogue compiled after their returne from Babylon. But first, that the booke of Daniel (I meane so much as is found in the Hebrew) is Canonically: secondly, that it was written by Daniel himselfe, and not by *Esdra*s and the Seniors, we may assure our selves by testimony of Councils and Fathers. For in the Councell of Laodicea held about the year of our Lord 368. after the death of Jovian the Emperour, and after the Nicene Councell three and forty years, this booke of Daniel was received, verified and confirmed among the other Canonically Scriptures, as in the Epitomy of the same Councell it may be seen; and so doth Meliton the most ancient Bishop of Sardis number it, witness Eusebius in his Ecclesiastical History, the fourth booke, and five and twentieth chapter: so doth the same Author in the Catalogue of Canonically books upon Origen: so doth Hilarion in his Preface upon the *Palme*s, and Epiphanius in his booke of Weights and Measures, &c. To these I may adde Saint Hierome, Gregorie Nazianzen, and others. For the Hagiographa booke or holy Writings, the Jewes and Rabbines reckon to be these, Daniel, Psalms, Psalms, Psalms, Job, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Ezra, Nehemia, and the Chronicles. And that it was Daniel, and not *Esdra*s, that wrote this booke, Gods commendement unto him by his Angell, to seale up the same to the time appointed, is an unanswerable testimony. Yea, that which exceedeth all strength of other prooffe, our Saviour Christ, who citeth no Apocryphall Scripture, in Matthew & Mark alledgeth Daniel the Prophet, to wit, the last verse of his ninth chapter. Further, in the fifth of John, Christ distributeth the risen from the dead, as in Daniel the twelfth verse the second. Saint Paul describeth Antichrist out of Daniel, and the Revelation is wholly an interpretation of *Daniel*s visions.

§. II. I.

That the 70. years of captivity are to be numbred from the destruction of Jerusalem; not from the migration of Jechonia.

Having thus farre digressed in maintaining that authority which must often be cited in the present argument, it is now convenient, that we returne unto the differences of opinion concerning the beginning of these 70. years. Neither will I stand to trouble my selfe and others with laying open the grounds or weaknesse of that which Eusebius and some few namelesse Authors have sometimes held in this point, which is lately revived by Beroaldus; but will forth-with enter into consideration of that opinion, which many both ancient and late Writers have so earnestly maintained, that it wants not much of being common.

Four Kings of Juda were carried away captives to Babylon: First, Manassers then Jehoiakim, and with him among others, Daniel the Prophet: thirdly, Jechonias, and with him Ezechiel; lastly, Zedechias, at which time the city & temple were destroyed. To the first of these captivities the beginning of the 70. years is referred by none that I have read; to the second, by few and with weak prooffe; to the third, by very many and with much confidence. For besides those places of Ezechiel already cited, there is a strong argument gathered gathered out of Jeremy, which may seeme to make the matter plaine. For the Prophet in comforting the people that were carried away with Jechonias, useth these words: Thus saith the Lord, After 70. years be accomplished at Babel, I will visit you, and perform my good promise towards you, and cause you to returne to this place.

But it stands indeed with little reason that we should seeke the interpretation of a prophecy out of circumstances, when the prophecy is such as doth sufficiently expound it selfe. Jeremy hath already in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, denounced the judgement of God against the Land, for the finnes and impenitency of that obstinate people, in these words: Behold, I will send and take to me all the families of the North, saith the Lord, and Nebuchadnezzar the King of Babel, my servant; and will bring them against this Land, Jer. 29. ver. 16.
10 and against the Inhabitants thereof, and against all these Nations round about, and I will destroy them, and make them an astonishment, and an hissing, and a continuall desolation. Moreover, I will take from them the voice of mirth, and the voice of gladnesse, the voice of the bridegroom, and the voice of the Bride; the noise of the mil stones, and the light of the candle, and this whole Land shall be desolate, and an astonishment, and these Nations shall serve the King of Babel 70. years. And when 70. years are expired, I will visit the King of Babel, Jer. 29. ver. 18.
10 *Here we see prescribed unto the captivity the terme of 70. years, which were to commence, neither when the prophecy was uttered; nor when Jehoiakim, who then reigned, was taken by Nebuchadnezzar; nor yet in the time of Jechonia; but with the utter desolation of the City, whereof Jeremy did againe give notice to those that were already in Babylon, at such time as he sent them the comfort of deliverance before rehearsed. And so did the people understand this prophecy, in those times when they saw it accomplished, beginning the 70. years at the time of the desolation, as manifestly appears in the end of the History of Juda, where it is said thus: *They burn the house of God, and brake down the wall of Jerusalem, and burnt all the Palaces thereof with fire, and all the precious vessels thereof to destroy all: And they that were left by the sword, carried he away to Babel, and they were servants to him and to his sonnes, untill the kingdome of the Persians had rule, to fulfill the word of the Lord by the mouth of Jeremia, untill the Land had her fill of her Sabbath: for all the dayes that the lay desolate, she kept Sabbath, so fulfill 70. years. But in the first year of Cyrus King of Persia (when the word of the Lord, spoken by the mouth of Jeremia, was finished) the Lord stirred up the spirit of Cyrus. We seldom finde one piece of Scripture so precisely and plainly expounded by another, as in this prophecy, to have afterwards become the subject of alteration. For one can hardly devise how either the desolation could have been expressed more sensibly than it was by the Prophet, or the event of the prophecy have been more exactly set downe, than it was in the place now last of all cited. If it be requisite that we bring more prooffe in evidence a case, the ninth Chapter of Daniel yeelds testimony sufficient, unto this expedition of Jeremia his prophecy, that Jerusalem was to lye waste 70. years. For in the fifth year of Darius the Mede, which was the last of the 70. Daniel obtained of God the deliverance that had been promised by prayer, which he made upon consideration of the time that was expired: as he telleth in these words: In the first year of his reign, I Daniel understood by Dan. 9. 2.
40 *the number of the years whereof the Lord had spoken unto Jeremia the Prophet, that he would accomplish 70. years in the desolation of Jerusalem. So that howsoever the time of Daniel his owne captivity be reckoned from the taking of Jehoiakim, and that the people carried away with Jechonia, did accompt, as well they might, the years of their owne captivity; yet with the generall desolation of the Country, wherein were few or none of the Israelites left remaining to inhabite, began in the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor the great captivity, which by Gods appointment continued unto the end of seventy years.

This I will not further seek to prove, by the authority of Josephus and others affirming the same; forasmuch as that which already hath been produced, is enough to satisfy any man that hath not fully determined to hold the contrary.

§. IV.

§. I V.

Sundry opinions of the Kings which reigned in Babylon during the 70. years.

WHAT Kings reigned in Babylon, during these seventy years of the Captivity, & how long each of them did wear the Diademe, it is a matter of no great importance to know, forasmuch as neither their acts were notable in the age wherein they lived, nor the length of their reignes, any way helpful to the concordance of times, foregoing or succeeding. The conquests recounted by Xenophon of Syria, Arabia (or rather some part of it) Hyrcania, Bactria, & perhaps of some other Countries, may seeme fruits of the victories obtained by Nabuchadnezzar the Great (or by some of his Ancestors) in the former part of his life, before he betooke himselfe to ease, and to the sumptuous building of his great Babel, for the house of his Kingdome, and for the honour of his Majesty, where it may seeme that hee and his Heires kept a great state, and did very little. The idle behaviour of the Assyrian Souldiers, in such skirmishes as afterwards they had with the Medes, doth argueno lesse. For whereas under Nabuchadnezzar, they were so stout and industrious, that (to omit other proofes) they attempted, and finished that hardy piece of worke, of winning the strong City of Tyre, by joyning unto it the continent, filling up the deepe and broad channell of the Sea, dividing it from the maine with a mole or piece of earth, and other matter; the reputation whereof when the Sea had washed it away, was the very greatest of Alexanders workes: in the times following, they became timorous, that they durst not approach nearer to the enemy than their bowes would carry, but were ready to turne their backs, as soone as any, though inferiour in numbers, adventuring within the distance offered to charge them.

Now as their actions from the end of Nabuchadnezzars warres, till the ruine of their Empire, were not worthy to be recorded; so was the distinction of their times, and reigns of their severall Kings, unworthy of the great labour that hath in vaine been taken in that businesse. For when it is granted, that the captivity of Juda, ending with that Empire, lasted 70. yeares, we may as reasonably forebore to search into the particular continuance of two or three slothfull Kings, as we are contented to be ignorant of the ages of the Patriarchs, and their children living in the Egyptians servitude; resting satisfied in both with the general assured summe.

Yet forasmuch as many have travelled in this businesse, upon desire (as I take it) to approve the beginning and end of the 70. yeares, not only by the reigns of other Princes, ruling elsewhere, but by the times of the Assyrians themselves: I will not refuse to take a little paines in collecting their opinions, and shewing what I thinke may best be held for likely, if the certaine truth cannot be found.

The opinions are many, and greatly repugnant, both in recounting the Kings themselves, and in setting downe the years of their severall reignes. The first (as I take it) the surest, is theirs, who meerey follow the authority of the Scriptures, without borrowing any helpe from others. These name onely three Kings, Nabuchadnezzar, Evilmerodach, and Balthasar. Neither have they only the silence of Daniel, who names none other to be their warrant, but the prophecy of Jeremy precisely, and in a manner purposely teaching the very fame. For God, by the mouth of that Prophet, shewing that he being absolute Lord of all, would dispose of all according to his owne will, and making it known that he had put some Countries here named, into the hands of the King of Babel, saith thus: And all Nations shall serve him, and his Sonne, and his Sonnes Sonnes, untill the very time of his land come also; then many Nations and great kings shall serve themselves of him. These words expressing the continuance of the Chaldean Empire, and number of the Kings, will hardly be qualified with any distinction. But indeed I finde no other necessity of qualification to be used herein, than such as may grow out of mens desire to reconcile the Scriptures unto profane Authors. And this desire were not unjust, if the content of all histories were on the one side, and the letter of the holy Text were single on the other side.

But contrariwise, the Authors which are cited in this case, are so repugnant one to the other, & the proofes of their different reports are so slender & insufficient, that the succession of these Princes, had it not bin thus delivered in Scriptures, but only set down by some Author of equall credit with the rest, might very well have found and deserved as good belief, as any of those things which they have delivered in this point. For some there are, who following Josephus, derive that Empire, as by descent, from father to son, through five generations; beginning with Nabuchodonosor the great, and giving to him 43. yeares; to Evilmerodach 18. to Nightsar the son of Evilmerodach, 40. to Labosardach the son of Nightsar 9. moneths, and lastly, to Balthasar (whom Josephus intimates to be of the race of Nabuchodonosor, without naming his father) 17. yeares. And this opinion (save that he forbears to reckon the yeares, and plainly calls Balthasar the sonne of Labosardach) Saint Hierome doth follow, alledging Berosus and Josephus as a testator of Berosus, for his Authors; though Berosus, as he is cited by Josephus, report the matter far otherwise. For he tels us that Evilmerodach the sonne of Nabuchodonosor did reigne but two yeares, being for his wickednesse and lust, slaine by his sisters husband Nightsar, who occupied the kingdome after him foure yeares, and left it to his owne sonne Labosardach; who being an ill-conditioned boy, was at the end of nine moneths slaine by such as were about him, and the kingdome given to one Nabonidus, who held it by the election of the Conspirators, and left it unto Cyrus after 17. yeares. This relation ill agrees with that of Josephus, and both of them as bad with the Scriptures, in number either of yeares, or of generations; yet the particularities which they handle, have procured unto them some authority, so that the names which they have inserted, are taken as it were upon trust. There is a third opinion which makes the three last Kings brethren, and sonnes of Evilmerodach; and this may well enough agree with the Scripture: though I had rather beleve Xenophon, who saith that the last King of Babylon was immediate successor to his father. But whereas the Author of the Scholasticall History, who is founder of this opinion, placeth between him that took Jerusalem and Evilmerodach, another Nabuchodonosor: plain enough it is that he hath, out of any History sacred or profane, as little warrant to guide him, as we have reason to follow him. Eusebius, Sulpitius, Severus and Theodoret, upon better ground have supposed, that Evilmerodach and Balthasar were brethren and sonnes of the great Nabuchodonosor. This is built on the fifth Chapter of Daniel, wherein Balthasar (for of Evilmerodach there is none that ever doubted) is oftentimes called Nabuchodonosor his sonne. And so common grew this explication, that S. Hierome called it the vulgar opinion. But the place of Jeremy before cited, proves that Balthasar was not the King indeed, but the grand-child of that great Conqueror, though by the phrase very common in Scriptures, and familiar in those Eafrican languages, he was called the son.

Annus his Metasthenes hits very rightly the seventy yeares of captivity, giving to Nabuchodonosor 45. yeares, to Evilmerodach 30. yeares, and to the three sons of Evilmerodach, Nepheues of Nabuchodonosor, fourteen yeares; that is, to Reg-Assar the eldest son, three yeares, to Lab-Assar the second sonne, fixe yeares, and to Balthasar the third sonne, five.

To this account agreeing with the Scriptures, both in the whole summe of yeares, and in the number of generations, I have sometime subscribed, as not daring to reject an appearance of truth, upon no greater reason than because the Author was of Annus his nation. Yet could I not satisfie my selfe herein; both for that none of the Ancient, and few such of the moderne Writers as deserve to be regarded, have consented with this Metasthenes; and for that in making Balthasar succeed unto his brother in the kingdome, and not unto his father, he is wholly against Xenophon, whose History of the elder Cyrus in his Assyrian warre I cannot slightly value in many respects, and especially because it is very agreeable to the Scriptures, in the taking of Babylon, while the king was at his drunken feast.

Seeking therefore diligently into all circumstances that might give any light in this obscurity, I found manifest proofe, that the time allotted unto Balthasar by Annus his Metasthenes, was farre short of the truth, which is enough to render all suspected that he hath said in distributing what part of the 70. yeares he pleased amongst the rest. For in the third yeare of Balthasar, Daniel saw a vision, after which he was sicke certain dayes, but when he rose up, he did the Kings businesse: from which businesse, that he did afterwards withdraw himselfe, and live retired, so long, that he was forgotten in the Court, it appears plainly, both by the many words which the old Queene used to set out his sufficiency, and by the Kings asking of him, when he came into his presence, whether he

Dan. 5. 11, 12, 13.
Dan. 2. 49.

were Daniel. Now to think that a man of such account and place as Daniel had held, could in two years have been worne out of remembrance, were in my judgement a very strange conceit, which rather than I would entertaine, I can well be contented to think the whole story (thus related) a part of Amnius his impostures.

Out of these reports of Josephus, Berosus, and others, many new opinions are framed, by conjectures of late Writers. For the endurance of the captivity being 70. years, and these years extending unto the first of Cyrus, in which course of time Nabuchadnezzar, his son and grand-child, must have reigned; it hath seemed needfull to supply the years of these three descents, by inserting some, whose reignes might fill up the whole continuance of the captivity; with which the time allotted by Berosus and others, to Evilmerodach and Balthasar, joynd unto the years following the nineteen of Nabuchadnezzar, (wherein Jerusalem was laid desolate) are nothing even.

Therefore Mercator and others following him, fashion the yeares of Evilmerodach in this sort. They say, that the 18. yeares given to him by Josephus in the tenth of his Antiquities, should be read and numbred 28. years, and the two years that Berosus hath allotted to Evilmerodach should be written 23. in the first number the figure of 1. is mistaken for the figure of 2. and in the latter there should have bin added the figure of 3. to ken for the figure of (2.) and in the latter there should have bin added the figure of 3. to ken for the figure of (2.) this granted (to wit) that Evilmerodach reigned 28. years, whereof five together with his father, and 23. after his death, and the same number of 23. added to the 25. which Nabuchodonosor lived after the destruction of Jerusalem, make 48. then 4. years of Lahmishar according to Berosus, 5. months of Labassardach his son, and 17. years of Nabonidus or Balthasar, make up the number of 70. years to the first of Cyrus. But whether by error in figures, or in words, the numbers be utterly mistaken in all copies extant; upon how weak a foundation do they build, who having nothing to help them, have only on the bare names of two unknown Kings, found in authors manifestly corrupted, and such as if they had been entirely extant, were not worthy to have that place of Jeremy called into dispute, in regard of their authority.

§. V.

A more particular examination of one opinion touching the number, persons, and reigns of the Babylonian Kings.

Other suppositions, little different in substance from this of Mercator, I purpose to rehearse, as falling under the same answer. That of Joseph Scaliger I may not forget, as deserving to be considered apart from the rest. He gives to Nabuchadnezzar 44. years, to Evilmerodach two, to Balthasar five: and to Nabonidus 17. So that from the 19. of Nabuchadnezzar, in which Jerusalem was destroyed, unto the time of Cyrus, he accounteth only 59. years; beginning (as many do) the captivity 11. years sooner from the transportation of Jechonia. But hereof enough hath bin said already. That which we are now to consider, is his distribution of the time running between the 19. of Nabuchadnezzar, and the fall of the Chaldean Empire: wherein if he have erred, then is all further inquisition frivolous.

Concerning the length of Nabuchadnezzar's reigne, I shall hereafter upon better occasion deliver my opinion. The time which he gives to Evilmerodach is very short, and more precisely agreeing with Berosus than with the Scriptures. For we finde in Jeremy, that this Evilmerodach in the first of his reign, shewing all favour to Jechonia, did among other things, take order for him at his table; and that he did continually eat bread before him all the dayes of his life. His portion was continuall portion given him of the King, him all the dayes of his life until he died. The very sound of Babel, every day a certaine, all the dayes of his life until he died. The very sound of these words (which is more to be esteemed than the authority of Berosus, were he perfectly extant) imports a farre longer time than two years, wherein Jechonia, under this gentle Prince, enjoyed the comfort sent by God, whose commandment he had obeyed in yielding himselfe to Nabuchadnezzar. Indeed how long Jechonia did live, it cannot be proved; but plaine it is hereby, that all his remaining dayes he did eat bread before this King. Now that he lived not so short a while after this 2. yeares, it is more than likely; for he was but 55. yeares old when he was set at liberty, having bin 37. years in the prison, wherein he was cast at the age of 18. yeares; after which time it seems plaine that he began Salutiel, as well by the age of Berechiah, who is said to have bene but a young man, and one of Darius his Pages threescore years after this, as by other circumstances of his imprisonment it selfe.

Of Balthasar, to whom Scaliger gives the next five years, naming him also Laborosardach, I should wonder why he calls him Nebuchadnezzar's daughters son, were it not that herein I find him very carefull to help out Berosus, by shifting in his Niriglisaroor, as husband to Nebuchadnezzar's daughter, and Protector of his son foure of these years; by which means there remains about one year to Balthasar alone, agreeing nearly with the nine months assigned by Berosus to the sonne of Niriglisar. But Jeremy hath told us that it was to Nebuchadnezzar, and to his son, and to his sons son (not to his daughters son) that the Empire was promised: which difficulty, if Scaliger could not help, it was well done of him to passe it over with silence.

Nabonidus the last of these, whom others (desirous to reconcile Berosus to the Scriptures) have judged to be all one with Balthasar, is by Scaliger thought to be Darius of the Medes. But herein Scaliger is no firme Berosian: for Berosus makes him of the same stock or race, a Babylonian. I speake not this to disgrace the travell of that most learned man (for it highly commends his diligence and judgement, that he was not so wedded to any author, as affected with the love of truth) but to shew that he himselfe, having in some points disliked those Writers, whom in generall he approveth, might with greater reason have wholly reformed them by the Scriptures, wherein can be no error. Two things there are which chiefly did breed or confirme this opinion in Scaliger, that he whom Berosus calls Nabonidus, was the same whom Daniel had called Darius of the Medes: First, the phrase of Scripture, which signifies unto us, that Darius took the Kingdome, not saying that he wanne it by force of armes: Secondly, a fragment of Megasthenes found in Eusebius, wherein this Nabonidus is called the Median. Touching the word of the Original, or of the Greek translation, which expressing no force of armes, doth only signifie that Darius took or received the Kingdome; I see no reason why we should thereupon inferre, that the next King entred by Election: seeing Daniel relateth not the meanes and circumstances of Balthasars death, but onely the swift accomplishment of his owne prophecy. Neither could it indeed have properly been said (if Daniel had cared to use the most expressive termes) that Darius of the Medes, breaking into the City, did winne the Kingdome; seeing this was performed by Cyrus in the absence of Darius, though by his forces, and to his use. Now concerning the fragment of Megasthenes, true it is, that in Eusebius his works printed at Basile, in the year 1559. I finde onely thus much of Megasthenes, cited out of Alpheus: That Nabuchodonosor was more valiant than Hercules, that he subdued all Lybia, and the rest of Asia, as far as to the Armenians; and that, as the Chaldeans report, being returned into his kingdome, and rapt with a divine fury, he cryed with a loud voyce: O Babylonians, I foretold ye of a great calamity that shall come upon you, which neither Bel, nor any of the gods shall avert: There will come a Persian, halfe an Asse, that shall bring slavery upon you: and that, this and the like when he had spoken, he vanished. Of all this I believe little or nothing, saving that Nabuchodonosor knew before-hand, that his Empire should be translated, as Daniel had foretold, from the golden head, to the silver breast. But that he wanne all Africa or Lybia, I doe hold it neither true nor probable.

If Scaliger's copy of Eusebius were the more perfect, out of which Megasthenes tells us that Nabuchodonosor wanne both Affrick and Spain, I believee the fragment so much the lesse: and am as little moved with the authority of it, where it calls a Median the pride and confidence of the Affrians; as where it tels of Nebuchadnezzar his owne vanishing away. Indeed that same title of halfe an Asse, by which he calleth Cyrus, makes me to suspect the fable, as cunningly forged out of Apollo's Oracle, wherein he termeth him a Mule, because his parentage was more noble on the mothers side than on the fathers; as Mules are begotten by Asses upon Mares. And thus much in answer of the two principall foundations whereon this opinion is built. As for the concinnity and coherence which it had within it selfe, I easily allow it. But this proves nothing; for mere fictions have not wanted these commendations: neither can any man believe that one so judicious, industrious, and deeply learned as Joseph Scaliger, would overthrow himselfe, in setting downe repugnancies.

It now remaineth to examine the agreement of this with the Scriptures, from which there is no appeal. And herein it seems that Scaliger, well knowing his own sufficiency, has hath beene little carefull to satisfie men that would frame Arguments against him. For if the prophecy of Daniel were true, that the Kingdome of Balthasar was divided, and given to the Medes and Persians, either we must thinke that Darius of the Medes was not given to the Nabonidus, or else we must bethinke our selves what Persian it might be that shared the Kingdome with him. For it is not more certaine that Balthasar lost his life and Kingdome, than that his Kingdome was divided and given to the Medes and Persians. Neither did the Medes and Persians fall out and fight for it, as by supposing Nabonidus to ther did the Medes and Persians fall out and fight for it; but these two Nations did have been Darius, they should be thought to have done; but these two Nations did compound the body of that Empire, and were accounted as Lords over all the subject Provinces, in somuch that the Greek Historians did commonly call those Warres which Darius, and after him Xerxes, made upon Greece, The Warres of the Medes. Yet to clear this point, even Daniel himselfe resembles that King, with whom Alexander fought, unto a Ramme with two hornes, calling him the King of the Medes and Persians. Wherefore the whole Nation of Chronologers were not to have beene condemned by Joseph Scaliger, for maintaining upon such good grounds, that Darius of the Medes was partner with Cyrus in his victories, and not a Chaldean King by him subdued. Neither was Josephus to be the lesse regarded, for affirming that Balthasar was destroyed by Darius of the Medes, and his Nephew Cyrus, though herein he varied from Berosus and others, whose authority elsewhere he gladly citeth. For Josephus had no reason to beleve any mans faith or knowledge of those times half so wel as Daniel, whom I beleve that he understood as farre as was needfull in this case. Lawfull it was for him to alledge all Authors that had any mention, though imperfect, of the same things that were contained in the writings of the Jewes, to whose Histories thereby he procured reputation in the Roman world, where they were strangers, and might seeme fabulous. Even so doe Eusebius and other Writers willingly embrace the testimonies of Heathen bookes making for the truth in some particulars; yet will they not therefore be trayed in generall by the selfe same Ethnicke Philosophers, but leave them where they are against the truth; as Josephus in this case hath left Berosus. And thus much I thought it meet to say of Scaligers opinion in this point; holding nevertheless in due regard his learning and judgement, which if in some things it had not failed, the miracle had then beene very great.

Dan. 8. 10.

§. V I.

What may bee held as probable of the Persons and Times of Nabuchodonosor for his successors.

I now remains that I freely acknowledge mine owne weaknesse, who cannot find how the 70. years of captivity are to be divided among them which reigned in Babylon, though I finde that the distribution made of them, in such wise as already is rehearsed, be ill agreeable to the holy Scriptures. Wherefore I may truly say with Peregrinus, that we ought liberally to pardon those whose feet have failed them in the slippery waies of Chronology, wherein both learning and diligence are subject to take a fall at one time or other, by ignorance, forgetfulness, or heedlesse reckoning. Yet will I adventure to deliver my opinion, wherein the judgement of Lyra and others (holding those only to have reigned over the Chaldeans, whose names are found in the Scriptures) appears more conformable to reason and account of time, than any of the other Sentences or Conjectures before rehearsed. Not that I will take upon me to defend Lyra his Conjectures, when he supposeth by Niglissar and Laborsardach to be meant the same persons which are called in Scriptures Evilmerodach and Balthasar (for this can by no good colour be maintained) but only to shew that the Kings by him cited, are likely to have occupied the whole time of seventy years. First therefore let us consider the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, in whose eighteenth year Jerusalem was taken and sacked, but in his nineteenth laid utterly desolate.

Most of Writers have given to him 43. years of reigne, following therein Berosus. There are who have added one year more; and some have made it up 45. To dispute about the certainty were needlesse: for in shewing by what length of time the Scriptures measure him, we shall shew the certaine truth.

Manifest

Manifest it is, that the 19. year of Nebuchadnezzar, is joyned with the 11. of Zedechias, as also that his eighth yeer, was the first yeere of Jechonia his captivity; the reigne of Zedechias occupied all the meane space, being of 11. years. This is generally agreed upon, so that it needs no further proofes: As for the beginning of his succesor Evilmerodach, it was in the seven and thirtieth year of Jechonia his captivity; so that Nebuchadnezzar after his 8. yeare (which was the first of Jechonia his bondage) reigned 35. whole years, and peradventure a good part of the fixe and thirtieth, forasmuch as Jechonia was enlarged with so great favour, not untill the end of the year. Subtracting therefore out of these foure and forty, which Nebuchadnezzars reigne did well nere occupie, those eight or nine years of this which passed away before the captivity of Juda, and ruine of the city, we have remaining fixe and twenty years of the seventy, that were almost wholly spent when his son began to reigne.

It is now to be considered how the remainder of the seventie yeeres were divided between the Kings ruling in Babylon untill the first of Cyrus. A question more difficult (as I said before) than greatly needfull: the whole some being certaine, and the distinction of times affording no benefit in knowledge of their actions, who were slothfull Princes. Neither can any man the more justly suspect the beginning or end of the whole 70. years, for that the distribution of some part of them is only conjectural; seeing that none who gives any other termes to their beginning or end, hath refused to follow both unlikely and desperate conjectures in dividing them. I will therefore be bold to doe as others have done; knowing well before hand, that whosoever shall discover my error, must do me the pleasure (which I could rather wish in a case more materiall) of making me to understand the truth.

Of the foure and forty yeeres remaining in account of Nebuchadnezzars death, wee are to take away the last, which was the first of Darius the Mede, & then having uttering good enough to warrant us from blame of presumption, in giving us seventene yeeres to Balthasar, we finde left in our hands to bestow upon Evilmerodach fixe & twenty yeeres. Of the yeere belonging unto Darius the Mede, I have already spoken what I thought sufficient, in delivering my opinion of the beginning and continuance of this captivity. That Balthasar did reigne seventeen yeeres, we have the authority of Josephus, before cited in expresse words; We have also the generall consent of all, or the most late Writers, interpreting Berosus his Nabonidus, who reigned so long; & Balthasar to have beene one. But nothing moveth me so much to beleve this Tradition, as first those evident places in Daniel, shewing that in the third yeere of Balthasar hee followed the Kings business, and yet was forgotten ere the end of his reigne, (a proofe sufficient of no few yeeres, passing under this man, especially seeing it is no where found that Daniel employments tooke end either that yeere or the next.) Secondly, the consideration of Cyrus his warres against the Assyrians, which beginning with the death of this mans father, & being alwaies prosperous, could hardly have occupied any longer time; though we make large allowance to his deeds in the lower Asia, which fell out in the midde-way: I have already shewed, that there appears in the Scriptures likelihood enough to make it credible, that the reigne of Evilmerodach was not short, and that men of great judgement have found it most probable, that he was a King three and twenty years. More, I thinke, they would have allowed him, had not the desire of satisfying Berosus, caused them to rest content with this. And surely it were greatly to bee wished, that bookes of such antiquitie, as those of Berosus, were extant without corruption; a great light (no doubt) they would yeeld in many darke passages of Antiquitie. I will yet confesse, that were his workes never so excellent; and in all things else unquestionably true, I would not therefore condescend unto him in some one point, wherein the Scriptures were his open enimie: How much lesse ought I obey a broken fragment of his, containing only seven or eight lines, and part even of the title corrupted, as they beleeve that follow him in the rest. The Scriptures have told us that God gave the Empire to Nebuchadnezzar, to his sonne, and to his sonnes sonne: How long each of them held it, we finde not expresse; yet would we gladly know it of Berosus, or of any other that would teach us; provided alwayes, that helping us in a particularity, he destroyed not thereby the generall truth. More words are needlesse. It is enough to say with others, than Berosus, or Josephus who cited him, hath beene wronged by the needlesse of Scribes; and that it was as easie for those Scribes to erre in writing two for fixe and twenty, as for three & twenty, or perhaps more easie. For, the omission of the second figure, was as likely the one way as the other; and the Character 5, signifying 6, hath a neerer resemblance of 8 than hath 7 which is used for 3. So that the numerall notes 8 5, expressing 26, were not safe enough from being mistaken in the true copie, and might bee altered, as ill written, if some crooked hand, or other mischance not unusual, had omitted the first stroke of the former letter, or added a dash to the latter, which might cause them to seeme not two different figures, but the one a correction of the other, which how it could bee supposed in standing for 23. I doe not well perceive. As for the Arithmetical figures now in use, they were long after the time of Josephus brought in by the Arabians, and therefore doe not appertaine unto this time of business, unless wee should ghesse that his workes were corrupted in that unlearned age, which following the Saracen conquest, was little occupied in the studies of humane, but in a sort wholly given over to the doctrine of Aristotle. If this will serve to nity, but in a sort wholly given over to the doctrine of Aristotle. If this will serve to make Berofus our friend, to let it be; if not, I will not purchase the favour of his authority, by forsaking Jeremy and Daniel, when they seeme to be his opposites.

§. VII.

Of the victories which Nabuchodonosor obtained betwene the destruction of Jerusalem and conquest of Egypt.

WITH what actions this time of 70. years was entertained by the Babylonian Kings, few have written, or little is remaining in record. Which may peradventure have been some cause that the time it selfe was, & is yet sought to bee abridged, as not having left sufficient matter to witness the length of it. But by such an argument we might as well deny to many people even their being. For every Nation (I know not whom I should except) betwene the beginning and last end of it, hath in some slothfull age rather dreamt away the time, than spent it. It is therefore no marvel, if the posterity of Nabuchodonosor, finding all things ready to their hand, which their hearts could have desired, betooke themselves to their ease and pleasures, thinking perhaps, like the prodigall sons of greedy fathers, their own wisdom greater, which knew how to enjoy, than that of their Ancestors, which wearied away their dayes in the restless travell of purchasing: Though indeed the reigne of Nabuchodonosor was so divided, that his youthfull and stronger years having been exercised in victorious armes, no small part of his life was remaining to be spent in establishing what was gotten, and gathering the fruit of his worthie labours past. The nineteenth yeere of his reigne it was, when destroying utterly the great and mighty Citie of Jerusalem, hee enriched himselfe with abundance of spoile, & terrified all that would offer to resist him, by that fearefull example. From that time forward, he, untill his three and twentieth yeere, laboured in the conquest of those adjoining Regions, which God had exposed unto his sword, and commanded to wear his yoke; namely, the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, Tyrians, Sydonians, and Egyptians, though some of these were already become his followers, and served under him, when Jerusalem was beaten down and burnt. But the Tyrians, whose Citie was founded on an Island, safe enough from any danger of a Land-army, & whose fleet was so strong, that they needed not to feare any enemy at sea, were neither daunted with the fall of their neighbour cities, nor with the obstinate resolution of this mighty Prince, in employing all his power to their subversion.

That the City of Tyre was rather well pleased, than any way discouraged with the fall of Jerusalem (which had held the same course that Tyrrus did, and endured all that might bee in the same quarrell against the common enemy) it appears by the words which Ezekiel condemneth as the common voice of Tyrrus; Aha, the gate of the people is broken, it is turned unto me; for seeing she is desolate, I shall be replenished. Yet at length, even in the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor, that great worke of his, whereof we have already spoken, began to appeare above the waters, and threaten them with inevitable mischief.

But those prophecies of Jeremy & of Esay, which appoint unto this desolation of Tyre the same terme of 70. years, that was prescribed unto the reigne of the Chaldeans, doe plainly plainly shew, that he followed Jerusalem, the same nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor, in the same, or a very like fortune. The particularities, which doubtlesse were memorable in the issue of so great and laborious a siege, are in a manner utterly lost. Thus much we finde, That the Citizens perceiving the Town unable to hold out, embarked themselves, and fledde into the Isle of Cyprus. Neverthelesse it seemes that this evasion served only the principall men, who escaping with their goods, abandoned the poorer sort unto the enemies fury. For, not onely such people of Tyre as dwelt on the Continent, (who are called her Daughters in the field) were put to the sword; but the like execution was done in the streets, into which, with excessive labour, the Assyrian made way for his Horses and Chariots. Thus Nabuchodonosor caused his Armie to serve a great service against Tyrrus, wherein every head was made bald, and every shoulder was made bare, yet had hee no wages, nor his Armie; but was faine to rest contented with the Honour of having destroyed that Citie, which in all mens judgements had beene held invincible.

The destruction of these two great and powerfull cities, having made the name of the Chaldeans dreadfull in the eares of all the Nations thereabout, Nabuchodonosor used the advantage of that reputation which he had obtained by victories already gotten, to the getting of more, and more profitable, with lesse paine. The Kingdome of Egypt was the marke at which he aimed; a Country so abounding in all riches and pleasures, that it might well have tempted any Prince, finding himselfe strong enough to seek occasion of quarrell against it; and so farre an enemy to the Crown of Babylon, that had it bin poorer, yet either it must have beene subdued, or the conquest of Syria could ill have beene established. Neverthelesse it was needfull, that before hee entered into this business, the Countries adjacent should bee reduced into such termes, that either they should wholly stand at his devotion, or at least be unable to worke him any displeasure. And herein the decree of God concurred, as in all prosperous enterprises, with reason of state. For, the people of Moab, Edom, Damascus, Kedar, Hazar, and other adjoining Regions, whom God for their finnes had condemned to fall under the Babylonian swords, were such, as regarding only their owne gaine, had some of them, like Ravens, followed the Chaldean Armie, to feed upon the carcasses that fell by the cruelty thereof; others taking advantage of their neighbours miseries, occupied the Countries which were by his victories belonging to Nabuchodonosor: all of them thinking, that when the Assyrian had satisfied his fury, he should be faine to forsake those desolate parts, and leave the possession to those that could lay hand upon it. Particularly the Edomites and Philistims had shed much malice to the Jewes when their city was taken. What good service they had done to the Chaldeans, I finde not; if they did any, it is likely to have beene with reference to their owne purposes, wherein they were disappointed. The Ammonites were not contented to rejoyce at the fall of Jerusalem, but presently they entered upon the Country of Gad, and took possession, as if not the Assyrians, but they, had subdued Israel. Neither can I perceive what other ground that practice had of Basia King of the Ammonites, when he sent Ismahel, a Prince of the blood of Juda, to murder Gedalia, whom the King of Babel had left Governour over those that remained in Israel, and to carry captive into the Ammonites Country the people that abode in Mizpah, than a desire of embroiling Nabuchodonosor with so many labours at once, as should make him retire into his owne Country, and abandon those wasted Lands to himselfe and others, for whom they lay conveniently. Such or the like policy the Moabites did exercise; whose pride and wrath were made frustrate by God, & their dissimulation condemned, as not doing right.

All these nations had the art of ravening, which is familiar to such as live or border upon desarts; and now the time afforded them occasion to shew the uttermost cunning of their treivish wits. But Nebuchadnezzar did cut asunder all their devices by sharpe and suddaine warre, over-whelming them with unexpected ruine, as it were in one night; according to the prophecies of Esay, Jeremy, and Ezekiel, who foretold, with little difference of words, the greatnesse and swiftnesse of the misery that should come upon them. With which of them hee first began, I finde not; it seemes that Moab was the last which felt his hand: for so doe many good Authors interpret the prophesie of Esay, threatening Moab with destruction after three yeeres, as having reference to the third year following the ruine of Jerusalem; the next year after it being spent in the Egyptian expedition.

expedition. This is manifest, that all the principall townes in these Regions were burnt, and the people slaine, or made slaves, few excepted, who being preserved by flight, had not the courage to returne to their habitations over-hastily, much lesse to attempt any thing against Nabuchodonosor, but lived as miserable out-lawes, or at least oppressed wretches, untill the end of the seventy yeares, which God had prescribed unto the desolation of their Countries, as well as of the Land of Juda.

§. VIII.

That Egypt was conquered, and the King therein reigning slaine by Nabuchodonosor, contrarie to the opinion of most Authors: who, following Herodotus and Diodorus, relate it otherwise.

When by a long course of victory Nabuchodonosor had brought into subjection all the Nations of Syria, & the bordering Arabians, in such wise, that no enemy to himself, nor friend of the Egyptian, was left at his backe, that might give impediment unto his proceeding, or take advantage of any misfortune; then did he forth-with take in hand the conquest of Egypt himselfe, upon which those other Nations had formerly bin depending. Of this expedition, and the victorious issue thereof, the three great Prophets, Esa, Jeremy, and Ezekiel, have written so plainly, that I hold it altogether needlesse to looke after more authoritie, or to cite for proofe halfe of that which may be alleged out of these. Nevertheless, wee finde many and good Authors, who following Herodotus, & Diodorus Siculus, are well contented to straine these Prophecies with unreasonable diligence unto such a sense, as gives to Nabuchodonosor little more than the honour of having done some spoile in Egypt, omitting the conquest of that Land by the Babylonian, and referring the death of Apries or Hophra to a chance long after following, which had no coherence with these times or affaires. So preposterous is the delight which many men take in the meanes and second helpes conducing to their purpose, that oftentimes they doe preferre the Commentator before the Author; and to uphold a sentence, giving testimony to one clause, doe carelessly overthrow the history it selfe, which thereby they sought to have maintained. The reports of Herodotus and Diodorus, concerning the Kings of Egypt, which reigned about these times, are already rehearsed in the former booke: but that which they have spoken of Apries was purposely reserved unto this place. Herodotus doth affirm that he was a very fortunate King, but wherein he telleth not; (unlesse we should understand that he was victorious in the Warre, which he is said to have made upon Tyrrus and Sydon) that he reigned five and twenty yeeres, and was finally taken and put to death by his owne Subjects; who did set up Amasis, as King, which prevailed against him. The rebellion of the Egyptians hee imputeth to a great losse which they received in an expedition against the Cyrenians, by whom almost their whole army was destroyed. This calamity the people of Egypt thought to bee well pleasing to their King, who had sent them on this dangerous expedition, with a purpose to have them consumed, that so he might with greater securitie reigne over such as staid at home. So they who escaped, and the friends of such as were slaine, rebelled against Apries, who sent Amasis to appease the tumult; but Amasis became Captain of the rebels, & was by them chosen King. Finally, the whole Land consented unto this new Election; whereby Apries was driven to trust unto his foraine Mercenaries, the Ionians and Carians, of whom he kept continually in readinesse thirty thousand good Souldiers that fought valiantly for him, but were at length vanquished by the great number of the Egyptian forces, amounting unto two hundred and fiftie thousand, which were all by birth and education men of Warre. Apries himselfe being taken prisoner, was gently intreated by Amasis for a while, untill the Egyptians, exclaiming upon him, as an extreme enemy to the Land, got him delivered into their hands, and strangled him, yet they gave him honourable buriall. Such is the report of Herodotus, with whom Diodorus Siculus doth neerely agree, telling us that Apries did vanquish the Cyprians and Phoenicians in battell at Sea, tooke by force and demolished Sydon, wanne the other townes of Phoenicia, and the Ile of Cyprus, and finally, perished, as is before rehearsed, when he had reigned two and twenty yeeres. This authority were enough (yet not more than enough) to informe us of Apries his history, if greater authority did not contradict it. But the destruction of Egypt by the Babylonian, foretold by the Prophets, which hath no coherence with these relations, hath greater force to compell our beliefe, than have the traditions of Egyptian Priests (which the Greeke Historians followed) and greater probabilities to perswade those that looke only into humane reasons. For Esa prophesied long before of the shamefull captivity of the Egyptians, whom the King of Asshur should carry away naked, young & old, in such wise, that the Jewes, who fled unto them for deliverance from the Assyrian, should bee ashamed of their owne vaine confidence in men so unable to defend themselves.

10 But Ezekiel & Jeremy, as their prophecies were neerer to the time of execution, so they handled this argument more precisely. For Ezekiel telleth plainly, that Egypt should be given to Nabuchadnezzar, as wages for the service which he had done at Tyre: Also hee recounteth particularly all the chiefe Cities in Egypt, saying, That these by name should be destroyed, and goe into captivity, yea, that Pharao and all his Army should be slain by the sword. Wherefore it must needs bee a violent exposition of these Prophecies, which by applying the issue of such threatnings to an insurrection and rebellion concludes all, without any other alteration in Egypt, than change of the Kings person, wherein Amasis did succeed unto Apries, by force indeed, but by the uniforme consent of all the people. Certainly, if that notable place of Jeremy, wherein hee foretelleth how the Jewes in Egypt should see Pharao Hophra delivered into the hand of his enemies, as Tedekia had bene, were to be referred unto the time of that rebellion, whereof Herodotus hath spoken, as the generall opinion hath over-ruled it; then was it vainely dote of the same Prophet (which God forbid that any Christian should thinke, seeing hee did it by the appointment of God himselfe) to hide in the clay of a Bricke-hill, those very stones, upon which the Throne of Nabuchodonosor should bee set, and his Pavilion spread. Yea then was that prophecy no other than false, which expressed the end of Pharao thus: Behold, I will visit the common people of No, & Pharao and Egypt, with their gods and their Kings, even Pharao, and all that trust in him: and I will deliver them into the hands of those that seeke their lives, and into the band of Nabuchadnezzar, King of Babel, and into the hands of his servants. The clearnesse of this prophecy being such as could not but refuse that interpretation of many other places, which referred all to the rebellion of Amasis, it caused me to wonder what those Commentators would say to it, who are elsewhere so diligent in fitting all to the Greeke Historians. Wherefore looking upon Junius, who had in another place taken the enemies of Pharao Hophra to bee Amasis and his followers, I found him here acknowledging that the Egyptian Priests had notably deluded Herodotus with lies, coyned upon a vain-glorious purpose of hiding their owne disgrace and bondage. And surely it may well bee thought, that the history of Nabuchadnezzar was better knowne to the Jewes, whom it concerned, than to the Greekes, that scarcely at any time heard of his name. Therefore I see no cause why we should not rather believe Josephus, reporting that Nabuchodonosor in the three and twentieth yeere of his reigne, and the fift yeere of the destruction of Jerusalem, did conquer Egypt, kill the King thereof, and appoint another in his stead, than Herodotus or Diodore, who being meere strangers to this businesse, had no great reason to labour in searching out the truth, but might rest contented with any thing that the Priests would tell them. Now if setting aside all advantage of authority, we should once consider the relations of Josephus, and of the Greeke Historians, as either of them might be verified of it selfe by apparent circumstances, without reflecting upon the Hebrew Prophets, or Egyptian Priests, mee thinke the death of Apries can no way be approved as having bene wrought by consent of the people, but affords great matter of suspicion; yea, though no man had opposed the reports of Herodotus and Diodore. For the great love & honor which the Egyptians did beare unto their Kings, is notorious by the uniforme testimony of all others that have handled the matters of that Countrey, as well as by the report of Diodore himselfe. How then can we thinke it probable, that Apries having wonne great victories, did for one onely losse fall into the hatred of all his people, or which may serve to perswade us, that a King of Egypt would feeke, or so determine himself, that he might be thought to seek the destruction of his naturall subjects: As for that Army of thirty thousand souldiers, Carians and Ionians, which the King of Egypt, whom Amasis took prisoner, is said to have kept for his defence: doth it not argue that he was a forrainger, and one that armed himself against the Egyptians, wishing them few and weak, rather than any of the Pharaohs, who accounted the force of the Countrey, as assuredly their owne, as the strength of their owne bodies? It were more tedious than any way needfull, to use all Arguments that might be alledged in this case. The very death of this supposed Apries, which the clamours of the people obtained of Amasis, who fought to have kept him alive, doth intimate that hee was some forraigne Governour, not a naturall Prince; otherwise the people would have desired to save his life, and Amasis to take it quickly from him. I will not labour any further to disprove that opinion, whereunto I should not have yeelded, though it had stood upon great appearance of truth, considering that the voice of truth it selfe cries out against it, but leave the circumstances, proving the Conquest of Egypt by Nabuchodonosor, to be observed where due occasion in course of the story following shall present them.

How Egypt was subdued and held by Nabuchadnezzar.

IT is a great losse, that the generall History of the World hath suffered, by the spoile and waste which Time hath made of those Monuments, that should have preserved the memory of such famous actions as were accomplished by this mighty Prince Nabuchodonosor; wherein, whether his Vertue, or Fortune were greater, it is now uncertaine. That his Victories following the Conquest of Syria, and the Neighbour-Provinces, were such as did more enlarge his Dominion, than all the former Warres had done, it may easily be gathered out of Ezekiel, who reckoneth up in his thirtieth Chapter (besides the whole Countrey of Egypt) Phut and Lud, with other Nations that may seeme to have reached out into Mauritania, as people subdued by this great Babylonian. The circumstances of these Warres are in a manner utterly lost; but that the victory was easie and swift, any man shall finde, who will take the paines to conferre the places, wherein the three great Prophets touch this Argument. Thus much I thinke worthy of more particular observation; that Pharaoh, who (as is already noted in the former Booke) thought himselfe most safe in Egypt by the well defended situation of his Countrey, did very unwisely in suffering his enemies to sweep the way cleane unto his owne doores, by consuming all his friends and adherents in Syria. For as the labour of this businesse did more harden than weary the Chaldean Army, so the confidence and vaine security of the Egyptians, relying upon the difficult passages which the enemy was to make thorow the Arabian deserts, and the much advantage which the great river of Nilus would afford unto themselves, did little availle them in provision for the war, and much astonish them (as may justly be thought) in the time of execution: it being usually seene, that the hearts of men faile, when those helpees faile, in which they had reposed more confidence than in their owne vertue. Hitherto the Kingdome of Egypt had flourished under the rule of the Pharaohs, about a thousand five hundred and fourescore yeeres; but from this time forward it remained forty yeeres without a King, under the subjection of the Babylonians; & then at length it began to recover by little and little the former greatnesse, yet so, that it was never dreadfull unto others, God having said of that people, I will diminish them, that they shall no more rule the Nations. For whereas it hath bene said of Pharaoh: I am the sonne of the wife, I am the sonne of the ancient Kings; & whereas he had vaunted, The River is mine, and I have made it; the Princes of Egypt now became fooles, the river failed them, the King himselfe was taken & slaine, and that ancient lineage quite extinguished. This came to passe in the first yeere after the destruction of Jerusalem, and the three and twentieth of Nabuchadnezzar, at which time (saith Josephus) He slew the King then reigning, placed another in his room, and carried captives thence to Babylon, the Jewes whom he found in that Countrey. Now concerning the time which Josephus gives unto this businesse, and the businesse it selfe, I have already shewed, that it is warranted by all the prophecies which insinuate the same. As likewise the last destruction of Jerusalem, and carrying away those unto Babel, who inhabited the miserable ruines of that great city, which was in the same three & twentieth yeere of Nabuchadnezzar, is not improbably thought by good authors to have bene at the returne from this Egyptian expedition. But whereas Josephus tells us, that there was another King put in the room of Apries by Nabuchadnezzar, we must understand, that he was only a Vice-roy, and not (as some have mistaken) thinke that this was Amasis. For to place the beginning of Amasis his reigne in the three and twentieth of Nabuchadnezzar, were as well repugnant unto the prophecies before alledged, as to all Chronology and History. Some there are, which to help this inconvenience, imagine that there were two successively bearing the name of Amasis; others, that there were two Apries, the one slaine by Nabuchadnezzar, other by Amasis; a question of small importance, because the difference is only about a name, it being once granted that the person mentioned in Scriptures, was deprived of life & Kingdome by the Assyrians. Yet for any thing that I can perceive, that Apries, of whom the Greeke Historians wrote, could not be the Deputy of Nabuchadnezzar, seeing that he was the Grand-child of Pharao Meco, & made war (as they report) upon the Phoenicians, who were before the Egyptians, become subject unto the Crowne of Babylon. I might adde, perhaps, that he whom Nabuchadnezzar left as Governour of Egypt, was more likely to have had some Chaldean or Assyrian, than Egyptian name; unless we should thinke that he had bene a traitor to his naturall Prince, and so rewarded by the Conquerour with Lieutenantship of the Countrey: about which it were but frivolous to dispute. Thus much in briefe we ought to believe, that Nabuchodonosor made an absolute Conquest of Egypt; that he was not so foolish as to give it away, any man may ghesse; that he appointed one to rule the Countrey, it is consequent unto the former, and hath authority of Josephus; that his Governour (or some Successour of his) was afterwards taken and slaine by Amasis, I see probability enough to perswade my selfe, and yet can well be content, that others use their liberty, and believe what they list. As for the army which this Egyptian King Apries is supposed to have kept of Ionians & Carians; hold them to be none other than the garrisons of mercenary souldiers which were left by the Assyrian for the guard of his Viceroy, and custody of the new subdued Province: as likewise the company returning from Cyrene & Barce, who together with the friends of such as were slaine in that expedition, remembered before out of the Greeke Historians, depose & slew Apries, I take them to have been the Egyptian fugitives, which then recovered their own Countrey. Sure it is that this Prophecy of Ezekiel was verified, Arise out of forty years will I gather the Egyptians from the people where they were scattered, and will bring againe the captivity of Egypt, and will cause them to returne into the land of Pathros, into the land of their habitation, & they shall be there a small Kingdome. If the Egyptian Priests alluded herunto in the tale which they made of Amasis his obtaining the Kingdome, then are they to be helped with this or the like interpretation; if they devised matter that had no shadow of truth, only to keepe the Greeks from knowledge of their Countreys disgrace; then are they little to be regarded, since we know the truth with them.

Of the sundry accounts drawne from sundry acts of Nabuchadnezzar, and of the destruction of Nineve, by him; the time of which action is uncertaine.

THESE victories brought the greatnesse of the Assyrian Empire to the full, & from them was reckoned the time of Nabuchadnezzars reigne in sundry places of Scripture. To speake any more of the questions arising about the supputation of Nabuchadnezzars his times, might seeme to be the over-handling of one Argument: Yet thus much I will note; that whereas Daniel was carried captive in the third yeere of Jehoiakims reigne (which ran along with some part of Nabuchadnezzars first yeare) & was kept inder three years more, before hee was brought into the Kings presence; it could not be the second of Nabuchadnezzars Kingdome, wherein he interpreted the forgotten dream of the great Image, for shewing the successe of Monarchies, but the second of his Empire. The same or the like may be said of divers places which referre sundry matters unto their first years; as that of Ezekiel before cited, where he fore-tells, that Egypt should be given in reward for the service done before Tyrus, dating his prophecy in the seven and twentieth year; and that of Daniel, placing the erection of the golden Image in the eighteenth yeare: for these yeeres held no dependance upon either the beginning of Nabuchad-

Daniel 1. & 2.

Nabuchadnezzar's Kingdome, or of his Empire, nor yet upon any of the captivities, but had reference to some memorable actions, omitted in Scripture, and therefore not eafie to be found, nor worth the labour of uncertaine search.

Nahum 3. 8.

Of any warre made by Nabuchadnezzar, after fuch time as he returned from the Conquest of Egypt, I doe not reade: excepting that againſt Nineve, the deſtruction whereof was fore-told by the Prophet Nahum. Nineve had long before been taken by Merodach (as in due place hath bene ſhewed) and together with the reſt of Aſſyria made ſubject to Babylon. Yet was it left unto a peculiar King, who rebelling againſt the Chaldean, as Jeſojakim and Zedechias, tributary Kings of Juda, had done, taſted likewiſe of the ſame fortune. That the deſtruction of Nineve followed the Conquest of Egypt, it appeareth by the compariſon which Nahum the Prophet made betwene this City, that was to fall, and the City of No in Egypt, that was fallen already. But how long after this came to paſſe, it is (me thinks) impoſſible to finde out. For whereas it is found in an Hebrew Chronology, that it was in the firſt of Nabuchadnezzar's reign, the place of Nahum laſt cited is enough to diſprove it. Whereas it is referred by ſome unto the firſt of his Monarchy, which began at the end of the Egyptian warres; the whole Prophecy of Nahum which went betwene the one and the other, argueth ſtrongly, that there was a longer ſpace of time intercurrent. So that to enquire into the very eare of this deſtruction, or other circumſtances of the Warre, whether managed by Nabuchodonosor in perſon, or by his Lieutenants, were ſomewhat like unto the vaine curioſity of Tyberius Cæſar, enquiring who was the Mother of Hecuba, or to the like idle paines which he ſhould take, who would ſeek to learne what woman that Huſſab Queen of Nineve was, whoſe woeful captivity the ſame Prophet Nahum likewiſe did fore-tell.

§. X I.

Of the latter time of Nabuchadnezzar; his buildiſgs, madneſſe, and death.

Dan. 4. 27.

Of the time which this great Monarch ſpent in quiet, I think there are no monuments extant; ſave thoſe which we finde among the prophecies of Dauid. Among theſe we may reckon his great workes of Babylon, wherewith he pleaſed himſelfe ſo well, that he brake out into theſe glorious words: Is not this great Babel that I have built for the houſe of the Kingdome, by the might of my power, & for the honour of my Maieſty? Surely if thoſe things be true that are by Joſephus rehearſed of him out of Berſus & Megasthenes, he might well delight himſelfe with the contemplation of ſuch goodly & magnificent buildiſgs. For it is ſaid, That he fortified Babylon with a triple wall; ſituate beſides other ſtately workes, he raiſed thoſe huge arches wherewith were borne up the high Orchards, hanging as it were in the aire, & equalling the tops of Mountaines; which moſt ſumptuous frame, that out-laſted all the remainder of the Aſſyrian, and all the Perſian Empire, is ſaid to have bene reared, and finiſhed in ſeventene dayes.

But of all this, & other his magnificence, we finde little elſe reſcorderd, than that (which indeed is moſt profitable for us to conſider) his over-valuing of his owne greatneſſe abſeſed him unto a condition, inferior to the pooreſt of men. And not undeſervedly fell theſe judgements of God upon him. For whereas God had honoured him, not only with many victories, and much happineſſe in his owne life, but with a diſcovery of things to come after him, yea and had approved the certainty of his dreame, by the miraculoſus reducing of it into his memory, and interpretation thereof by Daniel the Prophet: hee nevertheleſſe became ſo forgetfull of God, whoſe wonderfull power he had ſeene and acknowledged, that he cauſed a golden Image to be ſet up and worſhipped: ordaining a cruell death as reward unto them that ſhould dare to diſobey his Kingly will and pleaſure, which was utterly repugnant to the law of him that is the Kings of kings. Hereof S. Hierome hath well noted; Felox obliſio veritatis, ut qui dudum ſervum Dei quaſi Deum adoraverat, nunc ſtatuum ſibi fieri jubcat, ut ipſe quaſi Deus in ſtatua adoraretur: A haſtu forgetfullneſſe of the truth, that he who ſo lately had worſhipped (Daniel) the ſervant of God, as if hee had bene God himſelfe, ſhould now command a ſtatua to be erected unto himſelfe, wherein himſelfe might be worſhipped as God. From this impiety it pleaſed God to reclaim him, by the ſtrange and wonderfull delivery of thoſe bleſſed Saints out of the fire; who being throwne into it bound, for reſuſtaining to commit Idolatry, were aſſiſed by an Angel; preſerved from all harme of the fire; looſened from their bands; and finally called out with gracious words, and reſtored to their former honour, by the King: who amazed at the miracle, made a decree tending to the honour of God, which by erection of his Image he had violated. Yet this devotion of Nabuchadnezzar was not ſo rooted in him, that it could bring forth fruit anſwerable to his haſtie zeale. Therefore was he forewarned by God in a dreame of the terrible judgement hanging over his head, which Daniel expounding, adviſed him to break off buſineſſe by right conſcience, and his iniquity by mercy towards the poore, that there might be a healing of his error. Hereby it ſeemes that injuſtice and cruelty were the faultes, for which hee was threatned: but this threatening ſufficed not unto his information. For, that ſo great a Monarch ſhould be driven from among men; (according to the tenor of the dream & interpretation) yea, compelled to dwell with the beaſts of the field, and made to eate graſſe as the Oxen, was a thing ſo incredible in mans judgement, that eaſily it might be thought an idle dreame; and much more eaſily be forgotten at the yeeres end. One whole yeare laſt to repent was given to this haughty Prince: which reſpite of the execution may ſeem to have bred in him a forgetfulneſſe of Gods ſentence. For at the end of twelve moneths, walking in the royall Palace of Babel, he was ſo over-joyed and transported with a vain contemplation of his owne ſeeming happineſſe, that without all feare of Gods heavie judgement pronounced againſt him, he uttered thoſe loſtie words before rehearſed, in vaunting of the Maſteſſe works which he had reared, as well beſeeming his maſteſſe-call perſon. But his high ſpeeches were not fully ended, when a voyce from heaven, telling him that his high dome was departed from him, rehearſed over unto him the ſentence againe, which was fulfilled upon him the very ſame houre.

That Salomon, and many other Princes, and great ones, have taken delight in their own buildiſgs, it cannot any way be doubted; yet I doe not remember that ever I have read of any, that were puniſhed for rejoycing in workes of this kinde (though it is hard injoy, or any paſſion of the minde, to keepe a juſt meaſure) excepting onely this Nabuchadnezzar.

The like may be ſaid of Dauid: for other (and ſome very godly) Kings have muſtered all their forces to the very laſt man; but few or none have been knowne to have bene puniſhed as Dauid was. Surely I not only hold it lawfull to rejoyce in thoſe good things wherewith God hath bleſſed us; but a more of much unthankfulneſſe to enter tain them with a ſullen and unfeeling diſpoſition. Yet as all humane affections, wherein due reference to God is wanting, are no better than obſcure clouds, hindring the influence of that bleſſed light, which clarifies the ſoule of man, and prediſpoſeth it unto the brightneſſe of eternall felicity; ſo that inſolent joy, which man in the pride of his vaine imagination conceiveth of his own worth, doth above all other paſſions blaſt our mindes, as it were with lightning, & make us to reflect our thoughts upon our ſeeming inherent greatneſſe, forgetting the whileſt him, to whom we are indebted for our very being. Wherefore theſe Mala mentis gaudia; The evil joyes of the minde, were not unapely, by the Prince of Latine Poets, beſtowed in the entrance of hell, and placed further inward than ſorrowes, cares, and feares: not far from the yron Cabbins of the Furies. And certainly it is no unlikely token of vengeance neere at hand, when theſe unreaſonable ſluſhes of proud and vaine joy, doe rage in a minde, that ſhould have beene humbled with a juſt repentance, and acknowledgement of ill deſerving.

This was verified upon Nabuchadnezzar, whoſe puniſhment was ſingular and unexampled. For hee ran among beaſts in the fields and woods, where for ſeven yeeres hee lived, not only as a ſalvage man, but as a ſalvage beaſt, for a beaſt he thought himſelfe, ſecundum ſuam imaginatiōem, as Thomas noteth, and therefore fed himſelfe in the ſame manner, and with the ſame ſoode that beaſts doe; Not that hee was changed in figure externally, according to Mediana, inſomuch as hee appeared a beaſt to other mens eyes, as S. Hierome in the life of Hilarius (how true God knows) ſpeakes of a woman that appeared to all other mens ſight a Cow, but to Hilarius only a woman; neither was hee changed as Iphigenia the daughter of Agamemnon was ſaid to be, into a Hinde; nor made a Monſter, as Dorotheus and Epiphanius dreamed: but according to S. Jeromes expoſition of theſe words: At the ſame time was my underſtanding reſtored unto me, &c. Quando diſcretiſſimè ſenſum ſibi redditum, oſtendit non formam ſe amiſiſſe, ſed mentem; When he ſaith that his ſenſe was reſtored unto him, he ſhewed that hee had not loſt his humane ſhape, but but his understanding. Seven yeeres expired, it pleased God to restore Nabuchodonosor, both to his understanding, and his estate, for which he acknowledged and praised God all the rest of his life, confessing his power, and everlasting being; that he was the Lord of heaven and earth, and wrought without resistance what he pleased in both; that his workes were all truth, and his wayes righteous. Which gave argument to many of the Fathers, and others, not to doubt of his salvation; namely, S. Augustine, Theodoret, Lyra, Carthusianus, and others. And for that place of Ezay the fourteenth, out of which his perdition may bee gathered, the aforementioned Authors apply the same to Balthasar, because Isay, both in the thirteenth and fourteenth Chapters, speaketh of the King, and the destruction of Babylon jointly.

§. XII. of Evilmerodach.

HAVING already spoken what I could of the succession and yeeres of Nebuchadnezzar's posterity; the most that may bee said of him, is said of Evilmerodach, which I will not here againe rehearse.

He lost some part of that which his father had gotten; and left his Kingdome burning in a warre that consumed it to ashes. Hee lost Egypt by rebellion of the people, in the nineteenth yeere of his reign, which was forty yeeres after his Father had conquered it. But this agrees neither with the account of Herodotus, who allows to Amasis foure & forty yeeres of reigne; nor with that of Diodorus, who gives him five and fifty, saying, that he died in the third yeere of the threecore and third Olympiad, when Cambyses did conquer Egypt. There were indeed but seven and thirty yeeres, which passed between the second yeere of the foure and fiftieth Olympiad, (which was the nineteenth of Evilmerodach, and the first of Amasis) and the fit of Cambyses his reigne, wherein he was Egypt; of which seven and thirty yeeres it is credibly held, that Psammiticus, the son of Amasis, reigned three: so that Amasis could bee no longer King than foure and thirty yeeres. But seeing that these two Greek Historians have bin abused by Egyptian Priests, in the substance of that which was spoken of Amasis, it is no marvell though they were also deceived in the length of his reigne. This is the plaine answer to this objection. For to say eicher that the numbers were mis-written, & foure & forty set down instead of foure and thirty, or that Amasis did temporize a while with the Assyrians, and not beare himself as absolute King of Egypt, untill the nineteenth of Evilmerodach (at which time, and not before, it hath been proved out Ezechiel, that Egypt became againe a Kingdome) I hold it a superfluous excuse.

Whether these Egyptian troubles did animate the King of the Medes to deale with Evilmerodach, as with a Prince greater in fame & reputation, gotten by the decayed valour of his people, than in present forces; or whether (as I rather thinke) some foyle received by the Assyrian invading Media, emboldned the Egyptians to rebell against him: I will neither undertake, nor seek to define. Xenophon tels, that the first service of young Cyrus in warre, was under Astages King of the Medes, his Grand-father, in a prosperous fight against the Assyrian Prince, who did set upon him; at which time Cyrus was fifteene or sixteene yeeres old. If therefore Cyrus lived threecore and three yeeres (as he is said to have died well stricken in yeeres) which is held to be the ordinary terme of no short life, then was this encounter in the third yeere of Evilmerodach his reigne. Yet by the same reckoning it should follow, that the warre began more early between these Nations, for as much as the manner of their fight in former times, with other circumstances insinuating as much, are found in the same place of Xenophon. And it may well bee, that the death or destruction of Nabuchodonosor gave courage unto those that had felt him a troublesome neighbour, to stand upon prouder termes with the Assyrians, than in his flourishing estate they durst have used. Howsoever the quarrell beganne, we find that it ended not before the last ruine of the Assyrian Monarchie. For the Babylonian, being too proud to digest the losses which he received by the Medes and their Allies the Persians, drew unto his partie the Lydians, and all the people of the lesser Asia, with gifts and strong persuasions, hoping so to over-whelme his enemies with a strong invasion, whom in vaine hee had sought to wearie out with a lingering Warre.

Xenoph. Cyrop. lib. 2.

This

This happened after the death of Astages, who left the world in the nineteenth yeere of Evilmerodach, at which time Amasis tooke possession of Egypt. So that the Assyrian having his hands already full of businesse, which more earnestly did affect him, seemed thereby to have given the better meanes unto the Egyptians, of new erecting their Kingdome, which by long distance of place did sundry times find occasion to rebell in after-ages, and set up a King within it selfe, against the far more mighty Persian.

The issue of these great preparations made by Evilmerodach against the Medes, was such as opened the way unto the fulfilling of those prophecies, which were many yeeres before uttered against Babel, by Ezay and Jeremy.

For, the Assyrians and their Confederates, who, trusting in their numbers, thought to have buried the Medes and Persians under their thicke showres of arrowes and darts, were encountered with an army of stout and well-trained men, weightily armed for close fight, by whom they were beaten in open battell, wherein Evilmerodach was slaine. So that great frame of Empire which Nabuchodonosor had raised and up-held, being shaken and grievously crackt under his unfortunate son, was left to be sustained by his unworthy Nephew: a man more likely to have overthrowen it, when it was greatest and strongest, than to repaire it, when it was in way of falling.

§. XIII.

A private conjecture of the Author; serving to make good those things, which are cited out of Berosus, concerning the Successors of Evilmerodach, without wrong to the truth. The qualitie, and death of Balthasar.

THOUGH I have already (as it seemes to me) sufficiently proved that Balthasar was the Son, and immediate Successour to Evilmerodach, yet considering earnestly the conjectures of those Writers, which following Berosus, insert Negessar, or Ningsaroor, and his son Bassardach betweene them: as also that which I finde in Herodotus of Nitocris, a famous Queene of Babylon, who greatly adorned and fortified that City; I have thought it not superfluous here in this place to shew; by what means it was possible that some error might have crept into the Historie of those times, and thereby have brought us to a needlesse trouble of searching out the truth, as it were by candle-light, in the uncertaine fragments of lost Authors, which we might have found by day-light, had we adhered only to the Scriptures. First therefore I observe, that the time which Berosus divides betwixt Evilmerodach, and the two next Kings, agrees with the yeeres in which Nebuchadnezzar lived wilde among brute beasts in the open field: Secondly, that the suddenness of this accident, which came in one houre, could not but work much perturbation in that State, wherein doublelesse the honour of so noble a Prince was highly regarded, his calamity pitied, and his restitution hoped; the prediction of Daniel finding reputation in that classe which promised his recoverie, as being verified in that which had bin more incredible. Now if we doe in common reason judge, what course was like to be taken by the great ones of the Kingdome, for settling the government, whilst the King was thus distracted, wee shall finde it most likely, that his Son and Heire did occupie the Royall Throne, with condition to restore it unto his Father, when God should enable him to repossesse it. In this his rule, Evilmerodach being to supply the utter want of understanding in his Father, as Protectors doe the unipotence of in young, but reasonable Kings, might easily either commit the insolencies, or fall into the troubles, incident to such an office. That he had in him very small ability of government, it appears by his ill maintaining the Empire, when hee held it in his owne right. That his sister Nitocris (if Nitocris were his sister) was a woman of an high spirit, it appears by that which Herodotus reports of her, saying, that shee was more cunning than Semiramis, as appeared in her magnificent and usefull workes about the River of Euphrates, and her fortification of Babylon against the Medes, who had gotten many Townes from the Assyrians, and amongst them Nineve. Wherefore it were not unreasonable to thinke, that such a woman, seeing how the Empire went to decay through her brothers misgovernment, used practices to get the rule into her owne hands, and afterwards, as a mother, to leave it unto her ungracious son. Other time than this, wherein Nitocris could have reigned, wee doe not finde; but wee finde in Berosus (as Josephus hath cited him) that Negessar, who got the Kingdom from Evilmerodach, was his sisters husband; husband; which argues this to have been the same woman. As for Labassardach the son of Niglissar, if at the end of nine months reign he were for his lewd conditions flaine by the Nobility, as the same Berosus reporteth, it seemes that God prepared hereby the way for Nebuchadnezzars restitution (whose terme of punishment was then expired by raising such trouble, as should make him the more desired, both of the Princes and the people. I will not here use many words to confute that which Berosus hath further set down of Evilmerodach, telling us that he was flaine by his sisters husband: for the plain words of the Scripture, named the year wherein he gave liberty to Jehonia, do plainly testifie that he out-lived the three or foure and fortieth year of his Fathers reign, which was the last of his life.

This may suffice to shew, that they who are said to have succeeded Evilmerodach in the Kingdom, might indeed have so done, though not when he held it in his owne right. Of Balhisar, who was his Son and Heire, we finde, that he had such conditions, as God permitted to be in a King for the ruine of the people. Hee was from his young yeeres of a mischievous nature; having in his Fathers time slaine a Noble young man that should have married his sister, only for spight and envie to see him kill two wilde beasts in hunting, at which himselfe having throwne his Javeline had missed them. Another great Lord he had gelded, because a Gentlewoman commending his beauty, said it were a happy woman that should be his wife. Such barbarous villanies caused many which had loved his Father (as a good and gracious, though unfortunate Prince) to revolt from him so unto the enemy as soone as hee was King. Neither doe I finde that hee performed any thing worthy of record, but as a coward and a foole he lost all; sitting still, and not once daring to give battell to them that daily took somewhat from him. Yet carelessly feasting when danger had hemmed him in on every side, & when death arrested him by the hands of those whom hee had wronged in his Fathers life. So the end of him was base & miserable; for hee died as a foole taken in unexcusable security, yet had not that happinesse, such as it is, of a death free from apprehension of feare, but was terrified with a dreadfull vision; which had shewed his ruine not in many houres before, even whilest he was drinking in that wine, which the swords of his insulting enemies drew out of him, together with his latest blood. It is therefore in this place enough to say of him, That after dishonourable reigne of severenteene yeares, he perished like a beast, and was slaine as he deserved. The rest that concerneth him in question of his time, hath bene spoken heretofore; in matter of his affaires, shall be handled among the acts of Cyrus, to whose story that of Balhisar is but an appendix.

CHAP. II.

Of the originall and first greatnesse of the Persians.

§. 1.

That the Medes were chiefe actors in the subversion of the Babylonian Empire.

THE Line of Belochus being now extinguished in Balhisar, the Empire of Babylon, and of Assyria, was joyned first to that of Media, which then was governed by Cyaxares or Darius Medus, after whom Cyrus became Lord and Monarch, both of Assyria and of Media it selfe.

Of the race of Belal Belochus there were tenne Kings besides him selfe, and of Arbaces as many are found by Metaphanes. These two Provinciaill Governours having cut downe the last branch of Ninus in Sardanapalus, divided betwene them the Eastern Empire. Cyaxares (whom the Scriptures call Darius Medus) the last of the race of Arbaces, dying about two yeeres after that the line of Belochus was ended in Balhisar; the Dominions aswell of the Conquerour, as of the conquered, fell to a third Family, namely, to Cyrus of the house of Achamenes, the Princes of which blood reigning in Persia, had formerly formerly been dependants on the Medes, and were of as little power at home, as of fame abroad in the world.

Of the Familie of the Achamenes, and Line of the Persian Kings, we shall hereafter finde occasion in due place to intreat.

The Nation of the Medes descended from Madai the third sonne of Japhet; that they had Kings soone after the Flood, Lactantius and Diodorus have found record; For Lactantius remembreth an ancient King of the Medes called Hydaspes, and Diodore speaketh of Pharnus with his seven sonnes, slaine by the Assyrian in the beginning of their Empire.

But of these who succeeded Arbaces the first, that freed his Nation from the Assyrian, I take the list and number from Eusebius, adding Darius Medus of whom I have spoken in their proper places heretofore; and they are these.

Arbaces.	28. years.
Sosarmus.	30. years.
Medidus.	40. years.
Cardiceus.	13. years.
Diocles.	53. years.
Phraortes.	24. years.
Cyaxares.	32. years.
Astyages.	38. years.
Darius Medus.

And though the Greekes ascribe the conquest of Babylon to Cyrus alone, yet the Scriptures teach us, that Darius was not only King of Media, and had the Persians his followers, but that the Armie victorious over Balhisar was his; as the Assyrian and Babylonian Empire also was during his owne life. For we finde in Daniel, that Darius of the Medes took the Kingdome being threecore and two years old: And further, what Officers it pleased him to set over the Kingdome. And so was it prophesied by Isay long before: Behold, I will stirre up the Medes against them, &c. And by Jeremie; The Lord hath raised up the spirit of the King of the Medes: for his purpose is against Babel to destroy it; and in the eight and twentieth Verse, Prepare against her the Nations, with the King of the Medes, the Dukes thereof, the Princes thereof, and all the Land of his Dominion. These Scriptures Julius Africanus doth well open, who taking authoritie from Diodore, Cassor, Thallus, and others, delivereth that Babylon was taken before Cyrus began to reign; which also agreeth with Strabo, where he saith, That as the Medes were subjugated by the Persians, so before Lib. 16. that both the Babylonians and Assyrians were mastered by the Medes. And therefore the reports of Justin and Herodotus are not to be received, who attribute the taking of Babylon to Cyrus alone.

§. II.

By what means the Empire was translated from the Medes to the Persians.

HOW the Kingdome of the Medes fell into the hands of Cyrus, it is a doubt not sufficiently cleared by Historians, but rather their different relations of his beginnings have bred the former opinion of those who give the conquest of Babel to the Persian only. For some there are who deny that Astyages had any other Successor than Cyrus his grand-child by Mandane. Whereas Ctesias on the contrary side affirmeth, that Cyrus was no way descended from Astyages (whom he calleth Astias or Apania) but only that having vanquished him in battell, and confined him to Bactria, he married his Daughter Amysis. But I find the relations of Ctesias often cited & seldom followed, and himselfe sometimes very justly reprov'd of wilfull untruth.

Viginius a diligent and learned Historian of this age, produceth many probable reasons that Astyages had no such son as Cyaxares, or Darius Medus; and to confirm this opinion the more, he citeth Diodore, Justin, Strabo, Plato, Aristotle, Isocrates, and before them Cassor, Thallus, and Pblegon, who doe not find any such Successor. Neither do Tasianus, Theophilus Autiochenus, Julius Africanus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Justin Martyr, Lactantius, Eusebius, S. Hierome, or S. Augustine, make report out of any faithfull Author by them read, that hath given other Son or Successor to Astyages than Cyrus.

to Xenophon, who affirmeth, That Cambyſes the father of Cyrus was King of Perſia; than to thoſe that make him a meane man, and ſay, that Aſtyages gave him his daughter Mandane in marriage, to the end that her ſon (whoſe native he feared) might be diſabled from any great undertaking by his fathers ignobilitie.

For what cauſe of griefe could it be to Aſtyages, that the ſon of his daughter ſhould become Lord of the beſt part of Aſia? No, it was more likely, that upon ſuch a Prophecie his love to his grand-child ſhould have encreaſed, and his care been the greater to have married her to ſome Prince of ſtrength and eminent vertue.

Yea, the ſame Herodotus, who is the firſt Author, and as I think the deviſer of the miſchiefe intended againſt Cyrus by his Grandfather, doth confeſſe, That the line of the Achemenida was ſo renowned, that the great King Xerxes in the height of his proſperitie did thence derive himſelfe, and vaunt of it: which he would never have done, had they bin ignoble, or had they bin the vaffals of any other King or Monarch.

For in this ſort Xerxes in the ſeventh of Herodotus deriveth himſelfe.

{ Achemenes.
{ Cambyſes.
{ Cyrus.

{ Tetiſeus.
{ Ariaramnes.
{ Arſamnes.

{ Hyſtaſpes.
{ Darius.
{ Xerxes.

Of the Achemenida there were two races: of the firſt was Cyrus the great, whoſe iſſue to male failed in his two ſonnes, Cambyſes and Smerdis. This royall familie is thus ſet downe by the learned Reineſcius.

Achemenes, the ſon of Perſes, firſt King of Perſia.

Darius.

Cyrus, the firſt of that name, had Cambyſes and Atoſſa; who married to Pharnaces, King of Cappadocia, had Artayſana and other daughters.

Cambyſes had

Cyrus the Great: Cyrus had

Cambyſes, who ſucceeded him, and Smerdis, ſlaine by his brother Cambyſes.

Of the ſecond were thoſe ſeven great Princes of Perſia, who having overthrowne the uſurped royaltie of the Magi, choſe from among themſelves Darius the ſon of Hyſtaſpes, King.

This Kingdome of Perſia was firſt known by the name of Elam, ſo called after Elam the ſon of Sem, and the people therein inhabiting, Elamita; by Elanus, Elyma; by Joſephus, Elymi.

Prep. Evang.*

Suidas derives this Nation ſometimes from Aſſur, ſometimes from Magog, of whom they were called Maguſai; which Maguſai, according to Eufebius, are not to be taken for the Nation in generall, but for thoſe who were afterward called the Magi or Wilemen. So doe the Greeks, among many other their ſayings of them, affirme, That the Perſians were anciently written Artai, & that they called themſelves Cepheneſes. But that they were were confirmed: Which alſo S. Hierome upon Jeremie the five and twentieth, upon Daniel the eighth, and alſo in his Hebrew queſtions, approveth, ſaying: Elam, a quo Elamita Principes Perſida; Elam, of whom were the Elamites Princes of Perſia.

And that Citie which the Author of the ſecond booke of the Maccabees calleth Perſopolis, is by the Author of the firſt called Elamais, but is now called Sirus, being the ſame which Antiochus, for the great riches thereof, twice attempted in vaine, and to his great diſhonour. And yet this Citie, now called Sirus, was not the old Perſepolis; for Alexander at the request of Thais the Harlot, burnt it.

The firſt King of Perſia to us known, if we follow the current of Authors interpreting the fourteenth chapter of Geneſis, was Chedorlaomer, who lived with Amraphel or Nimrod, and joyned with him in the war againſt thoſe Arabians; who was afterward extinguiſhed by the forces of Abraham.

CHAP.

CHAP. III.

Of Cyrus.

§. I.

Of Cyrus his name, and firſt actions.

Stouching the name of Cyrus, Strabo ſaith, That the ſame was taken from a river which watereth Perſia; this great Prince having Agradaus for his proper name. But the great Cyrus was not the firſt of that name. Herodotus otherwiſe; and that Cyrus ſignifieth a father in the Perſian Tongue, and therefore ſo intitled by the people.

It is true that for his Juſtice and other excellent vertues he was indeed called a Father; but that the name of Cyrus had any ſuch ſignification, I think it might be miſtaken.

Plutarch hath a third opinion, affirming, That Cyrus is as much to ſay as the Sunne in the ſame Language. Howſoever it be, yet the Prophet Eſay, almoſt two hundred years before Cyrus was borne, gives him that name, Thus ſaith the Lord unto Cyrus his Anointed, &c.

Before the Conqueſt of Babylon, the victories which Cyrus obtained were many and great among which, the Conqueſt of Lydia, and other Provinces thereto ſubject, together with the taking of Craſus himſelfe, are not recounted by Eufebius, Oroſius, and others, but placed among his latter achievements: whoſe opinion for this difference of time founded upon two reaſons; namely, That of the Median there is no mention in that laſt war againſt Craſus: and that the obtaining of Sardis is referred to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad, and the glorious victorie which Cyrus had over Babylon, to the five and fiftieth Olympiad.

The former of which might have bin uſed (and was by the Greekes) to exclude the Medes from the honour of having won Babylon it ſelfe, which in due place I have answered. The latter ſeems to have reference to the ſecond War which Cyrus made upon Lydia, when it rebelled; at which time he ſo eſtabliſhed his former Conqueſt, as after that time theſe Nations never offered to revolt. Wherefore I like better in this particular to believe with Herodotus, whom the moſt of Chronologers follow, and finde the enterpriſe of Sardis to precede that of Babylon.

§. II.

Of Craſus the King of Lydia, who made warre upon Cyrus.

I Have in the laſt Book ſpoken ſomewhat of Craſus, of his race and predeceſſors, as alſo of the Kings which governed Lydia in more ancient times: of which the firſt (to prophane Authors known) was Lydius the ſon of Arys: which Familie extinguiſhed, the kingdome was by an Oracle conferred upon Argon, deſcended from Hercules, whereof there were two and twentie generations, Candaules being the laſt, who by ſhewing his fair wife naked to Gyges his favorite, he was by the ſame Gyges (thereto urged upon peril of his own life by the Queen) the next day ſlain. Which done, Gyges enjoyed both the Queen and the Kingdome of Lydia, and left the ſame to Arys his ſon, who was father to Sadyattes, the father of Halyattes (who thruſt the Cimmerians out of Aſia) and Halyattes, begat Craſus. Which five Kings, of a third race, enjoyed that kingdome an hundred and ſeventie years. Halyattes the father of Craſus was an undertaking Prince, and after he had continued a war againſt Cyaxares the Median, a Prince very powerfull, and maintained it ſix years, a peace was concluded upon equal conditions between them.

Aſtyages, the ſon of Cyaxares, and grandfather to Cyrus, thought himſelfe greatly honoured by obtaining Argenes, Craſus ſiſter, whom he married.

But

But Cræsus so farre enlarged his dominions after his fathers death, as he was nothing inferior in territory to any King or Monarch of that age: Of which, about that time there were foure in effect of equall strength; to wit, the Median, the Babylonian, the Egyptian, and the Lydian: only Nabuchodonosor, after he had joyned Phœnicia, Palestina, and Egypt to his Empire, had thence-forward no Competitor during his owne life.

But Cræsus, notwithstanding the men and treasure spent in the quarrell of the Babylonians, he yet mastered Æolis, Doris, and Ionia, Provinces posselt by the Greeks in Asia the lesse, adjoining to Lydia; gave law to the Phrigians, Bithynians, Carians, Mysians, Paphlagonians, and other Nations. And that he also inforced the Ephesians to acknowledge him, notwithstanding they compassed their Citie with Diana's girdle, Herodotus witnesseth. Moreover, Athenæus out of Berosus (which also Strabo confirmeth) makes report of a Signall victorie which Cræsus obtained against the Sacæans, a Nation of the Seythians, in memorie whereof the Babylonians his allies did yearly celebrate a Feast, which they called Sacæa: All which he performed in fourteen years.

And being now confident in the continuance of his good fortune, and envious of Cyrus fame, doubting also, that his prosperous undertakings might in the end grow perillous to himselfe, he consulted with the Oracle of Apollo, whom he presented with marvellous rich gifts, what successe he might hope for against Cyrus, if he undertooke him: from whom he received this riddle; Cræsus, passing over the River Halys, shall dissolve agnus Dominion. For the divell being doubtfull of the successe, payed him with merchandize of 10 both sides alike, and might be inverted either way, to the ruine of Persia, or of his owne Lydia.

§. III.

Cræsus his Expedition against Cyrus.

Hereupon Cræsus being resolved to stop the course of Cyrus fortunes, if he could, despised all the arguments used by Sandaues to the contrary, who desired him to fore-think, That he urged a Nation inhabiting a barren and mountainous Region, a people not covered with the soft silke of worms, but with the hard skins of beasts; not fed with such meat as they fancied, but content with what they found; drinkers of water, not of wine: and in a word, a Nation warlike, enduring, valiant and prosperous; over whom if he became victorious, he could thereby enrich himselfe in nothing but fame, in which he already excelled: and if by them beaten, and subiected, so great would his losse appeare of all things which the world hath in account, as the same could neither hastily be told, nor readily conceived.

Notwithstanding this solid counsel, Cræsus having prepared a powerful armie, he led the same toward Media, but in his passage he was arrested at Pterium, a City of great strength in Cappadocia; which while he fought by all means to surprize or to force, Cyrus came on, and found the Lydians encamped before it. That each was inferior to other in strength or opinion, I doe not find: for out of doubt, Cræsus, as he excelled any Prince of that age in riches and abilitie; so was he not under any in territory and fame that he lived.

But as Cræpus of Mitylene answered Pompey when he complained against the gods, because they favoured a disturber and usurper of the Common-weale against him who fought for the Romane libertie, That Kingdomes and Common-weals had their encrease and period from divine Ordinance: so at this time was the winter of Cræsus prosperitie at hand, the leaves of his flourishing fortune ready to fall, and that of Cyrus but in the flower and first spring. The God of all power, and not Admetis Herdman, Apollo, had given a date to the one, and a beginning of glory to the other.

When these two Armies were in view of each other, after the entertainment of divers skirmishes, the Persians and Lydians began to joyn in grosse troups: supplies from both Kings thrust on upon the falling off, and advancement of either Nations: and as the Persians had somewhat the better of the day, so when the darke vaile of night had hidden each Armie from the others view, Cræsus doubting what successe the rising Sunne would bring with it, quitted the field to Cyrus, and with all speed possible retired, and taking the next way into Lydia, recovered Sardis his first Citie and Regall Seat, without any pursuit made by Cyrus to retard him. Where being arrived, and nothing suspecting suspecting Cyrus approach, or any other warre for that Winter, he dismissed the Souldiers, and sent the troups of his sundrie Nations to their owne Provinces, appointing them to re-assemble at the end of five moneths, acquainting his Commanders with his intents for the renewing of the warre at the time appointed.

§. IV.

The Conquest of Lydia by Cyrus.

C*yrus* in the following morning finding the Lydians departed, put his Armie in order to pursue them, yet not so hastily, and at their heeles, as to be discovered. But having good intelligence of Cræsus his proceeding, he so measured his marches, as he presented not himselfe before Sardis, till such time as Cræsus had disposed his Armie to their wintering garisons: which being altogether unlooked for, and unforeseen, he surrounded Sardis with his Armie; Wherein Cræsus having no other Companies than his Citizens and ordinary Guards, after fourteen dayes siege the same was enured by assault, and all executed that resisted. Cræsus having now neither arms to fight, nor wings to flye, Sardis being on all parts strongly encompassed, thrust himselfe into the heape and miserable multitude of his vassals, and had undergone the common fortune of common persons vanquished, had not a son of his, who had been dumb all his life (by extremities of passion and feare enabled) cried out to the Souldiers to spare Cræsus. Who thereupon being taken and imprisoned, despoyled of all things but the expectation of death, he was forthwith tied in fetters, and set on the top of a great and high heape of wood, to be consumed to ashes thereon. To which when the fire was set and kindled, remembering the discourse which he had with the Athenian Law-giver, he thrice cried out on his name, Solon, Solon, Solon: and being demanded what he meant by that invocation, he first used silence: but urged againe, he told them, That he had now found it true which Solon had long since told him, That many men in the race and courses of their lives might well be accounted fortunate, but no man could discern himselfe for happy indeed, till his end.

Of which answer Cyrus being speedily informed, remembering the changes of fortune and his owne mortalitie, he commanded his ministers of Justice to withdraw the fire with all diligence, to save Cræsus, and to conduct him to his presence: Which done, Cyrus demanded of him, Who it was that had perswaded him? or what selfe reason had conducted him to invade his territorie, and to make him of a friend an enemy? To whom he thus answered; It was thy prosperous, and my unprosperous destiny (the Grecian god flustering therewithall my ambition) that were the inventers and conductors of Cræsus warre against Cyrus.

Cyrus being pierc't with Cræsus answer, & bewailing his estate, though victorious over it did not only spare his life, but entertained him ever after as a King and his companion, shewing therein a true effect of mercy indeed. Quæ non causam, sed fortunam spectat.

And herein is the reall difference discerned between that behaviour which we call beneficence (latronis, and gratiam Principis: A theefe sometime sparing the life of him which is in his power, but unjustly: A King that giveth breath, and a continuance of being, to him that was the cause and author of his owne evill.

The report made by Xenophon, is, That Cyrus did friendly entertain Cræsus at the first fight, not mentioning that which Herodotus delivers, and is here already set down, that he should have bin burnt alive. It may very well be, that Xenophon pourtraying (in Cyrus) an heroicall Prince, thought an intent so cruell, fitter to be forgotten than rehearsed, as too much unbecoming a generous nature. And it is very likely, that neere necessity of alliance might with-hold Cyrus (had he bin otherwise vicious) from so cruell a purpose against his grandmothers brother. Howsoever it was, the morall part of the storie hath given much credit and reputation to the report of Herodotus (as to many the like it often doth) and made it passe for currant, though the truth reposed in Cræsus afterwards may seem to argue, that Cyrus did not use him inhumanely at the first.

For as Herodotus himselfe telleth us, when Cyrus past with his Armie over Araxes into Seythia, he left Cræsus to accompany and advise his sonne Cambyses, Governour of the Empire in his absence, with whom he lived all the time of Cyrus, & did afterward follow Cambyses.

Cambyſes into Egypt, where he hardly eſcaped his tyrannous hand. What his end was, I doe not find.

But in this time the races of three of the greateſt Kings in that part of the world took end; to wit, of the Babylonians, Medians, and Lydians; in Balchaſar, Cyaxares, and Creaſus.

§. V.

How Cyrus won Babylon.

After this Lydian War enſued the great Conqueſt of Babylon, which gave unto Cyrus an Empire ſo large & mightie, that he was juſtly reputed the greateſt Monarch then living upon earth. How long time the preparations for this great action took up, is uncertain; only it ſeems, that ten whole years did paſſe between his taking thoſe two Cities of Sardiſ and Babylon; which nevertheless I doe not thinke to have bin wholly occupied in proviſion for the Aſſyrian war, but rather to have bin ſpent in ſetting the Eſtate which he had already purchaſed. And hereunto perhaps may be referred that which Creaſus hath in his fragments of a war made by Cyrus upon the Syrians, though related as foregoing the victorie obtained againſt Creaſus. He telleth us, That Cyrus invaded Syria, and being victorious over that Nation, took Amorges their King priſoner: but being in a ſecond battell overthrowen by the wife of Amorges, Sparetha, and therein taken, the one King was delivered for the other.

Likewiſe it may be thought, that no ſmall part of thoſe troubles which aroſe in the lower Aſia, grew ſoon after the departure of the victorious armie, before the Conqueſt was fully eſtabliſhed.

For after Cyrus was returned out of Aſia the leſſe, many Nations, conquered formerly by Creaſus, and now by Cyrus, revolted from him; againſt whom he employed Palius, and then Harpagus, who firſt reduced the Phocians under their former obedience, and then the reſt of the Greekes inhabiting Aſia the leſſe, as the Ionians, Carians, Eolians, and Lydians, who reſolvedly (according to the ſtrength they had) defended themſelves. But in the attempt upon Babylon it ſelfe, it is not to be doubted, that Cyrus employed all his forces, having taken order before-hand, that nothing ſhould be able to divert him, or to raiſe that ſiege, and make fruſtrate the work upon which he did ſet all his reſt. And great reaſon there was, that he ſhould bend all his care and ſtrength unto the taking of that Citie, which beſide the fame and reputation that it held, as being head of an Empire thereon depending, was ſo ſtrongly fenced with a treble wall of great height, & ſurrounded with waters unfordable, ſo plentifully victualled for many years, that the inhabitants were not only free from all doubt and fear of their eſtate, but deſpiſed and derided all purpoſes and power of their beſiegers.

The only hope of the Medes and Persians, who deſpaired of carrying by aſſault a Citie ſo wel fortified & manned, was in cutting off all ſupplies of victuals and other neceſſaries: whereof though the Town was ſaid to be ſtored ſufficiently for more than 20. years, yet might it well be deemed, that in ſuch a world of people as dwelt within thoſe gates, one great want or other would ſoon appear, & vanquiſh the reſolution of that unwearied multitude. In expecting the ſucces of this courſe, the beſiegers were likely to endure much travel, & all in vain, if they did not keep ſtreight watch & ſtrong guards upon all quarters.

This was hard to doe, in regard of the vaſt circuit of thoſe walks which they were to gird in, with numbers neither great enough, nor of men ſufficiently aſſured unto their commander: The conſideration whereof miniſtered unto the Babylonians matter of good paſſtime, when they ſaw the Lydians, Phrygians, Cappadocians, and others, quartered about their Town to keep them in, who having bin their ancient friends and allies, were more likely to joyne with them, if occaſion were offered, than to uſe much diligence on the behalfe of Cyrus, who had, as it were, yesterdai layd upon their neckes the galling yoke of ſervitude. Whileſt the beſieged were playing themſelves in this deſcendiſſe and vaine gladneſſe, that is the ordinarie fore-runner of ſudden calamities; Cyrus, whom the Ordinance of God made ſtrong, conſtant, and inventive, deviſed by ſo many channels and trenches as were ſufficient and capable of Euphrates, and ſo to draw the ſame from the walls of Babylon, thereby to make his approach the more facile and aſſured: which when by the labour of many hands hee had performed, he

he ſtayed the time of his advantage for the execution: for he had left certain bankes or heads un-cut, between the maine river which ſurrounded the Citie, and his owne Trenches.

Now Balchaſar, finding neither any want or weakneſſe within, nor any poſſibilitie of approach for his enemies without, prepared an exceeding ſumptuous feaſt, publike Playes and other Paſtimes, and thereto invited a thouſand of his Princes or Nobilitie, beſides his wives, curtizans, & others of that trade. This he did either to let the beſiegers know, that his proviſions were either ſufficient, not only for all needfull uſes, but even for jollitie and exceſſe: Or becauſe he hoped that his enemies, under the burthen of many diſtreſſes were well neere broken; or in honour of Bel his moſt revered Idoll: Or that it was his birth or coronation day: Or for many or all theſe reſpects. And hee was not contented with ſuch magnificence as no Prince elſe could equall, but (uſing Daniels words) He liſted himſelf up againſt the Lord of Heavens: for he & his Princes, wives & concubines, made carowling cups of the Veſſels of God, in contempt of whom he praiſed his own puppets, made of Silver and Gold, of Braſſe, Iron, Wood, and Stone, Quanta ſuit ſultitia in cuſtodia aureis bibentes, lignos & lapideos deo laudare; How great a fooliſhneſſe was it (ſaith S. Hierome) drinking in golden Cups, to praife gods of Wood and Stone. While Balchaſar was in this ſort triumphing, and his braines well filled with vapors, he beheld a hand, which by divine power wrote on the wall oppoſite unto him, certaine words which he underſtood not: wherewith ſo great a feare and amazement ſeized him, as the joynts of his loynes were looſed, and his knees ſmote one againſt the other. Which paſſion when he had in ſome part recovered, he cried out for his Chaldeans, *Aſtologi*ans, and Soothſayers, promiſing them great rewards, and the third place of honor in the kingdom to him that could reade and expound the writing; but it exceeded their Art. In this diſturbance and aſtoniſhment the Queen hearing what had paſt, and of the Kings amazement, after reverence done, uſed this ſpeech: *There is a man in thy Kingdom, in whom is the ſpirit of the holy Gods, and in the dayes of thy father, light, and underſtanding, & wiſedome, like the wiſdome of the Gods, was found in him, whom the King Nabuchodonosor, thy father, the King (I ſay) thy father made chiefe of the Incubers, Aſtologi*ans, Chaldeans, and Soothſayers, becauſe a more excellent ſpirit, and knowledge, and underſtanding, &c. were found in him, even in Daniel, &c. Now let Daniel be called, and he will declare the interpretation.

This Queen, Jeſeph ſaves for the grandmother; Origen and Theodoret for the mother of Balchaſar; either of which may be true: for it appeareth, that ſhe was not any of the Kings wives, becauſe abſent from the feaſt; and being paſt the age of dancing and banquetting, came in upon the bruit of the miracle, and to comfort the King in his diſtreaſion: And whereas Daniel was forgotten and neglected by others both of younger years and times, this old Queene remembered well what he had done in the dayes of Nabuchodonosor, grandfather to this Balchaſar, and kept in mind both his religion and divine gifts.

When Daniel was brought to the Kings preſence, who acknowledged thoſe excellent graces wherewith God had enriched him, he prayed him, together with promiſes of reward and honour, to reade and interpret thoſe words miraculoſly written; to whom Daniel made answer in a farre different ſtile from that he uſed towards his Grandfather: for the evil which he ſaw in Nabuchodonosor, he wiſhed that the ſame might befall his enemies; but to this King (whoſe neglect of God and vice he hated) he answered in theſe words, Keep thy rewards to thy ſelfe, and give thy gifts to another, yet will I reade the writing unto the King, and ſhew him the interpretation. Which before he had performed, he gave him firſt the cauſe of Gods juſt judgement againſt him, and the reaſon of this terrible ſentence, whereof the King and all his Wife men were utterly ignorant. Which being written at large in Daniel, hath this effect: That forgetting Gods goodneſſe to his Father, whom all Nations feared and obeyed, and that for his pride and neglect of thoſe benefits, as he deprived him of his eſtate and underſtanding; ſo upon the acknowledgement of Gods infinite power he reſtored him to both. This King notwithstanding liſted himſelf up againſt the ſame God, and preſuming both to abuſe thoſe veſſels dedicated to holy uſes, and neglecting the Lord of all power, praiſed and worſhipped the dead Idols of Gold, Silver, Braſſe, Iron, Stone, and Wood: and therefore thoſe words, from the Oracle of a true God delivered, (to wit) Mene, Tekel, Upharſin, gave the King knowledge, that God had numbred the time of his kingdome, and finished it: That he was weighed in the ballance of Gods justice, and found too light; and that his Empire was divided and given to the Medes and Persians.

The very evening or night of this day, wherein Balthazar feasted and perished, Cyrus, either by his espiall, according to Xenophon, or inspired by God himselfe, whose engine he followed in this warre, found the time and opportunitie to invite him: and therefore while the Kings head, and the heads of his Nobilitie were no lesse filled with the vapors of wine, than their hearts with the feare of Gods judgement, he caused all the banks and heads of his trenches to be opened and cut downe with that diligence, as by them he drew the great River of Euphrates dry for the present, by whole channell running, his Armie made their entrance, finding none to disturbe them. All the Town lay buried (as the Poet saith) in sleepe and wine: such as came in the Persians way, were put to the sword, unless they saved themselves by flight, as some did, who ranne away crying, and filling the streets with an uncertaine tumult.

Such Assyrian Lords as had revolted from Balthazar, and betaken themselves to the partie of Cyrus, did now conduct a selected companie to the Kings Palace; which having easily forced, they rushed into the chamber where the King with his Princes were banqueting, slew both him and them without any mercie, who struggled in vain to keep those lives which God had newly threatened to take away. And now was the prophetic of Jeremie fulfilled, and that of Esay, two hundred yeares before this subversion, who in his seven and fortieth Chapter, and elsewhere, writeth this destruction for feelingly and lively as if he had been present both at the terrible slaughter there committed, and had scene the great and unfeared change and calamitie of this great Empire; yea, and had heard the sorrowes and bewailings of every surviving soule thereunto subject. His so heard the sorrowes and bewailings of every surviving soule thereunto subject. His Prophecie of this place he beginneth in these words: Come downe, and sit in the dust, O virgin daughter of Babel: sit on the ground, there is no Throne, &c. And again, Sit still and get thee into darkenesse, O daughter of the Chaldeans, for thou shalt no more be called the Lady of Kingdomes. For though it cannot be doubted, that God used Nabuchodonosor in this place, to punish the Idolatry of the Judeans, yet Esay teacheth us in this place, That he did not yet forget, that the execution of his judgements was mixt with a rigorous extremitie. For (saith Esay) in the person of God, I was wroth with my people, I have polluted mine inheritance, and given them into thine hands: thou didst shew them no mercy, thou didst lay thy very heavy yoke upon the ancient. I will rise up against them, saith the Lord of Hosts, and will cut off from Babel the name and the remnant, and the sonne and the nephew. And in the thirteenth, Every one that is found, shall be stricken thorow: and whosoever joyneth himself, shall fall by the sword; their children also shall be broken in pieces before their eyes, their houses spoiled, and their wives ravished. So as there is no Historian who was either present at this victory of Cyrus, or that received the report from others truly as it was, that could better leave the fame to posteritie after it happened, than Esay hath done in many places of his Prophecies, which were written two hundred yeares before any thing attempted.

The greatnesse and magnificence of Babylon, were it not by divers grave Authors set down, might seem altogether fabulous: for besides the reports of Saint Hierome, Solinus, and Orosius, Aristotle in the third of his Politiques, the second Chapter, received the report for true. That one part of the Citie knew not that the rest was taken three dayes after. Which is not impossible, if the testimonie of Diodorus Siculus may be taken; who findes the compasse thereof at three hundred and three score Stadia or Furlongs, which makes five and fortie miles: the walls whereof had fo great a breadth, that six Chariots might passe in front thereon. And of height, according to Ctesias and Clitarchus, three hundred three score and five foot, garnished with an hundred and fiftie Towers. Strabo in the beginning of his sixteenth Booke of Geographie gives it a greater circuit, adding five and twentie furlongs more to the former compasse, reckoning the same at three hundred foure score and five furlongs, which makes eight and fortie mile and one furlong, but finds the wall farre under that which Diodore reports: and so doth Curtius measure their thicknesse but at two and thirtie foot, and their height at an hundred cubits, which is also very much; every cubit containing a foot and halfe of the large measure, though to the whole circuit of the Citie he gives the same with Siculus, and eight furlongs more. Herodotus findes a greater content than Strabo doth, namely, four hundred dred and foure score furlongs circle; the thicknesse of the wall he measures at fiftie cubits, and the height at two hundred of the same regall cubit. For entrance it had an hundred gates of Brasse, with posts and hookes to hang them on of the same metall: and therefore did the Prophet Esay rightly intitle Babylon, The Princeesse and Glory of kingdoms.

But when Cyrus had wonne her, he stript her out of her Princely Robes, and made her a slave; dividing not onely all her goodly houses, and her whole Territorie, with all the riches therein contained, among his Souldiers; but bestowing the inhabitants themselves as bond-slaves upon those that had taken possession of their goods.

Touching the reigne of Cyrus, and the time which he enjoyed in rest and pleasure, I can say no more of it, than that it is generally agreed by all Chronologers to have lasted only seven yeares: in which time he made such Constitutions as differ little from the ordinances of all wise Kings that are desirous to establish a Royall power to themselves and their posteritie.

§. VI.

The end of Cyrus.

The last warre, and the end of this great King Cyrus, is diversly written. Herodotus and Justin deliver, That after the Conquest of Asia the lesse, Cyrus invaded the Massagetes, a very warlike Nation of the Scythians, governed by Tomyris their Queene: and that in an encounter between the Persians and these Northerne No-mades, Tomyris lost her armie, and her Son Spargapises that commanded it: In revenge whereof, this Queene making new levies of men of War, and following the War against Cyrus, in a second battell beat the Persian Armie, and taking Cyrus prisoner, cut off his head from his bodie, and cast the same into a boule of bloud, using these words; Thou that hast all thy life time thirsted for bloud, now drinke thy fill, and satiate thy selfe.

It should hereby seeme, that Cyrus knowing the strength and multitude of those frozen Nations, was perswaded to abate their furie by some forcible invasion and depopulation, because in the time of Cyaxares, father to Astages, those Scythians invaded Media and Asia the lesse, and held the same in a servile subjection eight and twenty yeares.

This war which Metasthenes calleth Tomyrique, lasted (saith he) sixe yeares, and took end at the end of Cyrus.

But in this particular I beleeve with Viginier, that this Scythian War was rather the same which Cyrus made against the Sacians, before the conquest of Lydia, according to Ctesias before cited, who calleth Tomyris, Sparethra, though he deliver the successe of that war otherwise than Herodotus doth: The rather (saith Viginier) because Strabo in his eleventh book reciteth, that Cyrus surprized the Sacians by the same stratagem by which Justin saith he defeated the son of Tomyris. And the same Ctesias also reporteth, That the last war which Cyrus made, was against Amorheus king of the Derbicians, a Nation (as the rest) of Scythia, whom though he overcame, yet he then received the wound of his death, which he suffered three dayes after.

Strabo also affirmeth, That he was buried in his owne Citie of Pasagardes, which himselfe had built, and where his Epitaph was to be read in his time; which is said to have bin this: O vir quicunque es, & undecunque advenis, neque enim te adventuram ignoravi: Ego sum Cyrus qui Persis imperium constitui, pusillum hoc terrae quae meum tegitur corpus mihi ne invidias; O thou man, whosoever thou art, or whence soever thou comest; for I was not ignorant that thou shouldst come: I am Cyrus that founded the Persian Empire, doe not envie unto me this little earth, with which my bodie is covered.

This Tombe was opened by Alexander, as Qu. Curtius reporteth, either upon hope of treasure, supposed to have been buried with him, or upon desire to honour his dead bodie with certaine ceremonies; in which there was found an old rotten Target, two Scythian Bowes, and a Sword. The Coffin wherein his bodie lay, Alexander caused to be covered with his owne garment, and a Crowne of gold to be set upon it. These things well considered, as they give credit to the reports of Xenophon and Zonaras, so they derogate much from Herodotus, who leaves his bodie in the hands of Tomyris.

And

Greekes, which being constant in it selfe, accordeth also with the computation of other Historians, and Astronomers, and likewise with the holy Scriptures.

S. II.

of Cambyfes, and the conquering of Egypt by him.

W E will therefore according to the truth give the Empire of Persia to Cambyfes, the son of Cyrus, though degenerate in all things, saving the desire to increase the greatness of his Empire: whereof he was possessor in his Fathers time while Cyrus made war in the North. Ctesias with others give him a longer reigne than agreeeth with the Grecian account before received.

In the fifth year of his sole reigne, and in the third year of the threescore and third Olympiad, according to Diodore and Eusebius, he invaded Egypt, and having overthrown the King thereof, Psammenniticus, he not onely caused him to be slaine, but also did put to death all his kindred and dependants, with the most of his children.

Herodotus and Ctesias give for cause of this war (being no other indeed than the Ambition of Cambyfes) that when he sent to Amasis king of Egypt, to have his daughter in marriage, Amasis presented him with Nitetis the daughter of Apries his predecessor, which Cambyfes disdained.

Howsoever it were; true it is, that Cambyfes gathered an Armie fit for such an enterprise, and caused the same to march. But before they entered Egypt, Amasis died, and left Psammenniticus, whom Ctesias called Amyreus, his successor; who enjoyed Egypt after his father (according to the best copies of Herodotus) but fixe Moneths, though other Chronologers give him fixe years.

But how long soever he held the Crowne, in one battell hee lost it, and was himselfe taken prisoner.

It is said that Cambyfes, following therein the example of Cyrus, did not onely spare life to the conquered King, but that he also trusted him with the government of Egypt, and that upon some revolt, or suspicion thereof, he caused him to be slaughtered. But the race of this King was not so extirpated, if we may beleve Herodotus and Thucydides, but that he left a son called Inarus, who caused the Egyptians to revolt both from Xerxes and Artaxerxes.

That Psammenniticus was at the first entreated gently by Cambyfes, I hold it very improbable, if it bee true which is also written of him, That he so much hated Amasis the King of Egypt, who died before his arrivall, that he caused his body to be drawne out of the grave, and after divers indignities used, commanded the same to be burnt, contrary to the custome both of the Egyptians and Persians. For the Egyptians used to powder their dead bodies with salt, and other drugs, to the end the wormes might not devour them. The Persians durst not consume them with fire, which they esteemed as a God, and therefore feared to feed it with Carrion.

S. III.

The rest of Cambyfes his AEs.

AFTER this victory obtained in Egypt, Cambyfes sent an Army into Cyprus, and constrained Evagoras King thereof to acknowledge him, who before held that Island of the Egyptians.

While Cambyfes yet busied himselfe in Egypt, he so much detested the Idolatry of that Nation, as he caused the images themselves, with the Temples wherein they were worshipped, to be torne downe and defaced. This done, he directed a part of his Armie into Libya, to overthrow the Temple of Jupiter Ammon; but the Divell in defence of his Oracle raised such a Tempest of Sand, wherewith the greatest part of that Country is covered, as the Persians were therewith choked and over-whelmed.

Notwithstanding which misadventure, Herodotus and Seneca report, that disdaining to be resisted, he prepared the rest of his Army, which himselfe meant to conduct into those parts, but that finding a beginning of those incommodities, which his first sent troupe had tryed, he changed his purpose. For though conquering Kings have power over men, yet the elements doe not obey them, according to that old English proverb, God, saith the King; Sea, saith the Tide.

After his returne from the attempt of Ethiopia, he caused Apis the Egyptian Bull, worshipped by that Nation as God, to be slaine: a deed very commendable, had it proceeded from true zeale, and been executed as in service of him that onely is, and liveth. But soone afterwards, when in a dreame it seemed unto him that Smerdis did sit in the royall throne of Persia (which apparition was verified in Smerdis the Magus) he gave it in charge to his favorite Praxaspes, to murder Smerdis his brother. And having married his own sisters, contrary to the Persian Lawes, he committed a most causelesse and most detestable murder upon the one of them called Meroe, then by himselfe with child, because she bewailed the death of her brother Smerdis. I finde it written of this Cambyfes, That because his Predecessors observed religiously the ordinances of their Empire, he assembled his Judges, and enquired of them whether there were any Law among the Persians that did permit the brother to marry his owne sister: it being his owne intent so to doe. The Judges (who had alwayes either lawes or distinctions in store to satisfie Kings and times) made answer, That there was not any thing written allowing any such conjunction, but they notwithstanding found it in their customes, that it was alwayes left to the will of the Persian Kings to do what best pleased themselves; and so as Nearchus termes it, invenerunt occasionem: That is as much to say, as the Judges found a shift to please the King, and to secure themselves. And yet, where it concerned not the Kings private satisfaction, he caused Sisamnes one of his Judges, and perchance one of those which favoured his incestuous match, to be slayed alive, for an unjust judgement given, and the same his hide to be hung up over the judgement seate. After which, bestowing the Fathers Office on his son, he willed him to remember that the same partiality deserved the same punishment.

Among other his cruelties, that which he exercised against the sonne of his beloved Praxaspes was very strange and ungrateful. For when he desired to be truly informed by him what the Persians thought of his conditions, Praxaspes answered, That his vertues were followed with abundant praise from all men; onely it was by many observed, that he took more than usuall delight in the tast of Wine. With which taxation inflamed, he used this replication: And are the Persians double-tongued, who also tell mee that I have in all things excelled my father Cyrus? thou Praxaspes shalt then witness, whether in this report they have done me right: for if at the first shot I pierce thy sonnes heart with an arrow, then is it false that hath been spoken; but if I misse the marke, I am then pleased that the same be accounted true, and my Subjects beleaved. This being spoken, he immediately directed an arrow towards the innocent child, who falling downe dead with the stroke, Cambyfes commanded his body to be opened, and his heart being broached on the arrow, this monstrous Tyrant greatly rejoycing, shewed it to the Father, with this saying in stead of an Epitaph: Now Praxaspes, thou maist resolve thy selfe, that I have not lost my wit with Wine, but the Persians theirs, who make such report.

Many other barbarous cruelties he exercised, till at the last, according to the phrase of our Law, he became selon de soy. For when he was informed that Patistates, and Smerdis the Magi (Cedrenus writeth them Sphendaces, & Cimerdus) Ministers of his domestick affaires, taking advantage of the great resemblance between Smerdis the Kings brother, and Smerdis the Magus, possessed themselves of the Empire, he made all haste towards Persia, and in mounting hastily on horsebacke, his word disheathing, pierced his owne thigh, where-with deadly wounded, falling into an over-hate and remorselesse repentance of the slaughter which he had executed upon his own brother, he soone after gave up his wicked ghost, when he had reigned eight years, accounting therein those seven & fortyeth in which the Magi governed, while he was absent.

In Cambyfes the Male Line of Cyrus failed. For he had no issue either by Atossa or Meroe: yet Zonaras out of Hierome gives him a daughter called Panaspes, and a son called Zucymus. Orontes, who being drowned in the river Ophites by Antioch, the same was afterward in memory of the Princes death called Orontes.

He built the Citie of Babylon in Egypt, in the place where Latopolis was formerly seated, and that of Meroe in the Island of Nils, calling it by the name of his sister Meroe.

§. IIII.

Of the inter-regnum betweene Cambyfes and Darius.

CYRUS and his two sonnes being now dead, and the Kingdome in the possession of one of the Magi, the counterfeit of Smerdis, the Princes, or Satrapes, or Provincial Governors of the Empire (to wit, Oranes, Intaphernes, Gobrias, Megabyfus, Alphasines, Midarnes, and Darius, who were all descended from Achamenes the first Persian King) having discovered the fraud of this imposture, joynd their forces together, surpris'd and rooted out the Conspirator with his Companions and Assistants. In which action (saith Justine) Intaphernes and Alphasines were slaine: but Herodotus otherwise, that they were onely wounded; for he avoweth that all the seven Princes were present at the election following.

For the Empire being now without a Governour, these Princes grew into consultation how the same might be ordered from thence-forth. Oranes one of the seven did not fancy any election of Kings, but that the Nobilitie and Cities should confederate, and by just lawes defend their liberty in equality, giving divers reasons for his opinion, being as it seemed greatly terrified by the cruelties of Cambyfes: As first, that it was not safe to give all power to any one, seeing greameffe it selfe, even in good men, doth often infect the minde with many vices, and the liberty and freedom in all things is most apt to insult, and to commit all manner of wicked outrage. Again, that tyrants do commonly use the services of wicked men, and favour them most; they usurp upon the lawes of their Country; take other mens wives by force, and destroy whom they please without judgement.

Megabyfus was of another opinion, affirming that the tyranny of a multitude was thrice more intolerable than that of one. For the multitude doe all things without judgement, runne into businesse and affaires with precipitation, like raging and over-bearing floods.

He therefore thought it safest to make election of a few, and those of the best, wisest, and most vertuous; because it is ever found, that excellent Counsels are ever had from excellent men.

Darius gave the third judgement, who perswaded the creation of a King, because even among few diuturnity of concord is seldom found, and in great Empires it doth ever happen that the discord of many Rulers hath enforce't the election of one Supreme. It were therefore, saith Darius, farre safer to observe the lawes of our Country, by which Kingly government hath beene ordained.

The other foure Princes adhered to Darius, and agreed to continue the same Imperiall government by God established, and made prosperous. And to avoyd partiality, it was accorded, that the morning following these seven Princes should mount on Horse-backe, and on him the kingdome should be conferred, whose Horse after the Sun-rising should first ney or bray. In the evening after this appointment was made, it is said that Darius consulted with the Master of his Horse Oebanus, who in the Suburbs of the City where the election was resolv'd, caused the same Horse, whereon in the morning Darius was mounted, to cover a Mare, who as soon as he came into the same place, was the first Horse that brayed. Whereupon the other fixe Princes descended from their Horses, and acknowledged Darius for their Lord and King.

Plato in the third of his Lawes affirmeth, that in memory of the seven Princes, whereof Darius himselfe was one, that delivered the Empire from the usurpation of the Magi, he divided the whole into seven governments; Herodotus saith, into twenty Satrapies.

Of Darius the sonne of Hyftaspes.

§. I.

Of Darius his Linage.

Darius was descended of the ancient Persian Kings, to wit, of the Achamenide, of which, Cyrus the Great was the lineall successor. For in this sort Herodotus derives him as before.

Cyrus the first, who had Teispus, who begat
Ariaramnes, who was father of Arfames, the father of Hyftaspes, the father of Darius, surnamed Celes, the father of Xerxes.

Cur. 46

Hyftaspes accompanied Cyrus the Great, in the warres against the Scythians, at which time Cyrus being made jealous of Darius by a dreame of his owne, caused him to be sent into Persia, others say to be imprisoned, from whence by the death of Cyrus he was delivered, and made Governour of the Persian Magi. He afterward followed Cambyfes into Egypt; he then joynd with the rest of the Princes against the Magi, and either by the meying of his horse, or, as others affirme, by strong hand he obtained the Empire, which he thence assured to himselfe by taking two of Cyrus Daughters, and as many of his Neeces for his wives.

Hyftaspes, according to * Herodotus, had besides Darius, these three sonnes, who were great Commanders in the warre which Darius made in Asia the lesse, Thrace, Macedon, and Greece; Atarnes, Artabernes, and Artabanus, who dislaid Xerxes from the second Grecian warre. Hyftaspes had also a Daughter married to Gobrias the Father of Mardamis, who commanded the Army of Darius in Macedon, and married the Daughter of Darius, Artochtre his Cousen germane.

Rumecius gives to Hyftaspes five sonnes, Darius who succeeded Cambyfes, Artabanus, Artaphernes, Oranes, and Atarnes, with two daughters.

§. II.

Of Darius his Government, and suppressing the rebellion of Babylon.

Darius devised equall lawes whereby his subjects might be governed, the same being formerly promised by Cyrus. He gave access to all his subjects, and behaved himselfe so mildly to all men, that many Nations desired and offered themselves to become his Vassals: Only he layd divers payments and taxes on the people, which had not beene accustomed in Cyrus time, to the value of fourteene thousand five hundred and three score talents, saith Herodotus.

The war which Cambyfes made a far off in Egypt, and the contention between the Magi and the Princes of Persia, for the Empire, gave heart to the Babylonians to recover their liberty, and to shake off the Persian yoke; whereof Darius being advertised, he prepared an Army to recover that Citie and State revolted. But finding the same a difficult work, he used the service of Zopirus, who for the love he bare Darius, did cut off his own Ears and Nose, and with other wounds yet fresh bleeding, he seemed to flye to the Babylonians for succour, to whom he accused the cruelty of Darius: who for having given him advice to give over the siege of their City, had in this sort dismembered and deformed him; whereupon the Babylonians gave him that credit, as they trusted him with the disposition and commandement of their greatest forces: which when Zopirus had obtained, after some small colourable over-throwes given to the Persians upon the Citie, he delivered the Citie into Darius his hands, who had lyen before it twenty months.

§. III.

Of Darius his favour to the Jewes in building the Temple.

IN the second year of Darius, hee gave order that the building of the Temple at Hierusalem should goe on, and commanded that the same should bee finished at his owne charge, and out of the revenues of the Crowne. And whereas the Governours of those Provinces which are situate between Euphrates and the Phœnician, and mid-land Sea (whom Ezra calleth the Captaines beyond the River) had hindered the worke in Cambyfes his time, Darius gave commandement that they should not thenceforth come neare unto Jerusalem, to give any impediment to the building, but that they should with-draw themselves, and get them far off till all were finished, and at an end. In the old Latine it is written, Procul recedite ab illis; with-draw your selves far from them; In our English, Be ye far from thence, to wit, from the City and Temple now in building.

He also made a decree which concerned his owne Subjects, That whosoever should thenceforth hinder the setting up of the Temple of God, that his house should become downe, and the disturber hanged on a Gallows made of the timber thereof. He also in the same decree maketh invocation to God; That hath caused his Name to dwell there (to destroy all Kings and People that put their hands to alter, and to destroy this house of God which is in Jerusalem, &c. In foure years after which decree (the Jewes being really finished with money and all things necessary from Darius) the Temple was in all finished, to wit, in the beginning of the Spring, in the sixth year of Darius Hystaspes, and in the two and fortieth after their first returne.

§. I V.

Of Darius his Scythian Warre.

AFTER the recovery of Babylon he invaded the Scythians, whose king Iustine calleth Lanthinus; and saith, that Darius undertooke this warre against him, because he refused him his daughter in marriage. The better to convoy his Army into Scythia, he built a bridge of small Vessels over the River Ister or Danubius; & gave the custody of the same in charge (among others of Asia the lesse) to the Tonians & Asians, among whom was Miltiades, who perswaded the Asian Grecians to breake downe the bridge, to the end Darius might not returne thereby, and if by any other way, then without great difficulty; but the same was resisted by Hystianus Prince of Milet, a Citie of Tonia, which Nation being a Colonie of the Greeks, Diodorus calleth Traytors to their Countrey, because they joyned themselves to Darius. But the Scythians more elegantly termed them good slaves, for as much as they would not runne away from their Master, but were more mindfull of doing their duties, than of shaking off their bondage, when they were presented with as faire an occasion of liberty as could have beene desired. For the great Armie of Darius entering the desert Countrey called Bessarabia, found in it neither people to resist them, nor any sustenance to relieve them. For the Scythians were then, as are the Chrim Tartars, their posterity, at this day all Horse-men, using the Bow and Sword. They were not Plough-men, but Grazier, driving their Herds from one place to another, as opportunity of Pasture led them. Standing Townes they had none, but used for Houses the Waggon wherein they carried their wives and children. These Waggones they place at every Station in very good order, making Streets and Lanes in the manner of a great Towne, removeable at their pleasure. Neither hath the Emperour himselfe, called now the great Chrim, any other Citie than such as Azora, (as they name it) or Towne of Carts. When as therefore Darius had wearied himselfe, and wasted his provision in those desolate Regions, wherein he found neither wayes to direct him, victuals to refresh him, nor any houses, fruitfull trees, or living creatures, nor any thing at all, which either he himselfe might make use of, or by destroying it might grieve his enemies; he began to perceive his owne folly, and the danger into which he had brought him. Yet setting a good face upon a bad game, he sent brave messengers to the Scythian, bidding him to cease his flight, and either to make triall of his valour & fortune in plaine battell: Or, if he acknowledged himselfe the weaker, then to yield by faire means, and become his Subject, giving him Earth and Water, which the Persians used to demand as a signe that all was yielded unto them. To this challenge the Scythian returned an Hieroglyphicall answer; sending a Bird, a Frog, a Mouse, and five Arrows: which dumbe shew Darius interpreting by his owne wisht, thought that he did yeelde all the Elements wherein those creatures live, and his weapons withall into his hands. But Gobryas, one of the seven Princes, who had slaine the Magi, construed their meaning aright, which was thus; O ye Persians, get ye wings like Birds, or drive under the water, or creepe into holes in the earth, for else ye shall not escape our arrows. And this interpretation was soone verified by the Scythians themselves, who assailed the Persian campe, drave the horsemen into the trenches, and vexed the Armie with continuall Allarums day and night; were so fearelesse of this great Monarch, and so little regarded him, that within his hearing, and even in his sight, they did not forbear the pastime of coursing a Hare, which they had started by chance. By this boldnesse of theirs, Darius was so discouraged, that he forsooke his Campe by night, making many fires, and leaving all that were sick and weake behinde him, and so with all speed marched away towards the River Ister. He was pursued hardly by the Scythians, who mist him; yet arriving at the Bridge before him, perswaded the Tonians to depart, assuring them that the Persian king should never more be able to do them either good or harm. Which words had certainly been proved true, had not Hystianus the Milesian prevailed with his people, to attend the coming of Darius, whom the Scythians did likewise faile to meet, when they returned from Ister to seeke him out.

§. V.

Some actions of the Persians in Europe, after the Scythian Warre.

Darius having thus escaped out of Scythia, determined the invasion of Thrace and Macedon, in which Warre he employed Megabastus, who mastered the Pæonians, and transplanted them, and possest Perinthus, Chalcedon, Byzantium, and other places, being also soone after subjected, and added to the Persian Empire by Otares, the son of Sylamnes, whom Cambyfes had exoriated for false judgment. So were the Cities of * Selybria, and * Cardia likewise taken in for the Persian, who having now reduced under his obeyssance the best part of Thrace, did send his Embassadors to Aminias King of Macedon adjoining, demanding of him by the Earth and Water, the Sovereignty over that kingdom. Aminias doubting his owne strength, entertained the Embassadors with gentle words, and afterwards invited them to a solemne and magnificent feast; the Persians greatly desired that the Macedonian Ladies might be present: which being granted, the Embassadors, who were well filled with wine, and presumed upon their greatnesse and many victories, began to use such embracings, and other lascivious behaviour towards those Noble Ladies, as Alexander the Kings son, great Grandfather to Alexander the Great, disdain the Persians barbarous presumption, besought his father to with-draw himselfe from the assembly, continuing notwithstanding all honourable respect towards the Embassadors, whom withall he entreated that the Ladies might refresh themselves for a while; promising their speedy returne. This being obtained, Alexander caused the like number of well-favoured young men to clothe themselves in the same garments, & to use the same attires which the Ladies had worn at the feast, giving them in charge, That when the Persians offered to abuse them, they should forthwith transpierce them with their long knives, of which they were provided for that purpose, which was accordingly performed. Charge was soone after given by Darius for a severe revenge of this murder. But Alexander somewhat before the death of Aminias, gave his sister Gyges in marriage to Bubaris, a principall Commander of Darius forces on that side, who perswading her husband how helpful the Alliance of Macedon would prove for the invasion of Africa intended, so prevailed, as Alexander escaped that tempest, which threatned to fall upon him very suddenly; the war of Asia the lesse, called Ionick, falling out at the same time.

§ VI. The

§. VI.

The first occasion of the War which Darius made upon Greece, with a rehearsal of the governments in Athens, whence the quarrell grew.

Now the better to understand thereupon and motives of that great War, which followed soone after, between the Persians and Grecians, it is necessary to make a short repetition of the state of Athens, which Citie endured the hardest and worst brunt of Darius invasion on that side the Sea, with admirable successe. Neither do I hold it any impertinency to be large in unfolding every circumstance of so great a business as gave fire to those wars, which never could be thoroughly quenched, untill the ruine of this great Persian Monarchy, Persopolis the capital City of the Empire, was at the request of an Athenian Harlot consumed with a flame, as dreadfull as in the pride of their greatnesse, the Persians had raised in Athens.

Now therefore as out of the former books it may be gathered, how Athens and other parts of Greece, were anciently governed, the same being already set downe, though scatteringly, & in severall times, among other the Contemporary occurrences of the Eastern Emperors, and the Kings of Judea; so I thought it very pertinent in this place to remember againe the two last changes in the State of Athens. As for the Lacedemonians, they maintained still their ancient policy under Kings, though these also after some fifteen descents were bridled by the Ephori.

Codrus King of the Athenians, in the former bookes remembered, who willingly died for the safety of his people, was therefore so honoured by them, as (thinking none worthy to succeed him) they changed their former government from Monarchical to Princty for terme of life, of which Medon the Son of Codrus was the first, after whom they were called Medonidae; and of these there were twelve Generations besides Medon, so wit, Agefus.

Archippus, in whose times the Greekes transported themselves into Ionia, after Troy an hundred and fourescore yeares, according to Eusebius: which migration all other Chronologers (such as follow Eusebius herein excepted) finde in the year after Troy fallen one hundred and forty.

Solon, & others, who are the last to be regarded, by reason of the yearly change.

This Solon being a man of excellent wisdom, gave Lawes to the Athenians, which were published, according to Gellius, in the three and thirtieth year of Tarquinius Priscus, and were in after Ages derived into the Romanes, and by the Decemviri (Magistrates in Rome created for that purpose) reduced into twelve Tables, which were the ground of the Romane lawes. But these goodly ordinances of Solon, were in his owne dayes violated, and for a while almost quite extinguished. For whereas they were framed into the practice practice and maintenance of a popular government; the state of Athens was very soone changed into a Monarchie by Pisistratus the son of Hippocrates: who finding the Citizens distracted into two factions, whereof Megacles & Lycurgus, two Citizens of noble Families, were become the heads, tooke occasion by their contention and insolency to raise a third faction more powerfull than the other two, and more plausible, for that he seemed a Protector of the Citizens in generall. Having by this means obtained love and credit, he wounded himselfe, and fained that by malice of his enemies he had like to have beene slaine for his love to the good Citizens; he procured a guard for his defence, and with that band of men surprisning the State-house, or Cittadell of Athens, he made himselfe Lord of the towne; Hegesistratus being then Governor. But the Citizens, who in every change of government had sought to remove themselves further and further from the forme of a Monarchie, could so ill brooke this usurpation of Pisistratus, that he was driven for lack of help, to flye the towne, as soone as Megacles and Lycurgus (joyning their forces) attempted his expulsion. Yet as the building of his tyranny, founded upon the diffention of the Citizens, was ruined by their good agreements; so was it soone after well redified by the new breaking out of the old factions. For when Megacles found the power of Lycurgus to grow greater than his own, he did (as is the usuall practice of the weaker side) call in the common enemy Pisistratus, to whom he gave his Daughter in marriage; by which alliance the Family of the Alcmaonidae, whereof Megacles was chief, became very powerfull, yet so, that Pisistratus by their power was made Master both of them and all the rest. But this agreement held not long; the Alcmaonidae, and especially Megacles being incensed against Pisistratus for his mildemeanour towards his Wife. Wherefore they practised with the Souldiers of the Towne, proceeding in their treason so secretly, and so farre, that Pisistratus upon the first discovery of their intent, perceived no other remedy for his affaires, than to withdraw himselfe to Eretria, where he remained eleven yeares. Which time being expired, having hired Souldiers out of many parts of Greece, he againe recovered the principality of Athens: after which third obtaining his estate, he governed Athens seventene yeares, according to Aristotle, and reigned in all thirty and three yeares, saith Eliahus, but as Justine hath it, foure and thirty, accounting the time belike as well before as after his severall expulsions. Herodotus gives the Father and the Son fixe and thirty yeares; Aristotle five and thirty. But Thucydides affirmeth, that he died very old, leaving for his Successors, his two Sonnes, Hippias and Hipparchus, who governed the Athenians with such moderation, as they rather seemed the Lineall successors of a naturall Prince than of a Tyrant. But in the end, & some three yeares before Hippias was expelled out of Athens, his brother Hipparchus was murdered by Harmodius and Aristogiton. The cause why, and the manner how performed, Thucydides hath written at large. And though Hipparchus were charged with unnatural lust, after Harmodius, yet Plato in his Dialogue, intituled Hipparchus, doth greatly magnifie him, affirming that he was a Prince of as many eminent vertues as that Age had any, altogether condemning the murderers & authors of that scandall. Hippias fearing that this enterprise upon his brother had more and deeper roots than were apparent, first sought to discover the further intents of Harmodius and Aristogiton, by a Harlot of theirs called Lemnia: who because she would not reveale her Companions, did cut out her owne tongue. Then did Hippias, the better to strengthen himselfe, enter into a strict amity with Æantides, Tyrant of the City Lampacus, whom he knew to be greatly favoured by Darius, to whose son Hypoclus he gave one of his Daughters in marriage. But some three yeares after the death of his brother, doubting I know not what strong practice against himselfe, he began to use the Citizens with great severity, which neither Pisistratus the Father, nor Hippias himselfe had ever exercised, during their usurpation till this time.

And therefore the Athenians fearing lest that this disease might rather increase, than diminish in Hippias, they stirred up Clistines one of the noblest and best able of their City, to practise their delivery: who calling to his assistance the banished Alcmaonidae, together with an Army of the Lacedemonians led by Cleomenes their King, so affrighted Hippias, as by composition he gave over his estate, and the possession of Athens, and from thence embarking himselfe, took land at * Seigum, whence he went to Lampacus in Atysia governed by Æantides, who presented him to Darius. He was deprived of his estate, as Herodotus and Thucydides agree, twenty yeares before the battell of Marathon: all which time he continued, partly with Æantides, at other times with Artaphernes Lieutenant for it seemeth that the invading Armie, after the first encounter, fought with their backs towards their enemy, and lost that number, by Herodotus set down, in their disorderly retreat, or rather in their flat running away. As for Justinus report, That two hundred thousand of the Persian army were slain, the same hath no appearance nor possibility of truth. In this fight Hippias the persuader of the enterprise was slain, saith Justinus and Cicero; but Suidas tells us, That he escaped, and died most miserably in Lemnos.

Tertia Attil.

The greatest honour of this victorie was cast upon Miltiades, who both persuaded the trial by battell, and behaved himselfe therein answerably to the counsell which he gave. Themistocles had his first reputation in this fight, being but young and of the first beard. Those of the Grecians, of mark & commandment, that fell in the first encounter, were Callimachus and Stesileus. It is also said, That Cynegyrus following the Persians to their embarking, laid hands on one of their Gallies, to have held it from putting off the shore, and having his right hand cut off, he yet offered to arrest it with his left; of which also being deprived, he took hold of it with his teeth. This encounter happened in the first year of the three score and twelfth Olympiad, about the time of the war made by Caranus against his fellow-Romans: Alexander the son of Amyntas being then King of Macedon, and Phaenippus then Governour of Athens, according to Plutarch, or Hylides, after Halicarnassensis.

This great fray thus parted, and the Persians returned backe into the lesser Asia, Miltiades fought and obtained an employment against the Islanders of Eurus, one of the Cyclades, and passing over his Companies in three score and ten Gallies, after fixe and twentie dayes assault he brake his thigh, in seeking to enter it by the Temple of Ceres, wherewith himself being made unable, and his companies discouraged, he returned to Athens, where those ungratefull Citizens forgetting all his services past, and that of all other the most renowned at the battell of Marathon, did by the perswasion of Xanthippus, the father of Pericles (who envied his fame) cast him into prison, and set on him a fine of fiftie Talents; where his weak and wounded bodie being not able to endure the one, nor his estate to pay the other, he after a few dayes ended his life.

Which envie of the better sort to each other, with their private Factions, assisted by the unthankfull and witlesse people, brought them, not many yeares after, from a victorious and famous Nation, to base subjection and slavery. Miltiades left behinde him one son called Cymon, begotten on Hegespila, daughter of Olorus King of Thrace, who (saith Plutarch) was neither inferior to his father in valour, nor to Themistocles in understanding, but exceeded them both in justice and good government.

Now Darius taking greater care how to recover his honour, than sorrow for the losse received in Greece, gave order for new levies of men, & all other warlike provisions. But the Egyptians revolting from his obedience (a Kingdome of great strength and revenue) greatly distracted his resolution for the re-invasion of Greece. The dissention also among his sons, of whom the younger being born after he was king, and by so great a mother as Atossa, did disdain to give place to his elder brother, born before Darius obtained the Empire, greatly vexed him. And lastly, death, who hath no respect of any mans affaires, gave end to all his consultations and enterprises, and joynd him to the earth of his ancestors, about a year after the battell of Marathon; & after that he had reigned fixe & thirty years. He left behinde him five sons, namely, Artabanus, born before he obtained the kingdom, Xerxes who succeeded him, Achamenes Governour of Egypt, Mastises and Anabignes.

§. I.

The preparation of Xerxes against Greece.

Xerxes received from his father, as hereditarie, a double Warre, one to be made against the Egyptians, which he finished so speedily, that there is nothing remaining in writing how the same was performed: the other against the Grecians, of which it is hard to judge, whether the preparations were more terrible, or the successe ridiculous. In the consultation for the prosecution of this War, which was chiefly bent against the Athenians, the Princes of Persia were divided in opinion. Mardonius, who had formerly commanded in Thrace and Macedon, under Darius, and had also Hystaspes for his grandfather, as Xerxes had, and married Xerxes, his sister Artogestres, persuaded by many arguments the European warre. But Ariabannus, brother to the late Darius, and uncle to Xerxes, maintained the contrary counsell, laying before Xerxes the lamentable and ridiculous successe of the two late invasions, which Darius had made contrary to his counsell: The one in person upon the Scythians, the other by his Lieutenants upon the Greeks; in each of which Darius left to his enemies both his Armie and his Honour.

He therefore besought Xerxes to be right well advised before he did too far imbarke himself in this business. For whatsoever undertaking hath deliberate and sound counsell for conductor, though the successe doe not alwaies answer the probability, yet hath Fortune nothing else thereof to vaunt, than the variability of his owne nature, which only the divine Providence, and not any humane power, can constrain.

But so obstinate was the resolution of Xerxes in prosecution of his former intent, that Ariabannus, whether terrified by Visions (as it is written of him) or fearing the Kings hatred, which he made knowne to all those that opposed his desire to this Warre (changing opinion and counsell) assisted the Grecian Expedition with all the power he had.

After the war of Egypt was ended, foure yeares were consumed in describing and gathering an Army for this invasion: which being compounded of all Nations subject to the Persian Empire, consisted of seventeen hundred thousand foot, and eightie thousand horsemen, besides Chariots, Camels, and other Beasts for Carriage, if we may beleieve Herodotus: for of this multitude, Trogus findes the number lesse by seven hundred thousand footmen.

The Commanders of the severall Nations were the Princes of the bloud of Persia, either by marriage in the kings house, or otherwise: for to these were all commandments of this nature given, some few people excepted, who had of their owne Leaders.

The charge of the whole Armie was bestowed on Mardonius, the son of Gobrias by a sister of Darius, to whom were joynd some others of Xerxes his nearest kinned, as Generalls over all; saving that the charge of ten thousand select Persians, called the immortal Regiment (because if any one of the whole number died, or were slaine, there was another presently chosen in his stead) was given to Hydarnes; the eightie thousand horsemen were led by the sons of Datis, who commanded the late Armie of Darius in Greece.

The Fleet of Gallies were 2200. and eight, furnished by the Phenicians, who had Commanders of their owne Nation, and by the Cypriotes, Cilicians, Pamphilians, Lycians, Dorians, Carians, Ionians, Eolians, and Hellestonines; who were trusted with the furnishing of their owne Vessels, though commanded by the Princes of Persia, as by Ariabignes, the son of Darius, and others. The rest of the Vessels for transportation were three thousand. There were also certaine Gallies furnished by Artemisia, the daughter of Lygdamis, Princess of Halicarnassensis, and the Islands adjoining, which her selfe commanded. Those Gallies by her prepared and furnished, exceeded all the rest of the Fleet, excepting those of Zidon, in which Xerxes himselfe was embarked.

§. II.

Xerxes Armie entertained by Pythius: his cutting off Mount Arbos from the Continent: his bridge of Boats over the Hellepont: and the discourse betwene him and Artabanus upon the view of the Armie.

When this world of an Armie was thoroughly furnished, he caused all the nations of which it was compounded, to make their Rendez-vous, and repair at Sardis in Lydia. And when he had assembled to the number of seventene hundred thousand foot, as he entred the bodie of Celenus, he was by one Pythius the Lydian entertained, who out of his Flocks and Herds of Cattell gave food to Xerxes and his whole Armie. The feast ended, he also presented him with two thousand Talents of silver, and in Gold four Millions, wanting seven thousand of the Persian Daries, which make so many of our Markes.

The King overcome with the exceeding liberalitie of Pythius, did not only refuse his treasure offered, but commanded that seven thousand Daries should be given him to make up his four Millions; of which, so many thousands were wanting when he made the present. But soone after, when Pythius besought him to spare one of his five sons from his attendance into Greece (because himselfe was old, and had none whom he could so well trust as his owne son) Xerxes most barbarously caused the young man, for whom his father sought exemption, to be sundred into two parts, commanding that the one halfe of his carcase should be layed on the right, and the other halfe on the left hand of the common way by which the Armie marched.

Two things he commanded to be done before he came to the Sea-side. The one was passage for Gallies to be cut behinde Mount Arbos, making the same (with the halfe Island or Headland, whereon it stood) to be an entire Island, sundring thereby from the Continent of Thrace five Cities, besides the Mountain and the Chersonesus or Necke of Land it selfe: a worke of more ostentation than of use, and yet an enterprise of no great wonder, the Valley which held it to the Continent having but twelve furlongs (which make about a mile and halfe) to cut through, and the ditch being broad enough only for two Gallies to passe in front. The Cities so severed from the maine, were Dian, Olympus, Acrothoon, Thysus and Cleone.

He also gave order, that a Bridge upon Boats should be made over the Hellepont between Abidos and Sestos, the Sea there having a mile of breadth, wanting an eighth part; which after the finishing, was by a Tempest torne asunder and dislevered: where with Xerxes being more enraged than discouraged, commanded those to be slaine that were masters of the worke, and caused fixe hundred threecore and fouretee Gallies to be coupled together, thereon to frame a new Bridge; which by the art and industrie of the Phenicians was so well anchored to resist both winds blowing into and from the Euxine Sea, as the same being well boorded and rayled, the whole Armie of seventeen hundred thousand foot, and fourecore thousand Horse, with all the Moyles and Carriages, past over it into Europe in seven dayes and seven nights, without intermission. This transportation of Armies did Cæsar afterward use. And Caligula that mad Emperour, in imitation of Xerxes his Bridge, did build the like.

The Bridge finished, and the Armie brought neere to the Sea-side, Xerxes tooke a view of all his Troupes, assembled in the Plains of Abidos, being carried up, and seated on a place over-topping the Land round about it, and the Sea adjoining; and after he had gloried in his owne happinesse, to behold and command so many Nations, and so powerfull an Armie and Fleet, he suddenly (notwithstanding) burst out into teares, moved with this contemplation, That in one hundred years there should not any one survive of that marvellous multitude: the cause of which sudden change of passion when he uttered to Artabanus his Uncle, Artabanus spake to the King to this effect: That which is more lamentable than the dissolution of this great Troupe within that number of yeares by the King remembred, is, That the life it selfe which we enjoy is yet more miserable than the end thereof: for in those few dayes given us in the world, there there is no man among all these, nor elsewhere, that ever found himselfe so accompanied with happinesse, but that he oftentimes pleased himselfe better with the desire and hope of death, than of living; the incident calamities, diseases, and sorowes whereto mankinde is subject, being so many and inevitable, that the shortest life doth oftentimes appear unto us over-long; to avoid all which, there is neither refuge nor rest, but in desired death alone.

With this melancholy discourse, Xerxes being not much pleased, prayed Artabanus not to over-cast those joyes which they had now in pursuit with sad remembrances. And holding still a doubtfull conceit, that Artabanus utterly condemned the invasion of Greece, against which he had formerly given many strong reasons, desired him to deale freely with him, Whether he were returned to his first resolution, that the enterprise of Greece could not be prosperous? Or whether, according to the change of mind put into him by his late Vision, he was confident of good successe? Artabanus, notwithstanding that he assured himselfe of the Kings resolution to goe on, and dared not by any new arguments to batter the great purpose it selfe, yet he told the King, That there were two things which marvellously affrighted him, and which the King should finde, as he feared, to be most adverse; to wit, the Sea and the Land: The Sea, because it had no where in that part of the world any Port capable of so great a Fleet: in so much, as if any tempest should arise, all the Continent of Greece could hardly receive them, nor all the Havens thereof afford them any safety: and therefore when any such shelter shall be wanting unto them, he prayed him to understand, that in such a case of extremitie; men are left to the will and disposition of Fortune, and not Fortune to the will and disposition of men. The Land, besides other incommodities, will be found by so much the more an enemy, by how much the unsatiate desire of man to obtaine more and more thereof, doth lead him forward: for were there no man found to give resistance, yet the want of means to feed such an Armie, and the Famine, which cannot be prevented, will, without any other violence offered, dis-inable and consume it. By these Arguments Artabanus hoped to have diverted Xerxes, not daring perchance to utter what indeed he most feared; to wit, the overthrow of the Armie it selfe both by Sea and Land, which soone after followed.

These Cautions were reckoned weightie, if Xerxes his obstinacie had not misprised them. For, to invade by Sea upon a perillous Coast, being neither in possession of any Port, nor succoured by any partie, may better fit a Prince presuming on his fortune, than enriched with understanding. Such was the enterprise of Philip the second upon England in the year 1588. who had belike never heard of this Counsell of Artabanus to Xerxes, or forgotten it.

Now concerning the second point, it is very likely, that Xerxes his Armie, which could not have in it lesse than two millions of Soules, besides his beasts for Service and Carriage, should after a few dayes suffer famine, and using Machiavels words, Mourir sans causes, die without a knife. For it was impossible for Greece, being a ragged, strait, and mountainous Countrey, to yeeld food (besides what served themselves) for twenty hundred thousand strangers, whom they never meant to entertaine, but with the sharpest points of their weapons, destroying withall whatsoever they could not well inclose and defend. Nay, if we may beleeve Herodotus, the Armie of Xerxes, being reviewed at Thermoplie, consisted of five millions, two hundred eightie three thousand, two hundred twentie men, besides Landrestles, Harlots, and Horses, and was therefore likely to endure a speedie famine.

The effect of Xerxes his answer was, That it was impossible to provide for all things; and that whatsoever should enterprise any great matter, if he gave the hearing to all that could be objected of accidentall inconveniences, he should never pursue the same farther than the dispute and consultation: which if his Predecessors, the Persian Kings, had done, they had never growne to that greatnesse, or posselt so many Kingdomes and Nations as they now did; and therefore concluded; That great enterprises were never undertaken without great perils. Which resolution of Xerxes was not to be condemned, if any necessitie had enforced him to that warre. But seeing the many Nations newly conquered, which he alreadie commanded, were more than could be constrained to obedience any longer than the powerfull prosperitie of the Persians endured, and that Greece was separated by the Sea from the rest of Xerxes his Dominions (of whose resolution his Father Darius had made a deare experience) the fruit of this Warre was answered.

answerable to the plantation, and the successe and end agreeable to the weak counsell whereon it was grounded. Furthermore, those millions of men which he transported, and yet in his own judgement not sufficient, (for he gathered in marching on all the strength of Thrace and Macedon) were an argument, that he rather hoped to feare the Greeks by the fame of his numbers, than that he had any confidence in their valour and virtues, whom he conducted. For it is wisely said of those uncountable multitudes: Non vires habent, sed pondus; & impedita potius sunt quam auxilium; They are great in bulk, but weak in forces, and rather a luggage than an aide.

Besides, as it was impossible to marshal such a world of men in one Armie, so the divers Nations, speaking divers languages, bred the same confusion among the Persian commanders when they came to fight, as it did to the builders of Babel, when they came to work. Whereas if Xerxes had of his five millions compounded ten Armies of fiftie thousand choosen Souldiers in each, and sent them yearly into Greece well victualled and furnished, he had either prevailed by the sword, or forced them to forsake their territory, or brought them into obedience by necessity & famine, which cannot be resisted. But while Xerxes resolved to cut down the banks of Greece, and to let in a sea of men upon them, he was deceived both of his own hopes, and in their hearts whom he employed, and beaten by the Greeks, both by Land and Sea; yet, he himself, conducted by his fear, fled shamefully into Asia. A great part of his Armie was buried in Greece: the remainder whereof, which wintered in Theffalie, and led by Mardonius, who perfwaded the enterprize, was in the Summer following utterly defeated, and himself slain.

§. III.

Of the fights at Thermopylae and Artemisium.

After such time as Xerxes had transported the Armie over the Hellepont, and landed in Thrace, (leaving the description of his passage along that Coast, and how the River of Lissus was drunke dry by his multitudes, and the lake neero Pissyrus by his cattell, with other accidents in his marches towards Greece) I will speake of the encounters he had, and the shamefull and incredible overthrowes which he received. As first at Thermopylae, a narrow passage of halfe an acre of ground, lying between the Mountains which divide Theffalie from Greece, where sometime the Phocians had raised a wall with gates, which was then for the most part ruined. At this entrance Leonidas, one of the Kings of Sparta, with three hundred Lacedemonians, assisted with one thousand Tegeate and Manantineans, one thousand Arcadians, and other Peloponnesians, to the number of three thousand one hundred in the whole; besides one thousand Phocians, foure hundred Thebans, seven hundred Theffians, and all the forces (such as they were) of the bordering Locrians, defended the passage two whole dayes together against that huge Armie of the Persians. The valour of the Greeks appeared so excellent in this defence, that in the first dayes fight, Xerxes is said to have three times leaped out of his Throne, fearing the destruction of his Armie by one handfull of those men, whom not long before he had utterly despised: and when the second dayes attempt upon the Greeks had proved vaine, he was altogether ignorant how to proceede further, and so might have continued, had not a run-agate Grecian taught him a secret way, by which part of his Armie might ascend the ledg of Mountains, and set upon the backs of those who kept the Straits. But when the most valiant of the Persian Armie had almost inclosed the small forces of the Greeks, then did Leonidas, King of the Lacedemonians, with his three hundred, and seven hundred Theffians, which were all that abode by him, refuse to quit the place which they had undertaken to make good, and with admirable courage, not onely resist that world of men which charged them on all sides; but issuing out of their strength, made so great a slaughter of their enemies, that they might well be called vanquishers, though all of them were slain upon the place. Xerxes having lost in this last fight, together with twentie thousand other Souldiers and Captains, two of his own brethren, began to doubt what inconvenience might befall him by the vertue of such as had not bin present at these battels, with whom he knew that he shortly was to deale. Especially of the Spartans he stood in great feare, whose manhood had appeared singular in this triall, which caused him very carefully to enquire what numbers they could bring bring into the field. It is reported of Dieneces the Spartan, that when one thought to have terrified him by saying, That the flight of the Persian arrowes was so thicke as would hide the sun: he answered thus; It is very good newes: for then shall we fight in the coole shade.

Such notable resolution having as freely been expressed in deeds, as it was uttered in words, caused the Persian to stand in great doubt, when he heard that the Citie of Sparta could arme well-nigh eight thousand men of the like temper, and that the other Lacedemonians, though inferior to those, were very valiant men. Wherefore he asked counsell of Demaratus, a banished King of the Spartans, who had always well advised and instructed him in the things of Greece, what course were fittest to be taken in his further proceedings. The opinion of Demaratus was, That all the Land-forces should assemble together to defend the Isthmus, that straight necke of ground which joyneth Peloponnesus to the Continent. For which cause he advised, That three hundred ships well manned should be sent unto the Coast of Laconia, to spoile the country, and to hold the Lacedemonians and their neighbours busied at home, whilst Xerxes at his leisure having subdued the rest, might afterward bring his whole power upon them, who remaining destitute of succour, would be too weak alone to make resistance. To this purpose also the same Demaratus further advised, That the said Fleet of three hundred ships should seize upon the Land thence called Cythera, now Cerge, which lying neare to the Coast of Laconia, might serve as a fit place of Rendezvous upon all occasions, either of their own defence, or endamaging the enemy: whereby that ancient speech of Chilon the Lacedemonian should be verified, That it were better for his Countrymen to have that Ile drowned in the sea, than stand so inconveniently as for them it did. What effect this counsell might have taken, had it bin followed, it is not easie to gesse. But a contrarie opinion of Achemenes brother to King Xerxes was preferred as the safer. For the Persian fleet had bin sorely vexed with a grievous tempest, which continued three whole dayes together, wherein were lost upon the Coast of Magefia, foure hundred ships of war, besides other vessels innumerable, accordingly as Ariabanes had foreseen, that if any such calamitie should overtake them, there would not be found any Harbor wide enough to give them succour. Therefore Achemenes perswaded his brother not to disperse his fleet, nor if (said he) after the losse of foure hundred ships we shall send away other three hundred to seek adventures, then will the Greeks be strong enough by sea to encounter the rest of the Navie, which holding all together is invincible. To this counsell Xerxes yielded, hoping that his Land-armie and fleet should each of them find the other in good stead, whilst both held one course, and lay not far asunder. But herein he was far deceived; for about the same time that his armie had felt the valour of the Greeks by land, his Navie likewise made a sorrowfull proofe of their skill and courage at sea. The Grecians fleet lay at that time at Artemisium in the straits of Eubaea, where the Persians thinking to incompass them, sent two hundred sayle about the Land to fall upon them behind, using a like stratagem to that which their King did practise against Leonidas in a case not unlike, but with far different successe. For that narrow channell of the sea which divideth Eubaea from the main, was in the same fort held by a Navie of two hundred threescore and eleven saile against the huge Persian Armada, as the straits of Thermopylae had formerly bin maintained by Leonidas, til he was circumvented, as this Navie might have bin, but was not. The departure of those two hundred ships that were sent about the Island, and the cause of their voyage, was too well known in the Persian fleet, and soone enough disclosed to the Greeks, who setting saile by night, met them with a counter-surprise, taking & sinking thirty vessels, inforcing the rest to take the Sea, where being overtaken with foule weather, they were driven upon the rocks and cast all away. Contrariwise, the Navie of the Greeks was increased by the arrivall of fiftie three Athenian ships, and one Lemnian, which came to their partie in the last fight. As these new forces encouraged the one side, so the feare of Xerxes his displeasure stirred up the other to redeem their losse with some notable exploit. Wherefore setting aside their unfortunate policie, they resolved in plain fight to repaire their honour, and casting themselves into the form of a Crescent, thought so to inclose the Greeks, who readily did present them battell at Artemisium.

The fight endured from noone till night, and ended with equall losse to both parts. For though more of the Persian ships were sunke and taken, yet the lesser losse felt altogether gether as heaue upon the Greekish fleet, which being small could worse beare it. Herein only the Barbarians may seem to have had the worse, that they forsook the place of fight, leaving the wrack and spoils to the enemy, who nevertheless were faine to abandon presently even the passage which they had undertaken to defend; both for that many of their ships were forely crusht in the battel, and especially because they had received advertisement of the death of Leonidas at Thermopylae. Before they wayed anchors, Themistocles, Generall of the Athenians, engraued upon stone at the watering place an exhortation to the Ionians, that either they should revolt unto the Greeks, or stand neutrall; which persuasion, he hoped would either take some place with them, or at the least make them suspected by the Persians.

§. IV.

The attempt of Xerxes upon Apollo's Temple: and his taking of Athens;

When Xerxes had past the straits of Thermopylae, he wasted the country of the Phocians, & the regions adjoining: as for the inhabitants, they chose rather to flie, & reserve themselves to a day of battel, than to adventure their liues into his hands, upon hope of saving their wealth, by making proffer unto him of their service. Part of his armie he sent to spoil the Temple of Delphi, which was exceeding rich by means of many offerings that had bin made by diuers Kings and great personages; of all which riches it was thought that Xerxes had a better Inventorie than of the goods left in his owne Palace. To make relation of a great astonishment that fell upon the companies which arrived at the Temple to have sacked it, and of two Rockes that breaking from the Mount Parnassus, overwhelmed many of the Barbarians, it were peradventure somewhat superstitious. Yet Herodotus, who lived not long after, saith, That the broken Rockes remained even to his memorie in the Temple of Minerva, whither they rowled in their fall. And surely this attempt of Xerxes was impious; for seeing he believed that Apollo was a god, he should not have dared to entertaine a covetous desire of enriching himself by committing sacrilege upon his Temple. Wherefore it may possibly be true, that licence to chastise his impietie, in such manner as is reported, was granted unto the diuinitie, by that Holy One, who saith, Will a man spoile his gods? and elsewhere, Hath any Nation changed their gods, which yet are no gods? Go to the Ile of Kittim, and behold, and send to Kedar, and take diligent heed, and see whether there be any such things. Now this impietie of Xerxes was the more inexcusable, for that the Persians alledged the burning of Cybele's Temple by the Athenians, when they set fire on the Citie of Sardis in Asia, to be the ground and cause of the waste which they made in burning of Cities and Temples in Greece. Whereas indeed, in the enterprize against Delphos, this vizzor of holy and zealous revenge falling off, discovered the face of covetousnesse so much the more ugly, by how much the more themselves had professed a detestation of the offence which the Athenians had committed in that kind by meer mischance.

The remainder of that which Xerxes did, may be expressed briefly thus: He came to Athens, which finding forsaken, he took and burnt the Citadell and Temple which was therein. The Citadell indeed was defended awhile by some of more courage than wisdom, who literally interpreting Apollo's Oracle; that Athens should be safe in wooden walls, had fortified that place with Boords and Palisadoes: too weak to hold out long, though by their desperate valour so well maintained at the first assault, that they might have yielded it upon tolerable conditions, had they not vainly relied upon the propheticke: whereof (being somewhat obscure) it was wisely done of Themistocles, to make discretion the interpreter, applying rather the words to the present need, than fashioning the business to words.

§. V.

How Themistocles the Athenian drew the Greeks to fight at Salamis.

The Athenians had before the coming of Xerxes removed their wives and children into Troazene, Egina, and Salamis, not so highly prizing their houses and lands, as their freedom, and the common libertie of Greece. Nevertheless, this great zeale, which the Athenians did shew for the generall good of their Countrey, was requirited by the other Greeks, who with much labour were hardly incited to stay for them at Salamis, whilst they removed their wives and children out of the Citie. But when the Citie of Athens was taken, it was presently resolved upon, that they should forsake the Ile of Salamis, and withdraw the fleet to Isthmus: which necke of land they did purpose to fortifie against the Persians, and so to defend Peloponnesus by land and sea, leaving the rest of Greece as indefensible, to the furie of the enemy. So should the Ilands of Salamis and Egina have been abandoned, and the Families of the Athenians (which were there bestowed as in places of securitie) have been given over into mercilesse bondage. Against his resolution Themistocles, Admirall of the Athenian Fleet, very strongly made opposition; but in vaine. For the Peloponnesians were so possessed with feare of losing their owne, which they would not hazzard, that no persuasions could obtaine of them, to regard the estate of their distressed Friends and Allies. Many remonstrances Themistocles made unto them, to allure them to abide the enemy at Salamis; As first in private unto Eurybiades the Lacedamonian, Admirall of the whole fleet; That the selfe-same feare which made them forsake those coasts of Greece, upon which they then anchored, would afterward (if it found no checke at the first) cause them also to dissever the Fleet, and every one of the Confederates to with-draw himselfe to the defence of his owne Citie and Estate: Then to the Councell of War, which Eurybiades upon this motion did call together (forbearing to object what want of courage might worke in them hereafter;) he shewed that the fight at Isthmus would be in an open Sea, whereas it was more expedient for them, having the fewer ships, to determine the matter in the streights; and that, besides the safeguard of Egina, Megara, and Salamis, they should by abiding where they then were, sufficiently defend Isthmus, which the Barbarians should not so much as once look upon, if the Greeks obtained victory by sea; which they could not so well hope for elsewhere, as in that present place which gave him so good advantage. All this would not serve to retaine the Peloponnesians, of whom one, unworthy of memorie, upbraided Themistocles with the losse of Athens, blaming Eurybiades for suffering one to speake in the Councell, that had no Countrey of his own to inhabit. A bafe and shamefull objection it was, to lay as a reproach that losse, which being voluntarily sustained for the common good, was in true estimation by so much the more honourable, by how much it was the greater. But this indignitie did exasperate Themistocles, and put into his mouth a replice so sharp, as availed more than all his former persuasions. He told them all plainly, That the Athenians wanted not a fairer Cause than any Nation of Greece could boast of; having well-near two hundred good ships of Warre, the better part of the Grecian Fleet, with which it was easie for them to transport their Families and substance into any part of the World, and settle themselves in a more secure habitation, leaving those to shift as well as they might, who in their extremity had refused to stand by them. Herewithall he mentioned a Towne in Italy belonging of old to the State of Athens, of which Towne he said an Oracle had foretold, That the Athenians in proesse of time should build it a-new, and there (quoth he) will we plant our selves, leaving unto you a sorrowfull remembrance of my words, and of your owne unthankfulness. The Peloponnesians hearing thus much, began to enter into better consideration of the Athenians, whose affaires depended not, as they well perceived, upon so weak termes, that they should be driven to crouch to others; but rather were such, as might enforce the rest to yeeld to them, and condescend even to the utmost of their owne demands.

For the Athenians, when they first embraced that Heroicall resolution of leaving their grounds and houses to fire and ruine, if necessity should enforce them so farre, for the preservation of their liberty; did employ the most of their private wealth, and all the common treasure, in building a great Navie. By these means they hoped (which accordingly fell out) that no such calamity should befall them by Land, as might not well be counterpoised by great advantages at Sea: Knowing well that a strong fleet would either procure victory at home, or a secure passage to any other Countrey. The other States of Greece held it sufficient, if building a few new ships, they did somewhat amend their navie. Whereby it came to passe, that, had they bin vanquished, they could not have expected any other fortune than either present death, or perpetuall slavery; neither could they hope to be victorious without the assistance of the Athenians, whose forces by leaded equall all theirs together; the whole consisting of more than three hundred and fourescore bottomes. Wherefore these Peloponnesians beginning to suspect their owne condition, which would have stood upon desperate points, if the fleet of Athens had forsaken them; were soon perfwaded, by the greater feare of such a bad event, to forge the lesler, which they had conceived of the Persians: and laying aside their insolent braverie; they yielded to that most profitable counsell of abiding at Salamis.

§. VI.

How the Persians consulted about giving battell: and how Themistocles by policie held the Greeks to their resolution; with the victorie at Salamis thereupon ensuing.

IN the meane season the Persians had entred into consultation, whether it were convenient to offer battell to the Greekes, or no. The rest of the Captaines giving such advice as they thought would best please the King their Master, had soon agreed upon the fight; but Artemisia Queen of Halicarnassus, who followed Xerxes to this warre in person, was of contrarie opinion: Her counsell was, that the King himselfe directly should march toward Peloponnesus, whereby it would come to passe, that the Greek Navie (unable otherwise to continue long at Salamis for want of provision) should presently be dislevered, and every one seeking to preserve his owne Citie and goods, they should, being divided, prove unable to resist him, who had won so far upon them when they held together. And as the profit will be great in forbearing to give battell; so on the other side, the danger will be more (said she) which we shall undergoe, than any need requireth us to adventure upon; and the losse in case it fall upon us, greater than the profit of the victorie which we desire. For if we compell the enemies to flee, it is more than they would have done, we fitting still: but if they, as better Sea-men than ours, put us to the worst, the journey to Peloponnesus is utterly dashed, and many that now declare for us, will soon revolt unto the Greekes. Mardonius, whom Xerxes had sent for that purpose to the Fleet, related unto his Master the common consent of the other Captaines, and withall this disagreeing opinion of Artemisia. The King well pleased with her advice, yet resolved upon following the more generally, but farre worse counsell of the rest; which would questionlesse have beene the same which Artemisia gave, had not feare and flatterie made all the Captaines utter that, as out of their owne judgement, which they thought to be most conformable to their Princes determination. So it was indeed that Xerxes had entertained a vaine perswasion of much good, that his owne presence upon the shore to behold the conflict, would worke among the Souldiers. Therefore he encamped upon the Sea-side, pitching his owne Tent on the mount Aegaleus; which is opposite unto the Isle of Salamis, whence at ease he might safely view all which might happen in that action, having Scribes about him to write downe the acts and behaviour of every Capitaine. The neere approach of the Barbarians, together with the newes of that timorous diligence, which their Countreimen shewed in fortifying the Isthmus, and of a Persian Armie, marching a pace thither; did now againe so terrifie and amaze the Peloponnesians, that no intreatie, nor contestation would suffice to hold them together. For they thought it meer madnesse to fight for a Country already lost, when they rather should endeavour to save that which remained unconquered; propounding chiefly to themselves what miserie would befall them, if losing the victorie, they should be driven into Salamis, there to be shut up, and besieged round in a poore desolate Iland.

Herupon they resolved forth-with to set saile for Isthmus: which had presently bin done, if the wisdom of Themistocles had not prevented it. For he perceiving what avolent fear had stopp'd up their eares against all good counsell, did practise another course, and forth-with labour to prevent the execution of this unwholesome decree; not suffering the very houre of performance to finde him busie in wrangling alteration. As soon as the Councell brake up, he dispatched secretly a trustie Gentleman to the Persian Captaines, informing them truly of the intended flight, and exhorting them to send part of their Navie about the Iland, which encompassing the Greekes, might prevent their escape; giving them withall a false hope of his assistance. The Persians no sooner heard than beleev'd these good newes, well knowing that the victorie was their owne assured, assured, if the Athenian fleet joyned with them; which they might easily hope, considering what ability their Master had to recompence for so doing, both the Captaines with rich rewards, and the People with restitution of their City, and Territories. By these means it fell out, that when the Greekes very early in the morning were about to weigh Anchor, they found themselves inclosed round with Persians, who had laboured hard all that night, sending many of their ships about the Isle of Salamis, to charge the enemy in rear, and landing many of their men in the Isle of Psittalea, which lyeth over against Salamis, to save such of their owne, and kill such of the Gracian parties, as by any misfortune should be cast upon the shore. Thus did mere necessity enforce the Gracians to undertake the battaile in the Straights of Salamis, where they obtained a memorable victory, stemming the foremost of their enemies, & chasing the rest, who falling foule one upon another, could neither conveniently fight nor flee. I doe not finde any particular occurrences in this great battaile to be much remarkable. Sure it is, that the Scribes of Xerxes had a wearisome taske of writing downe many disasters that befell the Persian fleet; which ill acquitted it selfe that day, doing no one piece service worthy the presence of their King, or the registering of his Notaries. As for the Greekes, they might well seeme to have wrought out that victory with equall courage, were it not that the principal honour of that day was ascribed to those of Aegina, and to the Athenians, of whom it is recorded, That when the Barbarians did flee towards Phalerus, where the Land-army of Xerxes lay, the ships of Aegina having possessed the Straights, did sinke or take them, whilest the Athenians did valiantly give charge upon those that kept the Sea, and made any countenance of resisting.

§. VII.

Of things following after the battaile of Salamis: and of the flight of Xerxes.

AFTER this victorie, the Greekes intending by way of Scrutiny, to determine which of the Captaines had best merited of them, in all this great service; every Capitaine, being ambitious of that honour, did in the first place write downe his own name, but in the second place, as best deserving next unto himselfe, almost every Suffrage did concur upon Themistocles. Thus private affection yielded unto vertue, as soone as her owne turne was served. The Persian King, as not amazed with this calamity, began to make new preparation for continuance of warre; but in such fashion, that they which were best acquainted with his temper, might easily discern his faint heart through his painted looks. Especially Mardonius, Author of the warre, began to cast away his eye upon his Master, fearing lest his counsell should be rewarded according to the event. Wherefore purposing rather to adventure his life in pursuit of the victorie, than to cast it away by undergoing his Princes indignation; hee advised the King to leave unto him three hundred thousand men, with which forces hee promised to reduce all Greece under the subjection of the Persian Scepter. Herewithall he forgot not to soothe Xerxes with many faire words; telling him, That the cowardise of those Egyptians, Phenicians, and Cilicians, with others of the like metall, nothing better than slaves, who had so ill behaved themselves in the late Sea-service; did not concerne his honour, who had alwayes beene victorious, and had already subdued the better part of Greece, yea taken Athens it selfe, against which the Warre was principally intended. These words found very good acceptance in the Kings care, who presently betooke himselfe to his journey homewards, making the more haist, for that he understood, how the Greeks had a purpose to saile to Hellepont, and there to breake downe his bridge, and intercept his passage. True it was that the Greekes had no such intent, but rather wished his hasty departure, knowing that hee would leave his Armie not so strong, as it should have beene, had he in person remained with it. And for this cause did Eurybiades give counsell, that by no means they should attempt the breaking of that bridge, lest necessity should enforce the Persians to take more courage; and rather to fight like men, than like beasts. Wherefore Themistocles did, under pretence of friendship, send a false advertisement unto this timorous Prince, advising him to convey himselfe into Asia with all speed, before his bridge were dissolved: which counsell Xerxes took very kindly, and hastily followed, as before is shewed. Whether it were so that hee found the bridge whole, and thereby repassed into Asia; or whether it were torne in sunder by tempests, and he thereby driven to imbarke himself in some obscure vessell, it is not greatly materiall; though the Greeks did most willingly embrace the latter of these reports. Howsoever it were, this flight of his did well ease the Country, that was thereby disburdened of that huge throng of people, which, as Locusts, had before overwhelmed it.

§. VIII.

The negotiations between Mardonius and the Athenians, as also betwene the Athenians and the Lacedæmonians, after the flight of Xerxes.

Mardonius with his three hundred thousand had withdrawne himself into Thessalie, whence he sent Alexander, the son of Amyntas King of Macedon, as Embassador to the Athenians, with promise of large amends for all their losses received; and of extending their Territories as farre as their owne desires; allowing them to retain their libertie and lawes, if they would make peace with Xerxes, and assist him in that warre.

The Athenians had now re-entred their city, but not as yet brought backe their wives and children; for as much as they well perceived that the place could not bee secure, till the Army of Mardonius were broken and defeated. Wherefore the Lacedæmonians, understanding what faire conditions this Embassadour would propound, were perplexed with very great feare, lest he should finde good and ready acceptance. Hereupon, they likewise very speedily dispatched their Embassadors for Athens, who arriving before the Macedonian had audience, used the best of their perswasion to retain the Athenians firm. They alledged, that neither Xerxes nor Darius had any pretence of Warre against the rest of Greece, but had onely threatned the subversion of Athens, till they and all their Confederates arming themselves in defence of that City, were drawne into the quarrell, wherein the Athenians without much crueltie of injustice could not leave them. Wee know, said they, that yee have endured great calamities, losing the fruit of the grounds, and being driven to forsake the Towne, the houses thereof bee ruined, and unfit for your habitation; in regard whereof, wee undertake to maintaine as our owne, your wives and children amongst us, as long as the warre shall continue, hoping that yee, who have always procured libertie to others, will not now goe about to bring all Greece into slavery and bondage. As for the Barbarians, their promises are large, but their words and oathes are of no assurance. It was needlesse to use many arguments to the Athenians, who gave answer to Alexander in presence of the Spartan Embassadors; That whilst the Sunne continued his course, they would be enemies to Xerxes, regarding neither Gold nor any riches, with which hee might seeke to make purchase of their libertie. Concerning the maintenance of their wives and children, it was a burden which they promised to sustaine themselves, only desiring the Lacedæmonians shut with all speed they would cause their Armie to marche, forasmuch as it was not likely, that Mardonius would long sit still in Thessalie, having once received such a peremptorie answer. In this their opinion of Mardonius his readinesse to invade Attica, they found themselves nothing deceived. For hee, as soone as Alexander had returned their obstinate purpose of resistance, did forthwith leade his army towards them, and their City: they having now the second time quitted it, and conveyed themselves into places of more security abroad in the Countrey, where they expected the arrivall of their confederates. From Athens he sent his Agent unto them, with instructions, not only to perswade them to acceptance of the conditions before to them propounded, but with great promises to allure the principall of them to his partie. His hope was, that either the people, wearied with forsaking their houses so often, would be desirous to preserve them from fire, & to have those which were already laid waste, re-edified at the Kings charges. Or if this affection took no place with them, but that needs they would relie upon their old confederates, whose succors did very slowly advance forwards, yet perhaps the leaders might be wonne with great rewards, to draw them to this purpose; all which projects, if they should faile, the destruction of Athens would be a good meane to please his Master, King Xerxes, who must thereby needes understand, that Mardonius kept his ground, and feared not to confront the whole power of Greece, in the strongest part of their owne Countrey. But his expectation was beguiled in all these. For the Athenians so little regarded his offers, that when one Lyndus, or (as Demosthenes calls him)

Cyrillus

Cyrillus, advised the Senate to accept the conditions, and propounded them to the people; all the Senators & as many as abiding without the Counsaile-house, heard what he had said, immediately set upon him, and stoned him to death; not examining whether it were feare or mony, that had moved him to utter such a vile sentence. Yea, the women of Athens, in the Ile of Salamis, hearing of his bad counsaile, and bad end, assembling together did enter his house there, and put his wife and children to the like execution. All this bravery notwithstanding, when they perceived the slacknesse of the Peloponnesians in giving them aide, they were faine to betake themselves to Salamis againe, the old place of their security. Remaining there, and seeing little forwardnes in those whom it most concerned to assist them, they sent very severe messages to Sparta, complaining of their slacknes, and threatening withall, to take such course as might stand best with their owne good, seeing that the common estate of all was so little regarded. These messengers were at the first entertained with dilatory answers, which every day grew colder, when as the Peloponnesian Wall, builded a-thwart the Isthmus, was almost finished. But as the Lacedæmonians waxed carelesse and dull, so the Athenians hotly pressed them to a quick resolution, giving them plainly to understand, that if they should hold on in those dilatory courses, it would not be long ere the City of Athens took a new course, that should little please them. All this while the Persian fleet lay upon the coast of Asia, not daring to draw nearer unto Greece, as being now too weak at Sea. Likewise the Greekish Navie contained it selfe within the Harbours upon Europe side; both to doe service where need should require at home; & withall to shunne the danger which might have befallen any part of it, that (being distracted from the rest) had adventured over-farre. So mutual feare preserved in quiet the Ilands lying in the midst of the Aegean Seas. But it was well and seasonably observed by a Counsellor of Sparta, that the Wall upon Isthmus would serve to little purpose for the defence of Peloponnesus, if once the Athenians gave eare to Mardonius: considering that many doores would bee opened into that Demie Island, as soone as the Enemy should by winning the friendship of Athens, become the Master of the Seas about it. The Lacedæmonians upon this admonition, making better persuall of their owne dangers, were very carefull to give satisfaction to the Athenian Embassadors, who not brooking their delays, were upon point of taking leave, yea, as it seemed, of renouncing their alliance. Wherefore dispatching away five thousand Spartans in the evening, under conduct of Pausanias; they gave audience the next day to the Embassadors, whose complaints they answered with vehement protestations of their readinesse, deeply swearing that the Army of Sparta was already farre upon the journey, and giving them leave to take up other five thousand Lacedæmonians, out of the Region adjoining, to follow after them.

The Athenians, though distasting such want of gravity, in a matter so important, were nevertheless contented with the final conclusion; & levying the number appointed of Lacedæmonian Souldiers, made what haste they could to incampe in Attica. The other Greeks were nothing slacke in sending forth Companies, whose neare approach caused Mardonius to forsake Attica as a rough Country, and therefore of much disadvantage to Horse, wherein consisted the best of his power. Before his departure he burnt the City of Athens, beating downe the Walls of it, and ruining all that had formerly escaped the fury of War.

The great battaile of Platae.

It were too long a rehearse to shew all that happened in many skirmishes between the Greekes and him, in the Countrey of Boeotia, which Mardonius had chosen to bee the seat of that Warre. Much time was spent before the quarrell was decided by the triall of one maine battaile: for both parties did stand upon their guard, each expecting when the other should assaile them.

The army of Mardonius contained about three hundred thousand, which were by him chosen out of Xerxes his Army; to whom were adjoynd the forces of Thebes, Macedony, Thessaly, and other parts of Greece, that now siding with the Persian, furnished his Campe with fifty thousand men. Against these the Lacedæmonians, Athenians, and their Confederates, had leaved an Army of one hundred and ten thousand, of which forty thouland were weightily armed, the rest were only assistants to these forty thousand, being armed more slightly, as rather to make excursions and give chase, than to sustain any strong charges.

These two armies having eleven dayes confronted one the other, without performing any memorable piece of service; Mardonius, whose victuals began to faile, resolved to begin the fray. The Greekes were promised victory by an Oracle, if they fought in the Land of the Athenians, and in the plain of Ceres & Proserpina, making prayers unto certain gods, Demi-gods, and Nymphes. But it was hard to finde the certaine place which the Oracle designed. For the plain of Ceres was indeed in the Territory of Athens; but there was also an old Temple of Ceres and Proserpina, neare unto the place where they lay at that time encamped, as likewise the memorials of those Nymphes and Demi-gods, were in the same place, upon Mount Citharon, and the ground served well for foot-men against horse; onely the Land belonged unto the Plataeans, and not unto the Athenians.

Whilest the Greekes were perplexed about the interpretation of this doubtfull Oracle, the Plataeans to make all cleere, did freely bestow their land on that side the Towne upon the Athenians.

This magnificence of the Plataeans caused Alexander the Great, many ages after, to re-edifie their City, which was ruined in the Peloponnesian wars.

All things being ready for battaile, the Lacedemonian Generall thought it most meet, that the Athenians should stand opposite that day to the Medes & Persians, whom they had formerly vanquished at Marathon; and that he, with his Spartans, should entertaine the Thebans and other Greekes which followed Mardonius, as better acquainted with their fight, and having beaten them often-times before. This being agreed upon, the Athenians changed place with the Lacedemonians; which Mardonius understanding (whether fearing the Athenians, of whose valour the Medes & Persians had felt heave proofe, or desiring to encounter the Spartans, as thinking them the bravest Souldiers in Greece) he did also change the order of his battaile, and oppose himselfe to Pausanias. All the Greekes might well perceive how the Enemy did shift his wings, and Pausanias thereupon returned to his former Station; which Mardonius noting, did also the like. Some whole day was spent in changing to and fro. Some attempt the Persians made that day with their Archers on horse-back, who did so molest the Greekes at their watering place, that they were faine to enter into consultation of retiring; because they could not without much losse to themselves, and none to the enemy, lye neare to that fountaine which did serve all the Campe. Having therefore concluded among themselves to dislodge; and part of the Army being sent away before day-light: Mardonius perceived their departure in the morning, and thereupon being encouraged by their flight, (which to him seemed to proceed out of meer cowardise) he charged them in the reare with great violence. It may well be recorded as a notable example of patient valour, That the Lacedemonians being over-taken by the enemies horse, & over-whelmed with great flights of Arrowes, did quietly sit still, not making any resistance or defence, till the Sacrifices for victory were happily ended, though many of them were hurt and slaine, and some of especiall make lost, before any signe of good successe appeared in the entrailes.

But as soone as Pausanias had found in the Sacrifice those tokens, which the superstition of that Age and Country accounted fortunate; he gave the Signall of battaile: and thereupon the Souldiers, who till then did sit upon the ground, as was their manner, arose altogether, and with excellent courage received the charge of the Barbarians, that came thronging upon them without any feare of such notable resistance. The rest of the Greek Army that was in march, being revoked by Pausanias, came in a-pace to succour the Lacedemonians: only that part of the Army which was led by the Athenians, could not arrive unto the place of the great battaile, because the Thebans, and others Greekes confederated with the Persians, gave them checke by the way. Nevertheless, the Spartans with other their assistants, did so well acquit themselves, that the Persians were vanquished, and Mardonius with many thousands more slaine in the field; the rest fled into the Campe, which they had fortified with wooden Walls, and there defended themselves with such courage as desperate necessity enforced them unto, holding out the longer, because the Lacedemonians were not acquainted with the manner of assaulting Fortresses, and Walls. In the meane time the Athenians having found strong opposition of the Thebans and Thessians, did with much labour & courage obtain victory, which having not long pursued, they came to help the Lacedemonians, whom they found weakly buisied in assaulting the Campe, with more valour than skill. Wherefore they themselves under-took it, & in short space forced a passage through the Wall, which breach first, and then on all sides, the Greekes entred with such fury, and just desire of vengeance, that of three hundred thousand they are said not to have left three thousand alive, excepting those who fledde away with Artabazus, when as the Persian Army first fell to rout.

If the execution were so great, as is reported, an especiall cause of it was the foolish retreat, or rather flight into the Campe. For though it were so, that the place was well fortified, and the number of those who cast themselves into it greater than any of the Assistants; yet they being of severall Nations and Languages and having lost their Generall and astonishment should make good that piece of ground, lying in the heart of an Enemy Country, against an Army of men, farre more valiant than themselves, and enlamed with present victory. Therefore the same wall which for a few houres had preserved their lives, by holding out the enemy, did now impale them, and leave them to the slaughtering fury of unpitifull Victors. Artabazus fled into Trabze, telling the people of Thessaly, and other Countries in his way, that he was sent by Mardonius upon some piece of service: For he well knew, that had they understood any thing of that great diffiniture, all places would have beene hostile unto him, and fought with his ruine to purchase favour of the vanquishers. Therefore making so large marches, that many of his Souldiers being feeble were left behinde and lost, he came to Byzantium, whence he shipped his men over into Asia. Such was the end of the vaine-glorious expedition, undertaken by Xerxes against the Greekes, upon hope of Honour, and Conquest, though forcing otherwise, accordingly as Artabazus had fore-seene, and rather worse, for as much as it began the quarrell, which never ended before the ruine of the Persian Empire was effected by that Nation of the Greekes, despised and fought to have beene brought into slavery. Hereby it may seeme, that the vision appearing to Xerxes, was from God himselfe, who had formerly disposed of those things, ordaining the subversion of the Persian Monarchie by the Greekes, who thus provoked, entred into greater consideration of their owne strength, and the weaknesse of their Enemies.

§. X.

The battaile of Mycalé, with a strange accident that fell out in the beginning of it: and examples of the like.

THE same day on which the battaile was fought at Plataea, there was another battaile fought at Mycalé, a Promontory, or Head-land in Asia, where the Persian fleet rode.

Leutychides the Spartan, with Xantippus the Athenian, Admirals of the Greek Navie, at the request of some Ilanders & Ionians, did saile into those parts, to deliver the Samiens, & procure the Ionians to revolt from the Persian. Xerxes himselfe at this time lay at Sardis, a city in Lidia, not farre from the Sea-side, having left three-score thousand under the command of Tigranes, for defence of Ionis & the Sea-coast. Therefore when Artayntes, and Ithramitres, Admirals of the Persian fleet, understood that the Greekes bent their course towards them; they did forth-with draw their ships a ground, fortifying with Palisades; & otherwise, as much ground as was needfull for the encamping of all their land & sea-forces. Leutychides at his arrivall, perceiving that they meant to keep within their strength, & resolving to force them out of it, rowed with his gally close aboard the shore, and called upon the Ionians (who more for feare than good will were encamped among the Persians) exhorting them in the Greek tongue to remember liberty, & use the faire occasion which they now had to recover it. Herein hee did imitate Themistocles, who had done the like at Euboea, trusting that either these persuasions would prevaille, or if the Persians did happen to understand them, that it would breed some jealousie in them, causing them to fight in feare of their own companions. It need not seeme strange, that this very same stratageme, which little or nothing availed Themistocles, did now very happily succeed. For Xerxes being in his full strength, it was a matter of much difficulty, to persuade those inhabitants of Asia to revolt; who now in his declining estate, gave a willing ear to the sweet sound of liberty. The Persians likewise, who in their former bravery, little regarded and less feared, any treason to be contrived by their subjects, were now fowary, that from the Samians which were amongst them, they took away their arms; the Milefians; whom they did suspect, but would not seem to mistrust, they placed far from them, as it were for defence of the straight passages of Mycale; pretending that these Milefians did best of all others know those places. But these devices little availed them. For the Samians perceiving that they were held as Traitors, took courage to in the heat of the fight, and laying hold upon such weapons as came to hand, assailed the Persians manfully within the Campe; which example the Ionians presently followed, being very glad to have found some that durst beginne. It is said that while the Greekes were yet in a march toward the Enemies Campe, a rumour suddenly ranne in the Army, that Mardonius was overthrowne in Greece, which (though perhaps was given out by the Captaines to encourage the Souldiers) was very true. For the battaile of Plataea was fought in the morning, and this of Mycale in the evening of the same day.

The like report of that great battaile, wherein Paulus Aemilius overthrowne Perseus the last King of Macedon, was brought to Rome in foure dayes, as Livie with others do record. And Plutarch hath many other examples of this kinde. As that of the battaile by the River Sagra in Italy, which was heard of the same day in Peloponnesus: That of the battell against the Tarquinians & the Latines, presently noised at Rome: And (which is most remarkable) the victory obtained against Lucius Antonius, who was Rebelle to Domitian the Emperour. This Lucius Antonius being Lievtenant of the higher Germanie, had corrupted his Army with gifts and promises, drawing the barbarous people to follow him, with great hope to make himselfe Emperour; which newes much troubling the City of Rome, with feare of a dangerous Warre, it was sodainly reported that Antonius was slaine, and his Army defeated.

Hereupon many did offer sacrifice to the gods, and shew all manner of publique joy, as in such cases was accustomed. But when better inquiry was made, and the Authour of these tidings could not be found; the Emperour Domitian betooke himselfe to his journey against the Rebelle; and being now with his Army in march, he received advertisement by Poste, of the Victory obtained, and the death of Antonius: whereupon remembering the rumour noised before in Rome, of the selfe-same victory, he found that the report and victory were borne upon one day, though twenty thousand furlongs (which make about five & twenty hundred miles) a-funder. It is truly said of Plutarch, that this last example gives credit unto many the like. And indeed it were very strange, if among so many rumours, begotten by forgery or mistakings, & fostered by credulous imagination, there should not be found (as happens in dreams among many thousand vaine and frivolous) a few precisely true. Howbeit we may finde, that God himselfe doth sometimes use to terrifie those who presume upon their owne strength, by these light meanes of tumultuous noises, as he raised the siege of Samaria, by causing a sound of Horses and Chariots to affright the Aramites; & as he threatened Senacherib, saying: Behold, I will send a blast upon him, and he shall heare a noise, and returne to his owne land. Wherefore it may well have bene true, that God was pleased by such a meane as this, to animate the Greekes; who (as Herodotus notes) went towards the Enemies with heave hearts, being in great feare, left their owne adventure should by no meanes fall out well; considering in what danger they had left their owne Countrey of Greece, which was ready to be subdued by Mardonius whilest they went wandring to seek out their enemies a-farre-off, upon the coast of Asia. But the same of the battaile fought at Plataea being noised among them; every man desired that his own valour in the present fight, might be some help to worke out the full deliverance of Greece. In this alacrity of spirit, they divided themselves into two Battalians, whereof the Athenians led the one; by the way of the plaine, directly towards the enemies Campe; the Lacedaemonians conducted the other, by the Mountaines and straight passages, to winne the higher ground. The Athenians did first set upon the Campe (ere the Lacedaemonians could arrive on the other part) and being desirous to get all the honour of the day to themselves, did for-forcibly assault it, that they brake way through the Palissadoes and Gabions, & made themselves Masters of the place, slaying all that could not save themselves by flight. In this fight the Samians did good service, as is formerly mentioned.

But the Milefians, who upon the like jealousy, were placed by the Persians on the tops of Mycale, to defend the passages, did now (as if they had bin set of purpose to keep them from running away) put as many to the sword as fell into their hands, letting none escape, except very few, that fled through by-paths. The Lacedaemonians that day did little service, for the business was dispatched ere they came in: Only they broke such companies as retired in whole troopes; making them flee dispersed in very much disorder; whereby the Milefians were enabled to doe the greater execution upon them. This was the last fight of that huge Army leaved against Greece, which was now utterly broken, and had no meane left to make offensive Warre.

§. X I.

Of the barbarous qualities of Xerxes: with a transition from the Persian Affairs to matters of Greece, which from this time grew more worthy of regard.

Xerxes lay at Sardis, not farr from the place of this battaile; but little minde had hee to revenge either this or other his great losses, being wholly given over to the love of his Brothers Wife: with whom hee could not prevaile by integrity, nor would obtaine his desire by force, because he respected much his Brother her husband: hee thought it best to make a match between his owne Son Darius, and the Daughter of this Woman; hoping by that means to finde occasion of such familiarity as might worke out his desire. But whether it were so, that the chastity of the Mother did still reject him, or the beauty of the Daughter allure him; hee soone after fell in love with his owne Sonnes wife, being a vicious Prince, and as ill able to governe himselfe in peace, as to guide his Army in warre. This young Lady having once desired the King to give her the Garment which hee then wore, being wrought by his owne Wife, shee caused the Queen thereby to perceive her husbands conversation with her, which she imputed not to much to the beauty of her Daughter-in-law, as to the cunning of the Mother, against whom thereupon she conceived extreme hatred. Therefore at a Royall feast, wherein the custome was that the King should grant their request, shee craved that the Wife of Masses, her husbands brother, the young Ladies Mother, might be given into her disposition. The barbarous King, who might either have reformed the abuse of such a custome, or have deluded the importunate cruelty of his Wife, by threatening her selfe with the like, to whatsoe ver she should inflict upon the innocent Lady, granted the request; & sending for his brother, persuaded him to put away the Wife which hee had, and take one of his Daughters in her stead. Hereby it seemes, that hee understood how villainously that poore Lady should be intreated, whom hee knew to bee vertuous, and whom himselfe had loved. Masses refused to put her away; alledging his owne love; her deserving, and their common Children, one of which was married to the Kings Sonne, as reasons important to move him to keepe her. But in most wicked manner Xerxes reviled him; saying, That hee now should neither keepe the Wife which hee had, nor have his Daughter whom hee had promised unto him. Masses was much grieved with these words, but much more, when hee returned home; hee found his Wife most butcherly mangled by the Queene Amestris, who had caused her Nose, Lips, Eares, and Tongue to be cut off, and her Breasts in like manner, which were cast unto Dogs. Masses enraged with this villany; tooke his way with his children, and some Friends; towards Bactria, of which Province hee was Governor, intending to rebelle & avenge himselfe. But Xerxes understanding his purpose, caused an Army to be leaved, which cut him off by the way, putting him and all his Company to the sword. Such was the Tyrannicall conclusion of the Persian Government; and such are generally the effects of Luxury, when it is joyned with absolute power.

Yet of Xerxes it is noted, that hee was a Prince of much vertue. And therefore Alexander the Great, finding an Image of his over-throwne; and lying upon the ground, said, That hee doubted, whether in regard of his vertue, hee should againe erect it, or, for the mischief done by him to Greece, should let it lye. But surely whatsoever his other good qualities were, he was foolish, and was a coward, and consequently mercelle.

Therefore wee may firmly beleieve, that the vertue of Cyrus was very great, upon which the foundation of the Persian Empire was so surely laid, that all the wickednesse and vanities of Xerxes, & other worse Princes, could not overthrow it, untill it was broken by a vertue almost equall to that which did establish it. In wars against the Egyptians, the fortune of Xerxes did continue, as at the first it had been, very good; but against the generall estate of Greece, neither he, or any of his posterity, did ever make offensive warre, but received many losses in Asia, to which the last at Mycalé served but as an introduction; teaching the Greekes, and especially the Athenians, that the Persian was no better Souldier at his owne doores, than in a forraigne Country: whereof good triall was made forth-with, and much better proofe as soone as the affaires of Athens were quietly settled and assured.

From this time forward I will therefore pursue the Historie of Greece, taking in the matters of Persia, as also the estate of other Countries, collaterally, when the order of time shall present them. True it is, that the Persian estate continued in her greatnesse, many ages following, in such wise that the knowne parts of the World had no other Kingdome, representing the Majesty of a great Empire.

But this greatnesse depended onely upon the riches & power that had formerly been acquired, yielding few actions or none that were worthy of remembrance, excepting some Tragedies of the Court, and examples of that excessive Luxury, where-with both it, and all, or the most of Empires that ever were, have beene enervated, made unwildy, and (as it were) fattened for the hungry fwords of poore and hardy Enemies. Herby it came to passe, that Xerxes and his successours were faine to defend their Crowns with money and base policies; very seldom or never (unlesse it were with great advantage) daring to adventure the triall of plaine bataille with that little Nation of Greeks; which would soone have ruined the foundations laid by Cyrus, had not private malice and jealousy urged every City to envie the height of her neighbours wals, and thereby diverted the fwords of the Greekes into their owne bowels, which after the departure of Xerxes began very well, and might better have continued, to hew out the way of conquest, on the side of Asia.

CHAP. VII.

Of things that passed in Greece from the end of the Persian Warre, to the beginning of the Peloponnesian.

§. I.

How Athens was rebuilt and fortified.

THAT the Medes and Persians had received their last blow, and were utterly beaten at Mycalé: Leutychides, who then commanded the Grecian Army, leaving the pursuit of the warre to the Athenians, assisted by the revolted Ionians, returned with the Lacedemonians and other Peloponnesians to Sparta and other places, out of which they had beene leaved. The Athenians in the meane while besieged Sestos, a City on the strait of the Hellepont, betweene which and Abydos, Xerxes had lately fastned his Bridge of Boats: where the inhabitants, desperate of succour, did not long dispute the defense thereof, but quitted it to the Greekes, who entertained themselves the Winter following on that side the Hellepont. In the Spring they drew homeward, and having left their wives and children, since the invasion of Attica, and the abandoning of Athens, in divers Islands; and at Troizen, they now found them out, and returned with them to their owne places.

And though the most part of all the houses in Athens were burnt and broken down, and the walls of the City over-turned, yet they resolved first on their common defence, and to fortifie their City, before they cared to cover themselves, their wives and children, with any private buildings. Whereof the Lacedemonians being advertised, and misliking the fortifying of Athens, both in respect that their owne City of Sparta was unwall'd, as also because the Athenians were grown more powerfull by Sea, than either themselves, or any other State of Greece, they dispatched messengers to the Athenians to dissuade them; not acknowledging any private mislike or jealousy; but pretending, that if the Persians should return to invade Greece a third time, the Athenians being in no better state to defend themselves than heretofore, the same would serve to receive their enemies, and to be made a Seate for the Warre, as Thebes had lately bin. To this the Athenians promised to give them satisfaction by their own Embassadors very speedily. But being resolved to goe on with their workes by the advice of Themistocles, they held the Lacedemonians in hope of the contrary, till they had raised their walls to that height, as they cared not for their mislikes, nor doubted their disturbance; and therefore (to gaine time) they dispatched Themistocles towards Lacedamon, giving him for excuse, that hee could not deliver the Athenians resolutions, till the arrivall of his fellow-Commissioners, who were of purpose retarded. But after a while, the Lacedemonians expectation being converted into jealousy (for by the arrivall of divers persons out of Attica, they were told for certaine, That the walls of Athens were speedily grown up beyond expectation) Themistocles prayed them not to beleve reports and vaine rumors, but that they would be pleased to send some of their owne trusty Citizens to Athens, from whose relation they might resolve themselves, & determine accordingly. Which request being granted, and Commissioners sent, Themistocles dispatched one of his owne, by whom he advised the Athenians, first to entertaine the Lacedemonians with some such discourse as might retaine them a few daies, and in conclusion to hold them among them, till himself, & the other Athenian Embassadors, then at Sparta, had their liberty also to return. Which done, and being also assured by his associates & Aristides, that Athens was already defensible on all parts, Themistocles demanding audience, made the Lacedemonians know, That it was true that the walls of Athens were now raised to that height, as the Athenians doubted not the defence of their City; praying the Lacedemonians to beleve, That whensoever it pleased them to treat with the Athenians, they would know them for such as right well understood what appertained to a Common-weale and their owne safety, without direction & advice from any other: That they had in the warre of Xerxes abandoned their City, and committed themselves to the wooden Walls of their shippes, from the resolution of their owne counsell and courage, and not thereto taught or persuaded by others: and finally, in all that perillous warre against the Persians they found their owne judgements and the execution thereof in nothing inferiour, or lesse fortunate, than that of any other Nation, State, or Common-weale among the Greekes: And therefore concluded, that they determined to be Masters and Judges of their owne affaires, and thought it good reason, that either all the Cities confederate within Greece should be left open, or else that the Walls of Athens should be finished and maintained. The Lacedemonians finding the time unfit for quarrell, dissembled their mislike, both of the fortifying of Athens, and of the division; and so suffered the Athenians to depart, and received backe from them their owne Embassadors.

The Walls of Athens finished, they also fortified the Port Pyrens, by which they might under covert imbarke themselves upon all occasions.

§. II.

The beginning of the Athenian greatnesse, and prosperous warre made by that State upon the Persian.

THE Athenians having settled things in good order at home, prepared thirty Gallies for the pursuit of the warre against the Persians, to which the Lacedemonians added other twenty, and with this Fleet, strengthened by the rest of the Cities of Greece confederate, they set saile for Cyprus, under the conduct of Pausanias the Lacedemonian; where, after their landing having posselt themselves of many principall places, they imbarked the Army againe, and tooke land in Thrace, recovering from the the Perſians by force the City Byzantium, now Conſtantinople: from whence Pauſanius, behaving himſelfe more like a Tyrant than a Captaine, eſpecially towards the Ionians, lately revolted from Xerxes, was called backe by the Councell of Lacedæmon, and not only accuſed of many inſolent behavours, but of Intelligence with the Medes, & Treason againſt his Country. In his ſtead they employed Dacres, who either gave the ſame cauſe of offence; or elſe the Athenians, who affected the firſt commandement in that warre, praſtiſed the ſouldiers to complaine; though indeede the wife and vertuous behaviour of Ariſtides, Generall of the Athenian forces, a man of rare & incomparable ſincerity, had beene able to make a good Commander ſeeme ill in compariſon of himſelfe; & therefore was much more available, in rendering thoſe deteſted, whoſe vices afforded little matter of excuſe. Howſoever it were, the Lacedæmonians being lo leſſe wearied of the war, than the Athenians were eager to purſue it, the one obtained their eaſe, and the other the execution and honour which they deſired: for all the Greeks (thoſe of Peloponneſus excepted) willingly ſubjected themſelves to the commandement of the Athenians, which was both the beginning of their greatneſſe in that preſent age, and of their ruine in the next ſucceeding. For the charge of the warre being now committed unto them, they began to rate the confederated Cities; they appointed Receivers and Treasuſers, & began to levie mony, according to their diſcretion, for the maintenance of the generall defence of Greece, & for the recovering of thoſe places on Europe ſide, in Aſia the leſſe, and the Iſlands, from the Perſians. This tribute (the firſt that was ever payed by the Greeks) amounted to foure hundred and threeſcore Talents; which was raiſed eaſily by the honeſt care of that juſt man Ariſtides, to whoſe diſcretion all the confederates referred themſelves, & no one man found occaſion to complaine of him. But as the vertue of Ariſtides, & other worthy Citizens, brought unto the Athenians great commoditie ſo the deſire which they conceived of encreaſing their commodity, corrupted their vertue, and robbing them of the generall love, which had made them powerfull, abandoned their City to the defence of her treaſure, which with her in the next age periſhed. For it was not long ere theſe foure hundred and threeſcore Talents were raiſed to fix hundred, not long after that, ere their covetous tyranny had converted their followers into ſlaves, and extorted from them yearly thirteene hundred Talents. The Iſle of Delos was at 30 the firſt appointed for the Treasuſe-houſe wherein theſe ſummes were laid up, and where, at the generall Aſſembly, the Captaines of thoſe forces, ſent by the confederates, were for ſome ſake called to conſultation. But the Athenians, who were ſtronger by ſea than all Greece beſides, had lockt up the common treaſure in an Iſland, under their owne protection, from whence they might tranſport it at their pleaſure, as afterward they did.

The generall Commander in this Warre was Cimon, the ſon of Miltiades, who firſt tooke Eion, upon the River Strimon; then the Iſle of Sciros, inhabited by the Delopis: they maſtered the Carſiis, and brought into ſervitude the Naxii, contrary to the form of the confederacy: So did the other the inhabitants of Greece, if at any time they failed of their contribution, or diſobeyed their commandements; taking upon them & uſurping a kinde of ſovereigne authority over the reſt: which they exerciſed the more aſſuredly, becauſe they were now become Lords of the Sea, and could not be reſiſted. For many of the confederated Cities and Nations, weary of the warre in their owne perſons, and given up altogether to their eaſe, made choiſe rather to pay their parts in money, than either in men of warre, or in ſhips; leaving the proviſion of both to the Athenians. Hereby the one grew weak in all their Sea-defences, and in the exerciſe of the Warres; the other greatly ſtrengthened their Navie and their experiences, being alwayes armed and employed in honorable Services, at the coſt of thoſe, who having liſted them into their Saddles, were now enforced to become their footmen. Yet was the Tribute-mony, levied upon theſe their confederates, employed ſo well by the Athenians at the firſt (as ill proceedings are often founded upon good beginnings) that no great cauſe of reſenting was given. For they rigged out a great Fleet of Gallies, very well manned, wherewith Cimon the Admirall ſcouring the Aſiaticke Seas, took in the City of Thaſtis; which having formerly pretended neutrality, and reſuſed to relieve, or any way aſſiſt the Greeks, were enforced to pay ten Talents for a fine, and ſo to become followers of the Athenians, paying yearly contribution.

From thence hee ſet ſaile for the River Eurymedon in Pamphylia, where the Perſian Fleet

Fleet rode, being of fixe hundred ſayle, or (according to the moſt ſparing report) three hundred and fifty, and having a great Land-Army, encamped upon the ſhoare; all which forces having been provided for advancing the Kings affairs in Greece, where utterly defeated in one day, and two hundred ſhips taken by the Athenians, the reſt being broken to pieces, or ſunk, ere ever they had ſworn in the Greekiſh Seas. Cimon having in one day obtained two great victories, the one by Sea, and the other by Land, was very ſoone preſented with a third. For foureſcore ſayle of Phenicians (who were the beſt of all Sea-men, under the Perſian command) thinking to have joyned themſelves with the Fleet before deſtroyed, arrived upon the ſame Coaſt, ignorant of what had paſſed, and fearing nothing leſſe than what enſued. Upon the firſt notice of their approach, Cimon weighed anchor, and meeting them at an head-Land, called Hydra, did lo amaze them, that they only ſought to run themſelves on ground; by which meane preſerving few of their men, they loſt all their ſhips. Theſe loſſes did ſo breake the courage of the Perſian, that omitting all hope of prevailing upon Greece, he condeſcended to whatſoever Articles pleaſed the Athenians to propound, granting liberty unto all the Greeks inhabiting Aſia; and further covenanting, That none of his ſhips of War ſhould ſayle to the Weſtward of the Iſles, called Cyanea and Chelidonia.

This was the moſt honourable peace that ever the Greeks made; neither did they in effect, after this time, make any war that redounded to the profit or glory of the whole Nation, till ſuch time as under Alexander, they overthrew the empire of Perſia; in which warre, few, or perhaps none of them, had any place of great command, but ſerved altogether under the Macedonians.

§. III.

The death of Xerxes by the treaſon of Artabanus.

BEſides theſe loſſes, which could not eaſily have bin repaired, the troubles of the Empire were at this time ſuch, as gave juſt cauſe to the Perſian of ſeeking peace upon any termes not altogether intolerable. For Artabanus, the Uncle of Xerxes, perceiving, that the King his Maſter did eaſily take ſmall occaſions to ſhed the blood of ſuch, as in kindred or place were neere unto him, began to repoſe leſſe hope of a ſafetie in remaining faithfull, than of obtaining the Sovereignie, by deſtroying a Prince that was ſo hated for his cruelty, and deſpised for his cowardice and miſfortunes. Having conceived this Treason, he found meanes to execute it by Mithridates an Eunuch, in ſuch cloſe manner, that (as if he himſelfe had been innocent) he accuſed Darius the ſonne of Xerxes, and cauſed him to ſuffer death as a Parricide. Whether it be true, that by this great wickedneſſe hee got the Kingdome, and held it ſeven moneths; or whether intending the like evill to Artaxerxes the ſon of Xerxes, he was by him prevented and ſurprized, were hard to a firme any certainty. But all Writers agree upon this; That taken hee was, and with his whole familie put to death by extreme torments, according to the ſentence whereof the truth is more ancient than the Verſe:

Raro antecedens cum ſcelis ſum

Deſeruit pede pana claudo.

Seldome the villaine though, much haſte he make,
Lame-footed Vengeance ſailes to overtake.

§. I V.

The baniſhment of Themistoocles: his flight to Artaxerxes newly reigning in Perſia; & his death.

ARTAXERXES being eſtabliſhed in his Kingdome, and having ſo compounded with the Athenians, as the preſent neceſſity of his affaires required, began to conceive new hopes of better fortune againſt the Greeks, than hee or his predeceſſors had ever hitherto found. For the people of Athen, when the Perſians were chaſed out of Greece, did ſo highly value their owne merits in that ſervice, that they not only thought it fit for themſelves to become the Commanders over many Townes and Iſlands of the Greekes, but even within their owne wals, they would admit none other forme of Government than merely Democratieall. Herein they were ſo inſolent, that no integritie nor good desert was able to preserve the estate of any such as had borne great office, longer than by flattering the rascall multitude, he was contented to frame all his words and deeds to their good liking.

This their intolerable demeanour much offended Themistocles; who, though in former times he had layed the foundations of his greatness upon popularity, yet now presuming upon his good services done to the State, he thought that with great reason they might grant him the liberty to checke their inordinate proceedings. But contrariwise, they were so highly offended with his often rehearsing the benefits which they had received from him, that they laide upon him the punishment of Ostracisme, whereby hee was banished for ten years, as a man over-burthened to the Common-wealth.

Before the time of his returne was halfe expired, a new accusation was brought against him by the Lacedemonians, who charged him of consulting with Paulanias, about betraying the whole Countrey of Greece unto Xerxes. Hereupon Themistocles, finding no place of security against the malice of two such mighty cities, was driven, after many troublesome flights, and dangerous removings, to adventure himself into Persia; where he found Artaxerxes newly settled, & was by him very honourably entertained. But the great hope which Artaxerxes had conceived of advancing his affaires by the counsell and assistance of Themistocles, proved altogether fruitlesse. For when the Athenians, in favour of Inarus the Lybian, (who infested Egypt, causing it to rebell against the Persian) had sent a Fleet to Sea, landing an Army in Egypt, and scouring those Easterne Seas, to the great hindrance of Artaxerxes, & (for ought that I can understand) to the manifest breach of that peace, which to their great honour they had concluded with Xerxes; then did the King send his Letters to Themistocles, requiring him to make good the hopes which hee had given, of assuring the Persian estate against the Greekes.

But whether Themistocles perceived much unlikeliness of good successe, in leading a great army of dastardly Persians against the warlike people of Greece; or else (as in favour of his vertue it is more commonly reported) the love of his Country would not permit him to seeke honour by the ruine of it: sure it is, that being appointed by Artaxerxes to undertake the conduct of great forces against the Athenians, he decided the great conflict between thankfulness to his well deserving Prince, and natural affection to his own ill-deserving people, by finishing his life with a cup of poyson.

§. V.

How the Athenians, breaking the peace, which to their great honour they had made with the Persian, were shamefully beaten in Egypt.

Then was Artaxerxes driven to use the service of his owne Captaines in the Egyptian warre, wherein it appeared well, that a just cause is a good defence against a strong enemy. An Athenian Fleet of two hundred saile strong was sent forth under Cimon, to take in the Isle of Cyprus: which conquest seemed easie both to make and to maintaine, the Persian being utterly broken at Sea, and thereby unable to relieve the Island. Now although it were so, that a peace had been concluded, which was likely to have been kept sincerely by the Persian, who had made so good proofe of the Gracian valour, that he was nothing desirous to build any ships of Warre (without which the Greekes could receive no harme from him) whereof if any one should be found sailing towards Greece, the peace was immediately broken, and if not, his whole estate yett all the Sea-coast (no small part of his Dominions) exposed to the waite of an enemy too far over-matching him. Yet whether the Athenians were in doubt, lest the league which in his own worse fortunes he had made with them, hee would break in theirs; and therefore sought to get such assurance into their hands, as might utterly disable him from attempting ought against them; or whether the increase of their revenues & power, by adding that rich and great Island to their Empire, caused them to measure honour by profit; they thought it the wisest way, to take whilst they might, whatsoever they were able to get and hold, and he unable to defend.

The Isle of Cyprus lying in the bottome of the streights betweene Cilicia, Syria and Egypt, is very fitly feared for any Prince of State, that being mighty at Sea, doth either seeke to enrich himselfe by trade with those Countreies, or to infect one or more of them them when they are his enemies. And this being the purpose of the Athenians, their Ambition which had already devoured, in conceit, this Island, was on the sudden well nigh choaked with a greater morsell, to snatch at which, they let Cyprus alone, which they might easily have swallowed and digested. For Inarus King of the Lybians, confining Egypt, having found how greatly the Countrey was exhausted by the late warres, and how weakly defended by very slender Persian Garrisons, conceived rightly, that if such small forces as the Satrapa or Viceroy could make on the sudden of his owne Guards, or levie out of the ordinary Garrisons, were by him defeated, the naturalls of the Countrey not long since oppressed by Cambyses, and after a revolt very lately subdued by Xerxes, would soone breake faith with him, who had no other title to that Kingdome than a good sword. Further, he perswaded himselfe that the people, unable to defend themselves against the Persian without his assistance, would easily be drawne to accept him, the author of their deliverance, for King. Neither did this hope deceive him. For having taken and cruelly slaine Achamenes the Viceroy, divers Cities forthwith declared themselves for him, and proclaiming him King, shewed the most of their endeavour for prosecution of the Warre. But he considering his owne weakness, and that the means of the Egyptians his adherents were not answerable to their desires, perceived well, that to resist the power of Artaxerxes, farre greater forces than his and theirs were to be procured, at what price soever he obtained them. Therefore hearing of the great Athenian fleet, and knowing well the vertue of the Souldiers therein embarked; he invited the Commanders to share with him the Kingdome of Egypt, as a farre greater reward of their adventure, than such an addition as that of Cyprus could be to their estate. Whether he or they (if things had wholly sorted according to their expectation) would have bin contented with an equall share, and not have fallen out in the partition, were perhaps a divination unnecessary. He was possesed of the peoples love, they were of most power. But the issue of those affaires was such as left them nothing to communicate but misfortunes, which they shared somewhat equally.

Yet had the beginnings of their enterprize very good and hopefull successe: For they entered the Land as far as to Memphis, the principall Citie; and of the Citie it selfe they tooke two parts: to the third part, which was called the White wall, they laid such hard siege, that neither those forces of the Persians, which then were in Egypt, were strong enough to remove them; neither could Artaxerxes well devise what means to use for the recovery of that which was lost, or for the preservation of the remainder. The best of his hope was by setting the Lacedemonians upon Athens, to enforce the Athenians to looke homewards to their owne defence. This was the first time that the Persian sought to procure the assistance of the Greekes one against the other, by stirring them up with gold, to the entertainment of private quarrels, for the good of their common enemy. To this purpose he sent Megabazus to Sparta with much Treasure; who after great expence, finding that the Lacedemonians were nothing forward in employing their whole force against the Athenians, whom in many conflicts of great importance they had found to be their matches, notwithstanding the absence of their Army in Egypt; he thought it his wisest way to imploy the rest of his money and means to their reliefe, who had now the space of sixe yeares defended his masters right in Egypt. Therefore he hastily dispatched another of his name, the sonne of Zopyrus, who arriving in Egypt, was first encountered by the revolted people; over whom he obtained victory, which made him master of the Countrey, whilst the Athenians lay busied about Memphis the great Citie.

It cannot be doubted, that long abode in a strange ayre, and want of supply, had much enfeebled the Athenians: sure it is, that when Megabazus, having reduced the Countrey to obedience, attempted the Citie it selfe, whether his former successe had amended the courage of the Persians, or want of necessaries made the Athenians inferior to themselves, he chased them out of Memphis, and pursued them so neare, as they were forced to fortifie themselves in the Isle of Prospiter, where Megabazus, after eighteene moneths siege, turning away one part of the River by divers Trenches, assaulted the Athenians without impediment of waters, tooke their Gallies, and put all to the sword, save a few that saved themselves by flight into Lybia; the same entertainment had fiftie other Gallies which they sent to the succour of the first two hundred.

Mendes is an Island in the mouth of Nilus, between the out-let called Bustiniticus, and Didon: But the branch of Nilus, called Mendefium, runneth into the Sea by the City Panephys.

hundred. For those Athenians having heard nothing that their Fleet and Armie was confumed, entred by the branch of Nilus, called Mendefium, and fell unawares among the Phœnician Gallies and the Persian Armie; so as the Persians recovered all Egypt, but that part held by Amyrteus, and Inarus the King of Lybia, being by them taken and hanged. This was the end of the Athenians fixe yeares Warre in Egypt, and the reward of their vanity and indiscretion to undertake many enterprizes at once.

§. V.

Of other Warres made by the Athenians for the most part with good successe, about the same time.

Notwithstanding these overthrowes in Egypt, yet the Athenians in their home-warres waded through many difficulties, and held the reputation of their forces against the Lacedæmonians, Corinthians, and others, rather to their advantage than otherwise. For as they were beaten neare unto Halia by the Corinthians and Epidaurians, so they obtained two great victories soone after; the one over the Peloponnesians, neere unto Ceryphalia; the other over the Æginets, neare unto Ægina; where they sunke and carried away threecore and ten Gallies of their enemies. Furthermore, they landed their forces on the sudden, and besieged Ægina, from whence they could not be moved, notwithstanding that the Corinthians, to divert them, invaded Megara; where, after a great fight, with equall losse, the Corinthians, when they returned againe to set up their Trophia, as Victors in the former battell, were utterly broken and slaughtered by the Athenian Garrisons and Megarians, to their great losse and dishonour.

Again, as the Athenians were discomfited neare to Tanagra, by the Lacedæmonians, who returned from the succour of the Dorians against the Phocians (at which time the Thessalian horse-men turned from their Allies the Athenians, and fought against them) so about threecore daies after, the Athenians entred Boeotia under the conduct of Myrmides, where beating that Nation, they won Phocis on the gulfes of Otteeus, and evened the wals of Tanagra to the ground. Finally, they enforced Ægina to render upon most base conditions; as to beat down the wals of their Citie, and to give them hostages for Tribute; the siege whereof they had continued, notwithstanding all their other brabbles and attempts elsewhere. Besides these victories, they sackt and spoiled many places upon the Sea-coast of Peloponnesus, belonging to the Lacedæmonians; wan upon the Corinthians, and overthrew the Sicyonians that came to their succour. These were the undertakings of the Athenians, and their Allies, during the time of those six yeares that a part of their forces made war in Egypt. In the end whereof they attempted Thessalie, periwaded thereunto by Orestes, but were resisted by the king Pharalus, who had chased Orestes out of his Dominions. They also landed in Sicyonia, and had victory over those that resisted, after which they made truce with the Peloponnesians for five yeares, and sent Cimon into Cyprus with two hundred ships; but they were againe allured by Amyrteus one of the race of their former Kings, who held the Marish and Wooddie parts of Egypt from the Persians, to whom they sent sixty of their ships. The rest of their Armie failing in their enterprize at Cyprus, and their fortunate and victorious Leader Cimon dying there, as they coasted the Island, incourted a fleet of the Phœnicians and Cilicians, over both which Nations they returned victorious into Greece: as also those returned safe which were sent into Egypt.

§. VI.

Of Artaxerxes Longimanus, that he was Ahashuerosh the husband of Quene Hester.

These Egyptian troubles being ended, the reign of Artaxerxes continued peaceable; whereof the length is by some restrained into twenty yeares, but the more and better Authors give him forty, some allow unto him foure and forty.

He was a Prince of much humanity, and noted for many examples of gentleness. His favour was exceeding great to the Jewes; as appeareth by the Histories of Esdras and Nehemias, which fell in his time.

To prove that this was the King who gave countenance and ayd to that great worke of building the Temple, it were a needlesse travell; considering that all the late Divines have taken very much paines to shew that those two Prophets were licensed by him, and succoured in that building, in such sort as appears in their writings.

This was likewise that King Ahashuerosh who married Hester. Whereof if it be needfull to give proofe, it may suffice, That Ahashuerosh lived in Susa, reigning from India to Ethiopia, and therefore must have been a Persian; That he lived in peace as appears by the circumstances of the Historie, and used the counsell of the seven Princes, the authority of which Princes began under Darius the son of Hystaspes; wherefore he could be neither Cyrus nor Cambyses.

The continuall Warres which exercised King Darius the Sonne of Hystaspes, together with the certainty of his marriages with sundry wives, from none of whom he was divorced, but left his first wife Arosta, the daughter of Cyrus alive in great honour, she being mother to Xerxes the succeeding King; do manifestly prove that Hester was not his. Whereunto is added by Philo the Jew, That at the perswasion of Mardocheus, Jochachim the high Priest the son of Jesua, caused the feast of Purim to be instituted in memory of that deliverance. Now the time of Jochachim was in the reign of Artaxerxes, at the coming of Esdras and Nehemias: Jesua his father dying about the end of Darius.

The same continuance of wars, with other his furious and tragicall loves wherewith Xerxes did consume such little time as he had free from war, are enough to prove, that the story of Hester pertained not unto the time of Xerxes, who lived but one and twenty yeares, whereas the two and thirtieth of Ahashuerus or Artaxerxes is expressed by Nehemias. Again, it is well knowne that Xerxes in the seventh year of his reign (wherein this marriage must have bin celebrated) came not neare to Susa. Of the Princes that succeeded Artaxerxes Longimanus, to prove that none of them could be Ahashuerosh, it is enough to say, that Mardocheus having been carried from Hierusalem captive, with Jechonias by Nabuchadnezzar, was unlikely to have lived untill their times.

But of this Artaxerxes it is true, that he lived in Susa, reigned from India to Ethiopia, lived in peace, was contemporary with Jochachim the high Priest, and further he had happily by his Lieutenants reclaymed the rebellious Egyptians in that seventh year of his reign; which good fortune might well give occasion to such a Royall Feast, as is described in the beginning of Hester. This is the summe of the arguments, brought to prove the age of Hester's storie by the learned and diligent Krenizhemus, who adds the authorities of Josephus, affirming the same, and of Philo giving to Mardocheus eightene yeares more than Isaac the Patriarch lived, namely, one hundred foure score and eightene yeares in all, which expire in the five and thirtieth year of this Artaxerxes, if we suppose him to have been carried away captive, being a Boy of ten yeares old.

§. VIII.

Of the troubles in Greece foregoing the Peloponnesian Warre.

But it is fit that we now returne to the affaires of the Greekes, who from this time forward, more vehemently prosecuting their civill warres, suffered the Persians for many ages to rest in peace: this Egyptian expedition being come to nought. Soone after this, the Lacedæmonians undertooke the warre called Sacred, recovered the Temple and Ile of Dulphos, and delivered both to the inhabitants; but the Athenians regained the same, and gave it in charge to the Phocians. In the meane while the banished Boeotians re-entred their owne Land, and mastered two of their own Townes posselt by the Athenians, which they soone recovered againe from them; but in their returne towards Athens, the Boeotians, Eubœians, and Locrians (Nations opprest by the Athenians) leapon them with such resolution, as the Athenians were in that fight all slain or taken, taken, whereby the Bœotians recovered their former liberty, restoring to the Athenians their prisoners. The Islanders of Eubœa tooke such courage upon this, that they revolted wholly from the Athenians, whom when Pericles intended to reconquer, he was advertised that the Megarians (who first left the Lacedæmonians, and submitted themselves to Aibens) being now weary of their yoke, had slain the Athenians Garrisons, and joynd themselves with the Corinthians, Sicyonians, and Epidaurians. These newes hastened Pericles homeward with all possible speed; but ere he could recover Attica, the Peloponnesians, led by Philoanax the son of Pausanias, had invaded it, pillaged & burnt many parts thereof, after whose returne Pericles went on with his first intent, and recovered Eubœa. Finally, the Athenians began to treat of peace with the Peloponnesians, and yielded to deliver up all the places which they held in the Country of Peloponnesus: and this truce was made for thirty years.

After sixe of these years were expired, the Athenians (favouring the Mylæans against the Samiens) invaded Samos by Pericles, and after many repulses, and some great losses, both by Sea and Land, the Citizens were forced to yeeld themselves upon most lamentable conditions; Namely, to deliver up all their ships, to break downe their own walls, to pay the charge of the war, and to restore whatsoever had been taken by themselves, or by their practice from the Athenians. In the neck of which followed that long and cruell Peloponnesian War, whereof I have gathered this briefe following: the same contention taking beginning fiftie yeares after the flight of Xerxes out of Greece. But because there was no Citie thereof, which either in the beginning of this war, or in the continuance of it, was not drawne into the quarrell, I hold it convenient now at the first to shew briefly the estate of the Country at that time, and especially the condition of those two great Cities, Aibens and Sparta, upon which all the rest had most dependance.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Peloponnesian Warre.

§. I.

Upon what termes the two principall Cities of Greece, Aibens and Sparta, stood at the beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre.

*P*reece was never united under the government of any one Prince or Estate, untill Philip of Macedon, and after him Alexander, brought them rather to a Union and League against the Persians, whereof they were Captains, than into any absolute subjection. For every Estate held their own, and were governed by Lawes, farr different, and by their owne Magistrates, notwithstanding the power of the Macedonians, to whom they did yeeld obedience no otherwise than as to such, who were (perforce) their leaders in the Persian war (deemed the Generall quarrell of Greece) and tooke the profit and honour of the victory, to their own use and increase of greatness. But the Kings which afterwards reigned in Macedonia, did so farr enlarge their authority, that all Greece was by them brought under such obedience, as differed little from servitude; very few excepted, who could hardly, sometimes with arms, and sometimes with gifts, preserve their liberty; of whom the Lacedæmonians and Athenians were chiefe: which two people deserved best the plague of tyranny, having first given occasion thereto by their great ambition, which wearied and weakened all the Country by perpetuall Warre. For untill these two Cities of Aibens and Sparta distracted all Greece, drawing every State into the quarrell, on the one or other side, and so gave beginning to the Peloponnesian Warre (the effects whereof in true estimation ceased not, before the time that Philip had over-matched all, so much as every conclusion conclusion of one war afforded henceforth matter of some new distraction of the whole Country) the wars, commenced between one Citie of Greece and another, were neither great, nor of long continuance. All controversies were soon decided, either by the authority of the Amphictyones, who were the generall Councell of Greece, or by the power of the Lacedæmonians, whose aid was commonly held as good as the assurance of victory.

These Lacedæmonians had lived about foure hundred yeares under one forme of Government, when the Peloponnesian War began. Their education was only to practise feats of Armes; wherein they so excelled, that a very few of them were thought equal to very great numbers of any other people. They were poor, and cared not much for wealth; every one had an equal portion of the common field, which sufficed to maintaine him in such manner as they used. For bravery they had none, and curious building or apparell they regarded not. Their diet was simple, their feasts and ordinary meales being in common Halls, where all fared alike. They used money of yron, whereof they could not be covetous nor great hoarders. Briefly, they lived Utopian like, save that they used no other occupation than War, placing all their felicity in the glory of their valour. Hereby it came to passe that in all enterprises, whereof they were partakers, the leading and high command was granted to them, and all Greece followed their conduct. But the Athenians were in all points contrary to this. For they sought wealth, and measured the honours of their victories by the profit; they used mercenary Souldiers in their wars, and exacted so great tribute of their Subjects, which were for the most part Islanders, compelled to obey them, because the Athenian fleet was great.

As in forme of policy, and in course of life, so in conditions naturall, the difference between these two people was very much. The Athenians were eager and violent, sodaine in their conclusions, and as hasty in the execution. The Lacedæmonians very slow in their deliberations, full of gravity, but very resolute, and such as would in cold blood perform what the Athenians did usually in flagrant. Whereby it came to passe, that the Lacedæmonians had all the Estates of Greece depending upon them, as on men firm and assured, that sought honor & not riches; whereas the Athenians were followed by such as obeyed them perforce, being held in streight subjection. But the Signory of the Athenians was nothing so large, untill such time as the Persian Xerxes had invaded Greece, pretending only a quarrell to Aibens: For then the Citizens perceiving well, that the town of Aibens could not be defended against his great Armie of severene hundred thousand men, bestowed all their wealth upon a Navie, & (assisted by the other Grecians) overthrew the fleet of Xerxes, whose Land-forces were soone after discomfited by them, and the Greeks, who all served under conduct of the Spartans. After these victories, the Athenians being now very mighty in fleet, reduced all the Islands of the Greekish Seas under their obedience; imposing upon them a hard tribute, for maintenance (as they pretended) of War against the Persians, though indeed they employed their forces chiefly, to the conquest of such Islands and haven-Townes of their owne Countreymen, as stood out against them. All which was easily suffered by the Lacedæmonians, who were Islanders, and men that delighted not in expeditions to be made far from home. But afterwards perceiving the power of the Athenians to grow great, they held them in much jealousie, and were very apt to quarrell with them; but much more willing to breed contention between them and other Estates. Wherefore at such time as the Thebans would have oppressed the Plataeans, when they of Plataea repaired to Sparta for succour, they found there no other aide, than this advice, That they should seek help at Aibens. Hereby it was thought, that the Athenians should be intangled in a long and tedious War with their neighbours of Thebes. But it proved otherwise; for their force was now so great, that all such occasions did onely serve to increase their honour and puissance.

§. II.

How Sparta and Aibens entered into Warre.

*N*evertheless many Estates of Greece were very ill-affected to Aibens, because that Citie grew very insolent upon sudden prosperity, and maintaining the weaker Townes against the stronger, incroached apace upon their Neighbours, taking their dependants from them. Especially the Corinthians were much enraged, because the people of the Iland Cercyra, their Colonie which had rebelled against them, and given them a great overthrow by Sea, was by the Athenians (who desired to increase their fleet by adjoining that of Cercyra unto it) taken into protection, and the Corinthians thereby impeached of that revenge which else they would have taken. Now howsoever it were so that these dealings of the Athenians were not directly against the conditions of peace so that these dealings of the Greekes, yet were the complaints made at Sparta so vehement, that (though with much ado) they concluded to redresse by warre the injuries done to their Allies.

First therefore, seeking religious pretences, they required the Athenians to expiate certain offences committed against the gods; whereto having for answer, That they themselves should expiate other the like offences, committed in Sparta, they began to deale plainly, and required that the people of some Townes, oppressed by the State of Athen, should be set at liberty; and that a decree made against those of Megara, whereby they were forbidden to enter any Port of the Athenians, should be reversed. This last point they so earnestly presse, that if they might obtaine it, they promised to abstain from their purpose of making War.

This they desired, not as a matter of any great importance (for it was a trifle) but only that by seeming to have obtained somewhat, they might preserve their reputation without entering into a war, which threatened them with greater difficulties apparent, than they were very willing to undergoe.

But the Athenians would yeeld to nothings; for it was their whole desire that all Greece should take notice how farre they were from feare of any other Citie. Hereupon they prepared on both sides very strongly, all that was needfull to the War; wherein the Lacedemonians were Superiour, both in number and quality, being assisted by most of the Cities in Greece, and having the generall favour, as men that pretended to set at liberty such as were oppressed; but the Athenians did as far exceed them in all provisions of money, shipping, engines, and absolute power of command among their Subjects; which they held, and afterward found of greater use in such need, than the willing readinesse of friends, who soone grow weary, and are not easily assembled.

§. III.

The beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre.

THE first and second yeares expedition was very grievous to the Citie of Athen. For the Fields were wasted, the Trees cut downe, the Countrey people driven to flye, with Wives, Children, and Cattell, into the Towne; whereby a most furious pestilence grew in the Citie, such as before they had never felt, nor heard of. Hereunto was added the revolt of the Mytilenians, in the Ile of Lesbos, & the siege of Plataea their confederate Citie, which they durst not adventure to raise; besides some small overthrowes received. The Lacedemonians assembling as great forces as they could raise out of Peloponnesus, did in the beginning of Summer enter the Countrey of Attica, and therein abide, untill victuals began to faile, wasting and destroying all things round about: The Governours of the Athenians would not suffer the people to issue into the field against them; for they knew the valour of their enemies: but used to send a fleet into Peloponnesus, which waited as fast all the Sea-coast of their enemies, whilst they were making warre in Attica. So the Peloponnesians being the stronger by Land, wan the Towne of Plataea, which wanted rescue; the Athenians likewise being more mighty by Sea, did subdue Mytilene which had rebelled, but could not be succoured from Sparta. By these proceedings in that Warre, the Lacedemonians began to perceive how unfit they were to deale with such enemies. For after that Attica was thoroughly wasted, it lay not greatly in their power to doe any offence equal to such harme as they themselves might, and did receive. The Confederates began to set forward very slowly in their expeditions into Attica, perceiving well that Athen was plentifully relieved with all necessities, which came by the Sea from the Ilands that were subject unto that Estate; and therefore these invaders tooke but small pleasure in beholding the Walls of that mighty Citie, or in wasting a forsaken field, which was to them a patterne of the calamities, with which their owne Territory was the whilst afflicted. Wherefore they began began to set their care to build a strong Navie, wherein they had little good successe, being easily vanquished by the Athenians, who both had more and better ships, and were so skillfull in Sea-fights, that a few Vessels of theirs durst undertake a great number of the Peloponnesians.

§. IIII.

Of the great losse which the Spartans received at Pylus.

AMONG other losses which the Spartans had felt by Sea; they received at Pylus a very sore blow, that compelled them to sue for peace. A fleet of Athenian ships bound for Cercyra, waiting in that passage, as their manner was, the coast of Laconia, and all the halfe Ile of Peloponnesus, was by contrary windes detained at Pylus, which is a ragged Promontory, joyning to the maine, by a strange necke of Land. Before it there lies a small barren Iland of lesse than two miles compasse, and within that a creeke, which is a good harbour for ships, the force of weather being borne off by the head Land and Ide. This Promontorie the Athenians fortified as well as in haste they might; and what was wanting in their artificial fortification, was supplied by the natural strength and site of the place. By holding this piece of ground, and haven, they in reason expected many advantages against their enemies. For the Countrey adjoining was inhabited by the Messenians, who in ancient times had held very strong and cruell warre with Sparta; and (though quite subdued) they were held in streight subjection; yet was not the old hatred so extinguished, that by the neare neighbourhood and assistance of the Athenians, it might not be revived. Furthermore it was thought, that many ill-willers to the Lacedemonians, and as many of their bond-slaves as could escape from them, would repair to Pylus, and from thence made daily excursions into Laconia, which was not far off: Or if other hopes failed, yet would the benefit of this haven, lying almost in the mid-way betweene them and Cercyra, make them able to surround all Peloponnesus, and waste it at their pleasure. The newes of these doings at Pylus drew the Peloponnesians thither in all haste out of Attica, which they had entred a few daies before with their whole Armie: but now they brought not only their Land-forces, but all their Navie to recover this piece, which how bad a neighbour it might prove in time, they well fore-saw, little fearing the grievous losse at hand, which they there in few daies received. For when they in vain made a generall assault on all sides, both by Sea and Land; finding that small Garrison which the Athenians had left, very resolute in the defence: they occupied the haven, placing foure hundred and twenty choyce men, all of them Citizens of Sparta, in the Iland before mentioned, at each end whereof is a channell that leads into the Port; but so narrow, that onely two ships in front could enter betweene the Ile and Pylus; likewise but seven or eight ships could enter at once by the further channell, betweene the Iland and the Main. Having thus taken order to shut up this new Towne by Sea, they sent part of their fleet to fetch wood, and other stufte, wherewith to fortifie round about, and blocke up the piece on all sides. But in the meane season the Athenian fleet hearing of their danger that were left at Pylus, returned thither, and with great courage entering the haven, did break and sink many of their enemies vessels; took five, and so intored the residue to run themselves a-ground.

Now was the Towne secure, and the Spartans abiding in the Iland as good as lost. Wherefore the Magistrates were sent from Sparta to the campe (as was their custome in great dangers) to advise what were best for the publike safety; who when they did perceive that there was no other way to rescue their Citizens out of the Ile, than by composition with their enemies, they agreed to entreat with the Athenians about peace, taking truce in the meane while with the Captaines at Pylus. The conditions of the truce were; That the Lacedemonians should deliver up all the ships which were in the coast, & that they should attempt nothing against the town, nor the Athenians against the campe: That a certaine quantity of Bread, Wine, and Flesh should be daily carried into the Ile, but that no ships should passe into the Iland secretly: That the Athenians should carry the Lacedemonian Embassadors to Athen, there to treat of peace, and should bring them backe, at whose returne the truce should end, which if in the meane time it were broken in any one point, should be held utterly voyd in all: That when the truce was expired, the Athenians Athenians should restore the Peloponnesian ships, in as good case as they received them. The Embassadors coming to Athens, were of opinion, that as they themselves had begun the warre, so might they end it when they pleased. Wherefore they told the Athenians how great an honour it was that the Lacedemonians did sue to them for peace, advising them to make an end of warre, whilst with such reputation they might. But they found all contrary to their expectation: For in stead of concluding upon even termes, or desiring of meet recompence for losse sustained; the Athenians demanded certain Cities to be restored to them, which had bin taken from them by the Lacedemonians long before this warre began, refusing like wife to continue the treaty of peace, unless the Spartans which were in the Isle, were first rendred unto them as prisoners. Thus were the Embassadors returned without effect, at which time the truce being ended, it was desired from the Athenian Captaines, that they should, according to their covenant, restore the ships which had been put into their hands. Whereunto answer was made; that the condition of the truce was, That if any one article were broken, all should be held void; now (said the Athenians) ye have assaulted our Garrisons, and thereby are we acquitted of our promise to restore the ships. This and the like frivolous allegations which they made, were but meere shifts; yet profit so far overweighed honour, that better answer none could be got. Then were the Lacedemonians driven to use many hard meanes, for conveyance of victuals into the Isle; which finally was taken by force, and the men that were in it carried prisoners to Athens, where it was decreed that when the Peloponnesians next invaded Attica, these prisoners should all be slain. Whether fearing the death of these men, or with-held by the troubles, which (according to the Athenians hope) fell upon them; the Lacedemonians were so far from waisting Attica, that they suffered their owne Country to be continually over-runne, both by the Athenians, who landed on all parts of their coast, and by those which issued out of Pylus; which became the Rendevous of all that were ill-affected unto them.

§. V.

How the Lacedemonians hardly, and to their great disadvantage, obtained a peace that was not well kept.

Therefore they endeavoured greatly to obtain peace, which the Athenians would not hearken unto. For they were so puffed up with continuance of good successe, that having sent a few bands of men into Sicilie, to hold up a faction there, and make what profit they might of the Sicilians quarrels; when afterward they heard that the differences in that Isle were taken away, and their bands returned without either gain or losse, they banished the Captaines, as if it had been merely through their default, that the Ile of Sicilie was not conquered; which (besides the longer distance) was in power to offend others, or defend it selfe, no whit inferiour unto Peloponnesus. Yet was this their over-weening much abated shortly after, by some disasters received, especially in Thrace, where in a battell which they lost at Amphipolis, Cleon and Brasidas, Generals of the Athenian and Lacedemonian forces, were both slain; which two had most bin adversaries to the peace. As the Athenians by their losses were taught moderation; so the Lacedemonians, who not only felt the like wounds, but through the great Navie which they had received at Pylus, were faine to proceed lamely in the war, against such as, through commodity of their good fleet, had all advantage that could be found in expedition, were fervently desirous to conclude the businesse, ere Fortune by any new favour should revive the insolence, which was at this time well mortified in their Enemies. Neither was it only a consideration of their present estate, that urged them to bring the treaty of peace to a good and speedy effect; but other dangers hanging over their heads, and ready to fall on them, which unless they compounded with the Athenians, they knew not how to avoid. The estate of Argos, which had ancient enmity with them, was now after a truce of thirty yeares well nigh expired, ready to take the benefit of their present troubles, by joining with those who alone found them worke enough. Argos was a rich and strong Citie, which though inferiour to Sparta in valour, yet was not so unwarlike, nor held such ill correspondence with the neighbouring Estates, that the Lacedemonians could ever fare prevaile upon it, when they had little else to doe.

This

This was a thing that in the beginning of this Warre had not been regarded. For it was then thought that by waisting the Territory of Athens with sword and fire, the quarrell should easily and in short time have been ended, whereby not only the Athenians should have bin brought to good order, but the Corinthians, and others, for whose sake the war was undertaken, have bin so firmly knitt to the Lacedemonians, that they should for love of them have abandoned the Argives to their own fortunes. But now the vanity of those hopes appeared, in that the Athenians abounding in ready mony, and means to raise more, were able to secure themselves by a strong fleet, from any great harme that the Peloponnesians, wanting wherewith to maintaine a Navie, could do unto them; yea, as Masters of the Sea, to weary them out, as in effect already they had done. As for the Confederates of Sparta, they could now endure neither war nor peace; their daily travels, and many losses had so wearied and incensed them. Wherefore the Lacedemonians were glad to use the occasion, which the inclination of their enemies did then afford, of making a finall peace, which with much ado they procured, as seemed equal and easie; but was indeed impossible to be performed, and therefore all their travell was little effectuall.

The restitution of prisoners and places taken being agreed upon; it fell out by lot, that the Lacedemonians should restore first. These had wonne more Townes upon the continent from the Athenians, than the Athenians had from them; but what they had wonne, they had not wonne absolutely. For they had restored some Townes to such of their Allies, from whom the State of Athens had taken them; some, and those the most, they had set at liberty (as reason required) which had opened their gates unto them as to their friends and deliverers, and not compelled them to breake in as enemies. Now concerning the Townes which were not in their owne hands, but had bin rendred unto their Confederates, the Spartans found meanes to give some satisfaction, by permitting the Athenians to retaine others, which they had gotten in the Warre; as for the rest, they promised more than afterwards they could performe. The Cities which they had taken into protection, could not endure to heare of being abandoned, neither would they by any meanes yeeld themselves into the hands of their old Lords the Athenians, whom they had offended by revolting, notwithstanding whatsoever articles were drawne, and concluded, for their security, and betterance in time to come. This dull performance of conditions on the side of the Spartans, made the Athenians become backward in doing those things which on their part were required; so that restoring only the prisoners which they had, they deferred the rest, untill such time as they might receive the full satisfaction, according to the agreement. But before such time as these difficulties brake out into matter of open quarrell, the Lacedemonians entered into a more freight alliance with the Athenians; making a league offensive and defensive with them. Hereunto they were moved by the backwardness of the Argives, who being (as they thought) likely to have sued for peace at their hands, as soone as things were once compounded betweene Athens and Sparta; did shew themselves plainly unwilling to give care to any such motion. Thinking therefore, that by cutting from Argos all hope of Athenian succour, they should make sure worke, the Spartans regarded not the affections of other States, whom they had either bound unto them by well-deserving in the late war, or found so troublesome, that their enmity (if perhaps they durst let it appeare) was little worse than friendship. It bred great jealousy in all the Cities of Greece, to perceive such a conjunction betweene two so powerfull Signiories: especially one claife threatening every one, that was any thing apt to feare, with a secret intent that might be harboured in their proud conceits, of subduing the whole Countrey, and taking each what they could lay hold on. For besides the other articles, it was agreed, That they might by mutual consent adde new conditions, or alter the old at their owne pleasures. This imprecision wrought so strongly in the Corinthians, Thebans, and other ancient Confederates of Sparta, that the hate which they had borne to the Athenians their professed enemies, was violently throwne upon the Lacedemonians their unjust friends: whereby it came to passe, that they who had lately borne chiefe sway in Greece, might have been abandoned to the discretion of their enemies; as already in effect they were, had the enemies wisely used the advantage.

§. VI.

§. VI.

Of the negotiations and practices held betwene many States of Greece, by occasion of the Peace that was concluded.

THe admiration wherein all Greece held the valour of Sparta as unrefutable, and able to make way through all impediments, had bin so excessive, that when by some sinister accidents, that Citie was compelled to take and seeke peace, upon termes not founding very honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as happens usually in things extreme) was changed into much contempt. For it was never thought that any Lacedæmonian would have endured to lay down his weapons, & yeeld himselfe prisoner, nor that any misfortune should have bin so great, as should have drawne that Citie to relieve it selfe otherwise than by force of Armes. But when once it had appeared that many of their Citizens, among whom were some of especiall make, being overlayed by enemies, in the Iland before Pylus, had rather chiole to live in captivity, than to die in fight; and that Pylus it selfe, sticking as a thorne in the foot of Lacônia, had bred such anguish in that Estate, as utterly wearying the accustomed Spartan resolution, had made it sit down, and seeke to refresh it selfe by dishonourable ease: then did not only the Corinthians and Thebans begin to conceive basely of those men which were vertuous, though unfortunate; but other lesser Cities joyning with these in the same opinion, did cast their eyes upon the rich and great Citie of Argos, of whose ability to doe much, they conceived a strong beliefe, because of long time it had done nothing. Such is the base condition, which through foolish envie is become almost naturall in the greater part of mankind. We curiously search into their vices, in whom, had they kept some distance, we should have discerned only the vertues; and comparing injuriously our best parts with their worst, are justly plagued with a false opinion of that good in strangers, which we know to be wanting in our selves.

The first that published their dislike of Sparta were the Corinthians, at whose vehement entreaty (though moved rather by envie at the greatness of Athenes daily encreasing the Lacedæmonians had entered into the present Warre. But these Corinthians did only murmur at the peace, alledging as grievances; that some townes of theirs were left in the Athenians hands. The Maninæans, who during the time of Warre, had procured some part of the Arcadians to become their followers, and forsake their dependancy upon the State of Sparta, did more freely and readily discover themselves; feare of revenge to come, working more effectually than indignation at things already past. The Argives feeling the gale of prosperous fortune that began to fill their sailes, prepared themselves to take as much of it as they could stand under; giving for that purpose unto twelve of their Citizens a full and absolute commission to make alliance between them and any free Cities of Greece (Athenes & Sparta excepted) without any further trouble of propounding every particular businesse to the multitude. When the gates of Argos were set thus open to all commers; the Maninæans began to lead the way, and many Cities of Peloponnesus following them, entered into this new confederacy; some incited by private respects, others thinking it the wisest way to doe as the most did. What inconvenience might arise unto them by these courses, the Lacedæmonians easily discerned; & therefore sent Embassadors to stop the matter at Corinth, where they well perceived that the mischief had bin hatched. These Embassadors found in the Corinthians a very rough disposition, with a gravity expressing the opinion which they had conceived of their present advantage over Sparta. They had caused all Citie which had not entered yet into alliance with Argos, to send their Agents to them, in whose presence they gave audience to the Lacedæmonians; the purport of whose Embassie was this: That the Corinthians, without breach of their oath, could not forsake the alliance, which they had long since made with Sparta; and that reason did as well binde them to hold themselves concerned with the peace lately made, as religion enforced them to continue in their ancient confederacy, forasmuch as it had bin agreed between the Spartans and their associates, that the consent of the greater part (which had yielded unto peace with Athenes) should binde the lesser number to performe what was concluded, if no divine impediment withstood them. Hereunto the Corinthians made answer, that the Spartans had first begun to doe them open wrong, in concluding the warre wherein they had lost many places, without provision of restitution; and that the very clause alledged by the Embassadors, did acquire them from any necessity of subscribing to the late peace, forasmuch as they had sworn unto those people whom they perswaded to rebell against Athenes, that they would never abandon them, nor willingly suffer them to fall againe into the tyrannous hands of the Athenians. Wherefore they held themselves bound both in reason and religion to use all means of upholding those, whom by common consent they had taken into protection; for that an oath was no lesse to be accounted a divine impediment, than were pestilence, tempest, or any thelike accident, hindring the performance of things undertaken. As for the alliance with Argos, they said that they would do as they should find cause. Having dismissed the Embassadors with this answer, they made haste to joine to themselves with Argos, and caused other States to do the like; so that Sparta and Athenes were in a manner left to themselves, the Thebans and Megarians being also upon the point to have entered into this new confederacy. But as the affections were divers which caused this hasty confluence of sudden friends to Argos, it so likewise came to passe that the friendship it selfe, such as it was, had much diversity both of sincerity and of continuance. For some there were that hated or feared the Lacedæmonians; as the Maninæans and Eleanes: these did firmly betake themselves to the Argives, in whom they knew the same affection to be inveterate: others did only hate the peace concluded; and these would rather have followed the Spartans than the Argives in war, yet rather the Argives in war than the Lacedæmonians in peace. Of this number were the Corinthians, who knowing that the Thebans were affected like unto themselves, dealt with them to enter into the society of the Argives, as they had done: but the different formes of government, used in Thebes and Argos, caused the Thebans to hold rather with Sparta, that was ruled by the principall men, than to incur the danger of innovation, by joyning with such as committed the whole rule to the multitude.

This businesse having ill succeeded, the Corinthians began to besinke themselves of their owne danger, who had not so much as any truck with Athenes, and yet were unprepared for War. They fought therefore to come to some temporary agreement with the Athenians, and hardly obtained it. For the Athenians, who had dealt with all Greece at one time, did not greatly care to come to any appointment with one City that had shewed against them more stomach than force; but gave them to understand that they might be safe enough from them, if they would claime the benefit of that alliance, which Athenes had lately made with Sparta & her dependants; yet finally they granted unto these Corinthians (which were loth to acknowledge themselves dependants of Sparta) the truce that they desired; but into private confederacie they would not admit them, it being an article of the league between them and the Spartans, That the one should not make peace nor war without the other.

Herein, as in many other passages, may clearly be seene the great advantage which absolute Lords have, as well in peace as in War, over such as are served by voluntaries. We shall hardly finde any Signiorie, that hath bene so constantly followed as Sparta was by so many States, and some of them little inferiour to it selfe, being all as free: whereas contrariwise, the Athenians had lately, and by compulsive means gotten their Dominion, wherein they demeaned themselves as Tyrants. But in performance of conditions agreed upon, the Athenians were able to make their words good, by excluding any State out of their Confederacy, and giving up such places as were agreed upon; of which the Lacedæmonians could do neither the one nor the other. For such Townes as their old Allies had gotten by their means in the late War, could not be restored without their consent, which had them in present possession; and particularly the Towne of Parasæte, which the Thebans held, could by no means be obtained from them by the Lacedæmonians (who earnestly desired it, that by restitution thereof unto the Athenians, as earnestly demanding it, themselves might recover Pylus) unless that they would agree to make a private alliance with Thebes; which thereupon they were constrained to doe, though knowing it to be contrarie to the last agreement between them and Athenes.

The Lacedæmonians having broken one article of the league made between them and the Athenians, that by so doing they might enable themselves to the performance of another, were shamefully disappointed of their hopes by the Thebans, who did not give up the towne of Parasæte, till first they had utterly demolished it, and made it of no worth to the the Athenians. This was sought to have bin excused by the Lacedæmonian Embassadors, who comming to Athens (whither they had sent home all prisoners that had bin detained at Thebes) hoping with gentle words to salve the matter; saying, That from henceforth no enemie of Athens should nestle in Panaetæ, for it was destroyed. But these Embassadors had not to deale with tame fooles. For the Athenians told them in plaine termes, That of three principall conditions agreed upon in their late League, they had not performed any one, but used such base conclusions as stood not with their honour: having made private alliance with the Thebans; having destroyed a Towne that they should have restored; and not having forced their dependants by Warre, to make good the Covenants of the late concluded peace. Hereupon they dismissed the Embassadors with rough words, meaning with as rough deeds to anger those that sent them.

There were at that time both in Athens and Sparta, many that were ill-contented with the peace: among whom were the Ephori, chosen for that yeare, in Sparta; and Alcibiades, a powerfull young Gentleman in Athens. But the Ephori, though desiring to renew the War, yet wished that first they might get from the Athenians as much as was to be rendered to them by Covenant, especially Pylus that had so sorely troubled them. Alcibiades, whose Nobility, riches and favour with the people, made him desire War, as the meane whereby himselfe might procure some honourable employment; used all means to set the quarrel on foot, whilest the Athenians had yet both advantage enough, as not having rendered ought save their prisoners, and pretence enough to use that advantage of breaking the peace, by reason that the Lacedæmonians (though indeed against their wills) had broken all covenants with them. Now the State of Athens had fully determined to retain Pylus, and to performe nothing that the Lacedæmonians should, and might require, untill they had first, without any longer halting, fulfilled all articles wherto they were bound, even to the utmost point. This was enough to make them sweat, who having already done the most that they could, had as yet got nothing in recompence, except the delivery of their Citizens, which were prisoners. But Alcibiades wishing a speedy beginning of open war, sent privily to the Argives, and gave them to understand how fitly the time served for them to affociate themselves with Athens, which was enough to give them security against all enemies.

The Argives, upon the first confluence of many Estates unto their society, had embraced great hopes of working wonders, as if they should have had the conduct of all Greece against the Athenians, robbing Sparta of that honour, as having ill used it, and thereby leaving their old enemies in case of much contempt and disabilitie. But these sudden apprehensions of vaine joy, were suddenly changed into as vaine feare; which ill agreed with the great opinion that had lately bin conceived of Argos. For when the Thebans had refused their alliance; when the Corinthians had sought security from Athens; and when a false rumour was noysed abroad, Athens, Thebes and Sparta, were come to a full agreement upon all points of difference; then began the Argives to let fall their crests, and sue for peace unto the Lacedæmonians, who needing it as much as they, or more, yet held their gravity, and were not over-hasty to accept it. At this time, and in this perturbation, the message of Alcibiades came very welcome to the Argives, which were now consulting how to become the chiefe of all others, but how to save themselves. Wherefore they sent away presently to Athens, their owne Embassadors, accompanied with the Mantineans and Eleans, to make a league offensive and defensive between their Estates and the Athenians.

Of this businesse the Lacedæmonians knew not what to thinke: for well they saw, that such a combination tended to their great hurt, and therefore were desirous to prevent it; but to keep the love of the Athenians, the new Ephori thought that more was already done, than stood with their honour or profit; others held it the wisest way, having done so much, not to stick upon a little more, but rather by giving full satisfaction, to retaine the friendship of that State, which was more to be valued than all the rest of Greece. This resolution prevailing, they sent away such of their Citizens as were best affected to the peace, who comming to Athens, with full commission to make an end of all controversies, did earnestly labour in the Councell-house, to make the truth of things appear, saying, that their Confederacy with the Thebans had tended to none other end than the recovery of Panaetæ: concerning which Towne, or any other businesse, that it much grieved the Lacedæmonians, to see things fall out in such wise as might give to the Athenians cause of displeasure; but that all should be done which in reason might be required for making matters even between them; to which purpose they shewed that themselves had absolute commission. Wherefore they desired that Pylus might be restored to them, and especially for the present, that the negotiation with the Argives might be called aside. Favourable audience was given to this proposition, the rather, because they which promised amends, had power to make their words good. But all this fair likelihood of good agreement was dashed on the sudden, by the practice of Alcibiades, who, secretly dealing with the Lacedæmonian Embassadors, perswaded them well of his friendship towards their citie, and advised them to take all care that their absolute power to conclude what they pleased in the name of Sparta, might not be knowne to the Commonaltie of Athens, lest the insolent multitude should thereupon grow peremptorie and yield to nothing, unless they could draw them to unreasonable conditions. The Embassadors believed him, & fashioned their tale in the assemblie of the people, as he had advised them. Hereupon the same Alcibiades taking presently the advantage, which their double dealing afforded, inveighed openly against them, as men of no sinceritie, that were come to Athens for no other purpose, than to hinder the people from strengthening themselves with friends, meaning to draw the Argives and their Adherents to their owne alliance, as (contrary to their owne Oath) already they had the Thebans. The people of Athens, whom a pleasing errand would very hardly have satisfied, or brought into a good opinion of the Lacedæmonians, (whose honest meanings had so ill bene seconded, with good performance) were now so much incensed with the double dealing of the Embassadors, and the strong perswasions of Alcibiades, that little wanted of concluding the league with Argos. Yet for the present so farre did Nicias, an honourable Citizen, and great friend to the peace, prevail with them, that the businesse was put off, untill he himselfe, with other Embassadors, might fetch a better answer from Sparta.

It may also seeme a great wonder, how so poore a trick of Alcibiades was able to carry a matter of so great importance, when the Spartan Embassadors might have cast the load upon his owne shoulders, by discovering the truth: But the gravitie which was usually found in the Lacedæmonians, hindered them (perhaps) from playing their game handsomely against so nimble a wit; and they might well have bene thought unskillful men, had they professed themselves such as would say and un-say for their most advantage.

Nicias and his Companions had a fowre message to deliver at Sparta, being peremptorily to require performance of all conditions, and among the rest, that the Lacedæmonians should take the paines to re-build Panaetæ, and should immediately renounce their Alliance made with the Thebans; letting them understand that otherwise the Athenians, without further delay, would enter into confederacie with the Argives, and to their adherents: The Ephori at Sparta had no minde to forsake the Thebans, assured friends to their State; but wrought so hard, that the anger of the Athenians was suffered to breake out what way it could, which to mitigate, they would doe no more, than only (at the request of Nicias their honourable friend, who would not seeme to have effected nothing) sweare a-new to keepe the Articles of the league betweene him and Athens. Immediately therefore upon receipt of the Embassadors, a new league was made betweene the Athenians, Argives, Mantineans and Eleans, with very ample provision for holding the same common friends and enemies; wherein, though the Lacedæmonians were passed over with silence, yet was it manifest that the whole intent of this confederacie did bend it selfe chiefly against them, as in short while after was proved by effect.

At this time the Lacedæmonians were in ill case, who having restored all that they could unto the Athenians, and procured others to doe the like, had themselves recovered nothing of their owne. (prisoners excepted) for default of restoring all that they should. But that which did most of all disable them, was the losse of reputation, which they had not more impaired in the late Warre by misfortunes, than in sundrie passages betweene them and the Athenians: to procure and keepe whose Amitie, they had lost sundrie of their old friends to shift for themselves. Contrariwise, the Athenians by the treatie of peace, had recovered the most part of that which they lost in warre;

all their gettings they had retained; and were strengthened by the accessse of new Confederates.

§. VII.

How the peace betweene Athens and Sparta was ill kept, though not openly broken.

IT was not long ere the Argives and their fellows had found businesse wherewith to set the Athenians on worke, and make use of this conjunction. For, presuming upon the strength of their side, they began to meddle with the Epidaurians, whom it concerned the State of Sparta to defend. So, many acts of hostilitie were committed, wherein Athens and Sparta did (as principals) infect each the other, but came in collaterally, as to the aide of their severall friends.

By these occasions the Corinthians, Bœotians, Phocians, Locrians, and other people of Greece, began a-new to range themselves under the Lacedæmonians, and follow their ensignes. One victorie which the Lacedæmonians obtained by their meere valour in a set battell, near to Maninæa, against the Argive side, helped well to repaire their decayed reputation, though otherwise it yielded them no great profit. The civill dissention arising shortly after within Argos it selfe, between the principall Citizens and the Commons, had almost throwne downe the whole frame of the new combination. For the chiefest Citizens getting the upper hand, made a league with Sparta, wherein they proceeded so farre as to renounce the amitie of the Athenians in expresse words, and forced the Maninæans to the like. But in short space of time the multitude prevailing, reversed all this, and having chased away their ambitious Nobilitie, applied themselves to the Athenians as closely as before.

Besides these uproles in Peloponnesus, many affaires were made to raise up troubles in all parts of Greece, and likewise in Macedon, to the Athenians; whose forces and readinesse for execution, prevented some things, revenged other, and required all with some prosperous attempts. Finally, the Athenians wanting matter of quarrell, and the Lacedæmonians growing wearie, they began to be quiet; retaining still that enmitie in their hearts, which they had sufficiently discovered in effects, though not yet breaking out into terms of open Warre.

§. VIII.

The Athenians sending two Fleets to sacke Siracuse, are put to flight, and utterly dispersed.

DURING this intermission of open War, the Athenians re-entertained their hopes of subduing Sicily, whither they sent a Fleet so mightie as never was set forth by Greece in any Age before or after.

This Fleet was very well manned, and furnished with all necessaries to so great an expedition. All which came to nought; partly by the factions in Athens, whence Alcibiades, Author of that voyage, and one of the Generalls of their Fleet, was driven to banish himselfe, for feare of such judgement, as else he was like to have undergone among the incensed people; partly by the invasion which the Lacedæmonians made upon Attica, whilst the forces of that State were so far from home. Hereunto was added the aide of the King of Persia, who supplied the Peloponnesians with mony.

Neither was the successe of things in Sicily such, as without help from Athens, could give any likelihood of a good end in that war. For although in the beginning, the enterprise had so well succeeded, that they besieged Siracuse, the chiefest Citie of all the Island, and one of the fairest Towns which the Greeks inhabited, obtaining the better in sundrie battells by Land and Sea; yet when the Town was relieved with strong aide from Peloponnesus, it came to pass that the Athenians were put to the worse on all sides, in such wise that their Fleet was shut up into the haven of Siracuse, and could not issue out.

As the Athenian affairs went very ill in Sicily, so did they at home stand upon hard terms; for that the Lacedæmonians, who had bene formerly accustomed to make wearisome yearly journeyes into Attica, which having pillled and foraged, they returned home; did now by counsell of Alcibiades (who seeking revenge upon his own Citizens, was fled unto them) fortifie the Towne of Decelia, which was near to Athens, whence they ceased not with daily excursions to harry all the Country round about, and some times give alarme unto the City it selfe. In these extremities, the perverse obstinacy of the Athenians was very strange, who leaving at their backs, and at their own doores, an enemy little lesse mighty than themselves, did yet send forth another fleet into Sicily, to invade a people no lesse puissant, which had never offended them.

It often happens, that a prosperous event makes foolish counsell seem wiser than it was; which came to passe many times among the Athenians, whose vaine conceits Pallas was said to turne unto the best. But where unfound advice, finding bad prooffe, is obstinately pursued, neither Pallas nor Fortune can be justly blamed for a miserable issue. This second Fleet of the Athenians, which better might have served to convey home the former that was defeated, after some attempts made to small purpose against the Siracuzans, was finally (together with the other part of the Navie, which was there before) quite vanquished & bard up into the haven of Siracuse, wherby the camp of the Athenians, utterly deprived of all benefit by Sea, either for succour or departure, was driven to break up, and flye away by land; in which flight they were over-taken, routed and quite overthrowne, in such wise that scarce any man escaped.

This mischiefe well deserved fell upon the Athenians, who had wickedly condemned into exile Sophocles and Priodorus Generals, formerly sent into that Ile, pretending that they had taken mony for making peace in Sicily, whereas indeed there was not any means or possibility to have made Warre. Hereby it came to passe, that Nicias, who had the chiefe command in this unhappy enterprise, did rather chuse to hazzard the ruine of his Country by the losse of that Army, wherein consisted little lesse than all the power of Athens; than to adventure his own estate, his life, and his honour upon the tongues of shamelesse accusers, and the sentence of Judges before his tryall resolved to condemne him, by retiring from Siracuse, when wisdom and necessity required it. For (said hee) they shall give sentence upon us, who know not the reason of our doings, nor would give care to any that would speak in our behalfe, but altogether hearken to suspitious and vain rumors that shall be brought against us; yea these our Souldiers who now are so desirous to returne in safety, will in our danger be well contented to frame their tales to the pleasure of the lewd and insolent multitude.

This resolution of Nicias, though it cannot be commended (for it is the part of an honest and valiant man to do what reason willerth, not what opinion expecteth; and to measure honour or dishonour by the assurance of his well-informed conscience, rather than by the malicious report & censure of others) yet it may be excused; since he had before his eyes the injustice of his people, and had well understood that a wicked sentence is infinitely worse than a wicked fact, as being held a precedent and pattern whereby offence beginning upon one, is extended as warrantable upon all. Therefore his feare of wrongfull condemnation was such, as a constant man could not easily have over-mattered; but when afterwards the Army, having no other expectation of safety than the faint hope of a secret flight; he was so terrified with an Eclipse of the Moon, happening when they were about to dislodge, that he would not consent to have the camp break up till seven and twenty dayes were past. His timorousnesse was even as foolish and ridiculous, as the issue of it was lamentable. For he should not have thought that the power of the Heavens, and the course of Nature would be as unjust as his Athenians, or might pretend lesse evill to the slothfull, than to such as did their best. Neither doe I think that any Astrologer can alledge this Eclipse, as either a cause or prognostication of that Armes destruction, otherwise than as the folly of men did, by application, turne it to their owne confusion. Had C. Cæsar the Roman, he who slew Julius Cæsar, imitated this superstition of Nicias, he had surely found the same fortune in a case very like. But when, hee retrying, the broken remainder of Cæsar's Army defeated by the Parthian Archers, was advised, upon such an accident as this, to continue where he then was, till the Sunne were past the signe of Scorpio; he made answer that he stood not in such feare of Scorpio, as of Sagittarius. So adventuring rather to abide the frowning of the Heavens, than the nearer danger of Enemies upon earth, he made such a safe and honourable retreat, as did both shew his noble resolution, and give a faire example to that good rule.

Thus we see that God, who ordinarily workes by a concatenation of meanes, deprives the Governours of understanding, when he intends evil to the multitude; and that the wickedness of unjust men is the readie meane to weaken the vertue of those who might have done them good.

Of the troubles whereinto the State of Athens fell, after the great losse of the Fleet, and Armie in Sicilia.

The losse of this Armie was the ruine of the Athenian Dominion, and may be well accounted a very little lesse calamitie to that Estate, than was the subversion of the walls, when the Citie about seven yeares after was taken by Xenander. For now began the subjects of the Athenian Estate to rebell, of whom, some they reduced under their obedience, others held out; some for feare of greater inconvenience were set at libertie, promising only to be their good friends, as formerly they had been their Subjects; others having a kinde of libertie offered by the Athenians, were not therewith contented, but obtained a true and perfect libertie by force. Among these troubles it fell out very unseasonably, that the principall men of Athens, being wearied with the peoples insolencie, tooke upon them to change the forme of that Estate, and bring the government into the hands of a few. To which purpose conspiring with the Captains which were abroad, they caused them to set up the forme of an Aristocratic in the Townes of their Confederates; and in the meane time, some that were most likely to withstand this innovation, being slaine at Athens, the Commonaltie were so dismayed, that none durst speake against the Conspirators, whose number they knew not, but every man was afraid of his neighbour, lest he should be a member of the league. In this generall fear the Majestie of Athens was usurped by foure hundred men, who observing in few the ancient form of proceeding, did cause all matters to be propounded unto the people, and concluded upon by the greater part of voices: but the things propounded were onely such as were first allowed in private among themselves; neither had the Commonaltie any other libertie, than onely to approve and give consent: for whosoever presumed any further, was quickly dispatched out of the way, and no inquirie made of the murder. By these meanes were many Decrees made, all tending to the establishment of this new authoritie, which nevertheless endured not long. For the Fleet and Armie which then was in the Isle of Samos, did altogether detest these dealings of the foure hundred usurpers, and held them as Enemies; whereupon they revoked Alcibiades out of banishment, and by his assistance procured that the supplies which the Persian King had promised to the Lacedaemonians, were by Tissaphernes his Lieutenant, made unprofitable, through the slow and bad performance. Alcibiades had at the first bene very well entertained in Sparta, whilst his service done unto that State was not growne to be the object of envie. But when it appeared that in Counsell and good performance he so far excelled all the Lacedaemonians, that all their good success was ascribed to his wit and valour, then were all the principall Citizens wearied of his vertue; especially Agis one of their Kings, whose wife had so far yielded her selfe to the love of this Athenian, that among her inward friends she could not forbear to call her young child by his name. Hereupon order was taken, that Alcibiades should be killed out of the way. But he discovering the Spartan treacherie, conveyed himselfe unto Tissaphernes, whom he so bewitched with his great beautie, sweet conversation, and sound wit, that he soone became the Master of that barbarous Vice-royes affections, who had free power to dispose the great Kings Treasures and Forces in those parts. Then began he to advise Tissaphernes, not so far forth to assist the Lacedaemonians, that they should quite overthrow the State of Athens, but rather to helpe the weaker side, and let them one consume another, whereby all should fall at length into the hands of the Persian. By this counsell he made way to other practices, wherein by strength of his reputation (as the onely Favourite of so great a Potentate) he played his owne game, procuring his restitution. At length his banishment being repealed by the Armie, but not by the Citizens (who then were oppressed by the foure hundred) he laboured greatly to reconreconcile the Souldiers to the Governours; or at least to divert their heat another way, and turne it upon the common Enemy. Some of the foure hundred approved his motion, as being wearied of the tyranny whereof they were partakers, partly because they saw it could not long endure, and partly for that themselves, being little regarded by the rest of their companions, than stood with their good liking, fought to acquit themselves of it as honestly as they might. But the most of that Faction laboured to obtain peace of the Lacedaemonians, desiring chiefly to maintain both their own authoritie & the greatness of their citie, if they might; but if this could not be, they did rather wish to preserve their own power, or satisfaction at least, than the good Estate of the Common-wealth. Therefore they made sundrie overtures of peace to the Lacedaemonians, desiring to compound in as good termes as they might, and affirming that they were fitter to be trusted than the warring multitude; especially considering that the Citie of Sparta was governed by an Aristocraticie, to which form they had now reduced Athens. All these passages between the foure hundred (or the most and chiefe of them) and the Lacedaemonians, were kept as secret as might be. For the Citie of Athens, hoping without any great cause, to repair their losses, was not inclined to make composition, from which upon juster ground the Enemy was much more averse, trusting well that the discord of the Athenians (not unknowne abroad) might yeeld some faire opportunitie to the destruction of it selfe, which in effect (though not then presently) came to passe. And upon this hope king Agis did sometimes bring his forces from Decelea to Athens, where doing no good, he received some small losses. Likewise the Navie of Peloponnesus made shew of attempting the Citie, but seeing no likelihood of successe, they bent their course from thence to other places, where they obtained victories, which in the better fortune of the Athenians might more lightly have bin regarded, than in this their decayed estate. Yet it seems, without any disparagement to their wisdom, they should rather have forborne to present unto the Citie, or to the countries near adjoining, any terror of the war. For the dissention within the walls might soon have done more good than could be received from the fleet or armie without, which indeed gave occasion to set the Citizens at unity, though it lasted not very long. The foure hundred, by means of these troubles, were faine to resign their authority, which they could no now hold, when the people, having taken arms to repell forraign Enemies, would not lay them down, till they had freed themselves, from such as oppressed the State at home. Yet was not this alteration of government a full restitution of the soveraign command unto the people, or whole bodie of the Citie, but only to five thousand; which company the foure hundred (when their authoritie began) had pretended to take unto them as assistants, herein seeming to do little wrong or none to the commonalty, who seldom assembled in greater number. But now when the highest power was come indeed into the hands of so many, it was soon agreed, that Alcibiades & his companions should be recalled from exile, and that the army at Samos should be requested to undertake the government: which was forthwith reformed according to the Souldiers desire.

How Alcibiades won many important victories for the Athenians; was recalled from exile, made their Generall, and again deposed.

This establishment of things in the Citie, was accompanied with some good success in the wars. For the Lacedaemonians were about the same time overthrowen at Sea, in a great battell, by the Athenian Fleet, which had remained at Samos, to which Alcibiades afterwards joyning such forces as he could raise, obtained many victories. Before the Towne of Abydos, his arrivall with eighteen ships, gave the honour of a great battell to the Athenians; he overthrew and utterly destroyed the fleet of the Lacedaemonians, commanded by Mindarus; took the Towns of Cyzicus and Perinthus, made the Selymbrians ransom their Citie, and fortified Chrysolopolis. Hereupon letters were sent to Sparta, which the Athenians intercepting, found to contain the distrust of the Armie, in these few words: All is lost; Mindarus is slain; the Souldiers want victuals; we know not what to doe.

Shortly after this, Alcibiades overthrew the Lacedaemonians in fight by land at Chalcidion, took Selymbria, besieged & won Byzantium, now called Constantinople, which even in those dayes was a goodly, rich & very strong Citie. Hereupon he returned home with very great welcome, and was made high admirall of all the Navie.

But this his honour continued not long: for it was taken from him, and he driven to banish himselfe again, only because his Lievtenant, contrarie to the expresse command of Alciades, fighting with the enemies in his absence, had lost a great part of the Fleet.

The second banishment of Alciades was to the Athenians more harmful than the first; and the losse which thereupon they received, was (though more heave to them, yet) lesse to be pittied of others, than that which ensued upon his former exile. For whereas at the first, he had sought revenge upon his own Citie; now, as inured to adversitie, he rather pittied theirurie; who in time of such danger had cast out him that should have repaired to their weak estate, than sought by procuring or beholding the calamitie of his people, to comfort himselfe after injurie received. Before they, who were instituted in the place of Alciades, arrived at the Fleet, he presented battel to Lysander the Lacedemonian Admirall, who was not so confident upon his former victorie, as to undertake Alciades: himselfe, bringing ships more in number (notwithstanding the former losse of fifteen) than his enemies had, and better ordered than they had bin under his Lievtenant. But when the decree of the people was published in the Navie, then did Alciades withdraw himselfe to a Town upon Hellepont, called Bizantie, where he had built a Castle.

§. XI.

The battell at Arginusæ, and condemnation of the victorious Athenian Captaine by the people.

AFTER this time, the Athenians receiving many losses and discomforts, were driven to flye into the Haven of Mytelæ, where they were straitly besieged both by Land and Sea. For the raising of this siege, necessitie enforced them to manall their vessels; and to put the uttermost of their forces into the hazzard of one battel. This battell was fought at Arginusæ, where Callicratidas, Admirall of the Lacedemonians, losing the honour of the day, preserved his own reputation by dying valiantly in the fight. It might well have bin expected, that the ten Captains, who joyntly had command in chiefe over the Athenian fleet, should for that good daies service, and so happy a victory, have received great honor of their Citizens. But contrariwise, they were forthwith called home, and accused, as if wilfully they had suffered many of the Citizens, whose ships were broken and sunk, to be cast away, when by appointing some Vessels to take them up, they might have saved them from being drowned. Hereto the Captains readily made a very just answer, That they pursuing the victorie, had left part of the fleet, under sufficient men, to save those that were wrackt; which if it were not well accomplished, it was, because a tempest arising about the end of the fight, had hindred the performance of that, and other their intendments. This excuse availed not: For a lewd fellow was brought forth, who said, That he himselfe escaping in a meal-tub, had bin intreated by those who were in perill of drowning, to desire of the people revenge of their deaths upon the Captains. It was very strange, that upon such an accusation maintained with so slender evidence, men that had well deserved of their Countrey should be overthrowen. But their enemies had so incensed the rascall multitude, that no man durst absolve them, save only Socrates the wife and vertuous Philosopher, whose voice in this judgement was not regarded. Sixe of them were put to death, of whom one had hardly escaped drowning, and was with much ado relieved by other vessels in the storme: but the Captains which were absent escaped; for when the furie of the people was overpast, this judgement was reversed, and the accusers called into question for having deceived and perverted the Citizens. Thus the Athenians went about to free themselves from the infamie of injustice; but the divine Justice was not a sleep, nor would be so deluded.

§. XII.

§. XII.

The battell at Ægos-Potamos, wherein the whole State of Athens was ruined; with the end of the Peloponnesian war.

THE Peloponnesian fleet under Lysander, the year next following, having scoured the Ægean Seas, entred Hellepont, where (landing souldiers) it besieged and took the town of Lampsacus. Hereupon all the navie of Athens, being an hundred and fourscore saile, made thither in haste, but finding Lampsacus taken before their coming, they put in at Sestos, where having refreshed themselves, they failed to the river called Ægos-Potamos, which is (as we might name it) Goats-Brook, or the river of the Goats, being on the continent opposite to Lampsacus: and there they cast Anchors, not one whole league off from Lysander, who rode at Lampsacus in the harbor. The next day after their arrival they presented fight unto the Peloponnesians, who refused it, whereupon the Athenians returned again to Ægos-Potamos; & thus they continued five daies, braving every day the Enemy, and returning to their own harbor when it drew towards evening.

The Castle of Alciades was not far from the Navie, and his power in those places was such as might have greatly availed his countreymen, if they could have made use of it. For he had waged mercenaries, & making war in his own name upon some people of the Thracians, had gathered much wealth, & obtained much reputation among them. He perceiving the disorderly course of the Athenian Commanders, repaired unto them, & shewed what great inconvenience might grow, if they did not soon fore-see and prevent it. For they lay in a roade subject to every weather, neither near enough to any town where they might furnish themselves with necessaries, nor so far off as had bin more expedient. Sestos was the next Market-town; thither both Souldiers and Mariners resorted, flocking away from the Navie every day, as soon as they were returned from braving the Enemy. Therefore Alciades willed them either to lie at Sestos, which was not far off, or at least to consider how neare their Enemy was, whose feare proceeded rather from obedience to their Generall, than from any cowardise. This admonition was so far despised, that some of the Commanders willed him to meddle with his own matters, and to remember that his authoritie was out of date. Had it not bin for these opprobrious words, he could (as he told his familiars) have compelled the Lacedemonians, either to fight upon unequal terms, or utterly to quit their fleet. And like enough it was that he might so have done by transporting the light-armed Thracians, his confederates, and others his Followers, over the Straights, who assaulding the Peloponnesians by Land, would either have compelled them to put to Sea, or else to leave their ships to the mercie of the Athenians. But finding their acceptance of his good counsell no better than hath bin rehearsed, he left them to their fortune, which how evill it would be he did prognosticate.

Lysander all this while defending himselfe by the advantage of his Haven, was not careless in looking into the demeanour of the Athenians. When they departed, his manner was to send forth some of his swiftest Vessels after them, who observing their doings, related unto him what they had seene. Therefore understanding in what carelesse fashion they romed up and down the country, he kept all his men a-board after their departure, and the fifth day gave especial charge to his Scouts, that when they perceived the Athenians dis-embarking, as their custome was, and walking towards Sestos, they should forthwith returne, and hang up a brazen shield in the Prov, as a token for him to weigh Anchor.

The Scouts performed their charge, and Lysander being in a readinesse, made all speed that strength of Oares could give, to Ægos-Potamos, where he found very few of his enemies about their ships, nor many near them, and all in great confusion upon the newes of his approach.

Insomuch that the greatest industrie which the Athenians then shewed, was in the escape of eight or nine ships, which knowing how much that losse imported, gave over Athens as desperate, and made a long flight into the Ile of Cyprus; all the rest were taken, and such of the Souldiers as came in to the rescue cut in pieces. Thus was the war which had lasted seven and wentie years, with variable successe concluded in one houre, and the glorie of Athens in such wise eclipsed, that she never afterward shone in her perfect light.

Immediately upon this victorie, Lysander, having taken such Townes as readily did yeeld such ancient Statutes, as were meet to be put in practice: the condition of the Citie standing as it did in that so sudden alteration. To this charge was annexed the supreme authority, either as a recompence of their labours, or because the necessity of the times did require it, wherein the Law being uncertain, it was fit that such men should give judgement in particular causes, to whose judgement the Lawes themselves, by which the Citie was to be ordered, were become subject. But these thirtie, having so great power in their hands, were more carefull to hold it, than to deserve it, by faithfull execution of that which was committed to them in trust.

Therefore apprehending such troublesome fellows, as were odious to the Citie, though not punishable therefore by law, they condemned them to death; which proceeding was by all men highly approved, who considered their lewd conditions, but did not withall bethinke themselves, how easie a thing it would be unto these thirtie men, to take away the lives of Innocents, by calling them perturbors of the peace, or what else they listed, when condemnation without true triall and proofe had beene once well allowed. Having thus plausibly entred into a wicked course of government, they thought it best to fortifie themselves with a sure guard, ere they brake out into those disorders, which they must needs commit for the establishing of their authority. Wherefore dispatching two of their own companie to Sparta, they informed the Lacedæmonians, that it was the full intent of the thirtie, to keep the Citie free from all rebellious motions: to which purpose it behoved them to cut off such as were seditious; and therefore desired to the Lacedæmonians to send them a Garrison, which they promised at their owne cost to maintaine. This motion was well approved, and a Guard sent, the Captaine of which was so well entertained by the thirtie, that none of their misdeeds could want his high commendations at Sparta. Hereupon the Tyrants began to take heart, and looking no more after base and detested persons, invaded the principall men of the Citie, sending armed men from house to house, who drew out such as were of great reputation, and likely, or able to make any head against this wicked forme of government: whereby there was such effusion of blood, as to Theramenes (one of the thirtie) seemed very horrible, and unable to escape vengeance. His dislike of their proceedings being openly discovered, caused his fellows to bethinke themselves, and provide for their owne securitie, and his destruction, lest he should make himselfe a Captaine of the discontented (which were almost the whole Citie) and redeem his own peace with their ruine. Wherefore they selected three thousand of the Citizens, whom they thought meetest, and gave unto them some part of publike authority, the rest they disarmed; and having thus increased their own strength, and weakened their opposites, they began a-fresh to shed the blood, not only of their private enemies, but of such whose money, or goods, might enrich them, & enable them for the payment of their guard. And to this purpose they concluded, that every one of them should name one man, upon whose goods he should seize, putting the owner to death. But when Theramenes uttered his detestation of so wicked intent, then did Critias, who of all the thirtie was most tyrannicall, accuse him to the Councell, as a treacherous man, & (whereas one main privilege of the three thousand was, that none of them should suffer death at the appointment of the thirtie, but have the accustomed triall) he took upon him to strike out of that number the name of Theramenes, & so reduced him under the triall & sentence of that order. It was well alleged by Theramenes, that his name was not more easie to be blotted out of the catalogue, than any other mans; upon which consideration, he advised them all to conceive no otherwise of his case, than as of their own, who were liable to the same form of proceeding: but every man choosing rather to preserve his own life by silence, than presently to draw upon himselfe the danger, which as yet concerned him little, and perhaps would never come near him; the Tyrants interpreting silence as consent, condemned him forthwith, and compelled him to drink poison.

§. III.

The Conspiracie against the thirtie Tyrants, and their deposing.

AFTER the death of Theramenes, the thirtie began to use such outrage, as exceeded their former villanies. For, having three thousand (as they thought) firme unto them, they robbed all others without feare or shame, depossing them of lands and and goods, and caused them to flie into banishment, for safeguard of their lives. This light of the citizens procured their libertie, and the general good of the citie. For the banished citizens, who were fled to Thebes, entred into consultation, and resolved to hazard their lives in setting free the citie of Athens. The very thought of such a practice had bin treason at home, which had no other danger abroad, than might be found in the execution. Seventie men, or thereabout, were the first undertakers, who with their Captaine Thrasibulus took Phyla, a place of strength in the Territorie of Athens. No sooner did the thirtie heare of their exploit, than seek means to prevent further danger; assembling the three thousand, and their Lacedæmonian guard, with which force they attempted Phyla, but were with some losse of their men repelled. Finding the place too strong to be taken by assault, they intended to besiege it; which purpose came to nought by means of snow that fell, and other stormie weather, against which they had not made provision. Retiring therefore to the citie, which above all they were to make good, they left the most of their guard, and two companies of Horse, to wearie out them which lay in Phyla, with a flying siege. But it was not long ere the followers of Thrasibulus were increased from seventy to seven hundred, which adventured to give charge upon those guards, of whom they cut off above an hundred and twentie. These finally, but prosperous beginnings, added more to the number of those in Phyla, who now with a thousand men got entrance into Piræus, the suburbs of Athens, lying on the Port. Before their comming the thirtie had resolved to fortifie the Towne of Eleusine, to their owne use, wherein they might make an easie retreat, and save themselves from any sudden perill. It may well seeme strange, that whereas their barbarous maner of government had brought them into such danger, they were so far from seeking to obtaine mens good will, that contrariwise, to assure themselves of Eleusine, they got all of the place who could beare arms into their hands by a traine, and wickedly (though under form of Justice) murdered them all. But, Salutem tutum per scelera est iter, the mischiefs which they had already done were such, as left them no hope of going backward, nor any other apparent likelihood of safetie, than by extending their crueltie unto all, seeing few or none were left, whom they could trust. When Thrasibulus and his fellows, who as yet were termed conspirators, had taken the Piræus, then were the three thousand armed againe by the Tyrants, and brought to assault it; but in this enterprise Thrasibulus had the better, & repelled his enemies, of whom though there were slain to the number of seventy only, yet the victory seemed the greater, because Critias, and one other of the thirtie, perished in that fight. The death of Critias, and the stout defence of Piræus, together with some exhortations used by Thrasibulus to the Citizens, wrought such effect, that the thirtie were deposed. Nevertheless there were so many of the three thousand, who having communicated with the thirtie in their misdeeds, feared to be called to a sharpe account, that no peace, nor quiet form of government could be established. For Embassadors were sent to Sparta, who craving aide against Thrasibulus and his followers, had favourable audience, and a power sent to their assistance, both by land and sea, under the conduct of Lysander, & his Brother; whom Pausanias the Spartan King did follow, raising an Armie of the Cities confederate with the Lacedæmonians. And here appeared first the jealousie, wherein some people held the State of Sparta. The Bæotians and Corinthians, who in the late wars had bin the most bitter enemies to Athens, refused to follow Pausanias in this expedition; alleging that it stood not with their oathes, to make war against that people, who had not hitherto broken any one article of the league: but fearing indeed, lest the Lacedæmonians should annexe the Territorie of Athens to their own Demains. It is not to be doubted, that Pausanias took this answer in good part. For it was not his purpose to destroy those against whom he went, but only to crosse the proceedings of Lysander, whom he envied. Therefore having in some small skirmishes against them of Thrasibulus his party, made a shew of war, finally wrought such means, that all things were compounded quietly: the thirtie men, and such others, as were like to give cause of tumults, being sent to Sparta. The remainder of that tyrannicall faction, having withdrawn themselves to Eleusine, were shortly after found to attempt some innovations, whereupon the whole Citie rising against them, took their Captains, as they were coming to Paric, and slew them: which done, to avoid further inconvenience, a law was made, that all injuries past should be forgotten, and no man called into question for wrongs committed. By which order, wisely made, and carefully observed, the Citie returned to her former quietnesse.

CHAP. X.

Of the expedition of Cyrus the younger.

§. I.

The grounds of Cyrus his attempt against his brother.

THe matters of Greece standing upon such terms; that no one estate durst oppose it selfe against that of Lacedæmon; young Cyrus, Brother to Artaxerxes, King of Persia, having in his fathers life time very carefully prosecuted the war against Athenis, did send his messengers to Sparta, requesting that their love might appear no less to him, than that which he had shewed towards them in their dangerous war against the Athenians. To this request, being generall, the Lacedæmonians gave a favourable answer, commanding their Admiral to perform unto Cyrus all service that he should require of him. If Cyrus had plainly discovered himself, and the Lacedæmonians bent their whole power to his assistance, very like it is, that either the kingdom of Persia should have bin the recompence of his deserts; or that he perishing in battell, as after he did, the subversion of that Empire had forthwith ensued. But it pleased God, rather to shew unto the Greeks the waies, which under the Macedonian Ensigns, the victorious foot-steps of their posteritie should measure; and opening unto them the riches, and withall the weaknesse of the Persian, to kindle in them both desire and hope of that conquest, which he reserved to another generation; than to give into their hands that mightie kingdom, whose house was not yet come. The love which Parysatis the Queen-mother of Persia bare unto Cyrus her younger son, being seconded by the earnest favour of the people, and readie desires of many principall men, had moved this young Prince, in his fathers old age, to aspire after the succession. But being sent for by his Father (as hath before bin shewed) whose meaning was to curb this ambitious youth; he found his elder brother Artaxerxes established so surely by the old kings favour, that it were not safe to attempt any means of displanting him, by whose disfavour himself might easily lose the place of a Vice-roy, which he held in Asia the lesse, and hardly be able to maintain his own life. The nearest neighbour to Cyrus of all the kings Deputies in the lower Asia, was Tissaphernes, a man compounded of cowardise, trechery, craft, and all vices which accustomably branch out of these. This man accompanied Cyrus to his Father, using by the way all faire shewes of friendship, as to a Prince, for whom it might well be thought, that Queen Parysatis had obtained the inheritance of that mighty Empire. And it was very true, that Parysatis had used the best of her endeavour to that purpose, alledging that (which in former ages had bin much available to Xerxes, in the like disceptation with his elder brother) Artaxerxes was born whilst his father was a private man, but Cyrus, when he was a crowned king. All which not sufficing, when the most that could be obtained for Cyrus, was the pardon of some presumptuous demeanour, and confirmation of his place in Lydia, and the parts adjoining: then did this Tissaphernes discover his nature, and accuse his friend Cyrus to the new King Artaxerxes, of a dangerous treason intended against his person. Upon this accusation, whether true or false, very easily beleevd, Cyrus was arrested, and by the most vehement intreatie of his Mother very hardly delivered, and sent backe into his owne Province.

§. II.

The preparations of Cyrus, and his first entrie into the War.

THe forme of government which the Persian Lieutenants used in their severall Provinces, was in many points almost Regall. For they made war and peace, as they thought it meet, not only for the Kings behoofe, but for their owne reputation; usually indeed with the Kings enemies, yet sometimes one with another: which was the more easily tolerated, because their owne heads were held only at the Kings pleasure, which caused them to frame all their doings to his will, whatsoever it were, or they could conjecture it to be. Cyrus therefore being settled in Lydia, began to consider with himselfe, the interest that he had in the Kingdome; the small assurance of his brothers love, held only by his Mothers intercession; the disgrace endured by his late imprisonment; and the means which he had by love of his own people, and that good neighbourhood of the Lacedæmonians, whom he had bound unto him, to obtaine the Crowne for himselfe. Neither was it expedient that he should long sit idle, as waiting till occasion should present it selfe: but rather enterprise somewhat whilst yet his Mother lived, who could procure a good interpretation to all his actions, if they were no worse than onely questionable. Hereupon hee first began to quarrell with Tissaphernes, and seized upon many Townes of his jurisdiction, annexing them to his own Province, which displeased not Artaxerxes at all, who (besides that he was of condition somewhat simple) being truly paid by Cyrus the accustomed Tributes out of those places, was well contented to see his brothers hot spirit exercised in private quarrels. But Tissaphernes, whose base conditions were hated, & cowardize despised, although he durst not adventure to take armes against Cyrus, yet perceiving that the Milesians were about to give up themselves into the hands of that young Prince, as many other townes of the Ionians had done, thought by terrour to preserve his reputation, and keepe the towne in his own hands. Wherefore he slew many, and many he banished, who flying to Cyrus, were gently entertained, as bringing faire occasion to take armes, which was no small part of his desire. In levying Souldiers he used great policie; for he tooke not only the men of his own Province, or of the Countreies adjoining, whose lives were ready at his will; but secretly he furnished some Greecian Captaines with money, who being very good men of warre, entertained Souldiers therewith, some of them warring in Thrace, others in Thessalie, others elsewhere in Greece; but all of them ready to crosse the Seas, at the first call of Cyrus, till which time they had secret instructions to prolong their severall warres, that the Souldiers might be held in continuall exercise, and ready in armes upon the sudden. Cyrus having sent a power of men to besiege Miletus, forthwith summoned these bands of the Greeks, who very readily came over to his assistance, being thirteen thousand very firme Souldiers, and able to make head (which is almost incredible) against the whole power of Artaxerxes. With this Army, and that which he had levied before, he could very easily have forced Miletus, and chased away Tissaphernes out of Asia the lesse: but his purpose was not so to lose time in small matters, that was to be employed in the accomplishment of higher designs. Pretending therefore that the Pisidians, a people of Asia the lesse, not subject to the Persian, had invaded his Territories, hee raised the siege of Miletus, and with all speede marched Eastward, leaving Tissaphernes much amazed, who had no leisure to rejoyce that Cyrus had left him to himselfe, when he considered, that so great an Army, and so strong, was never levied against the Rovers of Pisidia, but rather against the great King his Master. For which cause taking a band of five hundred horse, he posted away to carry tidings to the Court of this great preparation.

§. III.

How Cyrus took his journey into the higher Asia, and came up close to his Brother.

THe tumult which his comming brought was very great, and great the exclamations of the Queen Stratra, against Parysatis, the Queen-Mother, whom she called the Author and occasioner of the war. But whilst the King in great feare was arming the high Countreies in his defence, the danger hastened upon him very fast. For Cyrus made great marches, having his number much increased, by the repaire of his Countrymen, though most strengthened by the access of seven hundred Greeks, & of other four hundred of the same Nation, who revolted unto him from the King. How terrible the Greeks were to the Barbarians, he found by triall in a Muster, which (to please the Queen of Cilicia, who had brought him aide) he made in Phrygia; where the Greeks, by his direction making offer of a charge upon the rest of his Army, which contained a hundred thousand men, the whole Campe (not perceiving that this was but a bravely fled amaine, the victuallers & baggagers forsaking their cabbins, & running all away for very feare. This was to Cyrus a joyfull spectacle, who knew very well, that his brother was followed by men of the same temper, and the more unlikely to make resistance, because they were preft to the warre againft their will and difpofitions, whereas his Armie was drawne along by meere affection and good will. Nevertheleffe he found it a very hard matter to perfwade the Greekes to paffe the River of Euphrates. For the very length of the way which they had troden, wearied them with the conceit of the tedious returne. Therefore he was driven, being yet in Cilicia, to feeke excufes, telling them, that Abrocomas, one of the Kings principall Captaines, & his own great enemy, lay by the River, againft whom he requested them to affist him. By fuch devices, and exceffive promife of reward, he brought them to Euphrates; where fome of the Greekes confidering, That who fo paffed the River firft, fhould have the moft thanks, and might fafely returne if the reft fhould refufe to follow them; they entred the Floods, whereby were all finally perfwaded to do as fome had begun: and being allured by great hopes, they refolved to feeke out Artaxerxes, wherefoever he was to be found. The King in the meane time having raifed an army of nine hundred thoufand men, was not fo confident upon this huge multitude, as to adventure them in triall of a plaine battaile. Abrocomas, who with three hundred thoufand men, had under-taken to make good the Streights of Syria, which were very narrow, and fortified with a ftrong wall, and other defences of nature and art, which made the place to feeme impregnable, had quitted the paffage, and retired himfelfe toward the Kings forces, not daring to looke Cyrus in the face, who defpairing to finde any way by Land, had procured the Lacedaemonian fleet, by the benefit whereof to have transported his Army. I doe not finde that this cowardife of Abrocomas, or his Souldiers, who arrived not at the Campe, till five dayes were paff after the battaile, received either punishment, or difgrace; for they, toward whom he with-drew himfelfe, were all made of the fame metall.

Therefore Artaxerxes was upon the point of retiring to the uttermoft bounds of his Kingdom, untill by Teribazus, one of his Captaines, he was perfwaded not to abandon fo many goodly Provinces to the enemy, who would thereby have gathered addition of ftrength, and (which in the fharpe difputation of Title to a Kingdom is moft available) would have grown fuperior in reputation. By fuch advice, the King refolved upon meeting with his brother, who now began to be fecure, being fully perfwaded that Artaxerxes would never dare to abide him in the field. For the King having caft up a Trench of almoft fortie miles in length, about thirty foot broad, and eightene foot deepe, intended there to have encamped: but his courage failing him, he abandoned that place, thinking nothing fo fafe, as to be farre diftant from his enemies.

§. IIII.

The battaile betwene Cyrus and Artaxerxes.

THE Armie of Cyrus having overcome many difficulties of evill wayes, and fcarcitic of victuals, was much encouraged by perceiving this great feare of Artaxerxes; and being paff this trench, marched carelefly in great diforder, having beftowed their Armes in Carts, and upon Beasts of carriage; when on the fudden one of their Vant-cursors, brought newes of the Kings approach. Hereupon with great tumult they armed themselves, & had ranged their battailes in good order upon the fide of the river Euphrates, where they waited for the comming of their enemies, whom they faw not till it was after-noon. But when they faw the cloud of duft raifed by the feete of that huge multitude, which the King drew after him, & perceived by their neere approach how well they were marfhalled, comming on very orderly in f Silence, whereas it had bin expected, that rufhing violently with loud clamours, they fhould have fpent all their force upon the firft brunt; and when it appeared that the fronts of the two Armies were fo unequal in diftance, being all embattailed in one body and fquare, that Cyrus taking his place (as was the Persian manner) in the middeft of his own, did not with the corner, and utmoft point thereof, reach to the halfe breadth of Artaxerxes his battaile, who carried a front proportionable to his number, exceeding nine times that of Cyrus: then did the Greekes begin to diftruff their owne manhood, which was not accuftomed to make proofe of it felfe, upon fuch exceffive oddes. It was almoft incredible, that fo great an Armie fhould be fo eafily chafed. Nevertheleffe, it quickly appeared, that thefe Persians, having learned (contrary to their cuftome) to give charge upon their their enemies with Silence, had not learned (for it was contrary to their nature) to receive a ftrong charge with courage. Upon the very firft offer of on-fet, made by the Greekes, all that beaftly rabble of cowards fled amaine, without abiding the froke, or ftaying till they were within reach of a Dart. The Chariots armed with hookes and fithes (whereof Artaxerxes had two hundred, and Cyrus not twenty) did fmall hurt that day, becaufe the drivers of them leaping downe, fled away on foot. This bafe demeanour of his enemies gave fo much confidence to Cyrus and his Followers, that fuch as were about him forth-with adored him as King. And certainly, the Title had bin affured unto him that day, had not he fought how to declare himfelfe worthy of it, ere yet he had obtained it. For, perceiving that Artaxerxes, who found that part of the field which lay before him void, was about to encompass the Greekes, and to fet upon them in the reare, he advanced with fixe hundred Horfe, and gave fo valiant a charge upon a Squadron of fixe thoufand, which lay before the King, that he brake it, faying the Captaine thereof Artageses, with his owne hands, and putting all the reft to flight. Hereupon his whole company of fixe hundred, very few excepted, began to follow the chafe, leaving Cyrus too ill attended, who perceiving where the King flood in troupe, uncertaine whether to fight, or leave the field, could not containe himfelfe, but faid; I fee the man: and prefently with a fmall handfull of men about him ran upon his brother, whom he ftrake through the Curace, & wounded in the breaft. Having given this froke, which was his laft, he received immediatly the fatall blow, which gave period at once to his ambition and life, being wounded under the eye with a dart, throwne by a bafe fellow; where-with aftonied, he fell dead from his horfe, or fo hurt, that it was unpoftible to have recovered him, though all which were with him, did their beft for his fafetie; not caring afterwards for their owne lives, when once they perceived that Cyrus their Mafter was flaine. Artaxerxes caufed the head and right hand of his brother to be forthwith ftricken off, and fhewed to his people, who now purfuing them, fled apace, calling upon the name of Cyrus, and defiring him to pardon them. But when this great accident had breathed new courage into the Kings troupes, and utterly difmaied fuch Persian Captaines, as were now, even in their owne eyes, no better than rebels; it was not long ere the Campe of Cyrus was taken, being quite abandoned; from whence Artaxerxes making all fpeede, arrived quickly at the quarter of the Greekes, which was about three miles from the place where Cyrus fell. There hee met with Tiffaphernes, who having made way through the battaile of the Greekes, was ready now to joyne with his Mafter in fpoiling their Tents. Had not the newes, which Artaxerxes brought with him of his brothers death, bin fufficient to countervaille all difafters received, the exploit of Tiffaphernes in breaking through the Greekes would have yielded little comfort. For Tiffaphernes had not flaine any one man of the Greekes, but contrariwife, when he gave upon them, they opening their battaile, drave him with great flaughter through them; in fuch wife, that he rather efaped as out of an hard paffage, than forced his way through the Squadron of the Greekes. Hereof the King being informed by him, and that the Greekes, as Mafters of the field, gave chafe to all that came in their fight; they ranged their Companies into good order, and followed after thefe Greekes, intending to fet upon them in the reare. But thefe good Souldiers perceiving the Kings approach, turned their faces, and made head againft him; who not intending to feeke honour with danger of his life, wheeled about and fled, being purfued unto a certaine Village, that lay under a Hill, on the top whereof hee made a ftand, rather in a bravery, than with purpofe to attempt upon thefe bold fellows any further. For he knew well that his brothers death had fecured his eftate, whom hee would feeme to have flaine with his owne hand, thinking that fact alone fufficient to give reputation to his valour; and this reputation he thought that hee might now preterve well enough, fhewing a manly looke halfe a mile off. On the top of this Hill therefore hee advanced his Standard, a golden Eagle difplayed on the top of a Speare. This enfigne might have encouraged his people, had not fome of the Greekes efpyed it, who not meaning that he fhould abide fo neere them, with all their power marched toward him. The King difcovering their approach, fled upon the fpurre; fo that none remained in the place of battaile, fave onely the Greekes, who had loft that day not one man, nor taken any other harme, than that one of them was hurt with an arrow. Much they wondered that they heard no newes of Cyrus, but thinking that he was purfuing the Army, they thought it was fittest for them, having that day done enough, to return to their quarter, and take their Supper, to which they had good appetite, because the expectation of the Kings comming had given them no leisure to dine.

§. V.

The hard estate of the Greekes after the fight; and how Artaxerxes in vaine sought to have made them yield unto him.

IT was now about the setting of the Sunne, and they bringing home darke night with them, found their Campe spoiled, little or nothing being left that might serve for food: so that wanting victuals to satisfie their hunger, they refreshed their weary bodies with sleepe. In the mean season Artaxerxes returning to his Campe, which he entred by Torch-light, could not enjoy the pleasure of his good fortune entire, because he perceived that the baseness of his people, and weakenesse of his Empire, was now plainly discovered to the Greekes: which gave him assurance, that if any of these who had beheld the shamefull demeanor of his Army, should live to carry tidings home, it would not be long ere with greater forces they disputed with him for his whole Signory. Wherefore he resolved, to try all means, whereby he might bring them to destruction, and not let one escape to carry tidings of that which he had scene: to which purpose he sent them a brave message the next morning; charging them to deliver up their Armes, and come to his Gates, to awaite there upon his Mercie. It seemes that he was in good hope to have found their high courages broken, upon report of his brothers death: but he was greatly deceived in that thought. For the Greekes being advertised that morning from Arius, a principall Commander under Cyrus, that his Master being slaine, he had retired himselfe to the place of their last encamping, about eight miles from them, whence intending to returne into Ionia, his meaning was to dislodge the next day, awaiting for them so long if they would joyne with him, but resolving to stay no longer: they sent answer backe to Arius, that having beaten the King out of the field, and finding none that durst resist them, they would place Arius himselfe in the Kings Throne, if he would joyne with them, and pursue the victory. Before they received any reply to this answer, the Messengers of Artaxerxes arrived at the Campe, whose errand seemed to the Captaines very insolent: One told them, that it was not for the Vanquishers to yeelde their Weapons; another, that he would dye ere he yeelded to such a motion; a third asked, whether the King, as having the victory, required their Weapons; if so, why did he not fetch them? or, whether he desired them in way of friendship; for then would they first know, with what courtesie he meant to requite their kindnesse. To this question Phalimus a Gracian, waiting upon Tissaphernes, answered; That the King having slaine Cyrus, knew no man that could pretend any Title to his Kingdom, in the middelt whereof hee held them fast enclosed with great Rivers, being able to bring against them such numbers of men, as they wanted strength to kill if they would hold up their throats; for which cause he accounted them his prisoners. These words, to them, who knew themselves to be free, were nothing pleasant. Therefore, one told Phalimus that having nothing left, but their Armes and Valour, whilst they kept their Armes, their Valour would be serviceable; but should they yeelde them, it was to be doubted, that their bodies would not long remaine their owne. Hereat Phalimus laughed, saying; This young mandid seeme a Philosopher, and made a pretty speech; but that his deepe speculation shewed his wits to be very shallow, if hee thought with his Armes and Valour to prevaile against the great King. It seemes that Phalimus being a Courtier, and employed in a businesse of importance, thought himselfe too profound a States-man, to be cheekt in his Embassage by a bookish discourser. But his wisdom herein failed him. For whatsoever he himselfe was (of whom no more is knowne than that he brought an unhoneest message to his own Countreimen, perswading them basely to surrender their Weapons, and Lives, to the mercilesse Barbarians) this young Scholler by him despised, was that great Xenophon, who, when all the principall Commanders were surprisid by treachery of the Persians, being a private Gentleman, and having never scene the warres before, under-tooke the conduct of the Army, which he brought safe into Greece, freeing it from all those, and from greater dangers than Phalimus could propound. Some there were who promised to be faithfull to the King, as they had bin to Cyrus, offering their service in Egypt, where they thought Artaxerxes might have use of them. But the small answer was, That without Weapons they could neither doe the King good as Friends, nor defend themselves from him as Enemies. Hereupon Phalimus delivered the Kings further pleasure, which was to grant them Truce, whilst they abode where they then were, denouncing Warre if they stirred thence; Whereunto he required their answer. Clearchus the Generall told him, they liked it. How (saith Phalimus) must I understand you? As choosing peace if we stay, or otherwise war, said Clearchus. But whether warre or peace; quoth this politique Embassadour? To whom Clearchus (not willing to acquaint him with their purpose,) Let our doings tell you; and so dismissed him, no wiser than hee came. All that day the Greekes were faine to feed upon their Horses, Ases, and other Beasts, which they roasted with arrowes, darts, and wooden targets, throwne away by the Enemies.

§. VI.

How the Greekes began to returne home-wards.

AT night they took their way towards Arius, to whom they came at mid-night, being forsaken by foure hundred foot, and forty horse, all Thracians, who fled over to the King, by whom how they were entertained, I doe not finde. Like enough it is that they were cut in pieces; for had they bin kindly used, it may well bee thought that some of them should have accompanied Tissaphernes, & served as Stales to draw in the rest. Arius being of too base a temper, and birth, to thinke upon seeking the Kingdome for himselfe, with such assistance as might have given it unto Cyrus, was very well pleased to make covenant with them for mutual assistance unto the last: Whereunto both parts having sworn, he advised them to take another way homeward, which should be somewhat longer, yet safer and fitter to relieve them with victuals, than that by which they came. The next day, having made a wearisome march, and tyred the Souldiers, they found the Kings Army which had coasted them, lodged in certain Villages, where they purposed themselves to have encamped: towards which Clearchus made directly, because he would not seeme by declining them to shew feare, or weakenesse. That the Kings men were contented to remove, and give place to their betters, it cannot be strange to any that hath considered their former behaviour; Nor strange, that the Grecians, being weary and hungry, and lying among enemies in an unknown Country, should bee very fearefull: but it is almost past believe, that the noise which was heard of these poore men, calling one to another tumultuously, as the present condition inforced them to doe, should make the Persians flee out of their Campe, and so affright the great King, that in stead of demanding their Armes, he should crave peace of them. The next day very early, came messengers from Artaxerxes, desiring free access for Embassadors, to treat of peace. Were it not that such particulars do best open the quality of the persons, by whom things were managed, I should hold it fitter, to run over the general passages of those times, than to dwell among circumstances. But surely it is a point very remarkable, That when Clearchus had willed the Messengers to bid the King prepare for battle, because the Greeks (as he said) wanting whereupon to dine, could not endure to heare of truce till their bellies were full; Artaxerxes dissembling the dignity, was contented sweetly to swallow down this pill, sending them guides, who conducted them to a place where was plenty of victuals to relieve them.

§. VII.

How Tissaphernes, under colour of peace, betrayed all the Captains of the Greekes.

HERETO the Greekes, relying upon their own vertue, had rather advanced their affaires, than brought themselves into any Straights or termes of disadvantage. But now came unto them the subtile Foxe Tissaphernes, who circumventing the Chief Commatiders by fine sleights, did mischievously entrappe them, to the extreme danger of the Army: He told them, that his Province, lying neere unto Greece, had caused him greatly to desire, that their deliverance might be wrought by his procurement; knowing well that in time to come, both they, & their Countreimen at home, would not bee unthankfull for such a benefit. Herewithall he forgot not to rehearse the great service that he had done to his Master, being the first that advertised him of Cyrus his intent, and having not onely brought him a good strength of men, but in the day of battaile shewed his face to the Greekes, when all others turned their backs: that he, together with the King, did enter their Campe, and gave chase to the Barbarians that stood on the part of Cyrus. All this (quoth he) did I alledge to the King, entreating that he would give me leave to conduct you safe into Greece; in which suite I have good hope to speede, if you will send a milde answer to him, who hath willed me to aske you, for what cause ye have borne Armes against him. The Captaines hearing this, were contented to give gentle words, which Tissaphernes relating to the King, procured (though very hardly, as he said) that peace should be granted: the conditions whereof were; That they should passe freely through all the Kings Dominions, paying for that they tooke, and committing no spoile: yet that it should be lawfull for them to take victuals by force, in any place that refused to afford them an open Market. Hereupon both parties having sworn, the League was concluded, and Tissaphernes returning to the King to take leave, and end all businesse, came unto them againe after twenty dayes, and then they set forward. This interim of twenty dayes, which Tissaphernes did spend at the Court, ministered great occasion of mistrust to his new Confederates. For besides his long absence, which alone sufficed to breede doubt, the Brethren, and Kindred of Arius, repairing daily to him, and other Persians to his Souldiers, did worke him and them so with assurance of pardon, and other allurements, that he daily grew more strange to the Greekes than formerly he had bin. This caused many to advise Clearchus, rather to passe forward, than to relye upon covenants, and sit still whilst the King layed snares to entrappe them. But he on the contrary perswaded them, to rest contented whilst they were well, and not to cast themselves againe into those difficulties, out of which they were newly freed by the late Treatie; reciting withall their own wants, and the Kings meanes, but especially the Oathes mutually given and taken, wherewith hee saw no reason why the enemy should have clogged himselfe if hee meant mischief, having power enoughto do them harme by a faire and open Warre.

Tissaphernes was a very honourable man (if honour may be valued by greatness and place in Court) which caused his Oath to be the more esteemed; for as much as no enforcement, or base respect, was like to have drawne it from him. But his fallhood was such, both in substance and in successe, as may fitly expound that saying, which proceeded from the fountaine of Truth, I hate a rich man a lyer. A lyer may finde excuse when it growes out of feare: for that passion hath his originall from weaknesse. But when Power, which is a Character of the Almighty, shall be made the supporter of untruth, the fallhood is most abominable; for the offender, like proud Lucifer, advancing his own strength against the divine Justice, doth commit that sinne with an high hand, which commonly produceth lamentable effects, and is followed with sure vengeance. It was not long ere Tissaphernes found means to destroy all the Captaines, whom hee subtilly got into his power by a traine; making the Generall Clearchus himselfe the meane to draw in all the rest. The businesse was contrived thus: Having travailed some dayes together in such wise, that the Persians did not encampe with the Greekes, who were very jealous of the great familiarity, appearing betweene Tissaphernes, & Arius; Clearchus thought it convenient to roote out of Tissaphernes his braines all causes of distrust, whereof many had grown in that short time. To which purpose obtaining private conference with him, he rehearsed the oath of Confederacie, which had past betwene them, shewing how religiously he would keepe it; and repeating the benefits, which the Greekes did receive by the helpe of Tissaphernes, he promised that their love should appeare to him not unfruitfull, if he would make use of their service against the Myssians or Pisidians, who were accustomed to infect his Province; or against the Egyptians, who were then Rebels to the great King. For which cause hee desired him, that whereas all divine and humane respects had linked them together, hee would not give place to any close accusation or suspicion, whereby might grow sudden inconvenience to either of them, upon no just ground. The faithlesse Persian was very much delighted with this speech, which ministered faire occasion to the execution of his purpose. Therefore hee told Clearchus, that all this was by him wisely considered, wishing him further to call to minde how many wayes hee could have used to bring them to confusion, without perill to himselfe, especially by burning the country, through which they were to passe, whereby they might needs needs have perished by meere famine. For which cause he said that it had bin great folly, to seeke by perjurie, odious to God and Man, the destruction of such as were already in his hands. But the truth was, that his owne love to them had moved him to worke their safetie, not onely for those ends which Clearchus had recounted, of pleasures that might redound to himselfe, and the King, by their assistance; but for that hee might by their friendship, hope to obtaine what Cyrus had mist. Finally, he invited the credulous Gentleman to Supper, and sent him away so well assured of his good will, that he promised to bring all the Captaines with him to the same place; where, in presence of them all, Tissaphernes likewise promised to tell openly, which of them had by secret information sought to raise dissention betweene them. Clearchus himselfe being thus deceived, with great importunity drew all the chiefe Commanders, and many of the inferiour Leaders, to repaire with him to the Campe of Tissaphernes, whither followed them about two hundred of the common Souldiers, as it had bin to some common Faire. But being there arrived, Clearchus with other the five principall Coronels, were called into the Tent, the rest staying without, where they had not waited long ere a signe was given, upon which they within were apprehended, and the residue slaine. Forthwith certain bands of Persian Horsemen scoured the field, killing as many Greekes as they met, and riding up the very Campe of the Gracians, who wondred much at the tumult, whereof they knew not the cause, till one, escaping sorely wounded, informed them of all that had bin done. Hereupon the Greekes tooke Armes in haste, thinking that the enemy would forthwith have assailed their Campe. Anon they might perceive the Embassadors of Tissaphernes, among whom were his own brother, and Arius, followed with three hundred Horse, who called for the principall men in the Army, saying, that they brought a message from the King, which Arius delivered to this effect: That Clearchus having broken his faith, and the league made, was justly rewarded with death; that Menon and Proxenus, two other of the five Coronels, for detecting his treacherie, were highly honoured: & finally, that the King required them to surrender their Armes, which were due to him, as having belonged unto his servant Cyrus. When some altercation had followed upon this message, Xenophon told the Embassadors, that if Clearchus had in such sort offended, it was well that hee was in such sort punished: but he willed them to send backe Menon and Proxenus, whom they had so greatly honoured, that by them, as by common friends to both Nations, the Greekes might be advised how to answer the Persian. Hereunto the Embassadors knew not how to frame any reply, and therefore departed without speaking one word more. Clearchus, & the other four were sent to Artaxerxes, by whose commandement their heads were stricken off. I hold it not amisse to prevent the order of time, annexing to this perfidiousnesse of Tissaphernes, the reward which he afterward received. He saw his Province wasted by the Greekes, against whom receiving from his Master convenient aid of men and money, he did so ill manage his affaires, that neither subtiltie, nor perjury (to which he failed not to have recourse) availed him; finally, the King was jealous of his cunning head, and sent a new Lieutenant unto those parts, who took it from his shoulders. Such was the recompence of his treacherie, which made him so mistrusted at home, that the service which he could not doe, he was thought upon private ends to neglect; & so hated abroad, that he knew not which way to flee from the stroke, all the world being shut against him. But now let us returne to the prosperity, wherein he triumphed without great cause, having betrayed a braver man than himselfe, and intending to bring the like mischief upon the whole Armie.

6. VIII.

How Xenophon heartened the Greekes, and in despite of Tissaphernes went off safely.

Great was the heaviness of the Souldiers, being now left destitute of Leaders; and no lesse their feare of the evill hanging over their heads, which they knew not well how to avoide. Among the rest, Xenophon, whose learning supplied his want of experience, finding the deepe sadness of the whole Army to be such as hindered them from taking any course of preventing the danger at hand, began to advise the underunder-officers of Proxenus his companies, whose familiar friend he had been, to bethinke themselves of some means, whereby their safety might be wrought, and the Souldiers encouraged: setting before their eyes whatsoever might serve for to give them hope, and above all, perswading them in no wise to yeeld to the mercy of their barbarous enemies.

Hereupon they desired him to take upon him the charge of that Regiment; and so together with him, the same night calling up such as were remaining of any account, they made choice of the fittest men to succeed in the places of those who were slain, or taken. This being done, and order set downe for disburdening the Armie of all superfluous impediments, they easily comforted themselves for the losse of Tissaphernes his assistance, to hoping to take victuals by force better cheape than he had bin wont to sell them; To which purpose they intended to take up their lodging two or three miles further, among some plentifull Villages, and so to proceed, marching towards the heads of those great Rivers, which lay in their way, and to passe them where they were foordable. Many attempts were made upon them by Tissaphernes, whom they, serving all on foot, were not able to requite for the harme which they received by the Persian Archers, who shot at a farther distance than the Greeks could reach. For this cause did Xenophon provide slings, wherewith hee over-reached the enemy; and finding some Horses fit for service, that were employed among the carriages, he set men upon them; training likewise his Archers to shoot compasse, who had bin accustomed to the point blanke. By these means so did he bear off the Persians who assailed him; and sometimes gave them chase with that band of fittie Horses, which being well backt with a firm bodie of footmen, and secured with troupes of the light-armed-shot and slingers, compelled the enemy to lie a-loof. Tissaphernes not daring to come to handie-gripes with these resolute men, did possesse the tops of mountains, and places of advantage, by which they were to passe. But finally, when their valour made way through all such difficulties, he betook himselfe to that course, which was indeede the surest, of burning the Countrey. With great sorrow did the Greeks behold the Villages on fire, and thereby all hope of victuals cut off. Some advised to defend the Countrey, as granted by the enemy himselfe to be theirs; others to make more fires, if so perhaps the Persians might be ashamed to doe that which was the desire of such as made passage in hostile manner; But these were faint comforts. The best counsel was, that being neare unto the Carduchi, a people enemy to the Persian, they should enter into their Countrey, passing over some high mountains which lay between them. This course they followed, which could not have availed them, if Tissaphernes had begun sooner to cut off their victuals, rather than to seek to force, or to circumvent them by his fine wit.

The difficulties which the Greeke Armie found in passing through the Land of the Carduchi.

ENTring upon the Land of the Carduchi, they were encountered with many difficulties of wayes, but much more afflicted by the fierce inhabitants, who, accustomed by force to defend themselves against the huge Armies of the Persian, were no way inferior to the Greekes in daring, but only in the Art of Warre. They were very light of foot, skilfull Archers, and used the Sling well; which weapons in that mountainous Countrey were of much use against these poore travellers, afflicting them in seven dayes which they spent in that passage, farre more than all the power of the great King had done. Between the Territorie of these Carduchi, and the parts of Armenia confining them, ranne Centrites a great River, upon which the Greeks refreshed themselves one day, rejoicing that they had so well escaped these dangers, and hoping that the remainder would prove easie. But the next morning they saw certaine troupes of Horses, that lay to forbid their passage. These were levied by the Kings detroupees in those parts; Tissaphernes and his Companies having taken their way towards Ionia. The River was broad and deepe, so that it was not possible for such as would enter it, to make resistance against those which kept the opposite banks. To increase these dangers, the Carduchi, following upon them, lay on the side of a Mountaine, within lesse than a mile of the water. But it was their good hap to discover a Foord, by which the greater number of them passing over, did easily chase away the Subjects of the Persian, and then sending backe the most expedite men, gave succour to the Reare-ward, against which the Carduchi being slightly armed, could not on plaine ground make resistance hand to hand. These Carduchi seem to have inhabited the Mountaines of Niphates, which are not farre from the Spring of Tygrus, though Proxenus place them far more to the East upon the River of Cyrrus in Media; wherein he differs much from Xenophon, whose relation being grounded upon his own knowledge, doth best in this case deserve credit. Of the River Centrites (as of many other Rivers, Townes, and Places, mentioned by Xenophon) I will not labour to make a conjecture, which may endure the severity of a Critique. For Proxenus, and the whole Nation of Geographers, adde small light to this expedition: only of this last, I thinke it the same which falleth into Tygrus, not much above Artasagarta, springing out of Niphates, and running by the Towne of Sardeva in Gordene, a Province of Armenia the Great, wherein the Greekes having passed Centrites did arrive.

How Teribazus Governour of Armenia, seeking to entrap the Greekes with termes of fained peace, was disappointed and shamefully beaten.

THE Army finding in Armenia good provision, marched without any disturbance about fitty or threescore miles to the heads of the River Tygrus, and passing over them, travailed as farre further without resistance, till they were encountered by Teribazus at the River Teleboas, which Xenophon commendes as a goodly water, though small, but Proxenus and others omit it. Teribazus governed that Countrey for the Persian, & was great favour with Artaserxes, whose Court may seem to have bin a Schoole, wherein the Art of fallshood was taught as wisdom. He desired peace of the Greeks, which was made upon this condition, that they should take what they pleased, but not burne downe the Townes and Villages in their way. As soone as he had made this league, he levied an Army, and besetting the Streights of certaine Mountaines which they were to passe, hoped well to make such benefit of their security, as might give him the commendation of being no lesse craftily dishonest than Tissaphernes. Yet his cunning failed of successe. For a great snow fell, which caused the Greekes to make many fires, and scatter themselves abroad in the Villages. Teribazus also made many fires, and some of his men wandered about seeking reliefe. By the fires he was discovered, and by a Souldier of his that was taken prisoner, the whole plot was revealed. Hereupon the Greekes, taking this captive with them for a guide, sought him out; & coming upon his Campe, did so affright him, that before the whole Army could arrive there, the shout which was raised by the Vauit-currors, chased him away. They tooke his Pavilion, wherein (besides many slaves, that were Artificers of voluptuousnesse) very rich furniture was left by the treacherous coward, who returned no more to challenge it. From hence the Army went Northward, and passing Euphrates, not far below the Springs thereof, travailed with much difficulty through deepe snow, being followed aloofe by the enemy, who durst not approach them, but did cut off such as they found straggling behinde. The Inhabitants of the Countrey, through which they marched, had their wintering houses under ground, wherein was found great plenty of victuals, and of cattaille, which likewise did winter in the same Cellars with the owners. Having refreshed themselves in those parts, & taken sufficient ease after the miserable journey, which had consumed many of them with extreme cold; they departed, leading with them many bond-slaves & taking away (besides other Horses and Cattaille) some Colts that were bred up for the great King.

§. XI.

The passage of the Army to Trabizonde, through the Countreies bordering upon the River of Phasis, and other obscure Nations.

SO without impediment they came to the River Phasis, neere whereunto the people called Phasiani Tacchi, and Chalybes were seated. These Nations joyned together, and occupying the tops of a ledge of Mountaines, which the Greekes were to passe, made countenance of warre: but some companies being sent by night to seize upon a place of equall height to that whereon the enemies lay, making good the piece of ground which they had taken, secured the ascent of the rest; which caused these people to flye, every one retiring to the defence of his owne. The first upon whose Countreie the Greekes did enter were the Tacchi, who conveying all their provision of victuals into strong holds, brought the Army into much want, untill with hard labour one place was forced, wherein great store of cartails were taken; the people, to avoid captivty, threw themselves head-long downe the rockes, the very women throwing down first their own children, and then casting themselves upon them. Here was taken a great bootie of Cartails, which served to feed them, travailing through the land of the Chalybes, of whom they got nothing but strokes. The Chalybes were a very stout Nation, well armed at all points, and exceeding fierce. They encountered the Greekes hand to hand, killing as many as they tooke prisoners, and cutting off their heads, which they carried away, singing and dancing, to the great griefe of their companions living; who were glad, when after seven dayes journey they escaped from those continuall skirmishes, wherewith they had bin vexed by these Barbarians. Hence travailing through a good come-Countreie, inhabited by an obscure Nation called the Scythini, they came to a rich Towne, the Lord whereof, and of the Region adjoining, used them friendly, and promised to guide them to a Mountaine, whence they might discover the Euxine Sea. From Gymnius (which was the name of his Towne) he led them through the Territorie of his enemies, desiring them to waste it with sword and fire. After five dayes march, they came to a Mountaine called Teches, being (as I thinke) a part of the Mountaines called Moschici, whence their guide shewed them the Sea; towards which they bent their course: and passing friendly through the Region of the Macrones, (with whom by meanes of an interpreter, found among themselves, who borne in that place had bin sold into Greece, they made a good peace) they arrived in the Land of Colchos, wherein stands the Citie of Trabizond, called then Trapezus, a Colonie of the Greekes. The Colchi entertaining them with hostility, were requited with the like; for the Army having now good leisure to repose themselves among their friends the Trapezuntians, did spoile the Countreie thirty dayes together, forbearing onely the Borderers upon Trabizonde, at the Citizens request.

were

§. XII.

How the Army began at Trabizond to provide a Fleet, wherewith to returne home by Sea: how it came into the Territorie of Synope, and there persecuted the same purpose.

Having now found an Haven Towne, the Souldiers were desirous to take shipping, & change their tedious Land-journies into an easie Navigation. To which purpose Cherisophus a Lacedemonian, one of the principall Commanders, promised by meanes of Anaxibius the Lacedemonian Admirall, who was his friend, that he would provide Vessells to imbarke them. Having thus concluded, they likewise tooke order for the staying of such ships as should passe that way, meaning to use them for their navigation. Left all this provision should bee found insufficient for the transportation of the whole Army, Xenophon perswaded the Cities adjoining to cleare the wayes, and make an easie passage for them by Land; whereunto the Souldiers were utterly unwilling to give care, being desirous to returne by Sea: but the Countreie fearing what inconvenience might grow by their long stay, did readily condescend to Xenophons request. Two ships they borrowed of the Trapezuntians, which they manned and sent to Sea: the one of them sailed directly into Greece, forsaking their Companions, who had put them in trust to bring ships into the Port of Trabizonde: the other tooke Merchants and passengers, whose goods were safely kept for the owners, but the Vessells were stayed to increase the fleet. After long aboade, when victuals began to faile, by reason that all the Land of the Colchi, neere unto the Campe was already quite wasted, they were faine to imbarke their sicke men, with the women, children, and such of the baggage as might best be spared, in those few ships which they had already provided. The rest of the Army tooke their way by Land to Cerasus, a Greeke Towne, where the fleet likewise arrived. Here the Army being mustered, was found to consist of eight thousand & sixe hundred men. From hence they passed through the Countreie of the Mesynaci, who were divided divided into factions. The stronger partie, despising their friendship, caused them to joyne them with the weaker, whom they left Masters of all.

The next place of their abode was Cotiyora, a Greeke Towne likewise, & a Colonie of the Synapians, as Trapezus and Cerasus were; but the entertainment which here they found was very churlish, having neither an open Market afforded to them, nor the sicke men that were among them admitted into any house. Hereupon the Souldiers entred the Towne by force, and (committing no outrage) bestowed those which were sicke in convenient lodgings, taking into their own hands the custody of the Gates. Provision for the Army they made by strong hand, partly out of the Territorie of the Paphlagonians, partly out of the Lands belonging to the Towne. These newes were unwelcome to Sinope, whence Embassadours were sent to the Camp, who complaining of these dealings, & threatening to joyne with the Paphlagonians, if redresse could not otherwise be had, were roundly answered by Xenophon, that meere necessity had enforced the Army to teach those of Cotiyora good manners in so bad a methode: letting them know, that he feared not to deal with them & the Paphlagonian at once; though perhaps the Paphlagonian would be glad to take Sinope it selfe, to which, if cause were given, they would lend assistance. Upon this answer the Embassadours grew better advised, promising all friendship that the State of Sinope could shew, and commanding the Towne of Cotiyora to relieve the Souldiers as well as they might. Further, they promised to assist them with shipping, letting them understand how difficult the passage by Land would prove, in regard of the many & great Rivers, as Thermodon, Iris, Halys, and Parthenius, which crossed their way. This good counsaile, and the faire promises accompanying it, were kindly accepted by the Army, which well perceived, that the City of Sinope would spare for no cost, to be freed from such a neighbourhood. It was therefore decreed that they would passe the rest of the way by Sea; provided that if there should want such number of Vessells as might serve to imbarke every one of them, then would they not put from the shore.

§. XIII.

Of dissension which arose in the Armie; and how it was imbarked.

Hitherto the danger of enemies, and miseries of weather and wants, had kept the companie in firme unity; which now beganne to dissolve and to thaw, by the neighbouring aire of Greece, warming their heads with private respects to their severall ends and purposes. Whilest they, who were sent as Agents from the Campe, remained at Sinope; Xenophon considering the strength and valour of his men, & the opportunity of the coast whereon they lay, thought it would be an honourable worke to build a City in those parts, which were soone like to prove great and wealthie, in regard both of their owne puissiance, and of the great repaire of the Greekes into that quarter. For this cause he made sacrifice, according to the superstition of his time and Countreie, divining of his successe by the entrailles of beasts. The Sooth-sayer whom he employed had received a great reward of Cyrus, for conjecturing aright, that Artaxerxes would not give battaile in ten dayes: he therefore, having preserved his money carefully, was desirous to be soone at home, that he might freely enjoy his gettings. By him the purpose of Xenophon was divulged, which was interpreted according to the diversitie of mens opinions; some approving the motion, but the greater part rejecting it. They of Sinope and Heraclea, being informed of this consultation, were sore afraid, lest the poverie of the Souldiers, who had not wherewith to maintaine themselves at home, should give successe to the project. Which to prevent, they promised to supply the Army with a sufficient fleet, and likewise offered mony to some of the Captaines, who thereupon undertooke to give the Souldiers pay, if they would presently set saile for Greece. One of these Captaines being a banished man, desired them to follow him into Trachis; another offered to lead them into Cherronefus. Xenophon, who desired only the common good, was pleased greatly with these propositions, and professed openly that he would have them to set forward, & hold together in any case, punishing him as a traitor that should forsake the Armie, before such time as they were arrived at their journey end. Silanus the Sooth-sayer, who had uttered Xenophons purpose, was hereby staied from out-running his fellowes, and driven to abide with his wealth among poore men, longer than flood food with his good liking. Also the other Captaines were much troubled and affraid, when they perceived, that ships were prepared sufficient for their Navigation, but that the money promised to them, and by them to the Souldiers, came not. For the people of Sinope, and Heraclea, knowing that the Armie was now resolved for the voyage, and that Xenophon, whom they feared, had perswaded them to this resolution, thought it the wisest way to furnish them with a Navie whilst they were in good readinesse, to depart, but to keep the money to themselves. The Captaines therefore, who being disappointed by these townes, found themselves in great danger of their men, whom they had deceived with faire hopes, repented much of their faire offers, & signifying as much to Xenophon, prayed him to make proposition to the Armie, of taking the ships, & saying to Phasis, where they might seize upon Lands, and plant themselves in such wise as should stand best with their good liking. But finding him cold in the businesse, they began to worke the principall of their own followers, hoping by them to draw in all the rest. These newes becomming publike, bred a suspicion of Xenophon, as if he had won the rest of the Captaines to his purpose, and meant now to carry the Army quite another way from their own home. Wherefore assembling the Companies, he gave them satisfaction, and withall complained of some disorders, which he caused them to redresse. A general inquisition was likewise made of offences committed since the death of Cyrus; which being punished, all things were in quiet. Shortly after came Embassadors from Cyrus, Lord of the Paphlagonians, who sending presents, desired peace of the Greeks: the Embassadors were friendly entertained, and peace concluded, which needed not to have bin sought, for that the Greeks, having now their fleet in a readinesse, did soon weigh Anchors, & set saile for Harmene the Port of Sinope, whither Cherisophus came, bringing with him a few Gallies from the Admiral Anaxibius, who promised to give the Army pay as soon as they came into the parts of Greece.

§. XIV.

Another great dissension and distraction of the Army. How the mutiners were beaten by the Barbarians, and rescued by Xenophon.

THE nearer that they approached to Greece, the greater was their desire to make provision for themselves, that they might not returne home empty-handed. Wherefore trusting well that if the charge of the Armie were absolutely committed to one sufficient man, he might the more conveniently procure the good of them all, they determined to make Xenophon sole Commander of all; in whose favour as well the Captaines as the common Souldiers were very earnest and violent. But he, either fearing to displease the Lacedemonians, who were jealous of him already (being incensed by that fugitive who forsooke the army at Trabizond, flying with one of their two ships) or moved by some tokens appearing to him in the entrails that threatened ill successe to his government, procured with vehement contention, that this honour was laid upon Cherisophus a Lacedemonian. It seems that Xenophon, considering the vexation incident to the conduct of a voluntary Army, wanting pay, did wisely in yielding to such tokens as forbade him to accept it: especially, knowing so well their desire, which was, by right or by wrong, to get wealth whersoever it might be found, without all regard of friend or foe. Cherisophus had bin General all but fixe or seven dayes, when hee was depozed, for having bin unwilling to rob the Towne of Heraclea, which had sent presents to the Campe, and bin very beneficiall unto them in lending ships for their transportation. Two daies they had failed by the coast of Asia, when being past those great rivers, which would have given impediment to their journey by Land, they touched at Heraclea, where consulting how to take their way onwards, whether by Land or Sea; one seditious man began to put them in minde of seeking to get som what for themselves; telling them that all their provision would be spent in three dayes, and that being now come out of the enemies Country, victuals and other necessities could not be had without money; for which cause he gave advice to send messengers into the Towne of Heraclea, giving the Citizens to understand what their wants were, and demanding of them three thousand pieces of money, called Cyzicenes, which summe amounteth to two thousand and five hundred pound sterling, or thereabout. This motion was greatly applauded, and the sum raised to ten thousand Cyzicenes at least: which to require, they thought Cherisophus, as being General, the fittest man; others had more desire to send Xenophon: but in vain, for they both refused it, and renounced the action as dishonest. Left therefore either of these should faile in managing the businesse which agreed not with his disposition, others of more impudency and lesse discretion were sent; who in such wise delivered their information, that the Citizens taking time to deliberate upon their request, brought what they could out of the fields into the Towne, and shutting the Gates, did forthwith man the Walls. When the Souldiers perceived themselves to be disappointed of their ravenous purpose, they fell to mutiny, saying, That their Leaders had betrayed them: and being for the more part of them Arcadians and Achaens, they forsook immediately Cherisophus and Xenophon, chusing new Leaders out of their owne number. Above 10 four thousand and five hundred they were, all heavily armed, who electing ten Captains, failed into the Port of Calphas, which is in the mid-way between Heraclea & Byzantium, with purpose to assaile the Bythinians on the sudden. With Cherisophus there abode two thousand and one hundred, of whom one thousand and four hundred were armed weightily: Xenophon had two thousand foot, three hundred whereof were lightly armed, and forty horse; which small band had done good service already, and could not have bin spared now. Cherisophus had agreed with Cleander Governour of Byzantium, to meet him at the mouth of the River Calphas, whither Cleander promised to bring some Gallies to convey him over into Greece; for which cause he rooke his way thither by 20 Land, leaving to Xenophon such shipping as he had, who passing some part of the way by Sea, landed upon the confines of Heraclea, & Thracia Asiatica, intending to make a cut through the mid-land Country to the Propont. The Mutiners who had landed at Calphas by night, with purpose to take spoiles in Bythinia, divided themselves into ten Companies, every Capitaine leading his owne Regiment into some Village, five or six miles from the Sea; in the greater Townes were two Regiments quartered: and so was that part of the Country surpris'd on the sudden, and sacked all at one time. The place of 30 Rendezvous was an high piece of Ground, where some of them arrived, finding no disturbance; others, not without much trouble and danger: two Companies were broken and 30 defeated, only eight men escaped, the rest were all put to the sword. For the Thracians which had slip't at first out of the Souldiers hands, did raise the Country, and finding the Greeks loaden with booty, took the advantage of their disorder, cutting in pieces those two Regiments: which done, they attempted the rest, encompassing the hill wheron they encamped. One great advantage the Thracians had, that being all light armed, they could at pleasure make retreat from these Arcadians & Achaens: who wanting the assistance of horse, & having neither Archers nor Slingers among them, were driven to stand merely upon their defence, bearing off with greater danger, & many wounds received, the Darts & Arrows of the Barbarians, till finally they were driven from their watering place, & 40 enforced to crave parley. Whatsoever the Articles of composition were, the Thracians yielded to all; but pledges for assurance they would give none, without which the Greeks well knew, that all promises of such people, especially so incensed, were nothing worth. In the mean time Xenophon holding his way quietly through the In-land Region, did enquire of some Travellers, whether they knew ought of any Grecian Army, passing along those parts: & receiving by them true information of the desperate case into which these Gallants had foolishly throwne themselves, he marched directly towards the place where they lay, taking with him for guides, them who gave him the intelligence. His horse-men he sent before to discover, & to scowre the waies; the light armed foot-men 50 tooke the hill tops on either hand, all of them setting fire on whatsoever they found combustible: whereby the whole Country seemed to be on a light flame, to the great terror of the enemies, who thought that some huge Army had approached. That night he encamped on a hill, within five mile of the Arcadians, encreasing still the number of his fires, which he caused hastily to be quenched soon after Supper. The enemies perceiving this, thought certainly that he would have fallen upon them in the darke, which caused them in all haste to dislodge. Early in the next morning Xenophon coming thither in 60 very good order, to have given battell, found that his device, to affright the Thracians, had taken full effect; but he marvelled that the Greeks were also departed, concerning whom he learned by enquiry, that they removed at break of day, & perceived by signes that they had taken the way to the Port of Calphas, in which journey he overtook them. They embraced him and his, with great joy: confessing that they themselves had thought the same which the enemies did, looking that he should have come by night; wherein finding themselves deceived, they were affraid left he had forsaken them, and therefore hastened away to overtake him, and joyne with him. So they arrived at the Haven of Calpas, where it was decreed, That whosoever from thenceforth made any motion to dis-joyne the Army, should suffer death.

§. XV.

Of divers pieces of service done by Xenophon; and how the Army returned into Greece. The occasions of the War between the Lacedæmonians and the Persians.

THe Haven of Calpas lay under a goodly head-land, that was very strong, and abounding with all kinde of Graine and Fruits, except Olives. There was also Timber for building and shipping, and a very convenient Sea for a great City. All which commodities that might have allured the Souldiers to stay there, and to plant, caused them to haste away, fearing lest Xenophon should finde some device to have seized himselfe and them in that place. For the greater part of them had good meanes to live at home; neither did they so much for hope of gaine follow Cyrus in that War, as in regard of his Honour, and the love which they bare unto him: the poorer sort were such as left their Parents, Wives, and Children, to whom (though failing of the riches which they had hoped to purchase) they were now desirous to returne. But whether it were so that Xenophon found advantage by their owne superstition, to make them stay, which they greatly suspected; or whether the signes appearing in the entrails, did indeed forbid their departure: so long they were enforced to abide in the place till victuals failed; neither would the Captaines lead them forth to forrage the Country, until the Sacrifices should promise good successe. Cherisophus was dead of an Ague, and his ships were gone, being returned to the Hæracleans, of whom they were borrowed. His followers were joyned to the rest of the Armie, which the greater it was, the more provision it needed, and the sooner felt want. For which cause, he that was chosen Coronell into the place of Cherisophus, would needs adventure to gratifie the Souldiers with the spoile of some Villages that stood near at hand; in which enterprife he found ill successe, so the whole Country lying in wait to entrap him, and an Army of Horse being sent by Pharnabazus the Satrap, or Vice-roy of Phrygia, and the assistance of these Bythinian Thracians, which troupes falling upon the Greeks that were scattered abroad in seeking booty, slew five hundred of them, and chased the rest to a certaine Mountaine there by. The newes of this overthrow comming to Xenophon, he led forth a part of the Army to the rescue of those that survived, and brought them safe to the Campe; upon which the Bythinians made an offer that night, and breaking a Corps du garde, slew some, pursuing the rest to the very Tents. This new courage of the enemy, together with the present condition of the Army, so disheartened and unfurnished of necessaries, caused the Greeks to remove their Camp to a place of more strength; which having intrenched, and committed to the defence of such as were least able to endure travell, Xenophon with the firmest and best able men went forth, both to bury those which were lately slaine, and to abate the pride of the Thracians, and their assistants. In this journey his demeanour was very honourable. For having given buriall to the dead, the Enemy was discovered, lying on the tops of the hills adjoining, to whom (notwithstanding that the way was very rough and trouble some, so that some thought it a matter of too great danger, to leave at their backs a wood scarce passeable) he marched directly, telling his men plainly, that he had rather follow the enemy with halfe the number, than turn his back to them with twice as many; & letting them further know, that if they did not charge the Barbarians, he would not faile with the greater resolution to pursue them; from whom if they could safely retire to the campe, yet what should they do there, wanting victuals to sustain them in the place, and ships to carry them away? Wherefore he willed them rather to fight well that day, having eaten their dinners, than another day fasting; and not to regard the uneasy returne, which might serve to stay Cowards from running away, but to wish unto the Enemy a faire and easie way, by which he might flye from them. These persuasions were followed with so valiant execution, that both Persians and Bythinians being chased out of the field, abandoned the Country forthwith, removing their Families, and leaving all that could not suddenly be conveyed away, to the discretion of the Greekes, who at good leasure gathered the Harvest of these bad Neighbours fields. This was the last fight which they had on the side of Asia. For they were not only suffered quietly to enjoy the spoyle of the Country, but when the opinion grew common in those parts, that it was the intent of Xenophon to plant a Colony in the Port of Calpas, Embassadors were sent from the Neighbour people, to desire friendship, and make offer of their best assistance. But the Souldiers had no minde to stay. Wherefore entring further into Bythinia, they tooke a great booty, which they carried away unto Chrysopolis, a city near unto Chalcedon, where they sold it. Pharnabazus, Lieutenant in Phrygia to Artaxerxes, did greatly feare, lest their long stay in that Country might breed in them a desire to visite his Province, where they might have found great wealth, and little power to guard it. Therefore he sent to the Lacedæmonian Admirall, entreating him with much instance and large promises to waite them over into Europe; to whom Anaxibius the Admirall condescending, promised to give the Souldiers pay, as soon as they arrived at Byzantium. So were they carried out of Asia at the intreaty of the Persian, who in the height of his pride had thought them so surely imprisoned with mighty Rivers, that he not onely denied to permit their quiet departure, but willed them to surrender their Armes into his hands, and so to yeeld their lives to his discretion. How discourteously they were intreated by Anaxibius, and how to require his injurious dealings, they seized upon Byzantium, which by Xenophons persuasion they forbore to sacke; I hold it superfluous to relate. For the residue of their doings appertain little to the generall course of things. But this expedition, as in all ages it was glorious, so did it both discover the secrets of Asia, and stirre up the Greekes to thinke upon greater enterprises, than ever their forefathers had undertaken. Likewise it was the only remarkable action which the time afforded. For the Roman Warres did hitherto extend no further than to the next neighbouring Townes of Italy; and in Greece all things were quiet, the Lacedæmonians ruling insolently, but without disturbance. True it is, that the seedes of the Warre shortly following, which the Lacedæmonians made upon Artaxerxes, were already sowne, before these companies returned out of the high Countreys of Asia. For the Townes of Ionia which had sided with young Cyrus against Tissaphernes, if not against the great King, prepared to rebell; which they thought safer, than to fall into the hands of Tissaphernes, who was now appointed Lieutenant, both of his old Province, and of all that had belonged to Cyrus. Wherefore the Ionians besought the Lacedæmonians to lend them aid, whereby to recover their liberty; and obtained their request. For a power was sent over, under conduct of Timbro a Spartan, who bestowed his men in such Towns as had already revolted, to secure the Cities and their Fields, but not to make any offensive War.

CHAP. XI.

Of the affaires of Greece, whilest they were managed by the Lacedæmonians.

§. I.

How the Lacedæmonians tooke courage by example of Xenophons Army, to make Warre upon Artaxerxes.

IT seems that the Lacedæmonians did well perceive in how ill part Artaxerxes tooke their favour shewed unto his brother, and yet were timorous in beginning an open war against him, thinking it sufficient to take all care that no advantage might slip, which could serve to strengthen their Estate, by finding the Persian worke beyond the Sea. But when Xenophons Army had revealed the baseness of those effeminate Asiaticques, and rehearsed the many victories which they themselves had gotten, upon termes of extreme disadvantage; then was all Greece filled with desire of undertaking upon this huge unwieldy Empire, thinking it no hard matter for the joynt forces forces of that whole Nation, to hew out the way to Susa, whereof one handfull had opened the passage to Babylon; and further, finding no power that was able to give them resistance, in all that long journey of foure and thirty thousand two hundred and fifty five furlongs, spent in going and returning, which make of English miles about four thousand two hundred fourescore and one, a very painful march of one yeare and three monthes. Nevertheless, the civil distraction wherewith Greece was miserably torn, and especially that hot fire of the Theban war, which kindled with Persian gold, brake forth suddenly into a great flame, drew back out of Asia the power of the Lacedæmonians, to the defence of their owne Estate; leaving it questionable, whether Agessilas having both the same and far greater forces, could have wrought proportionable effects. Sure it is, that in the whole space of two yeares, which he spent in Asia, his deeds procured more commendation of magnanimity and faire behaviour, than of stout courage, and great, or profitable achievements. For how highly soever it pleased Xenophon, who was his friend, and follower in this, and in other wars, to extoll his vertue; his exploits being only a few incursions into the Countreys lying neare the Sea, carrying no proportion to Xenophon's owne journey, which I know not whether any Age hath paralleled: the famous retreat of Conon the Briton with fixe thousand men from Aquileia, to his owne Countrey, through all the breadth of Italy, and length of France, in despite of the Emperour Thiodosius, being rather like it than equall. But of Agessilas and his wars in Asia and Greece, we shall speake more in due place.

§. II.

The prosperous beginnings of the warre in Asia.

Thimbro receiving Xenophon's men, began to take in Townes, and to entertaine all such as were willing to revolt from the Persian, who were many, and some of them such, as had beene highly beholding to the King; who seeme to have had no other cause of discontent, than that they were to live under the government of Tissaphernes, whom all others did as vehemently hate, as the King his Master did love him. The manging of the warre begun by Thimbro, was for his oppressions taken out of his hands, and committed to Dercyllidas a Spartan, who behaved himselfe as a good man of War, and a wise Commander. For whereas the rule of the low-Countreys of Asia was divided between Pharnabazus and Tissaphernes, who did ill agree, Pharnabazus being the worthier man, but the other by his Princes favour the greater, and having the chiefe command in those Wars against the Greekes; Dercyllidas, who did beare a private hatred to Pharnabazus (knowing well that Tissaphernes was of a mischievous nature, and would not be sorry to see his Corrivall thoroughly beaten, though to the Kings losse) made an appointment with Tissaphernes, and forthwith entred Eolis, which was under the jurisdiction of Pharnabazus, which Province in few dayes, he brought into his owne power.

That Countrey of Eolis had about the same time suffered a violent alteration, which gave easie successe to the attempts of Dercyllidas. Zenis a Dardanian had bin Deputy to Pharnabazus in those parts; after whose death his wife Mania procured his Office, wherein he behaved himselfe so well, that he not only was beloved of the people under her government: but enlarged her Territory, by the conquest of certaine Townes adjoining; and sundry times gave assistance to Pharnabazus in his Wars against the Mytians and Persians. For shee had in pay some Companies of Greekes, whose valour by her good usage, did her great service. But somewhat before the arrivall of Dercyllidas in those parts, a Sonne-in-law of hers, called Midias, whom she trusted and loved much, being blinded with ambition, found means to fiske her, and kill her sonne of seventeen yeares old; which done, he seized upon two of her principall Townes, wherein her treasure lay, hoping to have beene admitted into possession of her whole estate. Being denyed entrance by her Souldiers that lay in Garrison, he sent Messengers with presents to Pharnabazus, desiring him to make him Governour in the place of Mania. His presents were not only rejected by Pharnabazus, but revenge of his foule treason threatened, whereby the wicked villaine was driven into termes of almost utter desperation. In the meane time came Dercyllidas, to whom the Townes of Mania, that held against Midias, did quickly open their Gates. One only Towne stood out foure dayes (against the will of the Citizens, who were covetous of liberty) the Governour striving in vaine to have kept it to the use of Pharnabazus. Now remained only two Cities, Gergethe and Scepsis, which the Traytor held, who tearing all men, as being loved of none, sent Embassadors to Dercyllidas, desiring leave to speake with him, and pledges for his security: upon the delivery of which, he issued out of Scepsis, and comming into the Camp, made offer to joine with the Greekes upon such conditions as might seeme reasonable. But he was plainly told by Dercyllidas, that other condition there was none, than to set the Citizens freely at liberty. And presently upon these words they marched toward Scepsis. When Midias perceived that it was in vaine to strive against the Army, and the Town-men, who were all of one minde; he quietly went along with Dercyllidas, who to remaining but a few houres in the City, did a sacrifice to Minerva, & then leading away the Garrison of Midias, he left the City free, and departed toward Gergethe. Midias did not forsake his Company, but followed him, earnestly intreating that he might be suffered to retaine Gergethe: but comming to the Gates, he was bidden to command his Souldiers that they should be opened; for (quoth Dercyllidas) I must here likewise doe a sacrifice to Minerva. The Traytor not daring to make deniall, caused his Mercenaries to open the Gates, whereby Dercyllidas, taking possession of the place, tendred pay to the Garrison, who did not refuse to serve under his Ensignes. This done, all the goods of Mania were seized upon, as belonging to one that had beene subject to Pharnabazus, who was enemy to the Greekes: and so the murderous wretch was sent away naked, not knowing in what part of the World he might finde any place to hide his detested head. Dercyllidas having in eight dayes taken nine Cities, purposed for the ease of his Confederates to winter in Bythnia, to which end he tooke Truce with Pharnabazus, who had not any desire of Warre. That Winter, and the Summer ensuing, the truce being recontinued, held; in which time, besides the wasting of Bythnia, the neck of Land joining Cherronea to the Main, was fortified, being foure or five miles in breadth; by which means eleven Towns, with much good Land belonging to them, were freed from the incursions of the wilde Thracians, and made fit and able to victual the Camp. Likewise the Citie of Atarne was taken, which was of great strength, and very well stored with provision. After this, Dercyllidas had command from Sparta, to divert the Warre into Caria, where was the seat of Tissaphernes; for that hereby it was thought not unsafe to recover all the Towns of Ionia; Pharax the Admirall of the fleet (which was a yearly office) being appointed to joine with him. Though it was manifest that Tissaphernes had neglected Pharnabazus in time of necessity, yet was he not in his owne danger requited with the like. For Pharnabazus, having respect to the Kings service, came to assist his private enemy Tissaphernes, and so passing into Caria, they thrust Garrisons into all places of strength; which done, they marched towards Ionia, hoping to finde the Townes ill manned for resistance. As these Persians were desirous to keepe the Warre from their owne dores, so was Dercyllidas willing to free his Confederates the Ionians from the spoile and danger of the War, by transferring it into Caria. For which cause he passed the River of Meander, and not looking to have beene so soon encountered, marched carelessly through the Country: when on the very sudden the whole Army of Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus was discovered, consisting of Persians, Carians, and some Mercenary Greekes, who were all marshalled in very good order to present battell. The odds was too apparent, both in numbers of men, and in readinesse, as also in advantage of ground: for the Persian had a great multitude of Horse, the Greeke very few and feeble, being to fight in an open plaine. Therefore all the Ionians, together with the Islanders and others, of such places as bordered upon the Kings Dominions, did either betake themselves to present flight; or abiding a while for shame, did plainly discover by their looks, that they meant not to be more bold than wife. Only Dercyllidas with his Peloponnesians regarding their honour, prepared to endure the fight: which must needs have brought them to destruction, if the counsell of Pharnabazus had been followed, who perceiving the opportunity of so great a victory, was not willing to let it slip. But Tissaphernes, who naturally was a coward, seeing that countenance of resistance was made, began to consider what strange defence the Souldiers of Xenophon had shewed, and thinking that all the Greekes were of like resolution, held it the wisest way to crave parley; the conclusion of which was, That a Truce should be made, to last until Tissaphernes might receive answer from the King, & Dercyllidas from Sparta, concerning the demands propounded in the Treaty; which were on the one part, That all the Greeks in Asia might enjoy their owne liberty and lawes; but contrariwise on the other side, That the Lacedæmonians should depart Asia, and leave the Towns to the Kings pleasure. This Treaty was of none effect; only it served to free the Greeks from the present danger, and to gaine time unto Tissaphernes, who desired to avoid the War by procrastination, which he durst not adventure to finish by tryall of a battell.

§. III.

How the Lacedæmonians took revenge upon the Eleans for old displeasure. The discontent of the Corinthians and Thebans, conceived against the State of Sparta.

IN the meane season the Lacedæmonians, who found none able to withstand them in Greece, began to call the Eleans to accompt for some disgraces received by them during the late Warres, when leasure was wanting to the requitall of such petty injuries. These Eleans being Presidents of the Olympique games, had set a fine upon the City of Sparta, for Non-payment of which, they forbade them to come to the solemnity; and publicly whipt one of them that was of note, for presuming to contend against their decree. Likewise they hindered Agis King of Sparta, from doing sacrifice to Jupiter; and in all points used great contempt toward the Spartans, who now had no business that could hinder them from taking revenge: and therefore sent a peremptory message to the Eleans, commanding them to set at liberty the Cities which they held in subjection. This was the usuall pretence which they made the ground of all their Wars: though little they cared for the liberty of such Townes, which they caused afterwards to become followers, and little better than mere Vassals of the Lacedæmonians. In their late Wars with Athens, the strong opposition which they found, caused this goodly Title of liberty to work very slowly: but having now to doe with a State of great spirit and small force, it gave present successe to their desires. Two years together they sent an Army into the Countrey of the Eleans: the first year an Earth-quake (held in those times a prodigious signe, and which did alwayes forbid the prosecution of any enterprize in hand) caused them to retire: the second year, all the Townes of the Eleans did hastily revolt, and the City it selfe was driven to submission; consenting both to suffer their old subjects freely to enjoy their liberty, and to have her owne Walls throwne downe. Only the Presidentship of the Olympian games was left unto them, which it was not to be doubted that they would in time comming use modestly, finding themselves to stand at the mercy of Sparta. In this expedition all the Greeks were assitant to the Lacedæmonians, excepting the Corinthians and Boeotians, whose ayd having bin of as much importance in the late Peloponnesian War, as the force of Sparta it selfe, they could not smother their dislike of their unequal division following the victory; which gave to Sparta the command of all Greece; to Thebes and Corinth, onely security against Athens, but such a security as was worke than the danger. For when the equall greatnesse of two mighty Estates did counterpoise each the other, it was in the power of these Neutrall Common-wealths to adhere to either, as the condition of their affaires required; but when to revenge injuries, they had by mortall hatred prosecuted the Warre to extremity, leaving the one City naked of power and friends, the other mightily increased in both; it was then (if not necessary to obey the greatnesse which themselves had made, yet) foolish and dangerous to provoke it. Nevertheless, it was not the purpose of the Spartans to take occasion of any quarrell, which they could not finish at pleasure, till such time as they had by victory or composition made some good end with the Persian, toward whom they bent all their care and forces.

§ IV. The

§. IIII.

The passage of Agesilaus into Asia. His Warre with Tissaphernes. How Tissaphernes was put to death; and the Warre diverted into another Province, through perswasion and gifts of Tithraustes his successeur. How carelesse the Persian Lieutenants were of the Kings good.

Agesilaus newly made King of Sparta, was desirous to have the honour of the victory, which not without cause, he expected upon those of Asia; and therefore procuring a great Army to join with that of Dyrclidas, he took his way in great pompe to Aulis in Boeotia, a Haven lying opposite to the Iland of Eubœa; in which place Agamemnon (leading the power of all Greece to the war against Troy, many Ages before) had imbarked his men. In imitation of Agamemnon, he meant also to doe sacrifice in Aulis, which the Thebans, Lords of that Countrey, would not permit, but saying, that the performance of such ceremonies in that place, belonged unto their Officers; they were so unable to conceale their malice, that sending some Companies of horse, they threw downe his sacrifice from the Altar. It was not then convenient time for Agesilaus to entangle himselfe and his Countrey in a new Warre; therefore waiting better opportunity of revenge, he quietly swallowed the contumely, and followed his maine intendment. Having landed his men at Ephesus, he was entertained by Tissaphernes with a Treaty of peace, wherein Agesilaus peremptorily requiring that the Persian should restore to liberty all the Greek Townes in Asia, was promised that the King, being first informed of his demand, should send answer to his good liking, if he would in the meane while make Truce. Truce was therefore made, which Tissaphernes had sought, only to win time of making provision for the War, and getting supply of men and money from Artaxerxes; whilest Agesilaus was busie in settling the estates of his confederate cities on that side of the Sea. The end of this long vacation from war was at the coming downe of these forces which Artaxerxes had sent: at what time Agesilaus received a plain message from Tissaphernes, that either he must forthwith depart out of Asia, or make good his abode by strong hand. Agesilaus returning word, that hee was glad to heare that his enemies had by perjury deserved vengeance from heaven, prepared to invade them; and sending word to all the Townes which lay betweene him and Caria, that they should provide victuals & other necessaries for his Army, did easily make Tissaphernes beleve, that his intent was to invade that Province wherein Tissaphernes dwelt, and which was unfit for Horse, in which part of his forces the Persian had most confidence. Therefore Tissaphernes bestowing all his Companies off foot in Caria, entred with his horse into the plains of Maander, hoping thereby to stop the passage of a heave foot-army, not suffering them to passe into that Countrey which was fittest for their service. But the Greeks left him waiting there in vaine, and marched directly into Phrygia, where they tooke a great spoile without resistance, till such time as the Horse-men of Pharnabazus met him, who in a small skirmish having the better of the Greeks, were the occasion that Agesilaus returned to Ephesus. Although in this last fight only twelve men were lost, yet Agesilaus perceiving by that tryall how hard it would be to prevaile, and hold the mastery of the field, without a greater strength of Horse, tooke all possible care to increase that part of his forces. By which meanes having enabled himselfe, whilest winter lasted, he entred upon the Countrey of Tissaphernes, as soone as the season of the year would permit, and not only took a great booty, but finding the Horse-men of Tissaphernes in the plaine of Maander, without assistance of their infantry, he gave them battell, and had a great victory, taking their campe, in which he found great riches. The blame of this losse fell heavie upon Tissaphernes, who either upon cowardise had absented himselfe from the battell, or following some other business, was then at Sardis. For which cause his Master having him in distrust, and thinking that peace might be the sooner had, which he much desired, if the man, so odious to the whole Nation of the Greeks, were taken out of the way, he sent into those parts Tithraustes a Persian, to cut off the head of Tissaphernes, and successe him in the government. Such was the end of this base and cowardly Politician, who little caring to offend Heaven, when by perjury he could advance his purposes on Earth, failed at the last through too much over-weening of his owne wisdom, even in that part of cunning wherein he thought himselfe most perfect; for supposing posing, that by his great skill in subtile negotiation he should one way or other circumvent the Greeks, and make them wearie of Asia; he did not seeke to finish the war, and according to his Masters wish, bring all things speedily to quiet, but rather to temporize, till he might finde some opportunitie of making such end as best might stand with the Kings honour and his owne. Wherein it seemes that he much mistooke his Princes disposition, who though he had highly rewarded him for the aide which he did bring in his time of danger, yet would he much more gladly have taken it, if he could have found such meanes whereby the danger it selfe might have beene avoided: as not loving to have warre, whilest by any conditions (honourable or not) he might obtain peace. And this appeared well by the course which Tithraustes took at his first possession of the low Countries. For he sent Embassadors to Agessilus, in very friendly sort, letting him know, that the man who had been Author of the warre, was now taken out of the way; and that it was the Kings pleasure to let the Greekes enjoy their owne lawes and libertie, upon condition, that they should pay him the tribute accustomed, and the Armie be forthwith dismissed. The answer to this proposition, was by Agessilus referred to the Council of Sparta; in the meane season he was content to transerre the war into the Province of Pharnabazus, at the request of Tithraustes, who bought his departure with thirtie Talents.

This was a strange maner of Warre, both on the offensive and on the defensive part. For Agessilus having entertained great hopes of vanquishing the great King, was contented to forbear his severall Provinces, at the entreatie of the Lieutenants: and those Lieutenants being employed by the King to maintaine his Estates against all enemies (wherein if they failed, they knew that their heads might easily be taken from their shoulders) were little offended at any losse that fell on their next Neighbour-Princes, which were subject like wife to the same Crowne of Persia, so long as their owne government could be preserved free from waite and danger. The cause of this disorder on the Persian side, I can ascribe to nothing so deservedly, as to the corrupted estate of the Court, wherein Eunuchs, Concubines, and ministers of pleasure, were able by partiall construction to countenance, or disgrace, the actions of such as had the managing of things abroad; and to that foolish manner of the Kings (which was so usual that it might be called a rule) to reward or punish the Provinciaall Governour, according to the benefit or losse, which the Countrey, given in charge unto each of them, received, during the time of his rule. Whereby it came to passe, that as every one was desirous to make his owne Territorie yeeld a large increase to the Kings treasure, so no man was carefull to assist his borderers, if losse or danger might thereby grow to himselfe & his; but sat still as an idle beholder, when perhaps by joyning their forces, it had not bin uneasy to recompence the spoile of one Countrey, by conquering another, or defending a third from far greater miseries.

§. V.

The War and Treatie betwene Agessilus and Pharnabazus.

Agessilus having thus compounded with Tithraustes, entred Phrygia, burning and wasting the Country without resistance. He tooke the Palace of Pharnabazus, and by his Lieutenant drave him out of his Campe. These actions, together with his honourable behaviour, which added much to their lustre, were more glorious than profitable. For he did not twin Cities and Places of strength, which might have increased his power, and given assurance to the rest of his proceedings: but purchased fame and high reputation, by which he drew unto him some that were discontented and stood upon bad termes with the great King; whom he lost againe as easily, by means of some sleight injury done to them by his under-Captaines. Pharnabazus did not enclose himselfe in any Towne, for feare of being besieged, but kept the field, lying as neare as he could safely to the enemies, with whom it was not his purpose to fight, but to make some good end by composition, which he found not uneasy to doe. For the pleasures, by him formerly done to the State of Sparta, in the times of their most necessity, had been so great, that when he (obtaining parley) did set before their eyes his bounty towards them, and his love which had been such, that besides many other hazards of this person, he had for the rescue of their fleet when it was driven to run a shore at Abydus, advenadventured to ride into the Seas as far as he could finde any ground, and fight on horse-backe against the Athenians) together with his faith which had never beene violated in word or deed: they knew not how to excuse their ingratitude, otherwise than by telling him, That having War with his Master, they were enforced against their will, to offend him. Agessilus did make a faire offer to him, that if he would revolt from the King to them, they would maintaine him against the Persian, and establish him free Prince of the Country wherein he was at that time only Deputy to Ariaxerxes. But Pharnabazus told him plainly, That if the King his Master did put him in trust to make war against him, he would not faile to doe the best that he could as their enemy; if the charge were taken out of his hand, and he commanded to obey another, he would then shift side, and betake himselfe to their alliance. The issue of this parley was, That the Armie should no longer abide in Phrygia, nor againe returne into it, whilest employment could be found elsewhere. The excuse made by Agessilus, and the withdrawing of his forces out of those parts, were not sufficient to appease Pharnabazus, whom he had not invaded for want of more necessary businesse elsewhere; but because his Country would yeeld great booty, and for the hire of thirty Talents. By this means the Lacedaemonians changed an honourable Friend into a hot Enemy, who afterwards required their unthankfulness with full revenge.

§. VI.

The great commotions raised in Greece by the Thebans and others, that were hired with gold from the Persian.

IN the meane while Tithraustes, perceiving that Agessilus meant nothing lesse than to returne into Greece, and let Ariaxerxes rest quietly in Asia, tooke a wife courtesie, whereby the Citie of Sparta was not onely driven to looke to her owne, and give over her great hopes of subverting the Empire, but was beaten out of all that had been gotten by many late victories, and saw her Dominion restrained unto the narrow bounds of her owne Territory. He sent into Greece fifty talents of silver, to be employed in raising war against the Lacedaemonians; which treasure was by the subtile practice of him that was put in trust with it, in such wise dispersed among the principall men of the Thebans, Argives and Corinthians, that all those Estates having formerly borne secrete hate to that of Sparta, were now desirous of nothing so much, as of open war. And lest this great heate of the incensed multitude should, for want of present exercise, begin to faine and vanish away in idle words, occasion was found out to thrust the Lacedaemonians into Armes, that they themselves might seem Authors of the quarrell. Some land there was in the tenure of the Locrians, to which the Thebans had in former time layd claim; but the Phocians either having the better title, or finding the greater favour, had it adjudged unto them, and received yearly mony for it. This mony the Locrians were either hired or perswaded to pay now to the Thebans, who readily accepted it. The Phocians not meaning so to lose their Rent, made a distresse by strong hand, recovering a great deale more than their owne; which the Thebans (as in protection of their new Tenants) requited with an invasion made upon Phocis, wasting that Country in the maner of open war. Such were the beginnings of professed hostility between Thebes & Sparta, & the first breaking out of their close enmity, that had long time, though hardly, bin concealed. For when the Phocian Embassadors came to Sparta, complaining of the violence done by the Thebans, & requesting succour, they had very favourable audience, & ready consent to their suit; it being the manner of the Lacedaemonians to deferre the acknowledgment of injuries received, until occasion of revenge were offered, & then to discover so their indignation in cold blood. At this time they had very good opportunity to worke their owne wils, having no other war to disturbe them in Greece, and hearing out of Asia no news that could offend or trouble them. Wherefore they sent Lyfander to raise all the Countries about Phocis, and with such forces as he could levie, to attend the coming of Paulanias King of Sparta (for Sparta, as hath bin shewed before, had two Kings) who should follow him with the strength of Peloponnesus. Lyfander did as he was appointed, & being of great reputation in those parts, he drew the Orchomenians to revolt from Thebes. Paulanias likewise raised all Peloponnesus, except the Corinthians (who refused to assist him in that enterprize) meaning to joyn with Lyfander, & make a speedy end of the war. The consideration of so great a danger, approaching so swiftly, caused the Thebans to seeke what helpe they could abroad, for as much as their own strength was far too little to make resistance against such mightie preparations. It was not unknown to them, that many followers of the Lacedæmonians were otherwise affected in heart than they durst utter in countenance; but the good wishes of such people were little available, considering that the most which could be expected from them, was, that they should doe as little hurt as they could by which manner of tergiversation, the Corinthians did at that present cast themselves into the displeasure of the Spartans, to the no great benefit of Thebes. Wherefore it was thought the safest course, to procure the assistance of some Estate that might presently declare it selfe on their side, which would cause many others to follow the example, and make their partie strong. To this end they sent Embassadors to Athens, excusing old offences, as either not committed by publike allowance, or done in time of the generall warre, and recompensed with friendship lately showne in their refusal of assisting Pausanias, when he came in behalfe of the thirtie Tyrants against the good Citizens of Athens. In regard of which, and for their owne Honour sake, they requested them of aide in the present warre, offering to doe the best that they could for the restoring of Athens to her former estate and dignitie. Thrasibulus and his Friends, who persecuted by the thirtie, had been well entertained at Thebes, procured now the Citie to make a large requittall of the courtesie which they had received. For it was decreed, that the State of Athens should not only refuse to aide the Lacedæmonians in this Warre; but that it should assist the Thebans, and engage it selfe in their cause. Whilest Pausanias lay still, waiting the arrivall of his Confederates; Lysander being desirous to doe somewhat that might advance the businesse in hand, came to Halimtus, where though Pausanias did not meet him, as had been appointed, yet he attempted the Towne, and was slaine in fight by the Thebans, who came hastily to the rescue. As this victorie did encourage the Thebans, so the comming of Pausanias with his great Armie did againe amaze them, with presentation of extreme danger; but their spirits were soon revived by the strong succour which was brought from Athens, in consideration of which, and of the late battell, Pausanias durst not hazzard a new fight with them, but receiving the bodies of those that were slaine, by composition, departed out of their Territory; for which, either cowardise or indiscretion, he was at his return to Sparta condemned as a Traitor, and driven to flie into Tegæa, where he ended his daies in banishment.

§. VII.

How Agesilaus was called out of Asia to help his Country. A victory of the Spartans. Conon the Athenian, assisted by Pharnabazus, overcomes the Lacedæmonian Fleet; recovers the mastery of the Seas, and rebuilds the walls of Athens.

THIS good successe, and the confederacy made with Athens, gave such reputation to the Thebans, that the Argives, Corinthians, Eubœans, Locrians, and Acarnanes, did forthwith side with them, and raising a strong Army, determined to give battell to the Lacedæmonians as neare as they might, to their owndores; considering that the force of Sparta it selfe was not great, but grew more and more by the adjunction of their Confederates. The Magistrates of Sparta perceiving the danger, sent for Agesilaus, who readily obeyed them, and promising his friends in Asia to return speedily to their assistance, passed the Streights of Hellepont into Europe. In the mean time the Cities of the new league had given battell to the Lacedæmonians, & the remainder of their Associates; but with ill successe. For when the right wing of each part had gotten the better hand, the Argives & Thebans returning from the chase in some disorder, were broken & defeated by the Lacedæmonians, who meeting them in good order, won from them the Honour which they had gotten by forcing the left wing of the Lacedæmonians, and made the victory of that day entirely their own. The reporters of this battell meeting Agesilaus at Amphipolis, were by him sent over into Asia, wherein it is not likely that they brought much comfort unto his friend, who had since his departure seen the Spartan Fleet beaten, and Lysander the Admirall slaine. The same man, whose endeavour had brought the Athenians into order by advancing the Sea-forces of the Lacedæmonians with money, and all manner of supplies, was now the occasion that the power power of Athens grew strong at Sea, when the Citie was dispoyled of her old reputation, & scarcely able to maintain an Army by Land for her defence. Pharnabazus considering how much it imported the king his Master, to have the Greeks divided into such factions as might utterly disable them from undertaking abroad, thought it the safest way for himselfe, during these broiles, to take such order, that he should not need any more to seeke peace by intreaty and commemoration of old benefices, at their hands, who unpovoked, had sold his love for thirty Talents. To which purpose he furnished Conon the Athenian with eight ships, who had escaped when the Fleet of Athens was surprized by Lysander at Ægos-Potamos; giving him the command of a great Navie, wherewith he required the losse received at Ægos-Potamos, by repaying the Lacedæmonians with the like destruction of their fleet at Cnidus. After this victory Conon sailed to Athens, bringing with him, partly as the liberality of Pharnabazus, partly as the fruit of his victory, so strong a Navie, and so much Gold as encouraged the Athenians to rebuild their Walls, and think more hopefully upon recovering the Signiory which they had lost.

§. VIII.

Of sundry small victories gotten on each part. The Lacedæmonians lose all in Asia; the Athenians recover some part of their old Dominion.

NEVERtheless, the Lacedæmonians, by many victories at Land, maintained for some years the honour of their Estate, endangered very greatly by this losse at Sea. For Agesilaus obtained the better with his horse-men from the Thessalians, who were accounted the best riders in Greece. He wasted Bœotia, and fought a great battell at Coronea against the Thebans and their Allies, whom he overthrew; and by his Marshall Gylis foraged the Country of Locris: which done, he returned home. The gain of these victories was not great, & the reputation of them was, by many losses, much defaced. For the Thebans did in the battell of Coronea vanquish the Orchomenians, who stood opposite unto them, and retired unbroken to Mount Helicon, opening way perforce when Agesilaus charged them in the returne from the pursuie. Likewise Gylis was slaine with a great part of his Army by the Locrians, and some other exploits by the Lacedæmonians performed against the Corinthians, were repayed with equall damage received in the parts adjoining; many Towns being easily taken, and as easily recovered. The variety of which enterfeats was such, that the Thebans themselves were drawne by the losse of the haven of Corinth, to sue for peace, but could not get audience, till such time as the newes came of a great victory obtained by Iphicrates, General of the Athenian forces at Lechæum; whereupon the Theban Embassadors being sent for, and willing to doe their message, required only in scorn, to have a safe conduct given them, that they might enter into Corinth. From this time forward the War was made for a while only by incursions, wherein the Achæans, Confederates of Sparta, felt most losse, their whole State being endangered by the Acarnanians, who held with the contrary side, untill Agesilaus repayed these invaders with equall, or greater calamities, brought upon their owne Lands, which did so afflict the Acarnanians, that they were driven to sue for peace. But the affaires at Sea were of most consequence, upon which the successe of all depended. For when the Townes of Asia perceived that the Lacedæmonians were not only intangled in an hard War at home, but almost disabled to passe the Seas, having lost their Fleet at Cnidus; they soon gave eare to Pharnabazus, who promised to allow that they should use their own lawes, if they would expell the Spartan Governours. Only the City of Abydus did stand firm, wherein Doryllidas lay, who did his best to contain all the Townes about Hellepont, in the Alliance of the Lacedæmonians; which he could not do, because the Athenian Fleet under Thrasibulus, took in Byzantium, Chalcedon, and other places thereabout, reducing the Ile of Lesbos to their acknowledgement of Athens.

The base conditions offered unto the Persian by the Lacedæmonian. Of sundry fights and other passages in the Warre. The peace of Antalcidas.

ABOUT this time the Spartans began to perceive how uneasie a thing it would be, to maintain the War against men as good as themselves, assisted with the treasures of Persia: wherefore they craved peace of Ariaxerxes, most basely offering not only to renounce the Greeks inhabiting Asia, and to leave them to the Kings disposition, but withall to set the Islanders and every Town in Greece, as well the little as the great, at full and absolute liberty, whereby they said that all the principall Estates of their Country would be so weakened, that no one, nor all of them should be able to stir against the great King. And sure it was, that the power of the Country being so broken and rent into many small pieces, could neither have disquieted the Persian, by an offensive War, nor have made any good defence against him, but would have left ease for him in continuance of time to have taken the Cities one after another, till he had made himselfe Master of all. The Spartans were not ignorant of this, but were so carried with envie, that perceiving how the dominion of the Seas was like to returne to Athens, they chose rather to give all from themselves and others, and make all a-like weak, than to permit that any of their owne Nation should grow stronger than themselves, who so lately had commanded all. Yet this great offer was not at the first accepted, both in regard that the other Estates of Greece, who had in the Kings behalfe joyned together against the Lacedæmonians, did by their severall Embassadors oppose themselves unto it, and for that it was thought safest for Artaxerxes rather to weaken the Lacedæmonians yet more, than by interposing himselfe to bring friends and foes on the sudden to an equality. Especially Struthas, whom Artaxerxes had sent as his Lieutenent into the low Countries, did seek to repay the harme done by Agesslaus in those parts: which his intent appearing plaine, and all hope of the peace being thereby cut off, Timbro was sent into Asia to make Warre upon Struthas; and others were appointed to other places, whereby the War being scattered about, all the Isles and Townes on the firme Land, grew almost to the manner of Pyrracy and Robbery, affording many skirmishes, but few great actions worthy of remembrance. Timbro was slain by Struthas, & in his place Diphodas was sent, who demeaned himselfe more warily. Dercylidas was removed from his charge at Abydus, because he had not impeached Thrasibulus in his enterprises about Hellepont; Anaxibius, who succeeded him, was surpris'd & slain in a skirmish by Iphicrates the Athenian. Thrasibulus departing from Lesbos toward Rhodes, was slain by the way at Aspendus. The City of Rhodes had long before joyned with the Lacedæmonians, who erected there (as was their manner) an Aristocratie, or the Government of a few the principall Citizens; whereas contrariwise the Athenians were accustomed to put the Sovereignty into the hands of the people, each of them seeking to assure themselves, by erecting in the town of their Confederates a government like unto their own: which doing (where more especiall cause did not hinder) caused the Nobility to favour Sparta, and the Commons to incline to Athens. The people of Ægina roved upon the coast of Attica, which caused the Athenians to land an Army in Ægina, and besiege their Towne: but this siege being raised by the assistance of the Lacedæmonian fleet, the Islanders began a-new to molest Attica, which caused the Athenians to man their ships again, that returned beaten, having lost foure of thirteen. The losse of these ships was soon recompensed by a victory which Chabrias the Athenian Generall had in Ægina, whereupon the Islanders were faine to keep home, and leave to the Athenians the Seas free. It may well seeme strange that the Citie of Athens, having but newly raised her wals; having nor by any fortunate and important battell secured her estate from dangers by land; but only depending upon the assistance of such Confederates, as carried unto different ends, had often discovered themselves irresolute in the common cause; would send a fleet and an army to Cyprus, in defence of Evagoras, when the mastery of the Seas was so ill assured, that an Island lying in the eie of Pyræus, had ability to vex the coast of Attica. But as the over-weening of that City did cause it usually to embrace more than it could compass; so the infolency and shamelesse injustice of the people, had now bred in the chief Commanders, a desire to keep themselves far out of fight, and to seek employments at such distance distance as might secure them from the eyes of the envious, and from publike judgments, out of which few or none escaped. For which cause Timotheus did passe away much part of his time in the Ile of Lesbos; Iphicrates in Thrace, and Chabrias now did carry away into Cyprus a greater force than his Countrey could well have spared: with which he returned not when the businesse in Cyprus came to an end, but sought new adventures in Egypt; whereby arose neither thanks to himselfe, nor profit to his Citie, though honour both to him and it. The Athenians being thus carelesse of things at hand, had a notable blow given unto them, shortly after that Chabrias was gone to Cyprus, even within their owne Haven. For Telentius, a Lacedæmonian, being made Governour of Ægina, conceived a strong hope of surprizing the Navie of Athens, as it lay in Piræus; thinking a right that it was an harder matter to encounter with ten ships prepared for the fight, than with twentie lying in harbour, whose Mariners were asleep in their Cabbins, or drinking in Tavernes. Wherefore he sailed by night into the mouth of the Port, which entering at the breake of day, he found (according to his expectation) most of the men on shore, and few or none left aboard to make resistance: by which meanes he tooke many ships laden with merchandizes, many filher-men, passengers, and other Vessels, also three or foure Gallies; having sunke or broken, and made unservicable, as many of the rest as the time would suffer. About this time Pharnabazus, the Lieutenent of Phrygia, had one of the Kings daughters given to him in marriage, with whom he lived about the Court; and many officers that favoured the Lacedæmonians were placed in the lower Asia; by whose assistance the Fleet of Sparta grew victorious about Hellepont; in such wise, that perhaps they should not have needed the peace, which they themselves procured by Antalcidas, from the great King, the conditions whereof were such as are mentioned before, giving freedom to all the Cities of Greece, and dividing the Countrey into as many severall States as were petty Boroughes in it. Thus Ariaxerxes having bought his owne peace with money, did likewise by his money become Arbitrator and decider of Controversies between the Greeks, disposing of their businesse in such wise as stood best with his own good. The Tenor of Ariaxerxes his decree was, That all Asia and Cyprus should be his own; the Isles of Ceamos, Imbrus, and Scirus be subject to Athens; all other Greeke Towns, as well the little as the great, be set at libertie; and that whosoever should refuse this peace, upon them the approvers of it should make war, the King assisting them by Land and Sea, with men, and ships, and treasure. The Athenians were so discouraged by their losses at Sea; the Lacedæmonians by revolt of their Confederates, and the necessitie of maintaining many Garrisons, for which they wanted money; and other States by the miseries of the war, whereof they saw no end; that all (excepting the Thebans) did consent unto these Articles. This was called the peace of Antalcidas: whereof the Lacedæmonians taking upon themselves the execution, did not only compell the Argives to depart out of Corinth (which under pretence of defending they held by Garrisons, lately thrust into it, not as Patrons, but as Lords) and the Thebans to leave Boeotia free, of which Province Thebes had alwaies held the government; the Thebans themselves being also comprehended under the name of the Boeotians; but caused the Mantineans to throw down their own Citie, and to dwell in villages: alledging that they had formerly bin accustomed so to doe, though purposing indeed to chastise them, as having bin ill affected to Sparta in the late War. By these courses the Lacedæmonians did hope that all the firme Towns in Greece would, when occasion should require it, willingly follow them in their wars, as Authors of their libertie; and that the great Cities having lost all their dependants, would be unable to make opposition.

The war which the Lacedæmonians made upon Olynthus. They take Thebes by treason; and Olynthus by famine.

WHILEST these wars, which ended without either victorie or profit, consumed the riches and power of Greece, the Citie of Olynthus in Thrace was grown so mightie, that she did not only command her neighbour Towns, but was also become terrible to places farre remote, and to Sparta it selfe. Great part of Macedonia, together with Pella, the principall Citie of that Kingdome, was taken by the

Sff

Olynthians;

Olynthians, who following the usuall pretence of the Lacedamonians, to set at liberty the places over which King Amyntas did tyrannize, had almost now driven him out of his Dominions, and taken all to themselves. The Citizens of Acambus and of Apollonia being nearest unto the danger of those intrenching neighbours, acquainted the Lacedamonians with their feare, affirming that this Dominion of the Olynthians would be too strong for all Greece, if continuance of time should give it reputation, which only it wanted: wherefore they requested assistance, but in such termes as did found of compulsion, protesting that either they must warre upon Olynthus, or become subject unto her, and fight in her defence. Hereupon was made a hastie levie of men, two thousand being presently sent away, with promise to be seconded by a greater Army. Whilest these two thousand gave such beginning to the warre, as agreed with their small number, the body of the Army following them, surprized the Cittadell of Thebes, which was betraied into the hand of Phabidas the Lacedamonian, by some of the Magistrates, who sought to strengthen their faction by the slavery of their Country. The Thebans were ill affected to Sparta, but had not in any one point violated the peace lately made between them; which caused the Lacedamonians to doubt whether this act of Phabidas were more worthy of reward or of punishment. In conclusion, profit so farre over-weighted honesty, that the deed was approved, many principall Citizens of Thebes condemned to death, many driven into banishment, and the Traitors rewarded with the government of the citie; by whose authoritie, and the force of the Garrison, the Thebans were compelled to serve the Lacedamonians, in all, and more than all that they could require. This access of power having strengthened the Lacedamonians, caused them to entertain the greater forces about Olynthus, which (notwithstanding the losse of one great battell, and some other disasters) they compelled at length by famine to render it selfe unto their obedience.

§. XI.

How the Thebans recovered their libertie, driving out the Lacedamonian Garrison.

AFTER this Olynthian Warre, which endured almost three yeares, it seemed that no Estate in Greece was able to make head against that of Sparta: but it was not long ere the Thebans found a means to shake off their yoke, and gave both example and meanes to others to do the like. One of the banished men found by conference with a Scribe of the Theban Magistrates, coming to Athens, that the tyrannie wherewith his Countrey was oppressed, pleased him no better than it did those who for feare of it were fled from home. Whereupon a plot was laid betweene these two, that soone found very good successe, being managed thus. Seven of the banished men forooke Athens privily, and entered by night into the fields of Thebes; where spending the next day secretly, they came late in the evening to the Gates like husband-men returned from worke, and so passed undiscovered unto the house of Charon, whom Phyllidas the Scribe had drawne into the conspiracie. The day following, a solemne feast being then held in the Citie, Phyllidas promised the Governours, who were insolent and lustful men, that he would conveigh unto them that night the most beautifull Dames of the Towne, with whom they should take their pleasure. Having cheered them with such hope, and plentie of good wine, he told them when the time of performance (which they urged) came, that hee could not make good his promise, unless they would dismiss their followers, because the Gentlemen, who attended without the Chamber, would not endure that any of the servants should see their faces. Upon this occasion the attendants were dismissed, and the Conspirators, attired like Ladies and their Maides, brought into the place; who taking advantage of the Governours loose behaviour, slew them all up on the sudden with Daggers, which they brought hidden under their garments. Then presently casting off their disguise, they went to other places, where feigning themselves to come to the Governours upon businesse, they got admittance, and likewise slew those which were of the Lacedamonian faction. By the like device they brake into the prison, slew the Goaler, & set at liberty such as they thought meet; and being followed by these desperate men, proclaimed libertie, making the death of the Tyrants known. The Captaine of the Castle hearing the sudden Proclamation, thought the Rebels to be stronger than indeed they were: the Citizens contrariwise mistrusted, that it was a practice to discover such as would be forward upon occasion of revolting. But as soon as day-light revealed the plaine truth, all the people took armes and besieged the Castle, sending hastily to Athens for succour. The Garrison also sent for aide unto the Towns adjoining, whence a few broken troupes coming to the rescue, were defeated on the way by the horse-men of Thebes. On the other side the banished Thebans did not only make speed to assist their COUNTRYMEN, but procured some Athenians to joyn with them, and thereby came so strong into the Citie, that the Castle was yielded, more through feare than any necessitie, upon condition that the Souldiers might quietly depart with their Armes; for which composition the Captaine at his returne to Sparta was put to death. When the newes of the doings at Thebes, and the successe arrived at Sparta, an Army was raised forth-with, and all things prepared as earnestly for the recovering of that Citie, as if some part of their ancient inheritance had bin taken from the Lacedamonians, and not a town perfidiously usurped by them, restored to her own libertie. Cleombrotus, one of the Kings, was sent on this expedition, who having wearied his followers with a toilsome Winters journe, returned home without any good or harm done; leaving Sphodrias, with part of his Armie, at Thebes, to infect the Thebans; who doing them some displeasures, made large amends by a foolish attempt upon the Haven of Athens, which failing to take, he wasted the countrey adjoining, and drove away Cattell, causing by this outrage the Athenians to enter with all their power into the war, out of which they were so before very carefully seeking how they might possibly with-draw themselves.

CHAP. XII.

Of the flourishing estate of Thebes, from the battell of Leuctra, to the battell of Mantinea.

§. I.

How Thebes and Athens joyned together against Sparta. How the Athenians made peace for themselves, and others, out of which the Thebans were excluded. The battell of Leuctra, and beginning of the Theban greatnesse.

THE Lacedamonians were men of great resolution, and of much gravitie in all their proceedings; but one dishonourable rule they held, That all respects withstanding the commodity of Sparta were to be neglected; the practice of which doctrine, even by the best and wisest of them, did greatly blemish that Estate: but when it was put in execution by insufficient over-weening men, it seldom failed to bring upon them instead of profit unjustly expected, both shame and losse. And so it befell them in these enterprises of Phabidas, upon the Castle of Thebes, and Sphodrias upon the Piræus. For, howsoever Agesslaus did spoyle the Countrey about Thebes, in which he spent two Summers, yet the diligence of the Thebans repaired all, who by the good successe of some attempts, grew stronger than they were at the first.

The Athenians likewise began to looke abroad, saying to the Isle of Corcyra, where they ordered things at their pleasure, and having in some fights at Sea prevailed, began, as in the Peloponnesian Warre, to surround Peloponnesus with a Navie; afflicting so the Lacedamonians, that had not the Thebans by their insolencie wearied their friends, and caused them to seeke for peace, it had bin very likely that the end of this warre, should have soone come to a good end, which nevertheless, being persecuted by the Thebans (who opposed at once both these two great Estates) left the Citie of Sparta as much dejected, as the beginning found it proud and tyrannous. But the Athenians perceiving how Thebes encroached every day upon her weake Neighbours, not sparing such as had bin dependants upon Athens, and finding themselves, whilst engaged in such a war, unable to relieve their complaining friends, resolved to settle the affairs of

Greece,

Greece, by renewing that form of peace which Antalcidas had brought from the Persian. Wherefore they sent Messengers to Thebes, peremptorily signifying, That it was their intent to finish the War, to which purpose they willed the Thebans to send Embassadors along with them to Sparta; who readily condescended, fearing otherwise that they should be left out of the Treatie of peace: which came to passe, being so wrought by the courageous wisdom of Epaminondas, who understood far better than his Countermen, what was to be feared or hoped. In this Treatie the Lacedemonians and Athenians did soon agree; but when the Thebans offered to sweare to the Articles in the name of the Boeotians; Agessilas required them to sweare in their own name, and to leave the Boeotians free, whom they had lately reduced under their obedience. Whereunto Epaminondas made answer, That the Citie of Sparta should give example to Thebes by setting the Lacedemonians free; for that the Signorie of Boeotia did by as good right appertain to the Thebans, as that of Laconia to the Spartans. This was well and truly spoken; but was heard with no patience: For Agessilas bearing a vehement hatred unto those of Thebes, by whom he was drawn back out of Asia into Greece, and disappointed of all the glory which he had hoped to achieve by the Persian war, did now passionately urge that point of setting the Boeotians at libertie; & finding it as obstinately refused, he dashed the name of the Thebans out of the league. At the same time Cleombrotus the other King of Sparta, lay in Phocis, who received command from the Governours of Sparta forthwith to enter upon the Land of the Thebans with all his power; which he did, and was there slain at Leuctra, and so with him the flower of his Armie. This battell of Leuctra, being one of the most famous that ever were fought between the Greeks, was not so notable for any circumstance foregoing it, or for the managing of the fight it self, as for the death of the King, and many citizens of Sparta, but especially, for that after this battell (between which and the conclusion of the general peace there passed but twenty daies) the Lacedemonians were never able to recover the strength and reputation which had formerly made them redoubted far and near; whereas contrariwise the Thebans, whose greatest ambition had in former times confined it selfe unto the little Region of Boeotia, did now begin to undertake the leading & command of many people & estates, in such wise, that soon after they brought an Armie of three score and ten thousand strong unto the Gates of Sparta. So much doe the afflictions of an hard war, valiantly endured, advance the affairs of the distressed, and guide them into the way of conquest, by stiffening that resolution with a manly temper, which wealth and ease had through luxurie, retchlesseffe, and many other vices or vanities, made rustie and effeminate.

§. II.

How the Athenians took upon them to maintain the peace of Greece. New troubles hence arising. Epaminondas invadeth and wasteth the Territories of Lacedemon.

THE Athenians refusing to take advantage of this overthrow fallen upon their old Enemies, and new Confederates the Lacedemonians; did nevertheless finely give them to understand, that their Dominion was expired, and therefore their pride might well be laid away. For taking upon themselves the maintenance of the peace lately concluded, which Agessilas (perhaps of purpose to make benefit of quarrels that might arise) had left unperfected, they assembled the Deputies of all the Estates confederated at Athens; where the generall libertie of all Towns, as well small as great, was ratified under the stile of the Athenians, and their Associates. Hereupon began fresh garboiles. The Mantineans, claiming power by this decree to order their affairs at their own pleasure, did (as it were) in despite of the Spartans, who had enforced them to raze their Town, re-edifie it, and allie themselves with such of the Arcadians as stood worst affected to Sparta. The Arcadians, a strong Nation, consisting of many Cities, were distracted with factions; some desiring to hold good correspondency with the Lacedemonians; some to weaken and keep them low; yet all pretending other ends. The Lacedemonians durst not give impeachment to the Mantineans, nor take upon them to correct their ill-willers among the Arcadians, till such time as the factions brake out into violence, and each part called in forraigne help. Then was an Armie sent from Sparta, as it were in defence of the people of Tegæa, against the Mantineans, but indeed against them both. Agessilas had the leading of it, but effected nothing. The Thebans had by this time subdued the the Phocians, and were become head of the Locrians, Acarnanians, Eubœans, and many others; with the power of which Countries they entred Peloponnesus in favour of the Arcadians, who had, upon expectation of their coming, abstained from giving battell to Agessilas. The Armie of the Spartans being dismissed, and Epaminondas joyned with the Arcadians; the Region of Laconia was invaded and spoiled: a thing so strange, that no Oracle could have found believe if any had foretold it. Almost 600. yeares were spent, since the Dorians, under the posteritie of Hercules, had seized upon Laconia, in all which time the sound of an enemies trumpet was not heard in that Countrie. Ten yeares were not fully past, since all Greece was at the devotion of the Spartans: but now the Region 10 which neither Xerxes with his huge Armie could once looke upon, nor the mightie forces of Athens, and other enemy-States had dared to set foot on, saving by stealth, was all on a light fire, the very smoake whereof the women of Sparta were ashamed to behold. All which indignitie notwithstanding, the Lacedemonians did not issue out of Sparta to fight, but sought how to preserve the Town, setting at libertie as many of their Heilotas or Slaves as were willing to beare Arms in defence of the State, and somewhat pitifully entreated the Athenians to give them succour. From Corinth and some towns of Peloponnesus they received speedie assistance; the Athenians came forward more slowly, so that Epaminondas returned without battell, having re-built the Citie of Messene, and peopled it a-new by calling home the ancient inhabitants, whom the Lacedemonians many 10 ages before had chased away to other Countries, possessing their Territories themselves.

§. III.

The Composition betwene Athens and Sparta for command in warre against the Thebans; who againe invade and spoyle Peloponnesus. The unfortunate presumption of the Arcadians.

THIS journey therefore utterly defaced the reputation of the Spartans, in such wise, that they did no longer demand the conduct of the Armie, which was to be raised, nor any manner of precedence: but sending Embassadors from Sparta, 10 and from all the Cities which held league with it, unto Athens, they offered to yeeld the Admiraltie to the Athenians, requesting that they themselves might be Generals by Land. This had become a composition well agreeing with the situation and qualitie of those two Cities; but it was rejected, because the Mariners and others that were to be employed at Sea, were men of no marke or estimation, in regard of those companies of horse and foot, whereof the Land-Armie was compounded, who being all Gentlemen or Citizens of Athens, were to have served under the Lacedemonians. Wherefore it was agreed that the Authoritie should be divided by time, the Athenians ruling five daies, the Lacedemonians other five, and so successively that each of them should have command of all both by Land and by Sea. It is manifest, that in this conclusion vaine ambition was 40 more regarded than the common profit; which must of necessity be very slowly advanced, where consultation, resolution, and performance are so often to change hands. This appeared by a second invasion of Peloponnesus, wherein the Thebans found their enemies 50 so unable to impeach them, that having fortified Isthmus from Sea to Sea, as in former times they had done against Xerxes, they were driven out of their strength by Epaminondas, who foraged the Countrie without resistance. But as the Articles of this league betwene Athens and Sparta did, by dividing the conduct in such manner, disable the societie, and make it insufficient to those ends for which it was concluded; so the example of it wrought their good, by filling the enemies heads with the like vanitie. For the Arcadians considering their owne numbers which they brought into the field, and having 50 found by many trials that their people were not inferiour to others in strength of bodie, in courage, or in good Souldieriship, thought it good reason that they should in like manner share the government, with their friends the Thebans; and not alwaies continue followers of others, by increasing whose greatness they should strengthen their owne yoke. Hereupon they began to demean themselves very insolently, whereby they grew hatefull to their Neighbours, and suspected of the Thebans in an ill time. For a motion of generall peace having bin made (which tooke not effect, because the Citie of Messene was not abandoned to the Lacedemonians) the next enterprise of the Spartans and their friends was upon these Arcadians, who relying too much upon their own worth, were overthrowen in a great battell, their calamitie being as pleasing to their Confederates, as to their Enemies.

§. IV.

The great growth of the Theban Estate, Embassages of the Greeks to the Persian, with reasons why he most favoured the Thebans. Troubles in the Persian Empire. The fruitlesse issue of the Embassages.

THE Thebans especially rejoyced at the Arcadians misfortune, considering, that without their aide, the successe of all enterprises proved foill; whereas they themselves had by their owne power accomplished very well whatsoever they tooke in hand, and were become not only victorious over the Lacedemonians, but patrons over the Theſſalonians, and moderators of the great quarrels that had risen in Macedonia; where compounding the differences about that Kingdome, as pleased them best, they carried Philip the son of Amyntas, and father of Alexander the Great, as a hostage unto Thebes. Having therefore obtained such reputation, that little seemed wanting to make them absolute Commanders of all Greece, they sought meanes of alliance with the Persian King, to whom they sent Embassadour the great and famous Captain Pelopidas, whose reputation drew Artaxerxes to grant unto the Thebans all that they desired; whereof two especiall points were, That Messene should remaine free from the Lacedemonians, and that the Athenians should forbear to send their ships of warre to Sea; only the latter of these two was somewhat qualified with reference to further advice. The other States of Greece did also send their Embassadours at the same time, of whom few or none received much contentment. For the king having found by long experience, how farre it concerned him to maintaine a sure partie in Greece, did upon many weightie considerations resolve to binde the Thebans firmly unto him; justly expecting, that their greatnesse should be on that side his owne securitie. The Athenians had bene ancient enemies to his Crowne; and having turned the profit of their victories upon the Persian to the purchase of a great Estate in Greece, maintained their Signorie in such puissant manner, that (sundrie grievous misfortunes notwithstanding) they had endured a terrible warre, wherein the Lacedemonians being followed by most of the Greeks, and supplied with treasure, and all sorts of aide by Darius Nobus; were not able to vanquish them, till their owne indiscretion brought them on their knees. The Lacedemonians being victorious over Athens, had no sooner established their Dominion at home, than they undertooke the conquest of Asia, from which though by the commotion raised in Greece with Persian gold, they were called backe, yet having renewed their power, and settled things in Greece, it was not unlikely, that they should upon the next advantage have pursued the same enterprife, had not they bene impeached by this Theban Warre. But the Thebans contrariwise had alwayes discovered a good affection to the Crown of Persia. They had sided with Xerxes in his invasion of Greece; with Darius and the Lacedemonians against Athens: And finally, having offered much contumelious Aggression when he put to Sea, they drew him home by making warre on the Confederates of Sparta. Besides all these their good deservings, they were no Sea-men, and therefore unlikely to looke abroad; whereupon if perchance they should have any desire, yet were they disabled by the want of good haven townes; which they could not seize upon without open breach of that peace, whereof they intended to become the Executors, giving libertie to all Cities that had at any time been free. Wherefore Artaxerxes did wholly condescend unto the requests of Pelopidas, as farre forth as he might, without giving open defiance to the rest of Greece; and by that meane he purchased his owne quiet, being never afterward molested by that Nation in the lower Asia. The ill means which the Greeks had to disturbe Artaxerxes, was very beneficiall to the Estate of Persia shortly after these times, in that great rebellion of all the Maritime Provinces. For had then the affaires of Greece bene so composed, that any one Citie might without impeachment of the rest have transported an Armie to assist the revolting Satraps, or Vice-royes of Caria, Phrygia, Lydia, Mysia, Lycia, Pisidia, Pamphilia, Cilicia, Syria, & Phoenicia; humane reason can hardly find the means, by which the Empire could have been preserved from that ruine, which the divine Counsell had deferred unto the dayes of Alexander. But this great conspiracie of so many large and wealthy Provinces, wanting ting a firme body of good and hardy Souldiers, was in short space discussed, and vanished like a mist, without effect: these effeminate Asiaticques wearied quickly with the travels and dangers incident to War, forsaking the common cause, and each man striving to be the first, that by treason to his company should both redeeme the former treason to his Prince, and purchase withall his own promotion with encrease of riches. Of this commotion, which in course of time followed some actions not as yet related, I have rather chosen to make short mention in this place, than hereafter to interrupt the Narration of things more important; but for that it was like a sudden storme, rashly commenced, idly followed, and foolishly layd downe, having made a great noyse without effect, and having small reference to any other action regardable; as also because in the whole reigne of Artaxerxes, from the Warre of Cyrus to the invasion of Egypt, I find nothing (this insurrection, and a fruitlesse journey against the Cadusians excepted) worthy of any mention much lesse of digression from the course of the businesse in Greece. All, or the most of his time passed away so quietly, that he enjoyed the pleasures which an Empire so great and wealthy could afford unto so absolute a Lord, with little disturbance. The troubles which he found were only or chiefly Domesticall; growing out of the hatred which Parryſtain the Queen-Mother bare unto his wife Statira, and to such as had been the greatest enemies to her sonne Cyrus, or gloried in his death: upon whom, when by poyson and mischievous practices she had satisfied her feminine appetite of revenge, thenceforth she wholly applied her selfe to the Kings disposition, cherishing in him the lewd desire of marrying his own Daughter, and filling him with the perswasion, which Princes not endued with an especiall grace, doe readily entertain: That his owne will was the supreme law of his subjects, & the rule by which all things were to be measured, and adjudged to be good or evil. In this imaginary happinesse Pelopidas, and the other Embassadors of Greece, both found & left him; but left him by so much more assured than they found him, by how much the conclusion of his Treaty with them, being altogether to his owne advantage, did seeme to promise, if not the perpetuity, a long endurance of the same felicity to him & his, or (at the least) a full security of danger from Greece, whence only could any danger be feared. But such foundations of eternitie layd by mortall men in this transitory world, like the Tower of Babel, are either shaken from heaven, or made vaine and unprofitable, ere the frame can be raised to full height, by confusion of tongues among the builders. Hereof was found a good example in the Thebans, & other Estates of Greece that had sent Embassadors to the Persian. For whereas it had been concluded, that all Townes, as well the little as the great, should be set at liberty, and the Thebans made Protectors of this common peace, who thereby should become the Judges of all controversies that might arise, and Leaders in War of all that would enter into this Confederacy; the Kings letters being solemnly published at Thebes, in the presence of Embassadors, drawne thither from all parts of Greece; when an oath was required for observation of the forme of peace therein set downe, a dilatory answer was made by the Embassadors, who said, that they were sent to heare the articles, not to sweare unto them. Hereby the Thebans were driven to send unto each of the Cities to require the Oath; But in vaine. For when the Corinthians had boldly refused it, saying, that they did not need it; others took courage by their example to doe the like, disappointing the Thebans of their glorious hopes, to whom this negotiation with Artaxerxes gave neither addition nor confirmation of greatnesse, but left them as it found them to relye upon their own swords.

§. V.

How all Greece was divided between the Athenians and Lacedemonians on the one side, and Thebans on the other. Of the great tumults rising in Arcadia.

THE condition of things in Greece at that time did stand thus. Athens and Sparta, which in former times had commanded all that Nation, and each upon envie of the others greatnesse drawne all their followers into a cruell intestine Warre, by which the whole Countrie, and especially the Estate of these two Cities, was brought very low, did now conjoin their forces against the Thebans, who sought to make themselves Lords of all. The Eleans, Corinthians, & Achaians, followed the party of these ancient governing Cities; either for the old reputation of them, & benefits received, or in dislike of those, who by strong hand were ready to become Rulers, to which authorities they could not suddenly aspire without some injurie and much envie. The Citie of Thebes abounding with men, whom necessity had made warlike, and many victories in few years had filled with great spirits; and being so mightie in dependants, that she had reduced all the continent of Greece without Peloponnesus (the Region of Attica, and very little part beside excepted) under such acknowledgement, as wanted not much of mere Vassallage, did hope to bring all Peloponnesus to the like obedience, wherein already she had set good footing by her conjunction with the States of Argos, and of Arcadia. The Argives had beene alwayes bad Neighbours to the Spartans, to whom they thought themselves in ancient Nobilitie Superiours, but were farre under them in valour, having beene often beaten out of the field by them, and put in danger of losing all, which caused them to suspect and envie nothing more than the greatness and honour of Sparta, taking truce with her when she was at rest, and had leasure to bend her whole force against them; but firmly joyning with her enemies whensoever they found her entangled in a difficult warre. As the Argives were, in harred of Sparta, sure friends of Thebes, so the Arcadians, transported with a great opinion of their owne worthinesse, had formerly renounced and provoked against them their old Confederates & Leaders, the Lacedemonians, and were now become very doubtfull adherents to the Thebans. In which regard it was thought convenient by Epaminondas, and the State of Thebes, to send an Armie into Peloponnesus, before such time as these wavering friends should fall further off, and become either Neutral, or, which was to be feared, open enemies. And surely great cause there was to suspect the worst of them, considering that without consent of the Thebans, they had made peace with Athens, which was very strange, and seemed no lesse to the Athenians themselves, who holding a firme league with Sparta at the same time when the Arcadians treated with them, did neverthelesse accept this new Confederacie, nor relinquishing the old, because they found that howsoever these Arcadians were enemies to the Lacedemonians, they should hereby be drawn somewhat further from their alliance with Thebes, which without them was unlikely to invade Peloponnesus with a strong Armie. But this did rather hasten, than by any meanes stay the coming of Epaminondas; who finding the way somewhat more cleare for him (because the Citie of Corinth, which lay upon the Isthmus, and had beene adverse to Thebes, was now, by millions of this grievous warre, driven to become Neutral) tooke occasion hereby, and by some disorders among the Arcadians, to visit Peloponnesus with an Armie, consisting of all the power of Thebes. A great tumult had risen in Arcadia about consecrated money, which many principall men among them had laid hands on, under pretence of employing it to publike uses. In compounding the differences growne upon this occasion, such as had least will to render account of the money which had come into their hands, procured the Capitaine of some Theban Souldiers, lying in Tegea, to take prisoners many of their Countreymen, as people desirous of innovation. This was done: but the up-roare thereby caused was so great, that the prisoners were forth-with enlarged, and the Arcadians, who had in great numbers taken Armes, with much a-doe scarce pacified. When complaint of the Capitaines proceedings came to Thebes, Epaminondas turned all the blame upon them, who had made the peace with Athens, letting them know, that he would be shortly among them, to judge of their fidelitie, by the assistance which they should give him, in that war which he intended to make in Peloponnesus. These Lordly words did greatly amaze the Arcadians, who needing not the aide of so mighty a power as he drew along with him, did vehemently suspect that great preparation to be made against themselves. Hereupon such of them as had before sought means to settle the affairs of their Countreie, by drawing things to some good conclusion of peace, did now forth-with send to Athens for help, and withall dispatched some of the principall among them as Embassadors to Sparta, by whom they offered themselves to the common defence of Peloponnesus, now ready to be invaded. This Embassage brought much comfort to the Lacedemonians, who feared nothing more than the coming of Epaminondas, against whom they well knew, that all their forces, and best provisions, would be no more than very hardly sufficient. Forbearing therefore to dispute about prerogatives, they (who had beene accustomed unto such a supremacie, as they would in no wise communicate with the powerfull Citie of Athens, till other hope of securing their owne estate could not be thought upon) did now very gently yeeld to the Arcadians, that the the command of the Armie in chiefe, should be given, for the time, to that Citie in whose Territorie it lay.

§. VI.

A terrible invasion of Peloponnesus by Epaminondas.

Certaine it is, that the condition of things did at that time require a very firm content, and uniform care of the common safetie. For, beside the great forces raised out of the other parts of Greece, the Argives and Messenians prepared with all their strength to joyn with Epaminondas; who having lien a while at Nemea, to intercept the Athenians, received their intelligence, that the Armie coming from Athens would passe by Sea, whereupon he dislodged, and came to Tegea, which Citie, and the most of all Arcadia besides, forthwith declared themselves his. The common opinion was, that the first attempt of the Thebans, would be upon such of the Arcadians as had revolted; which caused the Lacedemonian Capitaines to fortifie Mantineia with all diligence, and to send for Agesslaus to Sparta, that he bringing with him all that finall force of able men which remained in the Towne, they might be strong enough to abide Epaminondas there. But Epaminondas held so good espial upon his Enemies, that had not an unknowne fellow brought hasty advertisement of his purpose to Agesslaus, who was then well onward in the way to Mantineia, the Citie of Sparta had suddenly bin taken. For thither with all speed and secrecie did the Thebans march, who had surely carried the Citie, notwithstanding any defence that could have bin made by that handfull of men remaining within it; but that Agesslaus in all flying haste got into it with his companies, whom the Armie of his Confederates followed thither to the rescue as fast as it was able. The arrival of the Lacedemonians and their friends, as it cut off all hope from Epaminondas of taking Sparta, so it presented him with a faire advantage upon Mantineia. It was the time of Harvest, which made it very likely, that the Mantineans, finding the war to be carried from their walls into another quarter, would use the commodity of that vacation, by fetching in their corn, and turning out their cattell into the fields, whilst no enemy was neere that might impeach them. Wherefore he turned away from Sparta to Mantineia, sending his horsemen before him, to seize upon all that might be found without the Citie. The Mantineans (according to the expectation of Epaminondas) were scattered abroad in the country, far more intent upon their harvest businesse, than upon the war, whereof they were secure, as thinking themselves out of distance. By which presumption it fell out, that great numbers of them, and all their Cattell, being unable to recover the Town, were in a desperate case; and the town it selfe in no great likelihood of holding out, when the enemy should have taken all their provision of victuals, with so many of the people as had not over-deerly bin redeemed, by that Cities returning to societie with Thebes. But at the same time, the Athenians coming to the succour of their Confederates, whom they thought to have found at Mantineia, were very earnestly entreated by the Citizens to rescue their goods, & people, from the danger whereinto they were fallen, if it were possible by any courageous adventure to deliver those who otherwise were given as lost. The Thebans were knowne at that time to be the best Souldiers of all the Greeks, and the commendation of good horfemanship had alwaies bin given to the Thebans, as excelling in that qualitie all other Nations; yet the regard of honour so wrought upon the Athenians, that for the reputation of their Citie, which had entred into this war upon no necessity of her own, but only in desire of relieving her distressed friends, they issued forth of Mantineia, not abiding so long as to refresh themselves, or their horse with meat, and giving a lustie charge upon the enemy, who as bravely received them, after a long & hot fight, they remained masters of the field, giving by this victorie a safe and easie retreat to all that were without the walls. The whole power of the Bavians arrived in the place soon after this battell, whom the Lacedemonians and their assistants were not far behind.

§. VII.

Epaminondas considering that his Commission was almost now expired, and that his attempts of surprizing Sparta and Mantinea having failed, the impression of terror which his name had wrought in the Peloponnesians, would soon vanish, unless by some notable act he should abate their courage in their first growth, & leave some memorable character of his expedition; resolved to give them battell, whereby he reasonably hoped both to settle the doubtfull affections of his own Associates, and to leave the Spartians as weak in spirit and abilitie, as he found them, if not wholly to bring them into subjection. Having therefore warned his men to prepare for that battell, wherein victory should be rewarded with Lordship of all Greece; and finding the alacrity of his Souldiers to be such as promised the accomplishment of his own desire; he made shew of declining the enimie, and intrenching himselfe in a place of more advantage, that so by taking from them all expectation of fighting that day, he might allay the heat of their valour, and afterward strike their senses with amazement, when he should come upon them unexpected. This opinion deceived him not. For with very much tumult, as in so great and sudden a danger, the enimie ran to Arms, necessity enforcing their resolution, and the consequence of that dayes service urging them to doe as well as they might. The Thebans Armie consisted of thirte thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the Lacedemonians and their friends were short of this number, both in horse and in foot, by a third part. The Mantineans (because the war was in their Countrey) stood in the right wing, and with them the Lacedemonians: the Athenians had the left wing; the Acheans, Eleans, and others of lesse account, filled the bodie of the Armie. The Thebans stood in the left wing of their own battell, oppositeto the Lacedemonians, having by them the Aradians, the Eubaeans, Locrians, Sicyonians, Messenians, and Thessalians with others, compounding the main battell; the Argives held the right wing; the horse-men on each part were placed in the flanks, only a troupe of the Eleans were in reare. Before the footmen could joyn, the encounter of the horse on both sides was very rough, wherein finally the Thebans prevailed, notwithstanding the valiant resistance of the Athenians: who not yielding to the enimie either in courage or skill, were overlaid with numbers, and so beaten upon by Thessalian slings, that they were driven to forsake the place, and leave their infanterie naked. But this retreat was the lesse disgracefull, because they kept themselves together, and did not fall back upon their owne foot-men; but finding the Theban horse to have given them over, and withall discovering some Companies of foot, which had bin sent about by Epaminondas, to charge their battell in the reare, they brake upon them, routed them, and hewed them all in pieces. In the mean season the battell of the Athenians had not only to doe with the Argives, but was hardly pressed by the Theban Horsemen, in such wise that it began to open, and was ready to turn back, when the Elean Squadron of Horse came up to the reliefe of it, and restored all on that part. With farre greater violence did the Lacedemonians and Thebans meet, these contending for Dominion, the other for the maintenance of their ancient honour; so that equall courage and equall losse on both sides made the hope and appearance of victorie to either equally doubtfull: unless perhaps the Lacedemonians being very firme abiders, might seeme the more likely to prevaile, as having borne the first brunt and furie of the on-set, which was not hitherto remitted; and being framed by discipline, as it were by Nature, to excell in patience, whereof the Thebans, by practice of a few yeares, cannot be thought to have gotten a habite so sure and generall. But Epaminondas perceiving the obstinate stiffnesse of the Enemies to be such, as neither the bad successe of their owne horse, nor all the force of the Boeotian Armie, could abate so farre, as to make them give one foot of ground: taking a choice companie of the most able men, whom he cast into the forme of a Wedge, or Diamond, by the advantage of that figure against a Squadron, and by his owne exceeding vertue, accompanied with the great strength and resolution of them which followed him, did open their ranks, and cleave the whole battell in despite of all resistance. Thus was the honour of that day won by the Thebans, who may justly be said to have carried the victorie, seeing that they remained Masters of the ground whereon the battell was fought, having driven the Enemie to lodge farther off. For that which was alledged by the Athenians, as a token that the victorie was partly theirs, the slaughter of those Mercenaries upon whom they lighted by chance in their owne flight, finding them behind their Armie, and the retaining of their dead bodies; it was a ceremonie regardable only among the Greeks, and served merely for ostentation, shewing that by the fight they had obtained somewhat, which the enimie could not get from them otherwise than by request. But the Thebans arrived at the generall immediate end of battell; none daring to abide them in the field: whereof a manifest confession is expressed from them, who forsake the place which they had chosen or accepted, as indifferent for trial of their abilitie and prowesse. This was the last worke of the incomparable vertue of Epaminondas, who being in the head of that Warlike troupe of men, which broke the Lacedemonian Squadron, and forced it to give back in disorder, was furiously charged on the sudden, by a desperate Companie of the Spartians, who all at once threw their Darts at him alone; whereby receiving many wounds, he never thelesse with a singular courage maintained the fight, using against the enemies many of their Darts, which he drew out of his owne bodie; till at length by a Spartan, called Anticrates, he received so violent a stroke with a Dart, that the wood of it brake, leaving the yron and a peece of the truncheon in his breast. Hereupon he sunk down, and was soon conveyed out of the fight by his friends; having by his fall somewhat animated the Spartans (who fain would have got his bodie,) but much more inflamed with revengefull indignation, the Thebans, who raging at this heave mischance, did with great slaughter compell their disordered enemies to leave the field; though long they followed not the chase, being wearied more with the sadnesse of this disaster, than with all the travell of the day. Epaminondas being brought into his Tent, was told by the Physicians, that when the head of the Dart should be drawn out of his bodie, he must needs dye. Hearing this he called for his shield, which to have lost, was held a great dishonour: It was brought unto him. He bad them tell him which part had the victorie; answer was made, that the Boeotians had won the field. Then said he, It is faire time for me to dye; and withall sent for Solidus and Diophautes, two principall men of War, that were both slain; which being told him, He advised the Thebans to make peace, whilest with advantage they might, for that they had none left that was able to discharge the office of a General. Herewithall he willed, that the head of the weapon should be drawn out of his body, comforting his friends that lamented his death, and want of issue, by telling them, that the victories of Leuctra and Mantinea were two faire daughters, in whom his memorie should live.

So died Epaminondas, the worthiest man that ever was bred in that Nation of Greece, and hardly to be matched in any Age or Countrey: for he equalled all others in the severall vertues, which in each of them were singular. His Justice and Sinceritie, his Temperance, Wise dome, and high Magnanimitie, were no way inferior to his Militarie vertue; in every part whereof he so excelled, that he could not properly be called a Warlike Valiant; a Politique, a Bountifull, or an industrious, and a Provident Capaine. Neither was his private Conversation unanswerable to those high parts, which gave him praise abroad. For he was Grave, and yet very Affable and Courteous; resolute in publique businesse, but in his owne particular case, and of much mildnesse: a lover of his People, bearing with mens infirmities, witty and pleasant in speech, far from insolence, Master of his own affections, and furnished with all qualities that might win and keepe love. To these graces were added great abilitie of bodie, much Eloquence, and very deep knowledge in all parts of Philosophie and Learning, wherewith his minde being enlightened, rested not in the sweetnesse of Contemplation, but brake forth into such effects as gave unto Thebes, which had ever more bin an underling, a dreadfull reputation among all people adjoining, and the highest command in Greece.

§. VIII.

Of the peace concluded in Greece after the battell of Mantinea. The voyage of Agefilaus into Egypt. His death, and qualities; with an examination of the comparison made between him and Pompey the Roman.

THis battell of Mantinea was the greatest that had ever beene fought in that Countrey between the Naturals; and the last. For at Marathon, and Platæa, the populous Armies of the barbarous Nations gave rather a great fame, than a hard triall to the Grecian valour; neither were the practice of Armes and Art Militarie, so perfect in the beginnings of the Peloponnesian Warre, as long continuance and daily exercise had now made them. The times following produced no actions of worth or moment, those excepted which were undertaken against forraine enemies, proving for the most part unfortunate. But in this last fight all Greece was interested, which never had more able Souldiers, and brave Commanders, nor ever contended for victorie with greater care of the successe, or more obstinate resolution. All which notwithstanding the issue being such as hath bin related, it was found best for every particular Estate, that a generall peace should be established, every one retaining what he presently had, and none being forced to depend upon another. The Messenians were by name comprised in this new league; which caused the Lacedæmonians not to enter into it. Their standing out hindered not the rest from proceeding to conclusion, considering that Sparta was now too weak to offend her Neighbours, and therefore might well be allowed to shew that anger in ceremonies, which had no power to declare it selfe in execution. This peace, as it gave some breath and refreshing to all the Countrey, so to the Cities of Athen and Sparta it afforded leisure to seeke after wealth by forraine employment in Egypt, whither Agefilaus was sent with some small forces to assist, or indeed, as a Mercenarie, to serve under Tachos King of Egypt in his warre upon Syria. Chabrias the Athenian, who had before commanded under Acoris King of Egypt, went now as a voluntarie, with such forces as he could raise, by entreatie, and offer of good pay, to the same service. These Egyptian Kings descended from Amiramus of Sais, who rebelled against Darius; Nothus, having retained the Countrey, notwithstanding all intestine dissensions, and forraine invasions, during three Generations of their owne race, were so well acquainted with the valour of the Greekes, that by their helpe (easily procured with gold) they conceived great hope, not onely to assure themselves, but to become Lords of the Provinces adjoining, which were held by the Persian. What the issue of this great enterprize might have been, had it not fallen by Domestickall rebellion, it is uncertaine. But very likely it is, that the rebellion it selfe had soon come to nothing, if Agefilaus had not proved a false Traitor, joyning with Neitanebus, who rose against his Prince, and helping the Rebelle with that Armie which the mony of Tachos had waged. This falshood Agefilaus excused, as tending to the good of his own Countrey, though it seeme rather, that he grudged because the King tooke upon himselfe the conduct of the Armie, using his service onely as Lievtenant, who had made full account of being appointed the General. How soever it came to passe, Tachos being shamefully betrayed by them, in whom he had reposed his chiefe confidence, fled unto the Persian, who upon his submission gave him gentle entertainment; and Neitanebus (who seemes to have beene the Nephew of Tachos) reigned in his stead. At the same time the Citizens of Atendis had set up another King; to whom all, or most of the Egyptians yielded their obedience. But Agefilaus fighting with him in places of advantage, prevailed so far, that he left Neitanebus in quiet possession of the Kingdome; who in recompence of his treason to the former King Tachos, and good service done to himselfe, rewarded him with two hundred and thirtie Talents of silver, with which bootie sailing homewards, he died by the way. He was a Prince very temperate, and valiant, and a good Leader in Warre, free from covetousnesse, and not reproached with any blemish of lust; which praises are the lesse admirable in him, for that the discipline of Sparta was such as did endue every one of the Citizens (not carried away by the violent streame of an ill nature) with all, or the chiefe of these good qualities. He was nevertheless very arrogant, perverse, unjust, and vaine-glorious, measuring all things by his owne will, and obstinately prosecuting those courses, whose ends were beyond hope. The expedition of Xenophon had filled him him with an opinion, that by his hand the Empire of Persia should be overthrown, with which conceit being transported, and finding his proceedings interrupted by the Thebans and their Allies, he did ever after bear such hatred unto Thebes, as compelled that Estate by meere necessitie to grow war-like, and able, to the utter dishonour of Sparta, and the irreparable losse of all her former greatnes. The commendations given to him by Xenophon his good friend, have caused Plutarch to lay his name in the ballance against Pompey the Great; whose actions (the solemne gravitie of carriage excepted) are very disproportionable. Yet we may truly say, That as Pompey made great warres under sundry Climates and in all the Provinces of the Roman Empire, exceeding in the multitude of imployments all that were before him; so Agefilaus had at one time or other some quarrell with every Towne in Greece, had made a Warre in Asia, and meddled in the businesse of the Egyptians, in which varietie he went beyond all his Predecessours: yet not winning any Countries, as Pompey did many, but obtaining large wages, which Pompey never tooke. Herein also they were very like; Each of them was the last great Captain which his Nation brought forth in time of libertie, and each of them ruined the libertie of his Countrey by his owne Lordly wilfulness. We may therefore well say, Similia magis omnia quam paria; Thebes resemblance was neerer than the equalitie. Indeed the freedome of Rome was lost with Pompey, falling into the hands of Cæsar, whom he had informed to take Armes; yet the Roman Empire stood, the form of Government onely being changed: But the libertie of Greece, or of Sparta it selfe, was not forfeited unto the Thebans, whom Agefilaus had compelled to enter into a victorious Warre; yet the Signiorie, and ancient renowne of Sparta was presently lost; and the freedome of all Greece being wounded in this Theban warre, and after much blood lost, ill healed by the peace ensuing, did very soon, upon the death of Agefilaus, give up the ghost, and the Lordship of the whole Countrey was seized by Philip King of Macedon, whose actions are now on foot, and more to be regarded than the Contemporarie passages of things, in any other Nation.

Of Philip the father of Alexander the Great, King of Macedon.

§. I.

What Kings reigned in Macedon before Philip.

HHe Greekes, of whom we have already made large discourse, nor as yet wearied with intestine War, nor made wise by their vaine contention for superiority, doe still, as in former times, continue the invasion and vastation of each other.

Against Xerxes, the greatest Monarch of that part of the world, they defended their libertie, with as happy successe as ever Nation had, and with no lesse honour, than hath ever bin acquired by deeds of Arms. And having had a trial and experience, more than fortunate, against those nations, they so little regarded what might come from them, who had so often forfeited the reputation of their forces, as whatsoever could be spared from their own distraction at home, they transported over the Hellepont, as sufficient, to entertaine and buse them withall.

But, as it commonly falleth out with every man of mark in the world, that they underfall, and perish by the hands and harmes which they least feare; so fared it at this time with the Greeks. For of Philip of Macedon, of whom we are now to speake, they had so little regard, as they grew even then more violent in devouring each other, when the fast-growing greatness of such a Neighbour-King, should, in regard of their owne safeties, have served them for a strong argument of union and accord. But the glorie of their Persian victories, wherewith they were pampered and made proud, taught them to neglect all Nations but themselves, and the rather to value at little the power and purposes of the Macedonians, because those Kings and States, which fate nearer them than they did, had in the time of Amyntas the father of Philip, so much weakened them, and won upon them, that they were not (as the Greeks persuaded themselves) in any one age, likely to recover recover their owne, much lesse to worke any wonders against their borderers. And, indeed, it was not in their Philosphie to consider, That all great alterations are frommelike, sudden, and violent; and that it is then over-late to repair the decayed and broken banks, when great rivers are once swollen, fast-running, and enraged. No, the Greekes did rather imploy themselves, in breaking downe those defences, which stood betweene them and this inundation, than seek to rampire and re-enforce their owne fields, which by the Levell of reason they might have found to have lien under it. It was therefore well concluded by Orosius: Græciæ Civitates imperare singula cupiunt, imperium omnes perdidērunt; The Cities of Greece lost their command, by striving each of them to command all.

The Kingdome of Macedon, so called of Macedon, the sonne of Ofris, or, as other Authors ascribe, of Jupiter and Æthra, is the next Region towards the North which bordereth Greece; It hath to the East, the Ægean Sea; it is bounded on the North and North-west, by the Thracians and Illyrians; and on the South and South-west, by Thessalie and Epirus.

Their Kings were of the familie of Temenus of the race of Hercules, and by nation Argives; who are listed as followeth. About some fixe yeares after the translation of the Assyrian Empire, Arbaces then governing Media, Caranus of Argos, commanded by an Oracle, to lead a Colonie into Macedon, departed thence with many people, and as he was marching through that Countrey, the weather being raynie and tempestuous, he espied a great herd of Goats, which fled the storme as fast as they could, halting them to their knowne place of covert. Whereupon Caranus, calling to minde, that he had also by another Oracle bin directed, to follow the first troupe of beasts, that should either lead him, or flie before him; He pursued these Goats to the Gates of Edessa, and being undiscovered by the Inhabitants, by reason of the darknesse of the aire, he entered their Citie without resistance, and possesit it. Soone after this, by the overthrow of Cisseus, Caranus became Lord of the rest of Macedon, and held it eight and twentie yeares. Cænus succeeded Caranus, and reigned twelve yeares. Tyrinus followed Cænus, and ruled eight and twentie yeares.

Perdiccas the first, the son of Tyrinus, governed one and fiftie yeares: a Prince, for his great valour, and many other vertues, much renowned. Solinus, Plinie, Iustine, Eusebius, Sole, Thophilus, Antiochenus, and others, affirm, that he appointed a place of burial for himself, and for all the Kings of Macedon his Successors, at Æge: assuring them, that the Kingdome should so long continue in his Line and Race, as they continued to lay up their bodies in that Sepulchre; wherein it is said, that because Alexander the Great failed, therefore the posteritie of the Temenide failed in him: a thing rather devised after the effect, as I conceive, than foretold by Perdiccas.

Argæus succeeded unto Perdiccas, and ruled eight and twentie yeares.

Philip the first, his successor, reigned eight and twentie yeares.

Europus followed Philip, and governed fixe and twentie yeares: in whose infancie the Illyrians invaded Macedon, and having obtained a great victorie, they pursued the same, to the great danger of that State. Whereupon the Macedonians, gathering new forces, and resolving either to recover their former losse, or to lose at once both their Kingdome and their King, they carried him with them in his cradle into the field, and returned victorious; for they were either confident that their Nation could not be beaten (their King being present) or rather they perswaded themselves that there was no man so void of honour and compassion, as to abandon their natural Lord, being an infant, and no way (but by the hands of his servants) able to defend himselfe from destruction. The like is reported by Aimanius of Clotarius the son of Fredegunda.

Alcetas succeeded Europus, and ruled nine and twentie yeares.

Amyntas the first succeeded Alcetas, and reigned fiftie yeares; He lived at such time as Darius Histaspes, after his unprosperous returne out of Scythia, sent Megabazus with an Armie into Europe, who in Xerxes name requied Amyntas to acknowledge him for his Supreme Lord, by yielding unto him Earth and Water. But his Embassadors, as you have heard before, were, for their insolent behaviour towards the Macedonian Ladies, slain by the direction of Alexander, who was the sonne of Amyntas, and his Successor.

Alexander surnamed the Rich, the sonne of Amyntas, governed Macedon three and fortie years. He did not only appease the wrath of Megabazus, for the slaughter of the Persian Embassadors, by giving Gygæa his Sister, to Babares of the blood of Persia, but by that match he grew to great in Xerxes grace, as he obtained all that Region between the Mountains of Olympus and Hemus, to be united to the Kingdome of Macedon. Yet could not these benefits buy his affection from the Greeks. For Xerxes being returned into Asia, and Mardonius made Generall of the Persian Armie; Alexander acquainted the Greeks with all his intents and purposes against them. He had three sons, Perdiccas, Alcetas and Philip.

Perdiccas the second, the sonne of Alexander, lived in the time of the Phloponnesian war, and reigned in all eight and twentie years. The wars which he made were not much to remarkable: the storie of them is found here and there by pieces in Thucydides his first fixe Books. He left behind him two sons; Perdiccas, who was very young; and Archelau, who was bafe borne.

Perdiccas the third, being delivered to the custodie and care of Archelau, was at seven years of age cast into a Well and drowned by his false Guardian: who excusing this fact to Cleopatra the mother of the young King, said, That the child in following a Goose hastily, fell thereinto by misadventure. But Archelau stayed not here: for having thus dispatched his brother, he slew both his Uncle Alcetas the son of Alexander the Rich, and Alexander the son of this Alcetas, his Cousin German, and enjoyed the Kingdome of Macedon himselfe foure and twentie years.

This Archelau, of whom both Plato and Aristotle make mention, though he made himselfe King by wicked murder, yet he performed many things greatly to the profit of his Nation. It is said, That he fought by all means to draw Socrates unto him, and that he greatly loved and honoured Eurypides the Tragedian. He had two sons, Archelau and Orestes.

Archelau the second succeeded his father, and having reigned seven years, he was slain in hunting, either by chance, or of purpose by Crataeus.

Orestes his younger sonne was committed to the education of Æropus, of the royall blood of Macedon, & had the same measure which Archelau had measured to his Pupils; for Æropus murdered him and usurped the Kingdome, which he held some fixe years: so the same who denied passage to Agessilaus King of Sparta, who desired after his returne from the Asian expedition, to passe by the way of Macedon into Greece.

This Usurper left three sons, Pausanias, Argæus, and Alexander. Pausanias succeeded his father Æropus, and having reigned one year, he was driven out by Amyntas the son of Philip, the son of the first Perdiccas, the son of Alexander the Rich; which Philip was then preserved, when Archelau the Bastard slew his brother Perdiccas, his uncle Alcetas, and his son Alexander. This Amyntas reigned (though very unquietly) foure and twentie years; for he was not only infested by Pausanias, assisted by the Thracians; and by his brother Argæus; encouraged by the Illyrians; and by the said Argæus, for two years dispossessed of Macedon: but on the other side, the Olynthians, his Neighbours near 40 the Ægean Sea, made themselves for a while Masters of Pella, the chiefe Citie of Macedon.

Amyntas the second had by his wife Eurydice the Illyrian, three sonnes; Alexander the second, Perdiccas the third, and Philip the second, Father of Alexander the Great; and one Daughter called Euryone or Exione. He had also by his second Wife Gygæa, three Sons; Archelau, Argæus, and Menelaus, afterward slaine by their brother Philip. He had more by a Concubine, Protomie surnamed Alorites, of the Citie Alorum, wherein he was borne.

Alexander the second reigned not much above one year, in which time he was invaded by Pausanias, the sonne of Æropus, but defended by Iphecrates the Athenian, while he was at that time about Amphipolis. He was also constrained (for the payment of a great sum of money) to leave his youngest brother Philip in Hostage with the Illyrians, who had subjected his father Amyntas to the payment of tribute. After this, Alexander being invited by the Alexand against Alexander the tyrant of Pheres in Thessalie, having redeemed his brother Philip, to draw the Thebans to his assistance, entred into Confederacie with Pelopidas, being at that time in the same Countrey, with whom hee also left Philip with divers other principall persons, for the gage of his promises to Pelopidas. But Eurydice his mother falling in love with her Son-in-law, who had married her Daughter Daughter Euryone or Exione, practised the death of Alexander her son, with a purpose to conferre the Kingdome on her Paramour, which Protomy Alorites did put in execution: by means whereof he held Macedon for three years, but was soon after slain by Perdiccas the brother of Alexander. Diodore hath it otherwise of Philip being made pleg; Diod. lib. 16. That Amyntas his father delivered him for hostage to the Illyrians, by whom he was conveyed to Thebes, there to be kept: others report that Philip (while his father was yet living) was first ingaged to the Thebans, and delivered for hostage a second time by Alexander his brother.

Perdiccas the third, after he had slain Alorites his bafe brother, governed Macedon 10 five years, and was then slain in a battel against the Illyrians, according to Diodorus; but Justine affirmeth that he perished by the practice of Eurydice his mother, as Alexander Just. lib. 17. did.

§. II.

The beginning of Philips reigne: and how he delivered Macedon from the troubles wherein hee found it intangled.

Philip the second, the youngest son of Amyntas by Eurydice, having bin instructed in all knowledge requisite unto the government of a Kingdome, in that excellent education which he had under Epaminondas, making an escape from Thebes, returned into Macedon, in the first year of the hundred and fifti Olympiad, which was after the building of Rome three hundred fourscore and thirteen years: and finding the many enemies and dangers wherewith the Kingdome was invironed, he took on him, not as a King (for Perdiccas left a son, though but an infant) but as the Protector of his Nephew, and Commander of the men of war. Yet his fruitfull ambition soon over-grew his modestie, and he was easily perswaded by the people to accept both the title of King, and withall, the absolute rule of the Kingdome. And to say the truth, the necessitie of the State of Macedon at that time required a King both prudent and active. For, besides the incursions 30 of the Illyrians and Pannonians, the King of Thrace did set up in opposition Pausanias; the Athenians, Argæus, sons of the late Usurper Æropus: each of these labouring to place in Macedon a King of their own election. These heave burdens when Philip could not well bear, he bought off the weightiest by mony, and by faire promises unloaded himself of so many of the rest, as he ran under the remainder happily enough. For, notwithstanding that his brother Perdiccas had his death accompanied with four thousand Macedonians, beside those that were wounded and taken prisoners; & that the Pannonians were destroying all before them in Macedon; and that the Athenians with a Fleet by Sea, and three thousand Souldiers by Land under Mantias, did beat upon him on all sides & quarters of his Countrey: yet after he had practised the men of war of Pannonia, and corrupted them with gifts; and had also bought the King of Thrace from Pausanias, he forthwith made head against the Athenians his stiffest enemies; and, for the first, he prevented their recoverie of Amphipolis, a Citie on the frontier of Macedon: and did then pursue 40 Argæus the son of Æropus, set against him by the Athenians, and followed him so hard at the heeles, in his retreat from Æges, that he forced him to abide the battell: which Argæus lost, having the greatest part of his Armie slaine in the place. Those of the Athenians, and others which remained unbroken, took the advantage of a strong peece of ground at hand, which though they could not long defend, yet avoiding thereby the present furie of the Souldiers, they obtained of the vanquishers life and libertie to returne into Attica. Whereupon a peace was concluded between him and the Athenians 50 for that present, and for this clemencie he was greatly renowned and honoured by all the Greekes.

§. III.

The good successe which Philip had in many enterprises.

Now had Philip leisure to looke Northward, and to attend the Illyrians and Pannonians, his irreconcilable enemies and borderers: both which he invaded with so prosperous success, as he slew Bardilis, King of the Thyrians, with seven thousand of his Nation, and thereby recovered all those places which the Thyrians held in Macedon; and withall, upon the death of the King of Pannonia, he pierc'd that Country, and after a maine victory obtained, he enforc'd them to pay him tribute. This was no sooner done, than (without staying to take longer breath) he hastned speedily towards Larissa, upon the river Peneus in Thessaly, of which Town he soone made himselfe master; and thereby he got good footing in that Country, whereof he made use in time following. Now al- though he resolv'd either to subdue the Thessalians, or to make them his owne against all others, because the horse-men of that Country were the best, and most feared in that part of Europe; yet he thought it most for his safety to close up the entrances out of Thrace, lest while he invaded Thessaly and Greece towards the South, those ample Nations, lying towards the North, should either withdraw him, or over-run Macedon, as in former times. He therefore attempted Amphipolis, seated on the famous river of Strimon, which parteth Thrace from Macedon, and won it. He also recovered Pydna; and (to the North of Amphipolis) the City of Crenides (sometime Datus) and called it after his name Philippi: to the people whereof Saint Paul afterward directed one of his Epistles. This place, wherein Philippi stood, is very rich in mines of gold, out of which, greatly to the advancement of Philips affairs, he drew yearly a thousand talents, which make fixe hundred thousand French Crownes.

And that he might with the more ease disburden the Thracian shores of the Athenian Garrisons, to which he had given a great blow by the taking in of Amphipolis, he entred into league with his fathers malicious enemies, the Olynthians; whom the better to listen unto him, he gave them the City of Pydna with the territory, meaning nothing lesse than that they should enjoy it, or their own Estate, many years.

Now that he might by degrees win ground upon the Greekes, he tooke the faire occasion to deliver the City of Pheres in Thessaly, from the tyrants Lycophron and Timphonus: who, after they had conspired with Tebe the wife of Alexander, who usurped upon the liberty of that State, they themselves (Alexander being murdered) held it also by the same strong hand and oppression that Alexander did, till by the assistance of Philip they were beaten out, and Pheres restored to her former liberty. Which act of Philip did for ever after fatten the Thessalians unto him, and, to his exceeding great advantage, binde them to his service.

§. IV.

Of the Phocian War which first drew Philip into Greece.

About this time, to wit, in the second yeare of the hundred and sixth Olympiad, eight yeares after the battell of Maninea, and about the eighth yeare of Artaxerxes Ochus, began that War, called Sacred. Now, as all occasions concur to- wards the execution of eternall providence, and of every great alteration in the World, there is some preceding preparation, though not at the first easily discerned; so did this revengefull hatred by the Thebans, Thessalians, and Locrians, conceived against the Phocians, not only teach Philip how he might with halfe a hand wrest the sword out of their fingers; but the Greekes themselves, beating downe their owne defences, to give him an easie passage; and bearing themselves, to give him victory without perill, left nothing unperformed towards their owne slavery, saving the title and imposition. Of this War the Thebans (made over-proud by their victory at Leutres) were the inflamers. For at the Councell of the Amphyctiones, or of the generall Estates of Greece, in which at that time, they sway'd most, they caus'd both the Lacedemonians and Phocians to be condemn'd in greater summes of money than they could well beare; the one for surprizing the Castle of Cadmea in the time of peace, the other for ploughing up a piece of ground belonging to the Temple of Delphos. The Phocians being resolv'd not to obey this Edict, were secretly set on and encouraged by the Lacedemonians: and for refusal were expos'd as Sacrileggers, and accus'd to all their neighbour-Nations, for whom it was then lawfull to invade, and destroy them at their pleasures.

The Phocians perswaded thereunto by Philomelus, a Capaine of their owne, cast the same dice of hazzard that Cesar after many Ages following did; but had not the same chance.

chance. Yet they dealt well enough with all the enemies of their owne Nation. And the better to beare out an ungracious quarrell, of which there was left no hope of composition, they resolv'd to sacke the Temple it selfe. For seeing that for the ploughing of a peece of Apollo's ground, they had so much offended their Neighbour-God, and their Neighbour-Nations, as worke could not befall them than already was intended; they resolv'd to take the gold with the ground, and either to perish for all, or to prevail against all that had commision to call them to account. The treasure which they tooke out of the Temple in the beginning of the Warre, was ten thousand talents, which in those dayes serv'd them to wage a great many men; and such was their success in the beginning of the war, as they won three great battels against the Thebans, Thessalians, and Locrians; but being beaten in the fourth, their Leader Philomelus cast himselfe headlong over the Rocks.

In the meane while the Cities of Chersonesus, both to defend themselves against their bad neighbour Philip, who encroached upon them, and to draw others into their quarrell, rendred themselves to the Athenians. Philip prepar'd to get them into his hands, and at the siege of Mecheon lost one of his eyes. It is said, That he that shot him, did purposely direct his arrow towards him, and that it was written on the shaft thereof After Philippo; After to Philip: for so he was called that gave him the wound. This Citie he even'd with the soile.

Plutarch in Philip.
Strabo l. 8.

The Tyrant Lycophron before mentioned, while Philip was busied on the border of Thrace, and the Thessalians engag'd in the holy war, entred Thessalie with new forces, being assisted by Onomarchus, Commander of the Phocian Armie, in place of Philomelus. For hereby the Phocians hop'd so to enterraine the Thessalians at home, as they should not find leasure to invade them. Hereupon was Philip the second time called into Thessalie; but both the Thessalians and Macedonians (Philip being present) were utterly overthrowne by Onomarchus, and great numbers of both Nations lost. From Thessalie, Onomarchus drew speedily towards Boeotia, and with the same victorious Armie brake the forces of the Boeotians, and took from them their Citie of Coronea. But Philip, impatient of his late misadventure, after he had re-enforc'd his Armie, returned with all speed into Thessalie, there to find againe the honour which he lately lost: and was the second time encountered by Onomarchus, who brought into the field twentie thousand foot, and five hundred horse. All this great preparation suffic'd not; for Onomarchus was by Philip surmounted, both in numbers and in good fortune, his Armie overthrown, fixe thousand slaine, and three thousand taken: of which number himselfe being one, was among others hanged by Philip. Those that fled, were in part received by the Athenian Gallies, which sail'd alongst the coast, commanded by Chares; but the greatest number of those that tooke the Sea, were therein devour'd ere they recovered them. Lycophron was now againe driven out of Thessalie, and Pheres made free as before.

§. V.

Of the Olynthian war. The ambitious practices of Philip.

From hence Philip resolv'd to invade Phocia it selfe, but the Athenians did not favour his entrance into those parts; and therefore with the helpe of the Lacedemonians, they retrencht his passage at the Straits of Thermopylis. Whereupon he returned into Macedon, and after the taking of Micyberne, Torone, and other Towns, he quarrell'd with the Olynthians, whom not long before he had woo'd to his alliance, and bought his peace of them. For the Olynthians were very strong, and had evermore both brav'd and beaten the Macedonians. It is said, that Philip having put to death Archelaus his halfe brother (for Amyntas had three sons by Eurydice the Mother of Philip, and three other sons by Gygaa: but Philip elder brothers by the same Mother being dead, he determin'd to rid himselfe also of the rest) the two younger held themselves within Olynthus; and that the receiving of them by the Olynthians was the cause of the war, Justine affirmeth. But just quarrels are ballanced by just Princes, for to this King all things were lawfull that might serve his turne, all his affections, and passions, how divers soever in other men, were in his ambition swallowed up, and therein converted. For

For he neither forbore the murder of his owne brothers, the breach of faith, the buying of other mens fidelitie: he esteemed no place strong where his Affe loaden with gold might enter; nor any Citie or State unconquerable, where a few of the greatest, to be made greater, could lose the sense of other mens sorrow and subjection. And because he thought it vain to practise the winning of Olynthus, till he had inclosed all the power they had within their owne Walls, he entred their Territorie, and by the advantage of a well-compounded and trained Armie, he gave them two overthrowes ere he fate down before the Citie it selfe: which done, he bought Euthicrates and Lafthenes from their people, and from the service of their Countrie and common-weale, by whose treason he entred the Towne, slew his brothers therein, sackt it, and sold the inhabitants for slaves by the drumme. By the spoile of this place he greatly enriched himselfe, and had treasure sufficient to buy in other Cities withall, which he daily did. For so was he advised by the Oracle in the beginning of his undertaking, That he should make his assaults with silver speares: Whereupon Horace well and truly said, Horacum, Od. 16.

Diffidit Urbium
Portas vir Macedo, & subruit amulos
Reges muneribus.

By gifts the Macedon clave Gates asunder,
And Kings envying his estate brought under.

And it is true that he won more by corruption and fraud, than he did by force. For as he had in all the principall Cities of Greece his secret workers (which way of Conquest was well followed by Philip the second of Spain;) So when in the contention between the Competitors, for the Kingdome of Thrace, he was chosen the Arbitrator; he came not to the Councell accompanied with Pietie and Justice, but with a powerfull Armie, and having beaten and slain both Kings, gave sentence for himselfe, and made the Kingdome his owne.

§. VI.

How Philip ended the Phocian warre.

THE war still continued between the Phocians and the Associates of the holy war: the Bæotians, finding themselves unable to subsist without some present aid, sent unto Philip for succour, who willingly yeelded to their necessities, & sent them such a proportion of men, as were neither sufficient to master their enemies, nor to assure themselves; but yet to enable them to continue the war, and to waste the strength of Greece. They also sent to Artaxerxes Ochus for supply of treasure, who lent them thirty talents, which makes a hundred and fourescore thousand crownes: but when with these supplies they had still the worst against the Phocians, who held from them three of the strongest Cities within Bæotia it selfe, they then besought Philip of Macedon that he would assist them in person, to whom they would give an entrance into their Territorie, and in all things obey his Commandements in war.

Now had Philip what he longed for; for he knew himselfe in state to give the law to both, & so quitting all his other purposes towards the North, he marched with a speedy pace towards Bæotia, where being arrived, Phallemus who commanded the Phocian Armie, fearing to shooke with this victorious King, made his owne peace, and withdrew himselfe with a Regiment of eight thousand Souldiers into Peloponnesus, leaving the Phocians to the mercie of the Conqueror; and for conclusion he had the glorie of that war called Sacred, which the Grecians with so many mutuall slaughters had continued for ten years; and, besides the glorie, he posselt himselfe of Orchomenus, Coronea, and Ceræa, in the Countrie of the Bæotians, who invited him to be victorious over themselves. He brought the Phocians into servitude, and wasted their Cities, and gave them but their Villages to inhabit, reserving unto himselfe the yearly tribute of three score talents, which make fixe and thirtie thousand French Crowns. He also hereby (besides the same of pietie for service of the gods) obtained the same double voice in the Councell of the

Amphyziones,

Amphyziones which the Phocians had, with the superintendencie of the Pythian games, forfeited by the Corinthians, by being partakers in the Phocian sacriledge.

§. VII.

How Philip with ill successe attempted upon Perinthus, Byzantium, and the Scythians.

Philip, after his triumphant returne into Macedon, by the Lievtenant of his Armie Parmenio, slaughtered many thousands of the Ilyrians and Dardarians, and brought the Thracians to pay him the tenth part of all their revenues. But his next enterprize against the Perinthians stayed his furie. Perinthus was a Citie of Thrace, seated upon Propontis, in the mid-way between Sestos and Byzantium, a place of great strength, and a people resolved to defend their libertie against Philip, where the Athenians encouraged and assisted them. Philip fate downe before it with a puissant Armie, made many faire breaches, gave many furious assaults, built many over-topping and commanding Towers about it. But he was repelled with equall violence. For whereas Philip thought by his continual assaults to wearie them, and waste both their men and munition, they were supplied, not only from the Persian with mea and mony, and succoured from Byzantium, which stood upon the same sea-coast, but they were relieved from Athens, Chio, and Rhodes, by the conduction of Phocion, with whatsoeuer was wanting to their necessitie. But because those of Byzantium, by reason of their neighbourhood, and easie passage by water, gave them often and readie helpe, Philip removed the one halfe of his Armie, and besieged it, leaving fiftene thousand foot before Perinthus, to force it if they could: But to be short, he failed in both attempts, (as all Princes commonly doe that undertake divers enterprises at one time) and returned into Macedon with no lesse dishonour than losse: whereupon he made an overture of peace with the Athenians, and greatly desired into which though Phocion perswaded them in all he could, and that by the occasion offered they might greatly advantage their conditions; yet Demosthenes with his eloquence prevailed in the refusal. In the mean while, Philip having digested his late affront, and supplied his expence, by the taking of an hundred three score and ten Merchants ships, he gathered new forces, and being accompanied with his son Alexander, led them into Scythia; but he was also unprosperous in that enterprize: For the Triballi, a people of Mæsia, set on him in his return, wounded him, and rooke from him the greatest part of the spoiles which he had gathered.

§. VIII.

How Philip overthrowing the Greekes in the battell of Cheronæa, was chosen Capitaine-Generall of Greece. The death of Philip.

AMONG these Northern Nations (part of which he suppress, and part quieted) he spent some eight yeares; and in the ninth yeare, after the end of the holy Warre, he was by his great advantage invited againe by the Grecians to their assistance. For the Citizens of Amphissa having disobeyed the decree of the Amphyziones, in which Philip had a double voice, and who by reason that the Thebans and Locrians gave countenance and aide to the Amphissionians, the rest were not of themselves able to constrain them, they besought Philip to come in person to their assistance. Now you must thinke that Philip was not long in resolving upon this enterprize; hee needed no drawing on, whom nothing could keepe backe; nor other dissuasion than a masting power could hold thence. He therefore commanded his Armie forthwith to march; the same being compounded of thirtie thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse; and with as much expedition as could be made, he entred Phocis, won Plataea, and brought into subjection all that Region.

The rest, and especially the Athenians, although they had good cause to fear that a great part of this storme would fall on themselves, yet were they dissuaded by Demosthenes from accepting such reasonable conditions of peace as Philip offered, and rather made choice (having drawne the Thebans to joyne with them) to leave the enjoying of their estates estates and their freedom to the chance of one battell, than to hold it either by composition, or by the grace of Philip. But this their Oratours eloquence cost them deare. It is true, that he could far more easily minde them of the vertue of their Ancestors, than make them such as they were. He might repeat unto them (with words moving passion) the wonders they wrought at Marathon, but he could not transforme the Macedonians into Persians, nor draw from the dead, a Miltiades, an Aristides, a Themistocles, or a Cimon, or any of those famous Commanders, whose great vertues they had payed with the greatest ingratitude that ever Nation did. A Phocion they had, but by the strength of a contrary faction he was at this time in disgrace, and not employed: in so much as when the Armies of Philip and the Confederates incountr'd, although some thousand of the Athenians did abide the killing, and the like number well-near of the Thebans died with them; yet the want of the worthy men on that side to hold up the rest, and to draw them on, and the many choice Captains of the Macedonians, incouraged by a King of a growing fortune, as it gave to Philip so shining a victory, that Alexander by the light thereof found his way (in despite of all the Nations interjacent) into Persia, India, and Egypt; so it cut to the ground, and gave end and dare to all the Grecian glory: Yea their liberty (saith Curcius) with their large Dominion won with so many difficulties, continued for so many Ages, and so often defended against the greatest Kings, was now lost in a moment, and for ever lost.

Now this advised King (never passionate to his disadvantage) to the end he might obtaine the Sovereignty over all Greece, and be acknowledged for their Captain-General against the Persians, without any further hazzard or trouble, was content to let go those Athenians that were taken at this battell of Cheronara, as he also forbore to attempt any thing against their Citie: but in Thebes (which lately by the vertue of Epaminondas triumphed over the rest) he lodged a Garrison of Macedonians. And being soon after according unto the long desire which he had nourished of this Sovereignty, by the general States at Corinth, stiled the first Commander of all the Grecians, and contribution of men and money granted him, he compounded an Army of great strength, and under the Commandement of Attalus and Parmenio, transported the same over the Hellespont into Asia, to begin the War. Of his enterprise against Persia, he sought the successe from the Oracle at Delphos, from whence he received such another convertible riddle, as Cræsus did when he attempted Cyrus, and was in like sort mistaken in the exposition.

But as it is hard to discern and withstand the flatteries of our owne appetites, so Philip's ambitious desire to invade Persia, abuse his judgement, so farre, that the death, wherewith himselfe was threatened, he understood to be delivered of his enemy, whom he intended presently to invade. Before his purposed departure into Asia, he prepared for the marriage of his Daughter Cleopatra, with Alexander King of Epirus; to which feast and pastimes thereat appointed, he invited all his Friends and Allies, with the principall persons of the Grecian Cities, from whom he received much honour and many rich presents: but this was indeed the feast of his Funerall. For having refused to do justice to one Pausanias, a Gentleman of his Guard, whom Attalus (greatly favoured by Philip) had first made drunk, and then left to be carnally abused by divers base persons; this Pausanias grew into so great a detestation of the Kings partiality in so soule afe, as when Philip was passing towards the Theater, he drew a sword from under his long garment and wounded him to death, when he had lived fixe and forty years, and reigned five and twenty. Justine reports it, that Olympias incouraged Pausanias to murder the King her husband, which after his death she boldly avowed, by the honour she did unto Pausanias, in crowning his dead body, in consecrating his sword unto Apollo, by building for him a monument, and other like Graces.

§. I X.

What good foundations of Alexanders greatnesse were laid by Philip. Of his laudable qualities and issue.

Now although he were then taken from the World, when he had mastered all opposition on that side of the Sea, and had seenne the fruits of his hopes, and labours, changing colour towards ripenesse and perfection; yet hee was here.

herein happy that he lived to see his son Alexander at mans estate, and had himselfe bin ancie-witnesse of his resolution and singular valour in this last battell.

The foundation of whose future greatnesse he had laid so soundly for him, with so plaine a pattern of the buildings which himselfe meant to erect, as the performance and finishing was farre more easie to Alexander, though more glorious than the beginnings unto Philip, though lesse famous. For, besides the recovery of Macedonia it selfe, in competition between him and the sonnes of Alepus, the one assisted by the Thracians, the other by the Athenians, and besides the regaining of many places posselt by the Illyrians, the crushing of all those Northern Kings his Neighbours, the over-throw of Olynthus, a State that despised the power of his Father, the many Maritime Cities taken, of great strength and ancient freedom, and the subjection of that famous Nation of Greece, which for so many ages had defended it selfe against the greatest Kings of the World, and won upon them; He left unto his sonne, and had bred up for him so many choice Commanders, as the most of them, both for their valour and judgement in the Warre, were no lesse worthy of Crownes, than himselfe was that was a Crowne: For it was said of Parmenio (whom Alexander, ungratefull to so great vertue, impiously murdered) That Parmenio had performed many things challenging eternall fame, without the King; but the King without Parmenio never did any thing worthy of renowne: as for the rest of his Captaines, though content to obey the Sonne of such a Father, yet did they not after Alexanders death endure to acknowledge any man Superiour to themselves.

Of this Prince it is hard to judge, whether his ambition had taught him the exercise of more vices, than Nature and his excellent education had enriched him with vertues. For besides that he was Valiant, Wise, Learned, and Master of his Affections, he had this favour of Piety, that he rather laboured to satifie those that were grieved, than to suppress them. Whereof (among many other) we finde a good example in his dealing with Aradani and Nicanor; whom, when for their evil speech of Philip, his familiars perswaded him to put to death; he answered them, That first it ought to be considered, whether the fault were in them that gave him ill language, or in himselfe: Secondly, that it was in every mans own power to be well spoken of: and this was shortly proved, for after Philip relieved their necessities, there were none within his Kingdome that did him more honour than they did. Whereupon he told those that had perswaded him to use violence, that he was a better Phyfician for evil speech than they were.

His Epistles to Alexander his son are remembered by Cicero and Gellius; and by Dion and Cassiodorus exceedingly commended. His Stratagems are gathered by Polyænus and Erwinus, his wife sayings by Plutarch. And albeit he held Macedonia in his owne right, all the time of his reign, yet was he not the true and next Heir thereof; for Amyntas, the son of his brother Perdiccas (of whom he had the Protection during his infancy) had the right. This Amyntas he married to his daughter Cyna, who had by him a daughter called Eurydice, who was married to Philip base son Arideus, her Uncle by the Mothers side: both which Olympias, Philip's first Wife, and Mother to Alexander the Great, put to death; Arideus by extreme torments: Eurydice she strangled.

Philip had by this Olympias, the daughter of Neoptolemus, King of the Molossians (of the race of Achilles) Alexander the Great, and Cleopatra. Cleopatra was married to her Uncle Alexander, King of Epirus, and was after her brother Alexanders death slaine at Sardis, by the commandement of Antigonus.

By Andata, an Illyrian, his second Wife, he had Cyna, married as is shewed before. By Nicasipolis, the Sister of Jason, Tyrant of Phæris, he had Theffalonica, whom Cassander after he had taken Pidna, married; but she was afterward by her father-in-law Antigonus put to death.

By Cleopatra the Neece of Attalus, he had Caranus, whom others call Philip: him Olympias, the Mother of Alexander the Great, caused to be rosted to death in a copper Pan. Others lay this murder to Alexander himselfe. By the same Cleopatra he had likewise a daughter called Eurota, whom Olympias also murdered at the Mothers breast.

By Phila and Meda he had no issue. He had also two Concubines, Arfnoe, whom after he had gotten with childe, he married to an obscure man, called Lagus, who bare Ptolomie King of Egypt, called the Sonne of Lagus, but esteemed the Son of Philip: by Philinna, his second Concubine, a pub-

a publike Dancer, he had Aridaus, of whom we shall have much occasion to speake hereafter.

CHAP. II.

Of ALEXANDER the Great.

§. I.

A briefer rehearsal of Alexanders doings, before he invaded Asia.

Alexander, afterward called the Great, succeeded unto Philip his Father; being a Prince no lesse valiant by Nature, than by Education, well instructed, and enriched in all sorts of Learning and good Arts. He began his reign over the Macedonians foure hundred and seventeen years after Rome was built, and after his own birth twenty years. The strange dreams of Philip his father, and that one of the gods in the shape of a Snake, begat him on Olympus his Mother, I omit as foolish tales; but that the Temple of Diana (a work the most magnificent of the world) was burnt upon the day of his birth, and that so strange an accident was accompanied with the newes of three severall victories, obtained by the Macedonians, it was very remarkable, and might with the reason of those times be interpreted for ominous, and foreshewing the great things by Alexander afterward performed. Upon the change of the King, the Neighbour-Nations, whom Philip had oppressed, began to consult about the recovery of their former libertie, and to adventure it by force of arms. Alexanders young years gave them hope of prevailing, and his suspected feverie increased courage in those, who could better resolve to die, than to live slavishly. But Alexander gave no time to those swelling humours, which might speedily have endangered the health of his Estate. For after revenge taken upon the Conspirators against his Father, whom he slew upon his Tombe, and the celebration of his Funerals; he first fastened unto him his own nation, by freeing them from all exactions & bodily slavery, other than their service in his Wars; and used such Kingly austeritie towards those that condemned his young years, and such clemencie to the rest that perswaded themselves of the crueltie of his disposition, as all affections being passed at home, he made a present journee into Peloponnesus, and so well exercised his spirits among them, as by the Councell of the States of Greece, he was according to the great desire of his heart, elected Captain-Generall against the Persians, upon which war Philip had not only resolved, (who had obtained the same title of Generall Commander) but had transported under the leading of Parmenio and Attalus, a part of his Armie, to recover some places on Asia-side, for the safe descent of the rest.

This enterprise against the Persian occupied all Alexanders affections; those fair marks of Riches, Honour, and large Dominion, he now shot at both sleeping and waking: all other thoughts & imaginations were either grievous or hateful. But a contrary wind arising, for he receiveth advertisement that the Athenians, Thebans, and Lacedemonians, had united themselves against him, and, by assistance from the Persian, hoped for the recovery of their former freedome. Hereto they were perswaded by Demosthenes, himselfe being thereto perswaded by the gold of Persia: the devile he used was more subtil than profitable; for hee caused it to be bruited that Alexander was slaine in a battaile against the Triballes, and brought into the assembly a companion whom hee had corrupted to affirme, that himselfe was present, and wounded in the battaile. There is indeed a certaine Doctrine of Policy (as Policy is now a daies defined by falsehood and knaverie) that devised rumors and lies, if they serve the turn but for a day or two, are greatly available. It is true that common people are sometimes mockt by them, as Souldiers are by false alarms in the Wars; but in all that I have observed, I have found the successe as ridiculous as the invention. For as those that finde themselves at one time abused by such like bruits, doe at other times neglect their duties; when they are upon true reports, and in occasions perillous, summoned to assemble; so doe all men in generall condemne the Vencers of such trumpery, and for them, feare upon necessary occasions to entertaine the truth it selfe. This labour unlooked for, and losse of time, was not only very grievous to Alexander, but by turning his sword from the ignoble and effeminate Persians, against which he had directed it, towards the manly & famous Grecians, of whose assistance he thought himselfe assured, his present undertaking was greatly disordered. But he that cannot endure to strive against the winde, shall hardly attaine the Port which he purpoeeth to recover: and it no lesse becommeth the worthiest men to oppose misfortunes, than it doth the weakest children to bewaile them.

Heretofore made such expedition towards these Revolters, as that himselfe, with the Army that followed him, brought them the first newes of his preparation. Hereupon all flagger, and the Athenians, as they were the first that moved, so were they the first that fainted, seeking by their Embassadors to pacifie the King, and to be received again into his grace. Alexander was not long in resolving; for the Persians perswaded him to pardon the Grecians. Wise men are not easily drawn from great purposes by such occasions as may easily be taken off, neither hath any King ever brought to effect any great affaire, who hath intangled himselfe in many enterprises at once, not tending to one and the same certaine end.

And having now quieted his borderers towards the South, he resolved to assure those Nations which lay on the North-side of Macedon, to wit, the Thracians, Triballes, Peones, Gets, Agrians, and other salvage people, which had greatly vexed with incursions, not onely other of his Predecessours, but even Philip his Father: withall which, after divers overthrowes given them, he made peace, or else brought them into subjection. Notwithstanding this good successe, hee could not yet finde the way out of Europe. There is nothing more naturall to man than liberty; the Greekes had enjoyed it over-long, and lost it too late to forget it; they therefore shake off the yoke once againe. The Thebans, who had in their Citadell a Garrison of a thousand Macedons, attempt to force it; Alexander hastneth to their succour, and presents himselfe with thirty thousand foot, all old souldiers, & three thousand horse, before the City, & gave the Inhabitants some daies to resolve, being even heart-sicke with the desire of passing into Asia. So unwilling, indeed, he was to draw blood of the Grecians, by whom he hoped to serve himselfe elsewhere, that he offered the Thebans remission, if they would only deliver into his hands Phenix and Prothytes, the stirrers up of the Rebellion. But they, opposing the mounting fortune of Alexander, (which bare all resistance before it, like the breaking in of the Ocean Sea) in stead of such an answer, as men besieged and abandoned should have made, demanded Philotas and Antipater to be delivered unto them; as if Thebes alone, then layed in the ballance of Fortune with the Kingdome of Macedon, and many other Provinces, could either have evened the scale or swayed it. Therefore in the end they perished in their obstinacy. For while the Thebans oppose the Army assailing, they are charged at the back by the Macedonian Garrison, their City taken and razed to the ground, sixe thousand slaine, and thirty thousand sold for slaves, at the price of foure hundred and forty talents. This the King did to the terror of the other Grecian Cities.

Many arguments were used by Cleandus one of the prisoners, to perswade Alexander to forbear the destruction of Thebes. He prayed the King to beleve that they were rather misse-led by giving hasty credit to false reports, than any way malicious; for being perswaded of Alexanders death, they rebelled but against his successeur. He also brought the King to remember, that his father Philip had his education in that City, yea that his Ancestour Hercules was borne therein: but all perswasions were fruitlesse; the times wherein offences are committed doe greatly aggravate them. Yet for the honour hee bare to learning, he pardoned all of the race of Pindarus the Poet, and spared, and set at liberty Timocles, the sister of Theagenes, who died in defence of the liberty of Greece against his father Philip. This noble woman being taken by a Thracian, and by him ravished, he threatened to take her life unless she would confesse her treasure: she led that Thracian to a Well, and told him that she had therein cast it: and when the Thracian stooped to looke into the Well, she suddenly thrust him into the mouth thereof, and flod him to death.

Now because the Athenians had received into their city so many of the Thebans, as had escaped escaped and fled unto them for succour, Alexander would not grant them peace, but upon condition to deliver into his hands both their Orators which perswaded this second revolt, and their Captaines; yet in the end it being a torment unto him to retard the enterprise of Persia, he was content that the Orators should remaine, and accepted of the banishment of the Captaines; wherein he was exceeding ill advised, had not this fortune, or rather the providence of God, made all the resistance against him unprofitable: for these good Leaders of the Gracians betooke themselves to the service of the Persian, whom after a few dayes he invaded.

§. II.

How Alexander passing into Asia, fought with the Persians upon the River of Granicus.

When all was now quieted at home, Alexander, committing to the trust of Antipater both Greece and Macedon, in the first of the Spring did passe the Hellepont, and being ready to disimbarke, he threw a Dart towards the Asian shore, as a token of defiance, commanding his Souldiers not to make any waite in their own Territorie, or to burne, or deface those buildings which themselves were presently, and in the future to possess. He landed his Armie, consisting of two and thirty thousand foot, and five thousand horse, all old Souldiers, neere unto Troy, where he offered a solemne sacrifice upon Achilles Tombe, his maternall Ancestor.

But before he left his own coast, hee put to death without any offence given him, all his Mother-in-lawes Kinsmen, whom Philip his Father had greatly advanced, nor sparing such of his own as he suspected. He also took with him many of his tributary Princes, of whose fidelity he doubted; thinking by unjust cruelty to assure all things, both in the present & future. Yet the end of all fell out contrary to the policy which his Ambition had commended unto him, though agreeing very well with the justice of God; for all that he had planted, was soon after withered, & rooted up; those, whom he most trusted, were the most traiterous; his mother, friends, and children, fell by such another mercilesse sword as his owne, and all manner of confusion followed his dead body to the grave, and left him there.

When the knowledge of Alexanders landing on Asia side was brought to Darius, he so much scorned the Armie of Macedon, and had so contemptible an opinion of Alexander himselfe, as having stiled him his servant on a letter which he wrote unto him, reprehending his disloyaltie and audacitie (for Darius intitled himselfe King of Kings, & the Kinsman of the gods) he gave order withall to his Lieutenants of the lesser Asia, that they should take Alexander alive, whip him with rods, and then convey him to his presence: that they should sinke his ships, and send the Macedons taken prisoners beyond the Red-Sea; belike unto Aethiopia, or some other unhealthfull part of Africa.

In this sort did this glorious King, confident in the glittering, but heartlesse, multitude which he commanded, dispose of the already-vanquished Macedonians: But the ill destinies of men beare them to the ground, by what strong confidence soever armed. The great numbers which he gathered together and brought in one heape into the field, gave rather an exceeding advantage to his enemies, than any discouragement at all. For besides that they were men utterly unacquainted with dangers, men who by the name and countenance of their King were wont to prevaile against those of lesse courage than themselves, men that took more care how to embroider with gold and silver their upper garments, as if they attended the invasion but of the Sunne-beames, than they did to arme themselves with yron and Steele against the sharpe pikes, swords and darts of the hardie Macedonians; I say, besides all these, even the opinion they had of their own numbers, of which every one in particular hoped that it would not fall to his turne to fight, filled every of them with the care of their owne safetie, without any intent at all to hazard any thing but their owne breath, and that of their horses, in running away. The Macedonians, as they came to fight, and thereby to enrich themselves with the gold and jewels of Persia, both which they needed; so the Persians, who expected nothing in that Warre but blowes and wounds, which they needed not, obeyed the King, who had power to constrain them in assembling themselves for his service; but their owne feares and cowardise, which in time of danger had most power over them, they onely then obeyed, when their rebellion against so servile a passion did justly and violently require it. For, saith Vegetius: Quemadmodum bene exercitatus miles prallum capit, ita formidat indoctus; nam sciendum est in pugna usum amplius prodesse quam vires. As the well-practised Souldier desires to come to battaile, so the raw one feares it: for we must understand, that in fight it more avails to have beene accustomed unto the like, than only to have rud- strength. What manner of men the Persians were, Alexander discovered in the first encounter, before which time it is said, by those that write his story, that is was hard to judge, whether his daring to undertake the conquest of an Empire so well peopled, with a handfull of men, or the successe he had, were more to be wondered at. For at the River of Granicus, which severeth the Territory of Troy from Propontis, the Persians sought to stop his passage, taking the higher ground and banke of the River to defend, which Alexander was forced (as it were) to clime up unto, and scale from the Level of the water. Great resistance (saith Curtius) was made by the Persians, yet in the end Alexander prevailed. But it seemes to me, that the victory then gotten was exceeding easie, and that the twenty thousand Persian foot-men, said to be slaine, were rather kill'd in the backe, in running away, than hurt in the bosomes by resisting. For had those twenty thousand foot, and two hundred and fiftie horsemen, or after Plutarch, two thousand and five hundred horse-men, dyed with their faces towards the Macedonians, Alexander could not have bought their lives at so small a rare, as with the losse of foure and thirty of all sorts of his own. And if it were also true, that Plutarch doth report, how Alexander encountered two of the Persian Commanders, Spiriadates and Rhasaces, and that the Persian horse-men fought with great furie, though in the end scattered; and lastly, how those Gracians in Darius his pay, holding themselves in one body upon a piece of ground of advantage, did (after mercy was refused them) fight it out to the last; how often it then resemble truth, that such resistance having beene made, yet of Alexanders Army there fell but twelve Foot-men, and two and twenty Horsemen?

§. III.

A digression concerning the defence of hard passages. Of things following the battaile of Granicke.

The winning of this passage did greatly encourage the Macedonians, and brought such terrour upon all those of the lesser Asia, as he obtained all the Kingdomes thereof without a blow, some one or two Townes excepted. For in all invasions, where the Nations invaded have once beene beaten upon a great advantage of the place, as in defence of Rivers, Streights, and Mountaines, they will soone have perswaded themselves, that such an enemy upon equall termes and even ground, can hardly be resisted. It was therefore Machiavells counsell, That he which resolveth to defend a passage, should with his ablest force oppose the Assailant. And to say truth, few Regions of any great circuit are so well fenced, that Armies of such force as may be thought sufficient to conquer them, can be debarred all entrance, by the naturall difficultie of the wayes. One passage or other is commonly left unguarded: if all be defended, then must the forces of the Country bee distracted; and yet lightly some one place will bee found that is defended every weakly. How often have the Alpes given way to Armies, breaking into Italy? Yea, where shall we find that ever they kept out an invader? Yet are they such as (to speake briefly) afflict with all difficulties those that travaile over them; but they give no security to those that lye behinde them: for they are of too large extent. The townes of Lombardy perswaded themselves that they might enjoy their quiet, when the Warlike Nation of the Switzers had undertaken to hinder Francis the French King from descending into the Duchy of Milan: but whilst these Patrons of Milan, whom their own dwelling in those Mountaines had made fittest of all other for such a service, were busied in custody of the Alpes; Francis appeared in Lombardy, to so much the greater terrour of the Inhabitants, by how much the lesse they had expected his arrival. What shall wee say of those Mountaines, which locke up whole Regions in such sort, as they leave but one gate open? The Streights, or (as they were called) the gates of Taurus in Silicia, and those of Thermopyla, have seldome beene attempted, perhaps because they were thought impregnable: but how seldome (if ever) have they beene attempted in vaine? Xerxes, and long after him, the Romans, forced the entrance of Thermopyla;

Thermopylae; Cyrus the younger, & after him Alexander, found the Gates of Cilicia wide open; how strongly soever they had bin locked and barred, yet were those Countreys open enough to a fleet that should enter on the backe-side. The defence of Rivers how hard a thing it is, we finde examples in all histories that beare good witness. The deepest have many Forodes; the swiftest and broadest may be passed by Boates, in case he be found a matter of difficulty to make a bridge. Hee that hath men enow to defend all the length of his owne banke, hath also enow to beate his enemy; and may therefore doe better to let him come over, to his losse, than by striving in vaine to hinder the passage, as a matter tending to his owne disadvantage, fill the heads of his Souldiers with an opinion, that they are in ill case, having their meanes of safeguard taken from them, by the skill or valour of such as are too good for them. Certainly, if a River were sufficient defence against an Army, the Isle of Mona, now called Anglesey, which is divided from North-Wales by an arme of the Sea, had bene safe enough against the Romans, invading it under conduct of Julius Agricola. But he wanting, and not meaning to spend the time in making vessels to transport his forces, did assay the foords. Whereby he so amazed the enemies attending for ships and such like provision by Sea, that surely believing nothing could be hard or invincible to men, which came so minded to Warre, they humbly intreated for peace, and yielded the Island. Yet the Brittaines were men stout enough, the Persians were very dauntless.

It was therefore wisely done of Alexander, to passe the River of Gramick in face of the enemy; not marching higher to seeke an easier way, nor labouring to convey his men over it by some safer meanes. For, having beaten them upon their owne ground, he did thereby cut off no lesse of their reputation, than of their strength, leaving no hope of succour to the partakers and followers of such unable Protectors.

Soone after this victory he recovered Sardis, Ephesus, the Cities of the Trallians and Magnesians, which were rendred unto him. The inhabitants of which, with the people of the Countrey, hee received with great grace, suffering them to be governed by their owne lawes. For he observed it well; Novum Imperium inchoantibus nullis clementia summa; It is commodious unto such as lay the foundations of a new Sovereignty, so have the same of being mercifull. He then by Parmenio wan Miletus, & by force mastered Halicarnassus, which because it resisted obstinately, hee razed to the ground. From whence he entred into Caria, where Ada the Queene, who had bene cast out of all that she held (except the City of Alinda) by Darius his Lieutenants, presented her selfe unto him, and adopted him her son and successour; which Alexander accepted in so gracious part, as he left the whole Kingdome to her disposing. He then entred into Lycia, and Pamphylia, & obtained all the Sea coasts, and subjecting unto him Pisidia, he directed himselfe towards Darius (who was said to be advanced towards him with a marvellous Army) by the way of Phrygia: For all the Province of Asia the lesse, bordering upon the Sea, his first victory layed under his feet.

While he gave order for the government and settling of Lycia, and Pamphylia, they sent Cleander to raise some new Captaine in Peloponnesus, and marching towards the North, he entred Celenus seated on the River Alexander, which was abandoned unto him, the Castle onely holding out, which also after forty dayes was given up: for so long time he gave them to attend succour from Darius. From Celenus he past on through Phrygia towards the Euxine Sea, till he came to a city called Gordium, the Regall seat, in former times, of King Midus. In this City it was that he found the Gordian-knot, which when he knew not how to undoe, he cut it asunder with his sword. For there was an ancient propheticke did promise to him that could untie it, the Lordship of all Asia; whereupon Alexander, not respecting the manner how, so it were done, assumed to himselfe the fulfilling of the propheticke, by hewing it in pieces.

But before he turned from this part of Asia the lesse towards the east, he tooke care to cleare the Sea-coast on his backe, and to thrust the Persians out of the Ilands of Leibos, Chio, and Coos: the charge whereof he committed unto two of his Captaineis, giving them such order as he thought to be most convenient for that service; and delivering unto them fifty Talents to defray the charge; and withall out of his first spoyle gotten, he sent threecore Talents more to Antipater his Lieutenant in Greece and Attica. From Celenus he removed to Ancira, now called Anguiri, standing on the same River of Sangarius, which runneth through Gordium: there hee mustered his Army, and then entred Paphlagonia, whose people submitted themselves unto him, and obtained freedom of tribute: where he left Cains Governor with one Regiment of Macedonians lately arrived.

Here he understood of the death of Memnon, Darius Lieutenant, which heartned him greatly to passe on towards him; for of this only Capaine he had more respect than of all the multitude by Darius assembled, and of all the Commanders he had besides. For so much hath the spirit of some one man excelled, as it hath undertaken and effected the alteration of the greatest States and Common-weales, the erection of Monarchies, the conquest of Kingdomes and Empires, guided handfulls of men against multitudes of equall bodily strength, contrived victories beyond all hope and discourse of reason, converted the fearfull passions of his owne followers into magnanimity, and the valour of his enemies into cowardize; such spirits have bin stirred up in sundry Ages of the world, and in divers parts thereof, to erect and cast downe againe, to establish and to destroy, and to bring all things, Persons and States, to the same certaine ends, which the infinite Spirit of the Universall, piercing, moving, and governing all things, hath ordained. Certainly the things that this King did, were marvellous, and would hardly have bin undertaken by any man else: and though his Father had determined to have invaded the lesser Asia, it is like enough that he would have contented himselfe with some part thereof, and not have discovered the River of Indus: as this man did. The swift course of victory, wherewith he ran over so large a portion of the World, in so short a space, may justly be imputed unto this, that he was never encountered by an equall spirit, concurring with equall power against him. Hereby it came to passe that his actions being limited by no greater opposition, than desert places, and the meer length of tedious journeyes could make, were like the Colossus of Rhodes, not so much to be admired for the workmanship, though therein also praise-worthy, as for the huge bulke. For certainly the things performed by Xenophon, discover as brave a spirit as Alexanders, and working no lesse exquisitely, though the effects were lesse materiall, as were also the forces and power of command, by which it wrought. But he that would finde the exact pattern of an able Commander, must looke upon such as Epaminondas, that encountering worthy Captaineis, and those better followed than themselves, have by their singular vertue over-topped their valiant enemies, and still prevailed over those, that would not have yielded one foot to any other. Such as these are, doe seldome live to obtaine great Empires. For it is a worke of more labour and longer time, to master the equall forces of one hardie & well-ordered State, than to tread down and utterly subdue a multitude of servile Nations, compounding the body of a grosse unweildie Empire. Wherefore these Purus Potentes, men that with little have done much upon enemies of like ability, are to be regarded as choise examples of worth; but great Conquerours, to be rather admired for the substance of their actions, than the exquisite managing: exactnesse and greatnesse concurring so seldome, that I can find no instance of both in one, save onely that brave Roman, Caesar.

Having thus farre digressed, it is now time that we returne unto our Easterne Conqueror; who is travailing hastily towards Cilicia, with a desire to recover the Streights thereof before Darius should arrive there. But first making a dispatch into Greece, he sent to those cities, in which he reposed most trust, some of the Persian Targets which he had recovered in his first battaile; upon which, by certaine inscriptions, he made them partakers of his victory. Herein he well advised himselfe; for he that doth not as well impart of the honour which he gaineis in the Warres, as he doth of the spoiles, shall never be long followed of those of the better sort. For men which are either well borne or well bred, and have more of wealth than of reputation, do as often satisfie themselves with the purchase of glory, as the weak in fortune, and strong in courage, doe with the gaine of gold and silver.

The Governour of Cilicia hearing of Alexanders comming on, left some Companies to keepe the Streights, which were indeede very defensible; and withall, as Curtius noeth, hee began overlate to prise and put in execution the Counsell of Memnon: who in the beginning of the Warres advised him to waste all the provisions for Men and Horses, that could not be lodged in strong places, & alwayes to give ground to the Invader, till he found some such notable advantage as might assuredly promise him the obtaining of victory. For the fury of an invading Army is best broken, by delays, change of diet, and want, eating sometimes too little, and sometimes too much, sometimes reposing themselves in beds, and more often on the cold ground. These and the like sudden alterations bring many diseases upon all nations out of their own Countries. Therefore if Darius had kept the Macedonians but a while from meat and sleepe, &c., refusing to give or take battaile, had wearied them with his light horse, as the Parthians afterward did the Romans, he might perchance have saved his owne life, and his estate. For it was one of the greatest encouragements given by Alexander, to the Macedonians, in the third and last fatal battaile, that they were to fight with all the strength of Persia at once.

Xerxes, when he invaded Greece & fought abroad, in being beaten, lost only his men; but Darius being invaded by the Greekes, & fighting at home, by being beaten, lost his Kingdom. Pericles though the Lacedamonians burnt all in Attica to the Gates of Athenes, yet could not be drawne to hazard a battaile: for the invaded ought evermore to fight upon the advantage of time and place. Because wee read Histories to informe our understanding by the examples therein found, wee will give some instances of those that have perished by adventuring in their owne Countries, to charge an invading Armie. The Romans, by fighting with Hannibal, were brought to the brink of their destruction.

Pompey was well advised for a while, when he gave Casur ground, but when by the importunity of his Captaine he adventured to fight at Pharsalia, he lost the battaile, lost the freedome of Rome, and his owne life.

Ferdinand, in the Conquest of Naples, would needs fight a battaile with the French to his confusion, though it was told him by a man of sound judgement, that those Counsells which promise surety in all things, are honourable enough.

The Constable of France made frustrate the mighty preparation of Charles the Fifth, when he invaded Provence, by waisting the Countrie, & forbearing to fight; so did the Duke of Alva wearie the French in Naples, and dissolve the boisterous Army of the Prince of Orange in the low-Countries.

The Leigers, contrary to the advice of their Generall, would needs fight a battaile with the Bourgonians, invading their Countrie, and could not be perswaded to linger the time, and stay their advantage; but they lost eight and twenty thousand upon the place. Philip of Valois set upon King Edward at Chesvie; and King John (when the English were well-neere tired out, and would in short time by an orderly pursuit have beene waited to nothing) constrained the black Prince with great fury, neere Poitiers, to joyne battaile with him: But all men know what lamentable successe these two French Kings found. Charles the fifth of France made another kind of Fabian-Warfare; & though the English burnt and wasted many places, yet this King held his resolution to forbear blowes, and followed his advice, which told him, That the English could never get his inheritance by smooke; and it is reported by Belloy and Herrault, that King Edward was wont to say of this Charles, that he wan from him the Dutchy of Guyen without ever putting on his Armour.

But where God hath a purpose to destroy, wise men grow short-lived, and the charge of things is committed unto such as either cannot see what is for their good, or know not how to put in execution any sound advice. The course which Memnon had proposed, must in all appearance of reason have brought the Macedonian to a great perplexity, and made him stand still a while at the Streights of Cilicia, doubting whether it were more shamefull to return, or dangerous to proceede. For had Cappadocia & Paphlagonia bin wasted whilest Alexander was farre off; and the Streights of Cilicia been defended by Arfenes, Governor of that Province, with the best of his forces; hunger would not have suffered the enemy, to stay the triall of all meanes that might be thought upon, of forcing that passage: or if the place could not have bin maintained, yet might Cilicia, at better leisure have bin so thoroughly spoiled, that the heart of his Army should have beene broken, by seeking out miseries by painfull travaile.

But Arfenes leaving a small number to defend the Streights, tooke the best of his Armie with him, to waste & spoile the Countrie; or rather, as may seeme, to finde himselfe some worke, by pretence of which he might honestly run further away from Alexander. Hee should rather have adventured his person in custody of the Streights, whereby he might perhaps have saved the Province; and in the meane time, all that was in the fields, would have beene conveyed into strong Townes. So should his Army, if it were driven driven from the place of advantage, have found good entertainment within walled Cities, and himselfe with his horse-men have had the lesse worke in destroying that little which was left abroad. Handling the matter as he did, he gave the Cilicians cause to wish for Alexanders coming, and as great cause to the Keepers of the passage not to hinder it. For cowards are wise in apprehending all formes of danger. These Guardians of the Streights, hearing that Arfenes made all haste to joyne himselfe with Darius, burning downe all as he went, like one despairing of the defence, began to grow circumspect, and to thinke that surely their Generall, who gave as lost the Countrie behind their backs, had exposed themselves unto certaine death, as men that were good for nothing else but to dull the Macedonian swords. Wherefore, not affecting to die for their Prince and Countrie (which honour they saw that Arfenes himselfe could well forebear) they speedily followed the foot-steps of their Generall, gleaming after his Harvest. Thus Alexander without labour got both the entrance of Cilicia, abandoned by the cowardise of his Enemies, and the whole Province that had beene alienated from the Persian side by their indiscretion.

§. IIII.

Of the unwarlike Army levied by Darius against Alexander. The unadvised courses which Darius took in this expedition. He is vanquished at Issus; where his Mother, Wife, and Children are made prisoners: Of some things following the battaile of Issus.

IN the meane season Darius approached; who (as Curtius reports) had compounded an Army of more than two hundred and ninety thousand Souldiers, out of divers Nations; Justin musters them at three hundred thousand Foot, and a hundred thousand Horse; Plutarch at fixe hundred thousand.

The manner of his coming on, as Curtius describes it, was rather like a masker than a man of Warre, and like one that tooke more care to set out his glory and riches, than to provide for his own safety, perswading himselfe, as it seemed, to beat Alexander with pompe and sumptuous Pageants. For, before the Armie there was carried the holy fire, which the Persians worshipped, attended by their Priests, and after them three hundred and threescore and five young-men, answering the number of the dayes of the yeare, covered with Scarlet; then the Chariot of Jupiter drawne with white Horses, with their Riders clothed in the same colour, with rods of gold in their hands; And after it, the Horse of the Summe: Next after these follow ten sumptuous Chariots, in-layed and garnished with silver and gold; & then the Vantguard of their horse, compounded of twelve severall Nations, which the better to avoid confusion, did hardly understand each others language; and these marshalled in the head of the rest, being beaten, might serve very fitly to disorder all that followed them: in the taile of these Horses the Regiment of foot marched, with the Persians called immortall, because if any died, the number was presently supplied: & these were armed with chaines of gold, & their coats with the same metall imbroidered, whereof the sleeves were garnished with pearle; bautes, either to catch the hungry Macedonians withall, or to perswade them that it were great incivility to cutt and to deface such glorious garments. But it was well said: Sumptuosus indus miles, se virtute superiorem aliis non existimet, cum in praelio oporteat fortitudine animi, & non vestimentis muniri, quoniam hostes vestibus non debellantur; Let no man thinke that he exceedeth in valour, whom he exceedeth in gay garments; for it is by men armed with fortitude of minde, and not by the apparell they put on, that enemies are beaten. And it was perchance from the Roman Papyrius that this advice was borrowed, who when he fought against the Sannites in that farall battaile, wherein they all sware either to prevail or dy, thirty thousand of them having apparellled themselves in white garments, with high crests and great plumes of feathers, bade the Roman Souldiers to lay aside all feare: Non enim cristas vulnera facere, & per pila atque arata scuta transire Romanum pilum; For these plumed crests would wound nobody, and the Romane pile would bore holes in painted and gilded shelds.

To second this Court-like company, fifteene thousand were appointed more rich and glittering than the former, but apparellled like Women (belike to breed the more terror) & these were honoured with the Title of the Kings Kinmen. Then came Darius himselfe, himselfe, the Gentle-men of his Guard-robe, riding before his Chariot, which was supported with the gods of his Nation, cast and cur in pure gold; these the Macedonians did not serve, but they served their turnes of these, by changing their massie-bodies into thin, portable and currant coyne. The head of this Chariot was set with precious stones, with two little golden Idols, covered with an open-winged-Eagle of the same metall: The hinder part being raised high whereon Darius sat, had a covering of inestimable value. This Chariot of the King was followed with ten thousand Horse-men, their Lances plated with silver, and their heads gilt; which they meant not to imbrue in the Macedonian blood, for feare of marring their beauty. Hee had for the proper Guard of his owne person, two hundred of the blood Royall; blood too Royall and precious to be spilt by any valorous adventure, (I am of opinion that two hundred sturdy fellows, like the Switzers, would have done him more service) and these were backt with thirty thousand foot-men, after whom againe were led four hundred spare horses for the King, which if he had meant to have used, he would have marshalled somewhat nearer him.

Now followed the Reareward, the same being led by Sisgambis the Kings Mother, and by his wife, drawn in glorious Chariots, followed by a great traine of Ladies their attendants on horse-backe, with fifteene Wagons of the Kings children, and the wives of the Nobility, waited on by two hundred and fiftie Concubines, and a world of Nurses and Eunuchs, most sumptuously apparelled. By which it should seeme that Darius thought that the Macedonians had bin Comedians or Tumblers; for this troope was far fitter to behold those sports than to bee present at battailes. Betweene these and a company of slight-armed slaves, with a world of Vallets, was the Kings treasure, charged on fixe hundred Mules, and three hundred Camels, brought, as it proved, to pay the Macedonians. In this fort came the May-game. King into the field, incumbered with a most unnecessary traine of Strumpets, attended with troupes of divers Nations, speaking divers languages, and for their numbers impossible to bee marshalled; and for the most part so effeminate, and so rich in gold and in garments, as the same could nor but have encouraged the nakedst Nation of the world against them. We finde it in daily experience, that all discourse of magnanimity, of Nationall Vertue, of Religion, of Liberty, and whatsoever else hath bin wont to move and incourage vertuous men, hath no force at all with the common-Souldier, in comparison of spoile and riches. The rich ships are boarded upon all disadvantages, the rich Townes are furiously assaulted, and the plentifull Countries willingly invaded. Our English nation have attempted many places in the Indies, and run upon the Spaniards head-long, in hope of their Royalls of plate, and Pilliolets; which, had they bin put to it upon the like disadvantages in Ireland, or in any poore Country, they would have turned their Peeces and Pikes against their Commanders, contesting that they had bin brought without reason to the Butchery and slaughter. It is true that the warre is made willingly, and for the most part with good successe, that is ordained against the richest Nations; for as the needie are alwayes adventurous, so plenty is wont to shunne perill, and men that have well to live, do rather studie how to live well, I meane wealthily, than care to die (as they call it) honourably. Car où il y a rien a gagner que des coups, volontiers il n'y va pas. No man makes haste to the market, where there is nothing to be bought but blows.

Now if Alexander had beheld this preparation before his consultation with his Sooth-saiers, he would have satisfied himselfe by the out-sides of the Persians, and never have looked into the intralles of Beasts for successe. For leaving the description of this second battell (which is indeed no-where well described, neither for the confusion & hasty running away of the Asians could it be) we have enough by the slaughter that was made of them, & by the few that fell of the Macedonians, to informe us what manner of resistance was made. For if it be true that threecore thousand Persian footmen were slaine in this battaile, with ten thousand of their horsemen: Or (as Curius saith) an hundred thousand footmen, with the same number of horsemen, and besides this slaughter, forty thousand taken prisoners, while of Alexanders Armie there miscarried but two hundred & fourscore of all sorts, of which numbers Arrianus and other Historians cut off almost the one halfe: I doe verily beleeve, that this small number rather died with the over-travaille & paines-taking in killing their enemies, than by any strokes received from them. And surely if the Persian Nation (at this time degenerate & the basest of the World) had had any any favour remaining of the ancient valour of their fore-fathers; they would never have sold so good cheape, and at so vile a price, the Mother, the Wife, the Daughters, and other the Kings children; had their owne honour beene valued by them at nothing, and a banished Gracian of Athens had told him, when he made a view of his Army about Babylon, to wit, That the multitude which he had assembled of divers Nations, richly attired, but poorly armed, would be found more terrible to the Inhabitants of the countrey, whom in passing by they would devoure, than to the Macedonians, whom they intended to assaile; who being all old and obedient Souldiers, imbattailed in grosse squashed with weapons for offence of great advantage, would make so little account of the delicate Persians, loving their ease and their palat, being withall ill armed and worse disciplined, as except it would please him to entertain (having so great abundance of treasure to do it withall) a sufficient number of the same Gracians, and so to encounter the Macedonians with men of equall courage, he would repent him overlate, as taught by the miserable successe like to follow.

But this discourse was so displeasing to Darius (who had bin accustomed to nothing so much as to his owne praises, and to nothing so little as to heare truths) as he commanded that this poore Gracian should bee presently slaine: who while he was a funding in the Tormentors hand, used this speech to the King, That Alexander, against whom he had given this good counsell, should assuredly revenge his death, and lay deserved punishment upon Darius for despising his advice.

It was the saying of a Wife man: Desperata ejus Principis salus est, cujus aures ita formate sunt, ut altera quæ utilita, nec quicquam nisi jucundum accipiat; Tunc Princes sœcietis in a desperate case, whose eares judge all that is profitable to be too sharpe, and will entertaine nothing that is unpleasant.

For liberty in counsell is the life and essence of counsell; Libertas consilii est ejus vita, & essentia, quæ crepta consilium evanescit.

Darius did likewise value at nothing the advice given him by the Gracian Souldiers that served him, who intreated him not to fight in the Streights: But had they beene Counsellers and directors in that Warre, as they were underlings and commanded by others, they had with the helpe of a good troupe of horse-men bin able to have opposed the fury of Alexander, without any assistance of the Persian foot-men. For when Darius was overthrowne with all his cowardly and confused rabble, those Gracians, under their Capitaine Amyntus, held firme, & marched away in order, in despite of the vanquishers. Old Souldiers are not easily dismayed: we reade in Histories ancient and moderne, what brave retraits have bin made by them, though the rest of the Army in which they have served, hath bin broken.

At the battaile of Ravenna, where the Imperials were beaten by the French, a squadron of Spaniards, old Souldiers, came off unbroken & undismayed; whom when Gaston de Foix, Duke of Nemours, and Nephew to Lewis the twelfth, charged, as holding the victory not entire by their escape, hee was over-turned and slaine in the place. For it is truly said of those men, who, by being acquainted with dangers, fear them not, That, Neglecto periculo imminenti mali opus ipsum quantumvis difficile aggrediuntur; They goe about the businesse it selfe, how hard soever it be, not standing in consider of the danger, which the mischance hanging over their heads, may bring: and as truly of those that know the warres but by heare-say; Quid valentes sunt & prevalentes ante pericula, in ipsis tamen periculis discedunt; They have ability enough, and to spare, till dangers appeare; but when perill indeed comes, they get them gone.

These Gracians also that made the retreat, advised Darius to retire his Army into the plaine of Metopotamia, to the end that Alexander being entred into those large fields and great Champions, hee might have invironed the Macedonians on all sides with his multitude; and withall they counselled him to divide that his huge Army into parts, not committing the whole to one stroke of Fortune, whereby he might have fought many battailes, and have brought no greater numbers at once than might have been well marshalled & conducted. But this counsell was so contrary to the cowardly affections of the Persians, as they perswaded Darius to inviron the Gracians which gave the advice, and to cut them in pieces as Traitors. The infinite wisdom of God doth not work alwayes by by one and the same way, but very often in the alteration of Kingdomes and Estates by taking understanding from the Governours, so as they can neither give nor discern of Counsels. For Darius that would needs fight with Alexander upon a streightned piece of ground, neere unto the City of Iffus, where he could bring no more hands to fight than Alexander could, (who by the advice of Parmenio staid there, as in a place of best advantage) was utterly overthrowne, his Treasures lost, his Wife, Mother, and Children (whom the Gracians his followers had perswaded him to leave in Babylon, or elsewhere) taken prisoners, and all their traine of Ladies spoiled of their rich Garments, Jewels, and Honour. It is true, that both the Queene, with her Daughters, who had the good hap to be brought to Alexanders presence, were entertained with all respect due unto their birth, to their Honours preserved, and their Jewels and rich Garments restored unto them; and though Darius Wife was a most beautifull Lady, and his Daughters of excellent forme, yet Alexander mastered his affections towards them all: only it is reported out of Drissibulus the Historian, that he embraced the wife of the valiant Memnon, her Husband lately dead, who was taken flying from Damascus by Parmenio, at which time the Daughters of Ochus, who reigned before Darius, and the Wives and Children of all the Nobility of Persia in effect, fell into captivity; at which time also Darius Treasures (not lost at Iffus) was seized, amounting to fixe thousand and two hundred talents of coine, and of Bullion five hundred talents, with a world of riches besides.

Darius himselfe leaving his brother dead, with divers other of his chiefe Capraines, (casting the Crowne from his head) hardly escaped.

After this overthrow given unto Darius, all Phenicia (the City of Tyre excepted) was yielded to Alexander, of which Parmenio was made Governour.

Aradus, Zidon, and Biblos, maritime Cities of great importance, of which one Strato was King (but hated of the people) acknowledged Alexander. Good fortune followed him so fast that it trod on his heeles; for Antigonus, Alexanders Lievtenant in Asia the lesse, overthrowne the Cappadocians, Paphlagonians, & others lately revolted; Aristodemus, Darius Admiral, had his Fleet partly taken, & in part drowned by the Macedonians newly levied; the Lacedemonians that warred against Antipater were beaten, foure thousand of those Greeks which made the retreat at the last battaile, forsaking both the party of Darius & of Alexander, & led by Amintas into Egypt, to hold it for themselves, were buried there; for the time was not yet come to divide Kingdomes.

Alexander to honour Ephesius, whom he loved most, gave him power to dispose of the Kingdom of Zidon. A man of a most poore estate, that laboured to sustain his life being of the Royall blood, was commended by the people unto him, who changed his Spade into a Scepter, so as he was beheld both a Beggar and a King in one and the same houre.

It was a good desire of this new King, when speaking to Alexander, he wisht that he could beare his prosperity with the same moderation, & quiennesse of heart, that he had done his adversity; but ill done of Alexander, in that he would not performe in himselfe that which he commended in another mans desire: for it was a signe that he did but accompany, and could not governe his felicity.

While he made some stay in those parts, he received a letter from Darius, importing the ranfome of his Wife, his Mother, and his Children, with some other conditions of peace, but such as rather became a Conqueror, than one that had now been twice shamefully beaten, not vouchsafing, in his direction, to stile Alexander King. It is true, that the Romans, after that they had received an overthrow by Pyrrhus, returned him a more scornfull answer upon the offer of peace, than they did before the triall of his force. But as their fortunes were then in the Spring, so that of Darius had already cast leafe; the one a resolved, well armed and disciplined Nation, the other cowardly and effeminate. Alexander disdaind the offers of Darius, and sent him word that he not onely directed his letter to a King, but to the King of Darius himselfe.

§. V.

How Alexander besieged and won the Citie of Tyre.

Alexander coming neere to the City of Tyre, received from them the present of a golden Crowne, with great store of victuals, and other presents, which he tooke very thankfully, returning them answer, That he desired to offer a sacrifice sacrifice to Hercules, the Protector of their Citie, from whom he was defended. But the Tyrians like not his companie within their Walls, but tell him that the Temple of Hercules was seated in the old City adjoining, now abandoned and desolate. To bee short, Alexander resolved to enter it by force: and though it were a place in all mens opinion impregnable, because the Iland whereon it was built, was eight hundred furlongs from the Maine, yet with the labour of many hands, having great store of stone from the old Tyre, and timber sufficient from Lybanus, hee filled the passage of the Sea betwene the Iland and the Maine, which being more than once carried away by the strength of the Sea upon a storme of winde, sometime by the Tyrians fired, and sometime torne asunder; yet with the helpe of his Navie which arrived (during the siege) from Cyprus, he overcame all difficulties and prevailed, after he had spent seven moneths in that attempt. The Tyrians in the beginning of the siege had barbarously drowned the messengers sent by Alexander, perswading them to render the City, in respect whereof, & of the great losse of time and men, he put eight thousand to the sword, and caused two thousand of those, that escaped the first fury, to bee hanged on Crosses on the Sea-shore, and referred for slaves (saith Diodore) thirtene thousand; Arrianus reckons them at thirty thousand. Many more had died, had not the Zidonians, that served Alexander, conveyed great numbers away by shipping unto their owne Citie.

Happy it was for Apollo that the Towne was taken: for one of the Tyrians having dreamt, that this god meant to forsake the City, they bound him fast with a golden chaine to the Idoll of Hercules; but Alexander, like a gracious Prince, loosened him againe.

It is true, that it was a notable enterprize & a difficult, but great things are made greater. For Nabuchodonosor had taken it before, and filled up the channell, that lay between the Iland and the Maine.

The government of this Territory he gave to Philotas, the Sonne of Parmenio; Cilicia, he committed to Socrates, and Andromachus Lievtenant under Parmenio; Ephesus had charge of the Fleet, and was directed to finde Alexander at Gaza towards Egypt.

§. VI.

How Darius offered conditions of peace to Alexander. Alexander wins Gaza; and deals graciously with the Jewes.

In the meane while Darius sends againe to Alexander, sets before him all the difficulties of passing on towards the East, and layeth the losse of the last battaile to the streightnesse of the place: he hoped to terrifie him by threatening to encompass him in the plaine Countries, he bids him to consider, how impossible it was to passe the Rivers of Euphrates, Tigris, Araxes, and the rest, with all such other fearefull things: for he that was now filled with nothing but feare, had arguments enow of that nature to present unto another. All the Kingdomes betwene the River of Alis, and the Hellefont, he offered him in Dower with his beloved daughter. But Alexander answered, That he offered him nothing but his owne, and that which victory and his own vertue had possessed him of; That he was to give conditions, and not to receive any, & that he having passed the Sea it selfe, disdaind to thinke of resistance in transporting himselfe over Rivers. It is said, that Parmenio, who was now old and full of honour and riches, told the King, That were he Alexander, hee would accept of Darius his offers; to which Alexander answered, That so would he, if he were Parmenio.

But he goes on towards Egypt, and coming before Gaza, Geis a faithfull servant to Darius, shuts the Gate against him, & defends the Towne with an obstinate resolution, so at the siege wherof Alexander received a wound in the shoulder, which was dangerous, and a blow on his legge with a stone. Hee found better men in this place than he did at the former battailes, for he left so many of his Macedonians buried in the sands of Gaza, that he was forc't to send for a new supply unto Greece. Here it was that Alexander first began to change condition, & to exercise cruelty. For after that he had entred Gaza by assault, & taken Betis, (whom Josephus calleth Babemisi) that was weakened with many wounds, and who never gave ground to the Assaultants, he bored holes through his feet, and caused him to be drawne about the street, whilst he was as yet alive; who being as valiant a man as himselfe, disdaind to aske him either life or remission of his torments. And

And what had he to countenance this his tyrannie, but the imitation of his Ancestor Achilles , who did the like to Hector ? It is true, that cruelty hath alwayes somewhat to cover her deformity.

Lib. 11. cap. ult.

From Gaſa (saith Josephus) he led his Army towards Jerusalem , a City, for the antiquity and great fame thereof, well knowne unto him while he lay before Tyre ; He had sent for some supply thither, which Jaddus the high Priest, being subject and sworn to Darius , had refused him. The Jewes therefore fearing his revenge, and unable to resist, committed the care of their estates and familie to Jaddus , who, being taught by God, assured out of the City covered with his Pontificall Robes, to wit, an upper garment of purple, embroidered with gold, with his Miter, and the plate of gold wherein the name of God was written, the Priests and Levites in their rich ornaments, & the people in white garments, in a manner so unusuall, stately and grave, as Alexander greatly admired it. Josephus reports it, that he fell to the ground before the high Priest, as reverencing the name of God, and that Parmenio reprehended him for it. Howsoever it was, I am of opinion, that he became so confident in his enterprise, and so assured of the successe after the prophetic of Daniel had been read unto him, wherein he saw himselfe, and the conquest of Persia so directly pointed at, as nothing thence-forth could discourage him or feare him. He confessed to Parmenio (saith Josephus) that in Dio a City of Macedon , when his mind laboured the conquest of Asia , he saw in his sleepe such a person as Jaddus , and so appalled, professing one and the same God; by whom he was encouraged to pursue the purpose he had in hand, with assurance of victory. This apparition, formerly apprehended only by the light of his fantasie, he now beheld with his bodily eyes, wherewith he was so exceedingly pleased and emboldened, as contrary to the practice of the Phenicians , (who hoped to have sacked and destroyed Jerusalem) he gave the Jewes all, and more than they desired, both of liberty and immunity, with permission to live under their owne lawes, and to exercise and enjoy their owne Religion.

§. VII.

Alexander winnes Egypt: and makes a journie to the Temple of Hammon.

From Jerusalem Alexander turned againe towards Egypt , and entered it, where Darius his Lievtenant, Aspac , received him, and delivered into his hand the City of Memphis , with eight hundred talents of treasure, and all other the Kings riches. By this we see that the King of Persia , who had more of affection than of judgement, gave to the valiantest man he had but the command of one City, and to the vilest toward the government of all Egypt . When he had set things in order in Egypt , he began to travaile after God-head, towards Jupiter Hammon ; so foolish had prosperity made him. He was to passe over the dangerous and drie sands, where, when the water which he brought on his Camels backe was spent, he could not but have perished, had not a marvellous shewre of raine fallen upon him, when his Army was in extreme despair. All men that know Egypt , and have written thereof, affirme, That it never raines there: but the purposes of the Almighty God are secret, & he bringeth to passe what it pleaseth him; for it is also said, That when he had lost his way in those vast deserts, that a flight of Crows flew before the army; who making faster wing when they were followed, and fluttering slowly when the Army was cast backe, guided them over those pathlesse sands to Jupiters Temple.

Arrian. lib. 3.

Arrianus from the report of Ptolomy , the sonne of Lagus , saies, That he was led by two Dragons; both which reports may be a-like true. But many of those wonders and things prodigious, are fained by those that have writtne the storie of Alexander ; as, That an Eagle lay hovering directly over his head at the battell of Issus ; That a Swallow flew about his head when he slept, and could not be feared from him, till it had wakened him at Halicarnassus , fore-shewing the treason of Aeropus , practised by Darius to have slaine him; That from the yron barres of which the Tyrians made their defensive engines, when Alexander besieged them, there fell drops of blood; and that the like drops were found in a loafe of bread, broken by a Macedonian Souldier, at the same time; That a Turfe of earth fell on his shoulder, when he lay before Gaſa , out of which there flew a Bird into the aire. The Spaniards in the conquest of the West Indies have many such pretty pretty tales; telling how they have been assisted in battell by the presence of our Lady, & by Angels riding on white horses, with the like Romish miracles, which I think themselves do hardly beleieve. The strangest thing that I have read of in this kind being certainly true, was, That the night before the battell at Novara , all the Dogs which followed the French Army, ran from them to the Switzers, leaping and fawning upon them, as if they had been bred and fed by them all their lives, and in the morning following, Trivulci and Tremouille , Generals for Lewis the twelfth, were by these imperiall Switzers utterly broken and put to ruine.

The place of this Idoll of Jupiter Hammon is ill described by Curtius , for he bounds it to by the Arabian Troglodites on the South, between whom & the Territory of Hammon , the Region Thebais , or the superiour Egypt , with the Mountains of Lybia , & the River of Nilus , are interjacent; and on the North he joyns it to a Nation called Naffamones , who bordering the Sea-shore, live (saith he) upon the spoyle of shipwrack: whereas the temple or grove of this Idoll hath no Sea neare it by two hundred miles and more, being found on the South part of Lybia ; these Naffamones being due West from it, in the South part of Marmarica .

Ptol. Af. Tab. 3.

When Alexander came neare the place, he sent some of his Parasites before him to practise the Priests attending the Oracle, That their answer might be given in all things, agreeable to his mad ambition; who affected the title of Jupiters son. And so he was flattered (as some think) defective in the Greek tongue; For whereas he meant to say O padium , he said O paidios ; that is, O Son of Jupiter , in stead of O deare Son : for which Grammaticall error he was richly rewarded, and a rumour presently spread, that the great Jupiter had acknowledged Alexander for his owne.

He had heard that Persius and Hercules had formerly consulted with this Oracle, The one when he was employed against Gorgon , The other against Anteus and Busiris ; and seeing these men had derived themselves from the gods, why might not hee? By this it seems, that he hoped to make his followers and the world fools, though indeed he made himselfe one, by thinking to cover from the worlds knowledge his vanities and vices; and the better to confirme his followers in the beleife of his Deity, he had practised the Priests to give answer to such as consulted with the Oracle; that it should be pleasing to Jupiter to honour Alexander as his Son.

Who this Ammon was, and how represented, either by a Bosse carried in a Boat, or by a Ram, or a Rams head, I see that many wise men have troubled themselves to finde out; but as Arrianus speaks of Dionysius , or Liber Pater (who lived saith S. Augustine , in Moses time) Ea que de diis veteres fabulis suis conscripserunt, non sunt nimium curiosè percellenda; We must not over-curiously search into the fables which the Ancients have written of their gods.

But this is certaine and notable, that after the Gospel beganne to be preached in the World, the Diwell in this and all other Idols became speechlesse. For, that this Hammon was neglected in the time of Tiberius Cæsar , and in the time of Trajan altogether forgotten, Strabo and Plutarch witness.

There is found neare his Temple a Fountaine called Fons solis (though Ptolomy in his third African Table sets it farther off) that at mid-night is as hot as boiling water, and at Noone as cold as any yce: to which I cannot but give credit, because I have heard of some other Wels of like nature, and because it is reported by S. Augustine , by Diodore , Herodotus , Pliny , Metastolus , Arrianus , Curtius , and others; and indeed our Barmes in England are much warmer in the night than in the day.

§. VIII.

How Alexander marching against Darius, was opposed very unskillfully by the Enemy.

From the Temple of Hammon he returned to Memphis , where among many other learned men, he heard the Philosopher Pthammon , who, belike understanding that he affected the title of Jupiters Son, told him that God was the Father-King of all men in general; and refining the pride of this haughty King, brought him to say, That God was the Father of all mortall men, but that he acknowledged none for his children save good men.

Curt. 4.

He gave the charge of the severall Provinces of Egypt to severall Governours, following the rule of his Master Aristotle, That a great Dominion should not be continued in the hands of any one: whom therein the Romane Emperors also followed, not daring to commit the government of Egypt to any of their Senators, but to men of meaner rank and degree. He then gave order for the founding of Alexandria upon the Westermost branch of Nilus. And having now settled (as he could) the estate of Egypt, with the kingdome of the lesser Asia, Phœnicia and Syria, (which being but the pawns of Darius his ill fortune, one happy victory would readily have redeemed) he led his Army towards Euphrates, which passage though the same was committed to Maçus to defend, yet was it abandoned, and Alexander without resistance past it. From thence he marched towards Tigris, a river for the swiftnesse thereof called by the Persians, The Arrow. Here, as Curtius, and Reason it selfe tels us, might Darius easily have repelled the invading Macedonian: for the violent course of the streame was such, as it drave before it many weighty stones, and those that moved not, but lay in the bottome, were so round & well polished by continuall rolling, that no man was able to fight on so slippery a footing; nor the Macedonian foot-men to wade the river, otherwise than by joyning their hands, and entercealing their armes together, making one weighty and entire body to resist the swift passage and furious race of the streame. Besides this notable help, the Channell was so deep towards the Eastern shore, where Darius should have made head, as the foot-men were enforc't to lift their Bowes, and Arrowes, and Darts over their heads to keepe them from being moistned, and made unserviceable by the Waters. But it was truly and understandingly said of Homer,

*Talis est hominum terrestrium mens,
Qualem quotidie ducit pater virorumq; Deorumq;.*

The mindes of men are ever so affected,
As by Gods will they daily are directed.

And it cannot be denied, that as all Estates of the world, by the surfeit of misgovernment have been subject to many grievous, and sometimes mortall diseases: So had the Empire of Persia at this time brought it selfe into a burning and consuming Fever, and thereby become franticke and without understanding, foreshewing manifestly the dissolution and death thereof.

But Alexander hath now recovered the Eastern shores of Tigris, without any other difficulty, than that of the nature of the place; where Maçus (who had charge to defend the Passage both of Euphrates and it) presented himselfe to the Macedonians, followed with certaine companies of Horse-men, as if with uneven forces he durst have charged them on even ground, when as with a multitude farre exceeding them, he forsooke the advantage which no valour of his enemies, could easily have overcome. But it is commonly seene, that fearfull and cowardly men do ever follow those wayes and counsels, whereof the opportunity is already lost.

It is true that he set all provisions a fire wherewith the Macedonians might serve themselves over Tigris, thinking thereby greatly to have distressed them; but the execution of good counsell is fruitlesse, when unseasonable. For now was Alexander so well furnished with carriages, as nothing was wanting to the competency of the Army which he conducted. Those things also which he sought to waste, Alexander being now in fight, were by his Horse-men saved and recovered. This Maçus might have done some dayes before at good leisure; or at this time with so great a strength of Horse-men, as the Macedonians durst not have pursued them, leaving the strength of their foot out of fight and far behind.

The new provisions of Darius. Accidents foregoing the battell of Arbela.

Darius, upon Alexanders first returne out of Egypt, had assembled all the forces, which those Regions next him could furnish, and now also were the Arians, Scythians, Indians, and other Nations arrived; Nations (saith Curtius) that rather served to make up the names of men, than to make resistance. Arrians had numbered them with their Leaders; and finds of foot-men of all sorts ten hundred thousand, and of horse four hundred thousand, besides armed Chariots, and some few Elephants. Curtius, who musters the Army of Darius at two hundred thousand foot, & near fifty thousand horse, comes (I think) nearer to the true number; and yet seeing hee had more confidence in the multitude than in the valour of his Vassals, it is like enough that he had gathered together of all sorts some three or four hundred thousand, with which he hoped in those fair plains of Assyria, to have overcome the few numbers of the invading Army. But it is a rule in the Philosophy of the War;

In omni praelio non tam multitudo, & virtus indocta, quam ars & exercitium solent præferre victoriam; In every battell skill and practice do more towards the victory, than multitude and rude audacity.

While Alexander gave rest to his army after the passage over Tigris, there happened an Eclipse of the Moone, of which the Macedonians, not knowing the cause and reason, were greatly affrighted. All that were ignorant (as the multitude alwaies are) took it for a certain preface of their overthrow and destruction, in so much as they began not only to murmur, but to speake it boldly, That for the ambition of one man, a man that disdained Philip his father, and would needs be called the son of Jupiter, they should all perish; For he not only enforc't them to make war against Worlds of enemies, but against Rivers, Mountaines, and the Heavens themselves.

Hereupon Alexander being ready to march forward, made a halt, & to quiet the minds of the multitude, he called before him the Egyptian Astrologers, which followed him thence, that by them the Souldiers might be assured that this defection of the Moone was a certain preface of good successe; for, that it was naturall they never imparted to the common people, but reserved the knowledge to themselves, so as a sorry Almanack-maker had been no small foole in those daies.

Of this kind of superstitious observation Caesar made good use, when he fought against Arivissus & the Germans: for they being perswaded by the casting of lots, that if they fought before the change of the Moone, they should certainly lose the battell, Caesar forc't them to abide it, though they durst not give it; wherein having their minds already beaten by their owne superstition, and being resolutely charged by the Romans, the whole Army in effect perished.

These Egyptians gave no other reason than this, That the Grecians were under the aspect of the Sun, the persians of the Moone; and therefore the Moone failing and being darkened, the state of Persia was now in danger of falling, and their glory of being obscured. This judgement of the Egyptian Priests being noyed through all the Army, all were satisfied, and their courage redoubled. It is a principle in the Warre, which, though devised since, was well observed then: Exercitum terrori plenum Dux ad pugnam non ducat; Let not a Captaine lead his Army to the fight, when it is possessed with master of terror.

It is truly observed by Curtius, that the people are led by nothing so much as by superstition; yea, we finde it in all stories, and often in our owne, that by such inventions, devised tales, dreames, and prophecies, the people of this Land have been carried head-long into many dangerous tumults and insurrections, and still to their owne losse and ruine.

As Alexander drew neare the Persian Army, certaine letters were surprized, written by Darius to the Grecians, perswading them for great summes of money, either to kill or betray Alexander. But these by the advice of Parmenio he suppressed.

At this time also Darius his faire Wife, oppressed with sorrow, and wearied with travell, died. Which accident Alexander seemed no lesse to bewaile than Darius, who upon the first bruit, suspected that some dishonourable violence had been offered her; but being satisfied by an Eunuch of his owne that attended her, of Alexanders kingly respect towards her, from the day after being taken, he desired the immortal Gods, That if they had decreed to make a new Master of the Persian Empire, then it would please them to confer it on so just and continent an enemy as Alexander, to whom he once againe before the last tryall by battell offered these conditions of peace.

That with his Daughter in marriage he would deliver up and resigne all Asia the lesse, & with Egypt, all those kingdoms between the Phœnician sea, & the River of Euphrates; That he would pay him for the ranfome of his Mother, and his other Daughters, 30.

thousand talents, and that for the performance thereof, he would leave his sonne Ochus in hostage: To this they sought to perswade Alexander by such arguments as they had, Alexander causing the Embassadors to be removed, advised with his Councell, but heard no man speak but Parmenio, the very right hand of his good fortune; who perswaded him to accept of these faire conditions. He told him, that the Empire between Euphrates and Hellespont was a faire addition to Macedon; that the retaining of the Persian prisoners was a great cumber, & the treasure offered for them of far better use than their persons, with divers other arguments; all which Alexander rejected. And yet it is probable that if he had followed his advice, and bounded his ambition within those limits, he might have lived as famous for vertue as for fortune, and left himselfe a Successor of ablage to have enjoyed his estate, which afterward indeed he much enlarged, rather to the greatening of others than himselfe: who to assure themselves of what they had usurped upon his issues, left not one of them to draw breath in the world within a few years after. The truth is, That Alexander in going so far into the East, left behinde him the reputation which he brought out of Macedon; the reputation of a just and prudent Prince, a Prince temperate, advised and gratefull: and being taught new lessons by abundance of prosperity, became a lover of wine, of his owne flattery, and of extreme cruelty. Ycas, as Seneca hath observed, the taint of one unjust slaughter, amongst many, defaced and withered the flourishing beauty of all his great acts and glorious victories obtained. But the Persian Embassadors stay his answer, which was to this effect, That whatsoever he had bestowed upon the wife and children of Darius, proceeded from his owne natural clemency and magnanimity, without all respect to their Master; but thanks to an enemy was improper: that he made no Wars against adversity, but against those that resisted him; not against Women and Children, but against armed enemies: and although by the reiterated practice of Darius to corrupt his Souldiers, and by great summes of money to perswade his friends to attempt upon his person, he had reason to doubt that the peace offered was rather pretended than meant, yet he could not (were it otherwise and faithfull) resolve in haste to accept the same, seeing Darius had made the Warre against him, not as a King with Royall and overt force, but as a Traytor by secret and base practice; That for the Territory offered him, it was already his owne, and if Darius could beat him back again over Euphrates, which he had already past, he would then beleve that he offered him somewhat in his owne power: Otherwise he propounded to himselfe for the reward of the War which he had made, all those kingdoms as yet in Darius possession; wherein, whether he were abused by his owne hopes or no, the battell which he meant to fight in the day following should determine. For in conclusion, he told them, that he came into Asia to give, & not to receive; That the heavens could not hold two Suns: and therefore if Darius would be content to acknowledge Alexander for his Superiour, he might perchance be perswaded to give him conditions fit for a second Person, and his Inferiour.

The battell of Arbela: and that it could not be so strongly fought as report hath made it.

WITH this answer the Embassadors return; Darius prepares to fight, & sends Maeneus to defend a passage, which he never dared yet so much as to hazard. Alexander consults with his Captaines, Parmenio perswades him to force Darius his Camp by night; so that the multitude of enemies might not move terror in the Macedonians being but few. Alexander disdaines to steale the victory, and resolves to bring with him the day-light, to witnesse his valour. But it was the successe that made good Alexander's resolution, though the counsell given by Parmenio was more sound: For it is a ground in Warre, Si pauci necessarii cum multitudine pugnare cogantur, consilium est noctis tempore belli fortunam sentire. Notwithstanding upon the view of the multitude at hand, he staggers and trenches himselfe upon a ground of advantage, which the Persian had abandoned: And whereas Darius for feare of surprise had stood with his Army in armour all the day, and forborne sleepe all the night; Alexander gave his men rest and store of food; for reason had taught him this Rule in the Warre, In pugna Milites validius resistunt, si cibo potuque refecti fuerint, nam famem intrinsecus magis magis pugnat, quam ferrum externus; Souldiers do the better stand to it in fight, if they have their bellies full of meate and drinke; for hunger within, fights more eagerly than Steele without.

The numbers which Alexander had, saith Arrianus, were forty thousand foot, & seven thousand horse; these belike were of the European Army: for he had besides both Syrians, Indians, Egyptians, and Arabians, that followed him out of those Regions. Heuled but a short speech to his Souldiers to encourage them; and I thinke that he needed little Rhetorick; for by the two former battells upon the River of Granick and in Cilicia, the Macedonians were best taught with what men they were to encounter. And it is a true saying, Victoria victoriam parat, animumque victoribus augeat, & adversariis ansari; One victory begets another, and puts courage into those that have already had the better, taking spirit away from those that have been beaten.

Arrianus and Curtius make large descriptions of this battell, fought at Gaugamela; They tell us of many charges and re-charges; That the victory inclined sometimes to the Persians, sometime to the Macedonians; That Parmenio was in danger of being overthrowne, who led the left wing; That Alexander's Rear-guard was broken, and his carriages lost; That for the fierce and valorous encounters on both sides, Fortune her selfe was long unresolved on whom to bestow the Garland: And lastly, That Alexander in person wrought wonders, being charged in his retreat. But in conclusion, Curtius delivers us in account but three hundred dead Macedonians, in all this terrible daies work, saying, That Ephestion, Perdiccas, and others of name were wounded. Arrianus finds not a third part of this number slaine; of the Persians there fell forty thousand (saith Curtius) thirty thousand according to Arrianus: Ninety thousand, if we belevee Diodorus. But what can we judge of this great encounter, other than that, as in the two former battells, the Persians upon the first charge ran away, and that the Macedonians pursued? For if of those foure or five hundred thousand Asians brought into the field by Darius, every man had cast but a dart or a stone, the Macedonians could not have bought the Empire of the East at so easie a rate, as sixe or seven hundred men in three notorious battells. Certainly, if Darius had fought with Alexander upon the banks of Euphrates, & had armed but fifty or three score thousand of this great multitude, only with Spades, (for the most of all he had were fit for no other weapon) it had been impossible for Alexander to have past that River so easily, much lesse the river of Tigris. But as a man whose Empire God in his providence had determined, he abandoned all places of advantage, and suffered Alexander to enter so far into the bowels of his Kingdome, as all hope and possibility of escape by retreat being taken from the Macedonians, they had presented unto them the choice, either of death or victory; to which election Darius could no way constrain his own, seeing they had many large Regions to run into from those that invaded them.

§. XI.

Of things following the battell of Arbela, The yeilding of Babylon and Susa.

DARIUS after the rout of his Army recovered Arbela the same night, better followed in his flight, than in the fight. He propounded unto them that ranne after him his purpose of making a retreat into Media, perswading them that the Macedonians, greedy of spoyle and riches, would rather attempt Babylon, Susa, and other Cities filled with treasure, than pursue the vanquished. This miserable resolution his Nobility rather obeyed than approved.

Alexander soon after Darius his departure arrives at Arbela, which with a great masse of treasure, and Princely ornaments, was rendred to him: for the feare which conducted Darius, tooke nothing with it but shame and dishonour. He that had been twice beaten, should rather have sent his treasure into Media, than brought it to Arbela, so neare the place where he abid the comming of his enemies; if he had been victorious, he might have brought it after him at leisure; but being overcome, he knew it impossible to drive Mules and Camels laden with gold from the pursuing Enemy, seeing himselfe, at the overthrow he had in Cilicia, cast the Crowne from his head, to run away with the more speed. But errors are then best discerned when most incurable. Et praeterita magis reprehendi possunt quam corrigi; It is easier to reprehend than amend what is past.

From Arbela Alexander tooke his way towards Babylon, where Mazæus, in whom Darius had most confidence, rendered himselfe, his Children and the Citie. Also the Captain of the Castle, who was keeper of the treasure, strewed the streets with flowers, burnt frankincense upon Altars of silver as Alexander passed by, and delivered unto him whatsoever was committed to his trust. The Magi (the Chaldean Astrologers) followed this Captain in great solemnitie to entertaine their new King: after these came the Babylonian horsemen, infinite rich in attire, but exceeding poore in warlike furniture. Between these (though not greatly to be feared) and himselfe, Alexander caused his Macedonian foot-men to march. When he entered the Castle, he admired the glorie thereof, and the abundance of treasure therein found, amounting to fiftie thousand talents of silver uncoyned. The Citie it selfe I have elsewhere described, with the Walls, the Towers, the Gates and Circuit, with the wonderfull place of pleasure about two miles in Circuit, surrounded with a Wall of fourescore foot high, and on the top thereof (being under-borne with Pillars) a Grove of beautifull and fruitfull trees, which it is said that one of the Kings of Babylon caused to be built, that the Queene and other Princesses might walke privately therein. In this Citie, rich in all things, but most of all in voluptuous pleasures, the King rested himselfe and the whole Armie foure and thirtie dayes, consuming that time in banquetting and in all sorts of effeminate exercise; which so much softened the minds of the Macedonians, not acquainted till now with the like delicacies, as the severe discipline of war, which taught them the sufferances of hunger and thirst, of painefull travell, and hard lodging, began rather to be forgotten, than neglected.

Here it was that those bands of a thousand Souldiers were erected, and Commanders appointed over them, who thereupon were stiled Chiliarchi. This new order Alexander brought in, was to honour those Captains which were found by certaine selected Judges to have deserved best in the late war. For before this time the Macedonian companies consisted but of five hundred. Certainly the drawing down of the foot-bands in this latter age hath been the cause (saith the Marshall Monluc) that the title and charge of a Capitaine hath bin bestowed on every Pique-Bœuf or Spurn-Cow; for when the Captaines of foot had a thousand Souldiers under one Ensigne, and after that five hundred, as in the time of Francis the first, the title was honorable, and the kings were lesse charged, and far better served. K. Henry the eighth of England never gave the commandment of any of his good ships, but to men of knowne valour, and of great estate, nay sometime he made two Gentlemen of qualitie Commanders in one ship: but all orders and degrees are fallen from the reputation they had.

While Alexander was yet in Babylon, there came to him a great supply out of Europe; for Antipater sent him sixe thousand foot and five hundred horse out of Macedonia; of Thracians three thousand foot, and the like number of horse; and out of Greece four thousand and foure hundred horse, by which his Armie was greatly strengthened: for those that were infected with the pleasures of Babylon, could hardly be brought againe, De quitter la plume pour dormir sur la dure; To change from soft beds to hard boards.

He left the Castle and Citie of Babylon, with the Territories about it, in charge with three of his owne Captains, to wit, Agathon, Minetus, and Appollidorus; to supply all wants, a thousand talents: but to grace Mazæus, who rendered the Citie unto him, he gave him the title of his Lieutenant over all, and tooke with him Bagistines that gave up the Castle, and having distributed to every Souldier a part of the Treasure, he left Babylon, and entred into the Province Satrapene: from thence he went on towards Susiana Persia, the same which Ptolomy, Herodotus, and Elianus call Memnonia, situate on the river Euleus, a Citie sometime governed by Daniel the Prophet. Abulites also, Governour of this famous Citie, gave it up to the Conqueror, with fiftie thousand talents of silver in bullion, and twelve Elephants for the warre, with all other the treasures of Darius. In this sort did those Vassals of fortune, lovers of the Kings prosperitie, not of his person, (for so all ambitious men are) purchase their owne peace and safetie with the Kings treasures. And herein was Alexander well advised, that whatsoever titles he gave to the Persians, yet he left all places of importance in trust with his owne Captaines, to wit, Babylon, Susa, and Persepolis, with other Cities and Provinces by him conquered; for if Darius (as yet living) had beaten the Macedonians but in one battell, all the Nobilitie of Persia would have returned unto their naturall Lord. Those that are Treasurers to their owne Kings, are never to be used alone in great enterprises by those Princes that entertaine them, nor ever to be trusted with the defences of any frontier-Town, or Fortresse of weight, by the rendering whereof they may redeem their liberty and estates lost. Hereof the French had experience, when Don Pedro de Navarra, being banished out of Spaine, was trusted with Fonterabe, in the yeare 1523.

While Alexander spoiled Arbela, Mazæus might have furnished the King from Babylon; and while he stayed foure and thirtie dayes at Babylon, Abulites might have holpen him from Susa: & while he feasted there, Tiridates from Persepolis might have relieved him; for the great masse of Treasure was layd up in that City. But who hath sought out and so friendly fearedfull adversity? It is certaine, that benefits binde not the ambitious, but the honest: for those that are but greedy of themselves, doe in all changes of fortune only consult the conservation of their owne greatnesse.

The government of Susa, with the Castle and Treasure, he committed to his own Macedonians, making Abulites, who rendered it unto him, his Lieutenant, as he had done Mazæus and others, in giving them titles, but neither trust nor power; for he left three thousand old Souldies in Garrison to assure the place; and Darius mother and her children to repose themselves.

It is said that Charles the first, having promised Charles of Bourbon the government of Marfeilles, if he could have forc't it, and whereof he made sure accompt, told some of his nearest Counsellors, that he meant nothing lesse than the performance of that promise, because hee should thereby have left the Duke (revolted from his Matter) very well wherewithall to have recovered his favour.

§. XII.

How Alexander came to Persepolis and burnt it.

FROM Susa Alexander leadeth his Army toward Persepolis, and when he sought to passe those Mountaines which sunder Susiana and Persia, he was soundly beaten by Ariobarzanes, who defended against him those Streights, called Pyle Persidis, or Suseide; and after the losse of many Companies of his Macedonians, he was forc't to save himselfe by retreat, causing his Foot to march close together, and to cover themselves with their Targets from the stones tumbled on them from the Mountain top. Yet in the end he found out another path, which a Lycian, living in that Country, discovered unto him, and came thereby suddenly in view of Ariobarzanes, who being enforc't to fight, upon even ground, was by Alexander broken, whereupon he fled to Persepolis; but (after that they of Persepolis had refused to receive him) he returned and gave a second charge upon the Macedonians, wherein he was slain. In like manner did King Francis the first, in the year 1515, finde a way over the Alpes, the Switzers underraking to defend all the passages, who, if their footmanship had not saved them upon the Kings descent on the other side, they had been ill payd for their hard lodging on those Hills.

Foure thousand Greeks, saith Curtius (Justinus numbers them but at eight hundred) having bin taken prisoners by the Persians, presented themselves to Alexander now in sight of Persepolis. These had the barbarous Persians so maimed and defaced, by cutting off their hands, noses, eares, and other members, as they could no way have been known to their Country-men, but by their voyces; so each of these Alexander gave three hundred Crownes, with new garments, and such Lands as they liked to live upon.

Tiridates, one of Darius his false-hearted Grantes, hearing of Alexanders approach, made him know that Persepolis was ready to receive him, and prayed him to double his pace, because there was a determination in the people to spoyle the Kings treasure. This City was abandoned by many other Inhabitants upon Alexanders arrivall, and they that stayed followed the worst counsell: for all was left to the liberty of the souldiers, to spoyle and kill at their pleasure. There was no place in the world at that time, which, if it had been laid in the ballance with Persepolis, would have weighed it downe. Babylon indeed, and Susa, were very rich; but in Persepolis lay the bulke and main store of the Persians. For after the spoyle that had been made of money, curious plate, bullion, Images of gold and silver, and other Jewels; there remained to Alexander himselfe one hundred and twenty thousand talents. He left the same number of three thousand Macedonians Macedonians in Perſepolis, which he had done in Suſa, & gave the ſame formall honour to the traitor Tiridates, that he had done to Alcalites; but he that had the truſt of the place was Nicarides, a creature of his owne. The body of his Army he left here for thirty dayes, of which the Commanders were Parmenio and Craterus, and with a thouſand horſe and certain troupes of choſen foot, he would needs view in the Winter-time thoſe parts of Perſia, which the Snow had covered; a fruitleſſe and fooliſh enterpriſe, but as Senecca ſaies: Non ille ire vult, fed non poſſe ſtare: He hath not a will to goe, but he is unable to ſtand ſtill. It is ſaid and ſpoken in his praife, That when his Souldiers cryed out againſt him, becauſe they could not endure the extreme froſt, and make way, but with extreme difficulty, through the ſnow, that Alexander forſooke his horſe, and led them the way. To But what can be more ridiculous than to bring other men into extremity, thereby to ſhew how well himſelfe can endure it? His walking on ſoote did no otherwiſe take off their wearineſſe that followed him, than his ſometime forbearing to drinke did quench their thirſt, that could leſſe endure it. For mine owne little judgement, I ſhall rather commend that Captain that makes carefull proviſion for thoſe that follow him, & that ſeeks wiſely to prevent extreme neceſſity, than thoſe wiſeleſſe arrogant fools, that make the vaunt of having endured equally with the common Souldier, as if that were a matter of great glory and importance.

We find in all the Wars that Cæſar made, or the beſt of the Roman Commanders, that the proviſion of victuals was their firſt care. For it was a true ſaying of Coligny, Admirall of France; That who ſo will ſhate that beaſt (meaning War) muſt begin with his belly.

But Alexander is now returned to Perſepolis, where thoſe Hiſtorians that were moſt amorous of his virtues, complaine, that the opinion of his valour, of his liberality, of his clemency towards the vanquiſhed, and all other his Kingly conditions, were drowned in drinke; That he ſmothered in carowing cups all the reputation of his actions paſt, and that by defending, as it were, from the reverend Throne of the greateſt King, into the company and familiarity of baſe Harlots, he began to be deſpiſed both of his owne and all other Nations. For being perſwaded, when he was inflamed with wine, by the infamous Strumpet Thais, he cauſed the moſt ſumptuous and goodly Caſtle and Cite of Perſepolis to be conſumed with fire, notwithſtanding all the arguments of Parmenio to the contrary, who told him that it was a diſhonour to deſtroy thoſe things by the perſwaſions of others, which by his proper verue and force he had obtained; and that it would be a moſt ſtrong perſwaſion to the Aſians, to think hardly of him, and thereby alien their hearts: for they might well believe that he which demoliſhed the goodlieſt Ornaments they had, meant nothing leſſe than (after ſuch vaſtation) to hold their poſſeſſion. Per vinolentiam crudelitas ſequitur; Cruelti doth commonly follow drunkenneſſe. For it ſo fell out ſoone after, and often, in Alexander.

§. XIII.

The Treafon of Beſſus againſt Darius. Darius his death.

About this time he received a new ſupply of Souldiers out of Cilicia, and goes on to finde Darius in Media. Darius had there compounded his fourth and laſt Army, which he meant to have increaſed in Baſtria, had he not heard of Alexander coming on, with whom (truſting to ſuch companies as he had, which was numbered at thirty or forty thouſand) he determined once again to try his fortune. He therefore calls together his Captaines and Commanders, and propounds unto them his reſolution, who being deſperate of good ſucceſſe, uſed ſilence for a while. Artabazus, one of his clefeſt men of Warre, who had ſometime lived with Philip of Macedon, brake the yce, and proceſſing that he could never be beaten by any adverſity of the Kings, from the faith which he had ever ought him, with firme confidence, that all the reſt were of the ſame condition (whereof they likewiſe aſſured Darius by the like profeſſation) he approved the Kings reſolution. Two only, and thoſe the greateſt, to wit, Naburxanes and Beſſus, whereof the latter was governour of Baſtria, had conſpired againſt their Maſter; and therefore adviſed the King to lay a new foundation for the Warre, and to purſue it by ſome ſuch perſon for the preſent, againſt whom neither the gods nor fortune had in all things declared themſelves to be an enemy: this preamble Naburxanes uſed, and

and in concluſion adviſed the election of his fellow Traitor Beſſus, with promiſe that the warres ended, the Empire ſhould againe be reſtored to Darius. The King ſwollen with diſdain, preſt towards Naburxanes to have ſlain him, but Beſſus and the Baſtrians whom he commanded, being more in number than the reſt, with-held him. In the meane while Naburxanes with-drew himſelfe, and Beſſus followed him, making their quarter a-part from the reſt of the Army. Artabazus, the Kings faithfull ſervant, perſwaded him to be adviſed and ſerve the time, ſeeing Alexander was at hand, and that he would at leaſt make ſhew of forgetting the offence made; which the King being of a gentle diſpoſition, willingly yeelded unto. Beſſus makes his ſubmiſſion, and attends the King, who removes his Army. Patron, who commanded a Regiment of four thouſand Greeks, which had in all the former battels ſerved Darius with great fidelity, and alwayes made the retreat in ſpight of the Macedonians, offered himſelfe to guard his perſon, proteſting againſt the Treafon of Beſſus; but it was not his deſtiny to follow their advice who from the beginning of the Warre gave him faithfull counſell, but hee enclined ſtill to Beſſus, who told him, that the Greeks, with Patron their Captaine, were corrupted by Alexander, and practiſed the diviſion of his faithfull ſervants. Beſſus had drawne unto him thirty thouſand of the Army, promiſing them all thoſe things, by which the lovers of the World and themſelves are wont to be allured, to wit, riches, ſafety, and honour.

Now the day following Darius plainly diſcovered the purpoſes of Beſſus, and being overcome with paſſion, as thinking himſelfe unable to make head againſt theſe ungratefull and unnaturall Traytors, he prayed Artabazus his faithfull ſervant to depart from him, and to provide for himſelfe. In like ſort he diſcharged the reſt of his attendants, all ſave a few of his Eunuches; for his Guards had voluntarily abandoned him: His Perſians being moſt baſe cowards, durſt not undertake his defence againſt the Baſtrians, notwithſtanding that they had foure thouſand Greeks to joyne with him, who had been able to have beaten both Nations. But it is true, that him, which forſakes himſelfe, no man follows. It had been far more Man-like and King-like, to have dyed in the head of thoſe foure thouſand Greeks, which offered him the diſpoſition of their lives, (to which Artabazus perſwaded him) than to have lyen bewailing himſelfe on the ground, and ſuffering himſelfe to be bound like a ſlave by thoſe ambitious Monſters that laid hand on him, whom neither the conſideration of his former great eſtate, nor the honour he had given them, nor the truſt repoſed in them, nor the world of benefits beſtowed on them, could move to pity: no, nor his preſent adverſity, which above all things ſhould have moved them, could pierce their viperous and ungratefull hearts. Vaine it was indeed to hope it; for infidelity hath no compaſſion.

Now Darius, thus forſaken, was bound & laid in a Cart, covered with hides of Beaſts, to the end that by any other ornament he might not be diſcovered; & to adde deſpight and deriſion to his adverſity, they faſtned him with Chaines of Gold, and ſo drew him on among their ordinarie Carriages and Carts. For Beſſus and Naburxanes perſwaded themſelves to redeeme their lives and the Provinces they held, either by delivering him a priſoner to Alexander, or, if that hope failed, to make themſelves kings by his ſlaughter, and then to defend themſelves by force of Armes. But they failed in both. For it was againſt the nature of God, who is moſt juſt, to pardon ſo ſtrange villanie, yea, though againſt a Prince purely Heatheniſh and an Idolater.

Alexander having knowledge that Darius was retired towards Baſtria, and durſt not abide his coming, haſtened after him with a violent ſpeed, and becauſe he would not force his footmen beyond their powers, he mounted on horſe-back certain ſeleſted companies of them, & beſt armed, & with fix thouſand other horſe, rather ran than marched after Darius. Such as hated the Treafon of Beſſus, and ſecretly forſooke him, gave knowledge to Alexander of all that had happened, informing him of the way that Beſſus took, and how neere he was at hand: for many men of worth daily ran from him. Heere upon Alexander againe doubled his pace, and his Vant-guard being diſcovered by Beſſus his Reare, Beſſus brought a Horſe to the Cart, where Darius lay bound, perſwading him to mount thereon, and to ſave himſelfe. But the unfortunate King reſuſing to follow thoſe that had betrayed him, they caſt Darts at him, wounded him to death, and wounded the Beaſts that drew him, and ſlew two poor Servants that attended his perſon. This done, they all fled that could, leaving the reſt to the mercie of the Macedonian ſwords.

Polyſtratus

Macedonia is in Persepolis, which he had done in Susa, & gave the same formall honour to the traitor Tiridates, that he had done to Abulites; but he that had the trust of the place was Nicarides, a creature of his owne. The body of his Army he left here for thirty dayes, of which the Commanders were Parmenio and Craterus, and with a thousand horse and certain troupes of chosen foot, he would needs view in the Winter-time those parts of Persia, which the Snow had covered; a fruitlesse and foolish enterprise, but as Seneca saies: Non ille ire vult, sed non potest flere: He hath not a will to goe, but he is unable to stand still. It is said and reported in his praise, That when his Souldiers cryed out against him, because they could not endure the extreme frost, and make way, but with extreme difficulty, through the snow, that Alexander forsook his horse, and led them the way. ¹⁰ But what can be more ridiculous than to bring other men into extremity, thereby to shew how well himselfe can endure it? His walking on foot did no otherwise take off their wearinesse that followed him, than his sometime forbearing to drieke did quench their thirst, that could lesse endure it. For mine owne little judgement, I shall rather commend that Captain that makes carefull provision for those that follow him, & that seeks wisely to prevent extreme necessity, than those wildeffe arrogant fools, that make the vaunt of having endured equally with the common Souldier, as if that were a matter of great glory and importance.

We find in all the Wars that Cæsar made, or the best of the Roman Commanders, that the provision of victuals was their first care. For it was a true saying of Coligni, Admirall of France; That who so will finish his death (meaning War) must begin with his belly.

But Alexander is now returned to Persepolis, where those Historians that were most amorous of his vertues, complaine, that the opinion of his valour, of his liberality, of his clemency towards the vanquished, and all other his Kingly conditions, were drowned in drinke; That he smothered in carousing cups all the reputation of his actions past, and that by descending, as it were, from the reverend Throne of the greatest King, to the company and familiarity of base Harlots, he began to be despised both of his owne and all other Nations. For being perswaded, when he was inflamed with wine, by the infamous Strumpet Thais, he caused the most sumptuous and goodly Castle and Citie of Persepolis to be consumed with fire, notwithstanding all the arguments of Parmenio ²⁰ the contrary, who told him that it was a dishonour to destroy those things by the perswasions of others, which by his proper vertue and force he had obtained; and that it would be a most strong perswasion to the Asians, to thinke hardly of him, and thereby alien their hearts: for they might well beleieve that he which demolished the goodliest Ornaments they had, meant nothing lesse than (after such vastation) to hold their possi-

The Treason of Bessus against Darius. Darius his death.

ABout this time he received a new supply of Souldiers out of Cilicia, and goes on to finde Darius in Media. Darius had there compounded his fourth and last Army, which he meant to have increased in Bactria, had he not heard of Alexander coming on, with whom (trusting to such companies as he had, which was numbered at thirty or forty thousand) he determined once again to try his fortune. He therefore calst together his Captaines and Commanders, and propounds unto them his resolution, who being deperate of good successe, used silence for a while. Artabazus, one of his eldest men of Warre, who had sometime lived with Philip of Macedonia, brake the yce, and protesting that he could never be beaten by any adversity of the Kings, from the faith which he had ever ought him, with firme confidence, that all the rest were of the same condition (whereof they likewise assured Darius by the like protestation) he approved the Kings resolution. Two only, and those the greatest, to wit, Naburxanes and Bessus, whereof the latter was governour of Bactria, had conspired against their Master; and therefore advised the King to lay a new foundation for the Warre, and to pursue it by some such person for the present, against whom neither the gods nor fortune had in all things declared themselves to be an enemy: this preamble Naburxanes used, and

and in conclusion advised the election of his fellow Traitor Bessus, with promise that the warres ended, the Empire should againe be restored to Darius. The King swollen with disdain, prest towards Naburxanes to have slain him, but Bessus and the Bactrians whom he commanded, being more in number than the rest, with-held him. In the meane while Naburxanes with-drew himselfe, and Bessus followed him, making their quarter a-part from the rest of the Army. Artabazus, the Kings faithfull servant, perswaded him to be advised and serve the time, seeing Alexander was at hand, and that he would at least make shew of forgetting the offence made; which the King being of a gentle disposition, willingly yeelded unto. Bessus makes his submission, and attends the King, who removes his Army. Patron, who commanded a Regiment of four thousand Greeks, which ¹⁰ had in all the former bartels served Darius with great fidelity, and always made the retreat in spite of the Macedonians, offered himselfe to guard his person, protesting against the Treason of Bessus; but it was not his destiny to follow their advice who from the beginning of the Warre gave him faithfull counsell, but hee enclined still to Bessus, who told him, that the Greeks, with Patron their Captaine, were corrupted by Alexander, and practised the division of his faithfull servants. Bessus had drawne unto him thirty thousand of the Army, promising them all those things, by which the lovers of the World and themselves are wont to be allured, to wit, riches, safety, and honour.

Now Darius, thus forsaken, was bound & laid in a Cart, covered with hides of Beasts, to the end that by any other ornament he might not be discovered; & to adde despight and derision to his adversity, they fastned him with Chaines of Gold, and so drew him ⁴⁰ on among their ordinarie Carriages and Carts. For Bessus and Naburxanes perswaded themselves to redeem their lives and the Provinces they held, either by delivering him a prisoner to Alexander, or, if that hope failed, to make themselves kings by his slaughter, and then to defend themselves by force of Armes. But they failed in both. For it was against the nature of God, who is most just, to pardon to strange villanie, yea, though against a Prince purely Heathenish and an Idolater.

Alexander having knowledge that Darius was retired towards Bactria, and durst not abide his coming, hastened after him with a violent speed, and because he would not force his footmen beyond their powers, he mounted on horse-back certain selected companies of them, & best armed, & with six thousand other horse, rather ran than marched after Darius. Such as hated the Treason of Bessus, and secretly forooke him, gave knowledge to Alexander of all that had happened, informing him of the way that Bessus took, and how neere he was at hand: for many men of worth daily ran from him. Hereupon Alexander againe doubled his pace, and his Vant-guard being discovered by Bessus his Reare, Bessus brought a Horse to the Cart, where Darius lay bound, perswading him to mount thereon, and to save himselfe. But the unfortunate King refusing to follow those that had betrayed him, they cast Darts at him, wounded him to death, and wounded the Beasts that drew him, and slew two poor Servants that attended his person. This done, they all fled that could, leaving the rest to the mercie of the Macedonian swords.

Polystratus

Polystratus a Macedonian, being by pursuie of the vanquished prest with thirst, as he was refreshing himselfe with some water that he had discovered, espying a Cart with a Teame of wounded beasts breathing for life, and not able to move, searched the same, and therein found Darius bathing in his owne blood: And by a Persian captive which followed this Polystratus, he understood that it was Darius, and was informed of his barbarous Tragedy. Darius also seemed greatly comforted (if dying men ignorant of the living God can be comforted) that he caſt not out his last sorrowes unheard, but that by this Macedonian, Alexander might know and take vengeance on those Traytors, which had dealt no lesse unworthily than cruelly with him, recommending their revenge to Alexander by this messenger, which he besought him to pursue, not because Darius had desired it, but for his own honour, and for the safety of all that did, or should after wear Crownes. He also having nothing else to present, rendred thanks to Alexander for the Kingly grace used towards his Wife, Mother, & Children, desiring the immortal gods to submit unto him the Empire of the whole World. As he was thus speaking impatient death pressing out his few remaining spirits, he desired water, which Polystratus presented him, after which he lived but to tell him, that of all the best things that the world had, which were lately in his power, he had nothing remaining but his last breath, where-with to desire the gods to reward his compassion.

§. X IV.

IT was now hoped by the Macedonians, that their travels were neare an end, every man preparing for his returne. Hercof when Alexander had knowledge, he was greatly grieved; for the bounded earth sufficed not his boundlesse Ambition. Many arguments he therefore used to draw on his Army farther into the East, but that which had most strength, was, that Bessus, a most cruell traytor to his Master Darius, having at his devotion the Hyrcanians and Bactrians, would in short time (if the Macedonians should return) make himselfe Lord of the Persian Empire, and enjoy the fruits of all their former travels. In conclusion he wan their consents to go on: which done, leaving Craterus with certain Regiments of foot, and Amyntas with fixe thousand horse in Parthenia, he enters not without some opposition into Hyrcania; for the Mardons, and other barbarous Nations, defended certaine passages for a while. He passeth the river of Zioberris, which taking beginning in Parthia, dissolves it selfe in the Caspian Sea: it runneth under the ledge of Mountains, which bound Parthia & Hyrcania, where hiding it selfe under ground for three hundred furlongs, it then riseth again, & followeth its former course. In Zadracarta or Zeudracarta, the same Citie which Ptolomy writes Hyrcania, the Metropolis of that Region, he rested fifteen dayes, banquetting and feasting therein.

Phataphernes, one of Darius his greatest Commanders, with others of his best followers, submit themselves to Alexander, and were restored to their places and governments. But of all other he graced Artabazus most highly for his approved and constant faith to his master Darius. Artabazus brought with him ten thousand & five hundred Greekes, the remainder of all those that had served Darius; He treats with Alexander for their pardon, before they were yet arrived, but in the end, they render themselves simply without promise or composition: he pardons all but the Lacedæmonians, whom he imprisoned, their Leader having slaine himselfe. He was also wrought (though to his great dishonour) to receive Nabarzanes that had joynd with Bessus to murder Darius.

§. X V.

Of Thalestris Queen of the Amazons; where by way of digression, it is shewed, that such Amazons have been and are.

HERE it is said that Thalestris or Minothea, a Queene of the Amazons, came to visite him, and her suit was, (which she easily obtained) that she might accompany him till she were made with child by him: which done (refusing to follow him into India) she returned into her owne Country.

Plutarch

Plutarch citeth many Historians, reporting this meeting of Thalestris with Alexander, and some contradicting it. But indeed, the letters of Alexander himselfe to Antipater, recounting all that befell him in those parts, and yet omitting to make mention of this Amazonian business, may justly breed suspicion of the whole matter as forged. Much more justly may we suspect it as a vaine tale, because an Historian of the same time reading one of his bookes to Lyfismachus (then King of Thrace) who had followed Alexander in all his voyage, was laugh't at by the King for inserting such newes of the Amazons; and Lyfismachus himselfe had never heard of. One that accompanied Alexander, tooke upon him to write his acts; which to amplify, he told how the King had fought single with an Elephant, and slaine it. The King hearing such stuffe, caught the booke, and threw it into the river of Indus; saying, that it were well done to throw the writer after it, who by inserting such fables, disparaged the truth of his great exploits. Yet as we beleeve & know that there are Elephants, though it were false that Alexander fought with one; so may we give credit unto writers making mention of such Amazons, whether it were true or false that they met with Alexander; as Plutarch leaves the matter undetermined. Therefore I will here take leave to make digression, as well to shew the opinions of the ancient Historians, Cosmographers, and others, as also of some moderne discoverers touching these warlike Women, because not only Strabo, but many others of these our times make doubt, whether orno there were any such kind of people. Julius Solinus seares them in the North parts of Asia the lesse. Pom. Mela finds two Regions filled with them; the one on the River Thermoodon, the other neare the Caspian Sea; Lucas (saith he) Sauromatidas appehant; Which the people call Sauromatidas. The former of these two had the Cimerians for their Neighbours; Certum est (saith Vadianus), who hath commented upon Mela illas proximos Amazonibus fuisse; It is certaine that the Cimerians were the next Nations to the Amazons. Ptolomy sets them farther into the Land North-wards, neare the Mountains Hippici, not far from the Pillars of Alexander. And that they had Dominion in Asia it selfe toward India, Solinus and Pliny tell us. Where they governed a people called the Pandæans, or Padæans, so called after Pandæa the Daughter of Hercules, from whom all the rest derive themselves. Claudian affirms, That they commanded many Nations: For he speakes (largely perhaps as a Poet) thus:

*Medis levibusque Sabæis
Imperat hic Sexus: Reginarumque sub armis, Barbari a pars magna jacet.*

Claudianus Pergineus.

Over the Medes, and light Sabæans reignes
This female sexe: and under aimes of Queen, Great part of the Barbarian Land remains.

Diodorus Siculus hath heard of them in Lybia, who were more ancient (saith he) than those which kept the banks of Thermoodon, a River falling into the Euxine Sea, neare Heraculum.

Herodotus doth also make report of these Amazons, whom he tells us that the Scythians call Aorpatas, which is as much as Viricidas, or men-killers. And that they made incursion into Asia the lesse, sackt Ephesus, & burnt the Temple of Diana, Manetho, & Aven-tinus report, which they performed forty years after Troy was taken. At the siege of Troy it selfe we read of Penthesilea, That she came to the succour of Priamus.

Athenæus 1. 13.

Am. Marcellinus gives the cause of their inhabiting upon the River of Thermoodon, speaking confidently of the wars they made with divers Nations, & of their overthrow.

Plutarch in the life of Theseus, out of Philochorus, Hellenicus, and other ancient Historians, reports the taking of Antiope Queen of the Amazons by Hercules, and by him given to Theseus, though some affirme, That Theseus himselfe got her by stealth, when he came to visit him aboard his ship. But in substance there is little difference, all confessing, That such Amazons there were. The same Author in the life of Pompey speaks of certaine companies of the Amazons, that came to ayde the Albanians against the Romans, by whom after the battell, many Targets and Buskins of theirs were taken up: and he saith farther, That these women entertain the Gelæ and Lelæges once a year, Nations inhabiting between them and the Albanians.

But

c. 28.

But to omit the many Authors, making mention of Amazons that were in the old times, Fran. Lopez, who hath written the navigation of Orellana, which he made down the river of Amazons from Peru, in the year 1542. (upon which river, for the divers turnings, he is said to have sailed fixe thousand miles) reports from the relation of the said Orellana, to the Councell of the Indies; That he both saw those women, and fought with them, where they sought to impeach his passage towards the East-Sea.

It is also reported by Ulrichus Schmidel, that in the year 1542. when he sailed up the Rivers of Paragua and Parabol, that he came to a King of that country, called Scherever, inhabiting under the Tropique of Capricorne, who gave his Captaine Ernando Rieffere, a Crown of silver, which he had gotten in fight from a Queene of the Amazons in those parts.

Ed. Lopez, in his description of the Kingdome of Congo, makes relation of such Amazons, telling us, That (agreeable to the reports of elder times) they burne off their right breasts, and live apart from men, save at one time of the year, when they feast and accompany them for one month. These (saith he) possesse a part of the Kingdome of Monomotapa in Africa, nineteen degrees to the Southward of the line: and that these women are the strongest Guards of this Emperours, all the East Indian Portugals know.

I have produced these authorities in part, to justifie mine owne relation of these Amazons, because that which was delivered me for truth by an ancient Cacique of Guiana, how upon the River of Papamena (since the Spanish discoveries called Amazons) that 10 these women still live and govern, was held for a vain and unprobable report.

§. XVI.

How Alexander fell into the Persian Luxurie: and how he further pursued Bessus.

NOW as Alexander had begun to change his conditions after the taking of Persopolis: so at this time his prosperitie had so much over-wrought his vertue, as he accounted clemencie to be but basenesse, and the temperance which he had used all his life time, but a poor and dejected humour, rather becoming the instructers of his youth, than the condition and state of so mightie a King as the World could not equal. For he perswaded himselfe that he now represented the greatnesse of the gods; he was pleased that those that came before him, should fall to the ground and adore him, he wore the robes and garments of the Persians, and commanded that his Nobilitie should doe the like: he entertained in his Court and Camp, the same shamelesse rabble of Curtisians, and Sodomitall Eunuchs, that Darius had done, and imitated in all things the proud, voluptuous, and detested manners of the Persians, whom he had vanquished. So licentious is felicitie, as notwithstanding that he was fully perswaded, that the gods whom he served (detesting the vices of the invaded) assisted him in all attempts against them, he himselfe, contrary to the Religion he profest (which how Idolatrous soever it were, could not be but 40 fearful unto him by neglecting it) became by imitation, & not by ignorance or education, a more foule and fearfull Monster than Darius, from whose tyrannie he vaunted to have delivered so many Nations. Yea, those that were dearest and nearest unto him, began to be ashamed of him, entertaining each other with this, and the like scornfull discourse; That Alexander of Macedon was become one of Darius his licentious Courtiers; That by his example, the Macedonians were in the end of so many travels, more impoverished in their vertues, than enriched by their victories; and that it was hard to judge whether the Conquerors, or the Conquered were the baser slaves. Neither were these opinions so reserved, but that the noise of them came to his eares. He therefore with great gifts sought to pacifie the better sort, and those of whose judgments he was most jealous, and 50 making it knowne to the Armie, that Bessus had assumed the title of a King, and called himselfe Artaxerxes, and that he had compounded a great Armie of the Bactrians, and other Nations, he had arguments enow to perswade them to goe on, to the end that all alreadie gotten, might not with themselves (so farre engaged) be cast away. And because they were pestered with the spoiles of so many Cities, as the whole armie seemed but the guard of their carriages, (not much unlike the warfare of the French) having commanded every mans fardels to be brought into the market-place, he, together with his owne, caused all to be consumed with fire. Certainly, this could not but have proved 60 most most dangerous unto him, seeing the common Souldiers had more interest in these things which they had bought with their painefull travailes, and with their blood, than in the Kings ambition; had not (as Seneca often observed) his happy temerity overcome all things. As he was in his way, newes came to him, that Satibarzanes, whom he had established in his former government over the Arrians, was revolted; whereupon leaving the way of Bactria, he fought him out; but the Rebell, hearing of his coming, fled to Bessus, with two thousand Horse. He then went on towards Bessus, and by setting a great pile of wood on fire, with the advantage of a strong winde, won the passage over an high & unaccessable Rocke, which was defended against him with thirteene 10 thousand foot. For the extremity of the Flame & smoake forced them from the place, otherwise invincible. I saw in the third civill warre of France, certaine Caves in Langudoc, which had but one entrance, and that very narrow, cut out in the mid-way of high Rockes, which we knew not how to enter by any ladder or engine, till at last, by certaine bundels of straw, let down by an yron chaine, & a waighy stone in the middist, those that defended it, were so smothered, as they rendered themselves, with their plate, money, and other goods therein hidden. There were also some three years before my arrival in Guiana, three hundred Spaniards well mounted, smothered to death, together with their Horses, by the Countrey-people, who did set the long dry grasse on fire to the Eastward of them, (the winde in those parts being alwayes East) so as notwithstanding 20 their flying from the smoake, there was not any one that escaped. Sir John Borlomeus also, with a hundred English, was in great danger of being lost at Margarita, in the West-Indies, by having the grasse fired behinde him; but the smoake being timefully discovered, he recovered the Sea-shore with the losse of sixteene of his men. I remember these things, but to give caution to those that shall in times to come invade any part of those Countries, that they alwayes, before they passe into the Land, burne down the grasse and fedge to the East of them; they may otherwise, without any other enemy than a handfull of straw set on fire, dye the death of hony-Bees, burnt out of the Hive.

§. XVII.

A Conspiracie against Alexander. The death of Philotas and Parmenio.

ALEXANDER was, after he parted hence, no where rested, till he came into Aria, to the East of Bactria, where the chiefe City of that Province, called Artacoana, was a while defended against him, by the revolt of Satibarzanes, but in the end hee received the Inhabitants to mercie. At this place his Army was re-enforced with a new supply of five thousand and five hundred foot, and neere five hundred Horse, out of 30 Greece, Thessalie, and other places. His journey out of Persia into these parts, is very confusedly described. For having (as all his Historians tell us) a determination to find Bessus in Bactria, he leaves it at the very entrance, and takes the way of Hyrcania, from thence he wanders Northwards towards the obscure Mardi, upon the Caspian-Sea, and thence over the Mountaine Coronus unto Aria, and Drangiana.

At this time it was that the treason of Dimnus brake out, of which Philotas the sonne of Parmenio was accused, as accessary, if not principall. This Dimnus, having (I know not upon what ground) conspired with some others against the life of Alexander, were about to draw Nichomachus, a young man whom he loved, into the same treason. The Youth, although he was first bound by oath to secrecy, when he heard so foule a matter uttered; began to protest against it so vehemently, that his friend was like to have slaine 40 him for security of his owne life. So, constrained by feare, he made shew as if hee had bin won by perswasion; and by seeming at length to like well of the businesse, he was told more at large what they were that had undertaken it. There were nine or ten of them, all men of ranke, whose names Dimnus to countenance the enterprize, reckoned up to Nichomachus. Nichomachus had no sooner freed himselfe from the company of this Traitor Dimnus, than he acquainted his owne brother Ceballinus with the whole History: whereupon it was agreed betweene them, that Ceballinus (who might with least 50 suspicion) should goe to the Court, and utter all. Ceballinus, meeting with Philotas, told him the whole businesse, desiring him to acquaint the King therewith: which he promised to do, but did not. Two dayes passed, and Philotas never brake with the King about the matter, but still excused himselfe to Ceballinus by the Kings want of leisure. This his coldnesse bred suspition, and caused Ceballinus to address himselfe to another, one Metron, Keeper of the Kings Amorie, who forth-wich brought him to Alexanders presence. Alexander, finding by examination what had passed betwene Ceballinus and Philotas, did fully perswade himselfe that this concealment of the treason, argued his hand to have bin in the businesse. Therefore when Dimnus was brought before him, hee asked the T raitor no other question than this: Wherein have I so offended thee, that thou shouldst thinke Philotas more worthy to be King than I? Dimnus perceiving when he was apprehended, how the matter went, had so wounded himselfe, that he lived no longer, than to give his last groane in the Kings presence. Then was Philotas called, & charged with the suspition, which his silence might justly breede. His answer was, That when the practice was revealed unto him by Nicomachus, he judging it to bee but frivolous, did forbear to acquaint Alexander therewithall, untill he might have better information. This error of his, (if it were only an error) although Alexander, for the notorious services of his Father Parmenio, of his brother Nicanor lately dead, and of Philotas himselfe, had freely pardoned & given him his hand for assurance; yet by the instigation of Craterus, he againe swallowed his Princely promise, and made his enemies his Judges. Currius gives a note of Craterus in this businesse; How he perswaded himselfe, that he could never finde a better occasion to oppress his private enemy, than by pretending piety, and dutie towards the King. Hereof a Poet of our own hath given a note as much better, as it is more generall in his Philotas:

See how these great men cloathe their private hate,
In these faire colours of the publike good,
And, to effect their ends, pretend the State,
As if the State by their affection stood:
And, arm'd with power and Princes jealousies,
Will put the least conceit of discontent
Into the greatest ranke of treacheries,
That no one action shall seeme innocent:
Yea valour, honour, bountie, shall be made
As accessories unto ends unjust:
And even the service of the State must lade
The needfull ft undertaking with distrust;
So that base vilenesse, idle Luxurie,
Seeme safer farre, than to doe worthily, &c.

Now although it were so, that the King, following the advice of Craterus, had resolved the next day to put Philotas to torment, yet in the very evening of the same night in which he was apprehended, hee called him to a banquet, and discoursed as familiarly with him as at any other time. But when in the dead of the night Philotas was taken in his lodging, and that they which hated him began to binde him, he cryed out upon the King in these words: O Alexander, the malice of mine Enemies hath surmounted thy mercy, and their hatred is farre more constant than the word of a King. Many circumstances were urged against him by Alexander himselfe (for the Kings of Macedon did in person examine the accusations of treason) & this was not the least (nor the least offence, indeed, against the Kings humour, who desired to be glorified as a God) That when Alexander wrote unto him concerning the title given him by Jupiter Hammon; He answered, That he could not but rejoyce that he was admitted into that sacred Fellowship of the gods, and yet he could not but withall grieve for those that should live under such a one as would exceede the nature of man. This was (saith Alexander) a firme perswasion unto me, that his heart was changed, and that he held my glory in dispyght. See what a strange Monster Flatterie is, that can perswade Kings to kill those that doe not praise and allow those things in them, which are of all other most to be abhorred. Philotas was brought before the multitude, to heare the Kings Oration against him: he was brought forth in vile garments, and bound like a Theefe; where he heard himselfe, and his absent Father, the greatest Captaine of the World, accused; his two other Brothers, Hellor and Nicanor having bene lost in the present Warre. He was so greatly oppress'd with griefe, as for a while he could utter nothing but teares, and sorrow had so wasted his spirits, as he fanke under chofe that led him. In the end, the King asked him, In what language he would make his defence; he answered, In the same wherein it had pleased the King to accuse him; which he did, to the end that the Persians, as well as the Macedonians, might understand him. But hereof the King made his advantage, perswading the assembly, that he disdain'd the language of his owne Country, and so with-drawing himselfe, left him to his mercilesse enemies.

This proceeding of the Kings, Philotas greatly lamented, seeing the King, who had so sharply invighed against him, would not vouchsafe to heare his excuse. For not his enemies onely were emboldened thereby against him, but all the rest, having discovered the Kings disposition and resolution, contending among themselves, which of them should exceede in hatred towards him. Among many other arguments, which he used in his own defence, this was not the weakest; That when Nicomachus desired to know of Dimnus, what men of marke and power were his partners in the conspiracie (as seeming unwilling to adventure himselfe with meane and base Companions) Dimnus named unto him Demetrius of the Kings Chamber, Nicanor, Amintas, & some others; but spake not a word of Philotas, who by being Commander of the Horse, would greatly have valued the party, and have encouraged Nicomachus. Indeece, as Philotas said well for himselfe, it is likely that Dimnus, thereby the better to have heartned Nicomachus, would have named him, though he had never dealt with him in any such practice. And for more certaine proofe, that he knew nothing of their intents that practised against the King, there was not any one of the Conspirators, being many, inforced by torments, or otherwise, that could accuse him; and it is true, that adversity being seldom able to beare her own burden, is for the most part found so malicious, as she rather desires to draw others (not alwayes deservring it) into the same danger, than to spare any that it can accuse. Yet at the last, howsoever it were, to avoid the extremity of resistlesse and unnaturall torments, deviled by his proffert enemies Craterus, Cenus, Ephesion, and others, Philotas accused his owne selfe; being perswaded that they would have slaine him forthwith. But he failed even in that miserable hope, and suffering all that could be laid on flesh and blood, he was forced to deliver, not what he knew, but whatsoever best pleased their eares, that were fare more mercilesse than death it selfe.

Or this kinde of judicial proceeding S. Augustine greatly complaineth, as a matter to be bewailed, saith he, with Fountaines of teares. Quid cum in sua causa quisque torquetur: & cum quaeritur utrum sit nocens, cruciatur: & innocens luit pro incerto scelere certissimas penas: non quia illud commississe detegitur, sed quia non commississe nescitur? what shall we say to it, when one is put to torture in his own cause; and tormented whilest yet it is in question whether he be guilty; and being innocent, suffers assured punishment for a fault, of which there is no certaintie: not because he is knowne to have committed the offence, but because others doe not know that he hath not committed it?

It had beene enough for Alexanders safety, if Philotas had been put to death without torment; the rest would not much have grieved thereat, because he was greatly suspected. But Hemolau, who after ward conspired against him, made the Kings cruelty and delight in blood, the greatest motive of his owne ill intent. Therefore, Seneca, speaking of Alexander, saith thus: Crudelitas est minime humanum malum est, indignum amitti animo; serina ista rabies est sanguine gaudere & vulneribus, & abjectio homine, in silvestre animal transire; Cruelty is not a humane vice, it is unworthy of so milde a spirit: It is even a bestly rage to delight in blood and wounds, and casting away the nature of man, to become a savage Monster.

For the conclusion of this Tragedie, Currius makes a doubt, whether the confession that Philotas made were to give end to the torments which he could not any longer endure, or that the same was true indeece; For (saith he) in this case, they that speake truly, or they that deny falsly, come to one and the same end. Now, while the Kings hands were yet wet in blood, he commanded that Lysicles, sonne-in-Law to Antipater, who had bene three yeares in prison, should be slaine: The same dispatch had all those that Nicomachus had accused: others there were that were suspected because they had followed Philotas, but when they had answered for themselves that they knew no way so direct to winne the Kings favour, as by loving those whom the King favoured, they were dismiss'd. But Parmenio was yet living; Parmenio, who had served with great fidelity as wel Philip of Macedon the Kings Father, as himself; Parmenio, that first opened the way into Asia; that had deprest Artaban the Kings enemy; that had alwayes, and in all hazards, the leading of the Kings Vant-guard, that was no lesse prudent in counsell, than fortunate in all attempts; A man beloved of the men of War, and, to say the truth, he that had made the purchase for the King of the Empire of the East, and of all the glory and fame he had: That he might not therefore revenge the death of his Sonne, though not upon the King, (for it was unlikely that he would have dishonoured his fidelity in his eldest age, having now lived threescore and ten years) yet upon those that by the witchcraft of flattery had possest themselves of his affection, it was resolved that he should be dispatched. Polydamus was employed in this business, a man whom of all other Parmenio trusted most, and loved best, who (to be short) finding him in Media, and having Cleander and other murderers with him, slew him walking in his Garden, while he was reading the Kings letters. Hic exitus Parmenionis fuit, miliriae domique clari viri; Multa sine Rege prosperè, Rex sine illo nihil magna rei gesserat; This was the end of Parmenio (saith Curtius) who had performed many notable things without the King, but the King, without him, did never effect any thing worthy of praise.

Lib. 7.

6. XVIII.

How Alexander subdued the Bactrians, Sogdians, and other people. How Bessus was delivered into his hands. How he fought with the Scythians.

WHen these things had end, Alexander went on with his Army, and brought under his obedience the Arasians or Evergitans; he made Amenides (sometime Darius his Secretary) their Governour, then he subdued the Arachosians, & left Menanto command over them. Here the Army, sometimes led by Parmenio, findes him, consisting of twelve thousand Macedons and Greeks, with whom he past through some cold Regions with difficulty enough. At length he came to the foot of the Mountaine Taurus towards the East, where he built a City, which he honoured with his own name, & peopled it with seven thousand of his old Macedons, worne with age & with travailes of the war. The Arians, who since he left them were revolted, he subdued againe by the industrie and valour of Caranus and Erigius. And now he resolves to finde out the new King Bessus in Bactria. Bessus, hearing of his coming, prepares to passe over the great River of Oxus which divides Bactria from Sogdiana; Artabazus is made Governor of Bactria abandoned by Bessus. The Macedonian Army suffereth for want of Water, inasmuch as when they came to the River of Oxus, there died more of them by drinking inordinatly, than Alexander had lost in any one battaile against the Persians. And it may well be; For (as Chrysides did after object unto him) he fought against women, not against men, and not against their persons, but their shadowes. Hee found on the banks of this great River no manner of Timber or other materials, to make either boates, bridges, or raffe, but was forc't to sew together the Hides that covered his carriages, and stuffe them with straw, and on them in fixe daies to passe over his Army; which Bessus might easily have distrust, if hee had dared but to behold the Macedonian Army as far off. He had formerly complained against Darius for neglecting to defend the banks of Tigris, and other passages, and yet now, when this traitorous slave had stiled himself a King, he durst not perform any thing worthy of a slave. And therefore those that were neereest unto him, & whom he most trusted, to wit, Spitamenes, Dataphernes, Catanes, and others the Commanders of his Army, moved both by the care of their own safety, and by the memory of Bessus his Treason and cruelty against Darius, bound him in the like manner that he had done his Master, but with this difference, that he had the chaine closed about his necke like a mastiffe Dog, and so was dragged along to be presented to his enemy.

In the meane while Alexander was arrived at a certaine Town inhabited with Greeks of Miletum, brought thither by Xerxes, when long before hee returned out of Greece; whose issues had well-neere forgotten their Country-language. These most cruelly after they had received him with great joy) he put to the sword, & destroyed their City. At this place he received Bessus, and having rewarded Spitamenes with the rest that delivered him, he gave the Traitor into the hands of Oxartes, Darius his brother, to be tortured.

But

But while he now thought himself secure, some twenty thousand Mountainers assailed his Campe; in repelling whom he received a shot in the legge, the arrow head sticking in the flesh, so as he was carried in a Horse-litter, sometime by the horsemen, sometime by the foot.

Soone after he came unto Maracanda, which Petrus Peronidinus takes to be Samarachand, the regall City of the great Tamerlaine. It had in compasse threescore & ten furlongs (Curtius saith.) Here he received the Embassadors of the Scythians (called Avians) who offered to serve him.

The Bactrians are shortly again with the Sogdians stirred to Rebellion, by the same Spitamenes & Catanes, who had lately delivered into his hands the traitor Bessus. Many Cities were revoltedly defended against him, all which, after victory, he defaced & razed, killing all therein. At one of these he received a blow on the necke, which stricke him to the ground, and much disabled him for many dayes after. In the meane while Spitamenes had recovered Maracanda, against whom he employed Menedemus with three thousand foote and eight hundred horse.

In the heate of these tumults Alexander marched on (if we may beleeve Curtius and others) till he came to the river of Tanais; upon whose banke he built another Alexandria, threescore furlongs in compasse, which he beautified with houses within seventeen dayes after the wals built. The building of this City is said to have bin occasion of a war between him and the Scythians; the Scythian King perswading himselfe, that this new Towne was fortified of purpose to keepe him under. I doe not well understand, why the Scythians, offering war in such terrible manner, that Alexander was judged by his owne Souldiers to counterfeite sicknesse for very feare, should nevertheless make suite for peace: neither finde I the reason why Alexander (not intending the conquest of those Northerne desarts, but only the defence of his owne banke) should refuse to let them alone, with whom he could not meddle further than they should agree to suffer him. Yet hereof is made a great matter; and a victory described; in pursuit of which the Macedons ran beyond the bounds and monuments of Bacchus his expedition.

The truth is, That Curtius and Trogus have greatly mistaken this River, which they call Tanais. For it was the River of Jaxartes, that runs betweene Sogdiana and Scythia, which Alexander past over, while Menedemus was employed in the recovery of Samarachand: But Tanais, which divides Asia from Europe, is neere two thousand miles distant from any part of Bactria and Sogdiana, & the way desart and unknowne. So that Alexander had (besides Jaxartes) the great River of Volga & many others to swim over, ere he could recover Tanais: which (from the place where he was) he could hardly have discovered with the Army that followed him, if he had imployed all the time that he lived in Asia in that travaile.

Wherefore it is enough to beleeve, that the Asiaticke Scythians, making some offer to disturbe the erection of this new City, which was like to give some hinderance to their excursions, were driven away by the Macedonians; and being naked of defensive Armes, easily chased some ten or twelve miles; which is the substance of Curtius his report. As for the limits of Bacchus his journey; like enough it is that Bacchus (if in his life time he were as sober a man, as after his death he was held a drunken god) went not very far into that wast Country, where he could find nothing but trees and stones, nor other businesse than to set up a monument.

Threescore of the Macedons are said to have bin slaine, and one thousand one hundred hurt in this fight; which might easily be in passing a great River, defended against them by good Archers. Of Scythian horses one thousand eight hundred were brought into the Campe, and many prisoners. It is forbidden by some Historians, and indeede it is hardly possible to set down the numbers of such as perish in battell: yet Cæsar commonly did it. And where the diligence of the victors hath bene so inquisitive into the greatnesse of their own successe, that writers have bene able to deliver such particulars by credible report, I hold it not unlawfull to set down what we finde; especially when it serves to give light to the businesse in hand. The small number which the Macedonians lost; the omission of the number which they slew (a thing not usuall in Curtius, who forbears nothing that may set out the greatnes of Alexander) and the little bootie that was gotten; doe make it probable, that this war was no better than the repulsion of a few roving Tartars (the like being yearly performed by the Moscovites; without any boast) and therefore better omitted by some Historians, than so highly extolled as a great exploit, by others.

While Alexander was assuring himself of those Scythians bordering upon Jaxartes, he received the ill newes that Menedemus was slain by Spitamenes, the Army (by him led) broken, and the greatest numbers slain, to wit, two thousand foot, and three hundred horse. He therefore, to appease the rebellion, and to take revenge of Spitamenes, makes all the haste he can; but Spitamenes flies into Bactria. Alexander kills, burns, and layes waste all before him; not sparing the innocent children, and so departs, leaving a new Governour in that Province.

To repaire this losse he received a great supply of nineteene thousand Souldiers out of Greece, Lydia, & Syria; with all which, & the old Army, he returns towards the South, and passeth the River of Oxus; on the South-side whereof he built fixe Townes neere each other for mutuall succour. But he findes a new start-up-Rebell, called Arimazes, (a Sogdian) followed with thirty thousand Souldiers, that defended against him a strong piece of ground on the top of a high Hill; whom when Alexander had fought in vaine to win by faire words, he made choice of three hundred young men, & promised ten talents to the first, nine to the second, and so in proportion to the rest, that could finde way to creepe up to the top thereof. This they performed with the losse of some two and thirty of their men, & then made a signe to Alexander, that they had performed his commandement. Hereupon he sent one Cophes to perswade Arimazes to yeeld the place; who, being shewed by Cophes that the Army of Macedon was already mounted up, yeelded simply to Alexanders mercy, and was (with all his kinred) scourged and crucified to death; which punishment they well deserved for neglecting to keepe good watch in so dangerous a time. For the place, as seemes by the description, might easily have beene defended against all the Armies of the World. But, what strength cannot doe, Mans wit, being the most forcible engine, hath often effected: Of which I will give you an example in a place of our owne.

The Iland of Sarke, joyning to Garnsey, & of that government, was in Queen Marius time surpris'd by the French, and could never have beene recovered againe by strong hand, having cattell and corne enough upon the place to feed so many men as will serve to defend it, and being every way so inaccessible, that it might be held against the Great Turke. Yet by the industry of a Gentleman of the Netherlands, it was in this fort regained. He anchored in the roade with one Ship of small burden, and pretending the death of his Merchant, besought the French, being some thirty in number, that they might burie their Merchant in hallowed Ground, and in the Chappell of that Isle; offering a present to the French of such Commodities as they had aboard; whereto (with condition that they should not come a-shore with any weapon, no nor so much as with a Knife) the French men yeelded. Then did the Flemings put a Coffin into their Boat, not filled with a dead carcase, but with Swords, Targets, and Harquebusses; The French received them at their landing; and searching every of them so narrowly as they could not hide a Pen-knife, gave them leave to draw their Coffin up the Rockes with great difficulty; some part of the French tooke the Flemish Boat & rowed aboard their Ship, to fetch the commodities promised, & what else they pleased; but being entred, they were taken and bound. The Flemings on the Land, when they had carried their Coffin into the Chappell, shut the doore to them, and taking their weapons out of the Coffin, set upon the French; they run to the Cliffe and cry to their Company aboard the Fleming to come to their succour, but finding the Boat charged with Flemings, yeelded themselves and the place. Thus a Fox-taile doth sometimes helpe well to picce out the Lyons-skin, that else would be too short.

§. XIX.

How Alexander slew his owne friends.

After these Sogdian & Scythian Warres, we reade of Alexanders killing of a Lycian, and other Frivolous matters, and that he committed the Government of Macedonia, and the Country about it, to Chrys, and how he slew him soone after, for valuing the vertue of Philip the father before that of Alexander the son, or rather because he objected to the King the death of Parmenio, & derided the Oracle of Hammon:

for

for therein he toucht him to the quicke, the same being delivered in publike, and at a drunken Banquet. Chrys, indeed, had deserved as much at the Kings hands, as any man a living had done, & had in particular saved his life, which the King well remembered when he came to himselfe, and when it was too late. Yet to say the truth, Chrys his insolvency was intolerable. As he in his Cups forgot whom he offended, so the King in his (for neither of them were themselves) forgot whom hee went about to slay, for the griefe whereof he tare his owne face, and forrowed so inordinately, as, but for the perswasions of Calisthenes, it is thought he would have slain himselfe.

Wine begat Furie, Furie matter of Repentance: but preceeding mischiefs are not amended by succeeding bewailing: Omne vitium ebrietas & incendit, & detegit; obstantem malis conatibus verecundiam removet; ubi possedit animum nimia vis vini, quicquid mali latebat, emergit: non facit ebrietas viria, sed protrahit; Drunkenness both kindles & layes open every vice; it removes out of the way that shame which gives impediment unto badde attempts; where wine gets the mastery, all the ill that before lay hidden breakes out: drunkenness indeed rather discovers vices, than makes them.

Soone after this, Spitamenes, who slew Bessus, & had lately revolted from Alexander, was murdered by his Wife, & his head presented to Alexander. Spitamenes being taken away, the Dahans also seized upon his fellow-conspirator Dataphernes, & delivered him up. So Alexander being now freed from all these pettie-Rebels, disposed of the Provinces which he past over, & went on with his Army into Gabaza, where it suffered so much Hunger, Cold, Lightning, Thunder, and Storme, as he lost in one Tempest a thousand of his Traine. From hence he invaded the Sacans, & destroyed their Country. Then came he into the Territory of Cohortanes, who submitted himselfe unto him, feasted him greedily, & presented him with thirty beautifull Virgins, among whom Roxane, afterwards his Wife, was one: which although all the Macedonians did disdain, yet none of them durst use any freedom of speech after Chrys his death. From hence he directed his course towards India, having so increased his numbers, as they amounted to an hundred and twenty thousand armed men.

In the meane while he would needs bee honoured as a god: whereto that hee might allure the Macedonians, he employed two pernicious Parasites, Hagis and Cleus whom Calisthenes opposed: For, among many other honest arguments used to the assembly, he told Cleus, That he thought, that Alexander would disdain the gift of God-head from his Vassalls; That the opinion of Sanctity, though it did sometime follow the death of those, who in their life-time had done the greatest things, yet it never accompanied any one as yet living in the world. He further told him, That neither Hercules nor Bacchus were Deified at a banquet, and upon drinke (for this matter was propounded by Cleus at a carousing feast): but that, for the more than manly acts by them performed while they lived, they were in future and succeeding Ages numbred among the gods. Alexander stood behinde a partition, and heard all that was spoken, waiting but an opportunitie to be revenged on Calisthenes, who being a man of free speech, honest, learned, and a lover of the Kings honour, was yet soone after tormented to death; not for that he had betrayed the King to others: but because he never would condescend to betray the King to himselfe, as all his detestable flatterers did. For in a conspiracy against the King made by one Hermolam & others (which they confest) he caused Calisthenes without confession, accusation, or triall, to be torne asunder upon the racke: This deed unworthy of a King, Seneca thus censureth. Hoc est Alexandri crimen aeternum, quod nulla virtus, nulla belorum felicitas redimet. Nam quoties quis dixerit, Occidit Persarum multa millia: opponitur, & Calisthenem: Quoties dictum erit, Occidit Darium: opponitur, & Calisthenem. Quoties dictum erit, Omnia Oceano tenuis viciit, ipsum quoque tenuit novis claustris, & Imperium ex angulo Thraciae usque ad Orientis terminos protulit, dicitur, sed Calisthenem occidit. Omnia licet antiqua Ducum Regumque exempla transferat, ex his quae fecit nihil tam magnum erit quam scelus Calisthenes; This is the eternal crime of Alexander, which no vertue nor felicity of his in warre shall ever be able to redeeme. For as often as any man shall say, he slew many thousand Persians, it shall by replied, He did so, & he slew Calisthenes: when it shall be said, He slew Darius, it shall be replied, and Calisthenes; when it shall be said, He won all as farre as the very Ocean, thereon also he adventured with unsuccessfull Navies, & extended his Empire from a corner of Thrace to the utmost bounds of the Orient: It shall be said withall, But he killed Calisthenes. Let him have out-gone all the ancient examples examples of Captaines and Kings; none of all his aſſes make ſo much to his glory, as Calliſtences to his reproach.

§. XX.

Of Alexanders journey into India. The battaile betweene him and Porus.

With the Army before remembred, of one hundred & twenty thouſand foot & horſe, Alexander did enter the borders of India, where ſuch of the Princes, as ſubmitted themſelves unto him, he entertained lovingly, the reſt he conſtrained; killing Man, Woman, and Child, where they reſiſted. He then came before ¹⁰ Niſa built by Bacchus, which after a few daies was rendred unto him. From thence he removed to a Hill at hand, which on the top had goodly Gardens, filled with delicate fruits and Vines, dedicated to Bacchus, to whom he made feaſts for ten dayes together. Now when he had drunke his fill, he went on towards Dedula, and from thence to Acadera, Countries ſpoiled and abandoned by the Inhabitants; by reaſon whereof, victualls fail-ling, he divides his Army: Ptolomy led one part, Cenon another, and himſelfe the reſt.
They take many Townes, whereof that of greateſt fame was Mazage, which had in it three hundred thouſand men; but after ſome reſiſtance: it was yeilded unto him by Cleophe the Queene, to whom againe he reſtored it; at the ſiege of this City he received a wound in the legge. After this, Nora was taken by Polyſperchon, and a Rocke of great ¹⁰ ſtrength by himſelfe: hee wanne alſo a paſſage upon one Eryx, who was ſlaine by his companie, & his head preſented to Alexander. This is the ſumme of Alexanders doings in thoſe parts, before ſuch time as he arrived at the River of Indus. Comming to Indus, he found there Epheſion, who (being ſent before) had prepared boates for the transportation of his Army, & ere Alexanders arrivall, had perſwaded Omphis King of that part of the Country, to ſubmit himſelfe to this great Conquerour. Therefore, ſoone upon Alexanders comming, Omphis preſented himſelfe with all the ſtrength of his Country, & fixe & fiftie Elephants, unto him; offering him his ſervice and aſſiſtance. He made Alexander know, that he was an Enemy to the next two great Kings of that part of India, named Abiaſares and Porus; wherewith Alexander was not a little pleaſed, hoping ¹⁰ this diſ-union to make his owne victory by farre the more eaſie. He preſented Alexander with a Crowne of gold, ſo did he the reſt of his Commanders, & withall foureſcore talents of ſilver coyne; which Alexander not only reſuſed, but to ſhew that he was covetous of glory, not of gold, he gave Omphis a thouſand talents of his owne treaſure, beſides other Persian rarities. Abiaſares, having heard that Alexander had received his enemy Omphis into his protection, reſolved to make his owne peace alſo: For, knowing that his own ſtrength did but equall that of Omphis, and that there was no other difference betweene them, than that which the chance of Warre gave, hee thought it an ill match when Alexander, who had already beaten under foote all the greateſt Princes of Aſia, ſhould make himſelfe a Party and Head of the quarrell. So had Alexander none ⁴⁰ now to ſtand in his way but Porus, to whom he ſent a commandement, that he ſhould attend him at the border of his Kingdom, there to doe him homage. But from Porus he received this manly answer. That he would ſatiſfie him in his firſt demand, which was to attend him on his borders, and that well accompanied; but for any other acknowledgement he was reſolved to take counſell of his Sword. To be ſhort, Alexander reſolves to paſſe over the River Hydaſpes, and to finde Porus at his owne home. Porus attends him on the farther bank with thirty thouſand foot, foureſcore & ten Elephants, and three hundred armed Chariots, and a great troope of Horſe. If Darius had done the like on Tigris, Alexander had ſurely ſtaied ſomewhat longer ere he had ſeene India. The River was foure furlongs broad, which makes halfe a mile, and withall deepe and ſwift.
It had in it many Ilands, among which there was one well ſhadowed with wood, and of good capacity. Alexander ſent Ptolomy up the River with a great part of the Army, ſhrowding the reſt from the view of Porus: who by this device being drawne from his firſt incamping, ſets himſelfe down oppoſite to Ptolomy, ſuppoſing that the whole Army of Macedon meant to force their paſſage there. In the meane while Alexander recovers the farther ſhore without reſiſtance. He orders his troopes and advanceth towards Porus, who at firſt rather beleeves, that Abiaſares his Confederate (but now the Confederate of fortune) had bin come over Hydaſpes to his aide, than that Alexander had paſt it.
But

But he findes it otherwiſe, and ſends his Brother Hages with foure thouſand horſe, and a hundred armed waggons to entertaine him. Each waggon had in it foure to fight, and two to guide it; but they were at this time of little uſe for there had fallen ſo much raine, and thereby the fields were ſo moiſtned, as the horſes could hardly trot. The Scythians & Dahans had the Vant-guard, who ſo galled theſe Indians, as they brake their raines, & other furniture, overturning the waggons, & thoſe in them. Perdiccas alſo gave up the Indian horſe-men, & the one and the other were forc't to recoile. Porus moves forward with groſſe of his Army, that thoſe of his Vant-guard ſcattered might recover his Reare, Alexander being followed with Epheſion, Ptolomy, & Perdiccas, tooke on him to charge
10 the Indian horſe-men on the left wing, commanding Cenon or Cenon to invade the right; Antigonus & Leonatus, he directed to breake upon Porus his battaile of foot, ſtrengthened with Elephants, Porus himſelfe being carried upon one of them, of the greateſt ſtature. By theſe beaſts the Macedonian foote were moſt offended; but the Archers & Darters, being well guarded with the long & ſtrong pikes of the Macedonians, ſo galled them, as being enraged, they turned head, and ranne over the foot that followed them: In the end, and after a long and doubtfull fight, by the advantage of weapon, and by the courage and ſkillfulneſſe of the Macedonian Captaines, the victory fell to Alexander, who alſo farre exceeded Porus in number: for beſides the Macedonians and other Eaſterne & Northerne Nations, Porus was aſſailed by his owne Confederate and Countrey people.
20 Yet for his owne perſon he never gave ground otherwiſe than with his ſword towards his enemies, till being weakened with many wounds, and abandoned by his Army, he became a priſoner to the Conqueror, from whom againe he received his eſtate with a great enlargement.

§. XXI.

How Alexander finiſhed his expedition, and returned out of India.

IForbear to trouble my ſelf and others with a frivolous diſcourſe of Serpents, Apes, & Peacocks, which the Macedonians found in theſe their travailes: or of thoſe pettie 30 Warres which Alexander made betweene the overthrow of Porus, and his failing downe the River of Indus. The deſcriptions of places about the head & branches thereof are better knowne unto us in this Age, by meanes of our late Navigations into thoſe parts, than they were in any former times. The magnificence and riches of thoſe Kings we could in no fort be perſwaded to beleeve, till our own experience had taught us, that there were many ſtranger things in the World, than are to be ſeene betweene London and Stanes.

Our great traveller Mandevile, who died in the year 1372, and had ſeene ſo much of the World, and of the Eaſt India, we accompted the greateſt fabler of the World; yet had he another reputation among other Nations, as well able to judge as we. Witneſſe 40 the Monument made of him in the Covent of the Friars Guillimins in Liege, where the religious of that place keep ſome things of his, Comme pour honorable memoire de ſon Excellence, For an honourable memoire of his Excellencie, ſaith Guichardine.

The Countries towards the Springs of Indus, and where thoſe many Rivers of Hyda-ſpes, Zaradrus, Aceſines, and the reſt, fall into the maine ſtreame, are now poſſeſſed by the great Mogor, the ninth from Tamberlaine, who commands all that tract between Persia and Indus towards the Weſt, as alſo a great extent of Countrey towards Ganges. In the mouth of Indus, the Aſcenſion, a ſhippe of London, ſuffered ſhipwracke, in the yeere 1609. and ſome of the company travelled over Land till they came to Agra, the ſame great Citie (as I take it) which our later Cosmographers call Nagra, being named of 50 old Dionysopolis.

Philotracus in the liſe of Apollonius Tyanæus, ſpeaking of the expedition of Bacchus & Hercules into the Eaſt India, tells us, that thoſe two great Captaines (whom Alexander fought by almeans to out-fame) when they endeavourd to ſubject to them the Oxydracas, a people inhabiting betweene the Rivers of Hyphaſis & Ganges, they were beaten from the aſſault of their Cities with thunder and lightning. This may well be underſtood by the great Ordnance that thoſe people had then in uſe. For it is now certainly knowne, that the great Kings of the uttermoſt Eaſt, have had the uſe of the canon many hundreds of yeares ſince, and even ſince their firſt civilitie and greatneſſe, which was long before Alexander's

the Low Countreies.

Alexanders time. But Alexander pierc't not so farre into the East. It sufficed, that having already over-wearied his Army, he discovered the rest of India by fame. The Indian Kings whom he had subdued, informed him, that a Prince called Aggramenes, who commanded many Nations beyond the River Ganges, was the powerfullst King of all those Regions: and that he was able to bring into the field two hundred thousand Foot, three thousand Elephants, twenty thousand Horse, and two thousand armed Chariots. With this report, though Alexander were more inflamed than ever to proceed in this discovery and conquest, yet all the art he had, could not persuade the Souldiers to wander over those great Desarts beyond Indus & Ganges, more terrible unto them than the greatest Army that the East could gather. Yet at the last contented they were, after many persuasive Orations, to follow him towards the South, to discover such part of the Ocean Sea, as was neerer at hand, whereunto the River of Indus was their infallible guide. Alexander seeing that it would be no otherwise, devised a prettie trick, wherewith he hoped to beguile posterity, and make himselfe seeme greater than he was. He enlarged his Campe, made greater trenches, greater cabbines for Souldiers, greater Horse-stalles, and higher mangers than Horses could feede in. He caused all furniture of men & horses to be made larger than would serve for use; & scattered these Armour & Bridles about his Campe, to be kept as reliques, and wounded at by the Savages. Proportionable to these he raised up twelve great Altars to be the monument of his journeys end. This was a ready way to encrease the fame of his bignesse; to his greameffe it could adde nothing save a suspicion, that it was lesse than is thought, seeing he strove so earnestly to make it thought more than it was.

This done, he returned againe to the banke of Acefines, and there determined to set up his fleet, where Acefines and Hydaspis encounter; where to testifie by a surer monument, how far he had past towards the East, he built by those rivers two Cities: the one he called Nicaea, & the other Bucephalon, after the name of his beloved Horse Bucephalus. Here againe he received a fourth supply of fixe thousand Thracian Horse-men, seven thousand Foot; and from his Lieutenants at Babylon five and twenty thousand Armour, garnished with silver and gold, which he distributed among his Souldiers. About these Rivers he wan many Townes, and committed great slaughter on those that resisted: It is then written of him, that assaulting a Citie of the Oxidracans, he leapt from the top of the wall into it, and fought, I know not how long, against all the Inhabitants; tales like those of Bevis of Southampton, frivolous and incredible. Finally, he past downe the River with his fleet, at which time also the newes came unto him of a rebellion in Babaria, and then of the arrivall of an hundred Embassadors from a King of India, who submitted himselfe unto him. He feasted these Embassadors upon a hundred beds of gold, with all the sumptuosity that could be devised, who soone after their dispatch, returned againe with a present of three hundred Horse, one hundred and thirty Waggon, and to each of them foure Horses, a thousand Targets, with many other things rare and rich.

Their entertainments ended, he sailed towards the South, passed through many obscure Nations, which did all yeeld unto him either quietly, or compelled by force: among these he builded another Alexandria. Of many places which he tooke in this passage, Samus was one, the Inhabitants wherof fought against him with poisoned swords, with one of which Ptolomy (afterward King of Egypt) was wounded, and cured by an herb which Alexander dreamt he had seene in the mouth of a Serpent.

When he came neere the out-let of Indus (being ignorant of the tides of the Sea) his Gallies, as they were on a sudden shuffled one upon another by the Floud, so on the Ebbe they were left on the drie ground, and on the sandie banks of the River, wherewith the Macedonians were much amazed; but after he had a few daies observed well the course of the Sea, he past out of the rivers mouth some few miles, & after Sacrifices offered to Neptune, returned: and the better to informe himselfe, he sent Nearchus and Onesicritus, to discover the coast towards the mouth of Euphrates. Arrianus in the beginning of his sixt Book hath written this passage downe the River of Indus at length, with the manner of the Vessels in which he transported his Army, the Commanders that were used therein, and other the marvellous provisions made.

Neere the out-lets of this river, he spent some part of the Winter, and in eightene daies march from thence recovered Gedrosia, in which passage his Army suffered such

miserie for want of foode, that of a hundred and twenty thousand foot, and twelve thousand horse, which he carried into India, not the fourth part returned alive.

§. XXII.

Of Alexanders Riot, Cruelty, and death.

From Gedrosia, Alexander led his Army into Carmania, and so drawing neere to Persia, he gave himselfe wholly to feasting and drinking, imitating the triumphs of Bacchus. And though this Swinish vice be carefull enough in it selfe, yet it alwayes inflamed this King to Cruelty. For (saith Curcius) the Hang-man followed the feast, for Alpates, one of his Provinciaall Governors, he commanded to be slaine, so as neither did the exedle of voluptuousnesse qualifie his cruelty, nor his cruelty hinder in ought his voluptuousnesse.

While he refreshed his Army in these parts, a new supply of five thousand foot and a thousand horse, was brought him by Cleander, and his fellows, that had bin employed in the killing of Parmenio. Against these Murderers great complaint was made by the Deputies of the Provinces, in which they had commanded; and their offences were so outrageous, as Alexander was perswaded, that, had they not altogether despaired of his returne out of India, they durst not have committed them. All men were glad of the occasion, remembering the vertue of him, whom they had slaughtered. The end was, That Cleander, and the other chiefe, with fixe hundred Souldiers by them employed, were delivered over to the Hang-man every one rejoicing that the Ire of the King was at last executed on the ministers of his Ire.

Nearchus and Onesicritus were now returned from the coast, and made report of an Iland rich in gold, and of other strange things; whereupon they were commanded to make some farther discoverie: which done, that they should enter the mouth of Euphrates, and finde the King at Babylon.

As he drew neere to Babylon, he visited the Sepulchre of Cyrus in Fasargada, now called Chalquera: where he was presented with many rich gifts by Orsines, one of the Princes of Persia, of the race of Cyrus. But because Bagoas, an Eunuch in especiall favour with the King, was neglected, he not only practised certaine loose fellows to witness against Orsines, that he had robbed Cyrus tombe, for which hee was condemned to die; but he assisted the Hang-man with his own hands in tormenting him. At which time also Alexander caused Phradites to be slaine, suspecting his greatnesse. Cæperat (saith Curcius) esse precepta ad representanda supplicia, item ad deteriora credenda; He began head-longly to feed bloud and to beleeve false reports. It is true, that he tooke a way to make all men weary of his government, seeing cruelty is more fearefull, than all adventures that can be made against it.

At this time it is said, that Calanus the Philosopher burnt himselfe, when he had lived threescore and thirteene yeares. Whether herein he followed the custome of his Countrey, being an Indian, or sought to prevent the griefe and incommoditie of elder age, it is uncertaine: but in this the Historians agree, that fore-seeing and fore-shewing Alexanders death, he promised to meet him shortly after at Babylon.

From Fasargada he came to Susa, where he married Statira, Darius his eldest Daughter, giving her younger sister to his beloved Ephesion, and fourescore other Persian Ladies to his Captaines. There were fixe thousand guests invited to the feast, to each of which he gave a cup of gold. Here there came unto him three thousand young souldiers, out of his conquered Provinces, whereat the Macedonians greatly murmured. Harpalus, his Treasurer in Babylon, having lavishly consumed the monies in his keeping, got him going with five thousand Talents, and fixe thousand hired Souldiers; but he was rejected in Greece, & there slaine. Alexander greatly rejoiced at the fidelity of the Greeks, whom Harpalus with these forces and treasures could not stirre: yet he sent commandement, that they should againe receive their banished men, whereunto (fearefull of his indignation) all submitted themselves (except the Athenians) though they resolved, that it was a manifest preparation towards their bondage. After this there followed a marvellous discontentment in his Army, because he had resolved to send into Macedon all those old Souldiers which could no longer endure the travell of Warre, and to keepe the rest in Asia. He used many Orations to satisfie them, but it was in vaine during the tempest tempest of their fury. But afterward, as Whales are drawne to the Land with a twine-threeed, when they have tumbled a while, so are the unconsiderate multitude easilily conducted when their first passions are evaporate. With such as were licenced to depart, he sent Craterus, to whom he gave the Lieutenantship of Macedon, Thessaly, and Thrace, which Antipater had held from his first departure out of Europe, who had beaten the rebellious Greeks in his absence, discharged the trust committed unto him with great fidelity, and sent him so many strong supplies into Asia from time to time. Certainly if Alexander had not taken counsell of his cups, he would have cast some better colour on this alteration, and given Antipater a stronger reason for his remove, than to have im-ployed him in the conduction of a new supply to be brought him to Babylon, the Warre being now at an end. For Antipater saw nothing in this remove, but the Kings disposition to send him after Parmenio, and the rest. With this Antipater, the King, notwithstanding his great courage, had no great appetite to grapple: Princes, though jealous, doe not stand in doubt of every man ill affected, though valiant: but there is a kinde of kingly courage, compounded of hardinesse and understanding, which is many times so fearefull unto them, as they take leave both of Law and Religion, to free themselves thereof.

After he had sent for Antipater, he made a journey into Media to settle things there; where Ephestion, whom he favoured most of all men, dies. The King according to the greatnesse of his love, laments his losse, hangs his Physician, and bestowes upon his Monument twelve thousand talents: After which he returnes to Babylon. Thither Antipater also came not, but sent; and not to excuse himselfe, but to free himselfe. For if we beleve Curtius (whom Plutarch & others gainc-say) Antipater by his sonnes, Cassander, Philip, and Tolla, who waited on Alexanders cup, gave him poyson; Thessalus (who was of the conspiracie) having invited him to a drinking feast of purpose. For after he had taken a carouse in Hercules his cup, a draught of drinke stronger than Hercules himselfe, he quitted the World within a few daies.

Certainly the Princes of the World have seldom found good, by making their Ministers over-great, & thereby suspicious to themselves. For he that doth not acknowledge fidelity to be a debt, but is perswaded, that Kings ought to purchase it from their Vassals, will never please himself with the price given. The only restorative, indeed, that strengthens it, is the goodnesse & vertue of the Prince, & his liberality makes it more diligent; so as proportion and distance be observed. It may be that Antipater, having commanded two or three Kingdomes ten or twelve years, knew not how to play any other part; no more than Cesar did, after he had so long a time governed the Gauls, where hee utterly forgot the art of obedience. A most cruell and ungratefull traitor Antipater was, if Curtius do not belie him: For though he feared some ill measure upon his remove (the Tragedies of Parmenio, Clytus, and Callisthenes, having bin so lately aded) yet he knew nothing to the contrary, but that the King had resolved to have given him some other great government in Asia: The old Souldiers thence returned, having perchance desired to be governed by Craterus, whom they had followed in all the former Warre.

§. XXIII.

Of Alexanders person and qualities.

Howsoever it were, Alexanders former cruelties cannot be excused, no more than his vanity to be esteemed the Sonne of Jupiter, with his excessive delight in drinke and drunkennesse, which others make the cause of his fever and death. In that he lamented his want of enterprising, & grieved to consider what he should doe when he had conquered the World, Augustus Cesar found just cause to deride him, so if the well-governing of so many Nations and Kingdoms, as he had already conquered, could not have offered him matter more than abundant, to busie his braines withall.
That he was both learned and a lover of learning, it cannot be doubted. Sir Francis Bacon, in his first booke of the Advancement of Learning, hath proved it sufficiently.
His liberality I know not how to praise, because it exceeded proportion. It is said, That when he gave a whole Citie to one of his servants, He, to whom it was given, did out of modesty refuse it, as disproportionable to his fortune: to whom Alexander replied, That he did not enquire what became him to accept, but the King to give: of which Seneca
Animosa

Animosa vox videtur & regia, cum sit plurisima. Nihil enim per se quinquam decet. Refers quid, cui, quando, quare, ubi, &c. sine quibus facti ratio non constabit; habeatur personarum & dignitatum proportio, & cum sit ubiq; virtutis modus, aq; peccat quod excedit, quam quod deficit; it seems a brave and royall speech, whereas indeed it is very foolish. For nothing simply considered by it selfe becomes a man. We must regard what, to whom, when, why, where, and the like; without which considerations no act can be approved. Let honours be proportioned unto the persons: for whereas vertue is ever limited by measure, the excess is as faulty as the defect.

L. d. B. M. 1.

For his Person, it is very apparent, That he was as valiant as any man, a disposition taken by it selfe, not much to be admired; For I am resolved that he had ten thousand in his Army as daring as himselfe. Surely, if adventurous natures were to be commended simply, we should confound that vertue with the hardinesse of Theeves, Russians, and mastiffe Dogs. For certainly it is no way praise-worthy but in daring good things, and in the performance of those lawfull enterprizes, in which we are employed for the service of our Kings and Common-weales.

If we compare this great Conquerour with other troublers of the world, who have bought their glory with so great destruction and effusion of blood, I think him far inferi-our to Cesar, and many other that lived after him, seeing he never undertook any warlike Nation, the naked Scythians excepted; nor was ever encountered with any Army of which he had not a most mastering advantage, both of Weapons & Commanders, every one of his Fathers old Captains by far exceeding the best of his Enemies. But it seems Fortune and Destinie (if we may use those termes) had found out and prepared for him, without any care of his owne, both heapes of Men, that willingly offered their necks to the yoke, and Kingdomes that invited and called in their owne Conquerours. For conclusion, we will agree with Seneca, who speaking of Philip the Father, and Alexander the Son, gives this judgement of them: Quod non minores fuerit pestes mortalium, quam innumratae, quae planum omne perfusum est, quam conflagratio, quam magna pars animantium exaruiit; & they were no lesse plagues to mankind, than an overflow of waters, drowning all the level; & or some burning drought, whereby a great part of living creatures are scorched up.

CHAP. III.

The reigne of Aridæus.

§. I.

Of the question about succession to Alexander.

THE death of Alexander left his Army (as Demades the Athenian then compared it) in such case, as was that monstrous Giant Poly-phemus, having lost his only eye. For that which is reported in fables of that great Cyclops, might well be verified of the Macedonians: their force was intolerable, but for want of good guidance ineffectuall, & harmfull chiefly to themselves. The causes whereof (under the divine ordinance) where partly the uncertainty of Title to succession in the Kingdom of Macedon, partly the stub-borne pride of Alexander himselfe, who thinking none worthy to be his heire, did refuse to establish the right in any one, leaving every one to his own fortune: but especially the great ambition of his followers, who all had learned of their Master to suffer no equals; a lesson soon taught unto spirits reflecting upon their own worth, when the reverence of a greater object faileth.

It hath formerly beene shewed, That Philip (the Father of Alexander) governing in Macedon as Protector, assumed unto himselfe the Kingdom, not rendering it unto Amynas, (the Sonne of his elder brother Perdiccas) when he grew to mans estate; but only bestowing upon him in marriage a Daughter of his owne: by which bond, and much more by his owne proper strength, he assured the Crown unto himselfe:
Amynas never attempting ought against Philip; though (with price of his life) he did Cccc against against Alexander in the beginning of his reign. Wherefore Eurydice, the sole issue of this marriage, ought in reason to have been acknowledged Queen after Alexander; as having better Title thereto, than either He or Philip had, when they lived, vnlesse (peradventure) some Law of that Nation forbad the reign of Women. But the excellent vertue of these two Princes had utterly defaced the right of all Pretenders, not claiming from their owne bodies: and so great were their conquests, that Macedon it selfe was (in regard of them) a very small Appendix, and no way deserving to be laid in ballance against the demand of their posterity, had they left any able to make challenge of the Royall seat.

Alexander having taken many wives, had issue by none of the principall of them. Barsine the Daughter of Artabazus a Persian, had borne unto him a young Son: and Roxane the Daughter of Oxyartes (whom he had more solemnly married) was left by him great with childe. But the baseness of the Mothers, and contempt of the conquered Nations, was generally alledged in Barre of Plea made for them, by some that would (perhaps) have wrought out their owne ends, under the name of Alexander's children.

Cleopatra a filier of Alexander, widow to the King of Epirus, & Aridaus his base brother (son to Philip by a Concubine of no account) who had married the Lady Eurydice before mentioned, were next in course. Of Cleopatra there was no speech, which may give suspicion, that either Law or Custome had made that sexe incapable of the Sovereignty: Aridaus (besides his baseness) was neither for person nor quality fit to rule as a King; yet upon him the election fell, but slowly, and (as happeneth often) for lacke of a better: when the Counsellors having over-laboured their disagreeing wits in devising what was best, were content for very wearinesse to take what came next to hand.

Ptolomy (soon after King of Egypt) concurring with them who rejected all mention of the halfe-Persian brood, King Alexander's children, was of opinion, that the rule of all should be given to the Captaines; that going for law which by the greater part of them should be decreed: so farre was he from acknowledging any one as true Heire to the Crowne.

This Ptolomy was called the sonne of Lagus, but reputed of Philip: who having used the company of Arfinoe Ptolomeie's smother, delivered her in marriage to Lagus, being so great with child. Therefore, whether it were so that he hoped well to work his own fortune out of those diffentions, which are incident unto the consultations of many ambitious men, equall in place, forcing them at length to redeeme their quiet with subjection to one, deserving regard by his blood, and trust for his even carriage; or whether he desired only to get a share to himselfe, which could not have come to passe, had all been given to one: plaine enough it is, that he thought not on preferring Aridaus before himselfe; and therefore gave such counsell as fitted his owne and other mens purposes. Yea, this device of his tooke place indeed, though not in forme as he had propounded it; For, it was in effect all one, to have assembled at Alexander's empty chair, as Ptolomy had conceived the forme of their consultations, or to set in the chaire such a King as Aridaus, no wiser than the chaire it selfe. Also the controversies arising were determined by the greater part of the Captaines; by the greater part, if not in number, yet in puissance.

But as these counterfeit shewes of dissembling aspirers doe often take checke by the plain dealing of them who dare to go more directly to work: so was it like to have fared with Ptolomy and the rest, when Arifonius another of the Captains, interpreted the very words of Alexander; saying, That he left his Kingdom to the worthiest, as designing Perdiccas, to whom (lying at the point of death) he delivered his ring. It seemed good in reason, that Alexander should be dispofer of his owne purchases: and those tokens of Alexander's purpose appeared plaine enough, so long as no man would interpose another construction: every one being uncertain how the secret affections of the rest might be inclined. Many therefore, either out of their love, or because they would not be of the latest, urged Perdiccas to take upon him the estate Royall. He was no stranger to the Royall blood; yet his birth gave him not such reputation, as the great favour of his dead King, with whom he had bin very inward, & that especially since the death of Ephesius (a powerful Minion) into whose place he was chosen. For his own worth he might well be commended, as a good man of War, and one that had given much prooffe of his private valour. But very surly he was: which quality (joynd with good fortune) carried a shew of Majesty:

Majesty: being checkt with misadventure, it was called by a true name, Pride; and rewarded with death.

In the present businesse a foolish over-weening did him as great harme, as it had been great happinesse to have succeeded Alexander. For, not content to have the acclamation of the Souldiers, approving the sentence of Arifonius, he would needs counterfeit modesty; thinking that every one of the Princes would have intreated him to take the weighty burden of an Empire, which would be the lesse envious, the more solemnity he used in the acceptance. It is truly said, He that faineth himselfe a Sheep, may chance to be eaten by a Wolfe. Meleager, (a man by nature envious, and bearing a particular hatred to Perdiccas) took advantage of his irresolute behaviour, and very bitterly inveighed against him. In conclusion, he pronounced, That whosoever was Heire to the Crowne, the Souldiers ought to be Heires to the Treasure; and therefore he invited them, who were nothing slow, to share it. This disturbed all the Consultation. The Captaines were left alone, farre enough from agreeing, and not able to have brought any conclusion to good effect without consent of the Souldiers, who greedy of spoyle, thronged about Meleager.

§. II.

The Election of Aridaus, with the troubles there about arising; the first division of the Empire.

During this up-roare, mention was made of Aridaus by some one, and entertained with good liking of many, untill at last it grew to the voyce of the Army. Meleager having with-drawne himselfe tumultuously from the company of the Lords, was glad of so faire an occasion to make himselfe great: therefore he produced Aridaus, commended him to the Souldiers, who called him by his Fathers name Philip, and brought him into the Palace, investing him in Alexander's Robes, and proclaiming him King. Many of the Nobles withstood this election, but in vaine: for they could not resolve what course to follow, rejecting this. Only Pythion, a hot-headed man, took upon him to proclaim the Son of Alexander by Roxane, according to the counsell which Perdiccas at first had given, appointing Perdiccas and Leontius his Protectors. But this childe was not yet borne, which made that attempt of Pythion vaine. Finally, Perdiccas with fixe hundred men, and Ptolomy with the Kings Pages, tooke upon them to defend the place where Alexander's body lay: but the Army conducted by Meleager, who carried the new King about whither he listed, easily brake in upon them, and enforced them to accept Aridaus for their Sovereigne Lord. Then by the intercession of the ancient Captaines, a reconciliation was propounded and admitted, but on neither side faithfully meant.

Leontius, who was of Royall blood, a goodly Gentleman and valiant, issued out of Babylon, being followed by all the horse, which consisted (for the most part) of the Nobility. Perdiccas abode in the City (but standing upon his guard) that he might be ready to take the opportunity of any commotion that should happen among the infantry. The King (who was governed by Meleager) commanded, or gave leave to have Perdiccas made away; which attempt succeeded ill, being neither secretly carried, nor committed to sure executioners. Their coming was not unexpected: and they were by Perdiccas rebuked with such gravity, that they departed honeste than they came; being sorry for their bad enterprife. Upon the newes of this attempt, the Campe was in an up-roare, which the King seeking to pacifie, wanted authority, as having newly got to the Crowne by them, and holding it by their courtesie. The matter it selfe afforded no good excuses, and his indiscretion made them worse. He said that no harme was done, for Perdiccas was alive: but their exclamations were against the tyrannous enterprife, which he imputed to Meleager; abandoning the surest of his friends to the rage of the multitude, who were not appeased, untill the King by offering to resigne his estate unto them, renewed out of their pity that favourable affection, which had moved them to set him up at the first.

Perdiccas having now joynd himselfe with Leontius, kept the fields, intending to cut off all provision of victuals from the Citie. But after sundry Embassies passing betwene the King and the Nobles, (they requiring to have the Authors of sedition given up into their hands; the King, that Meleager might be joynd with Leonatus and Perdiccas, as a Third in government of the Army) things were compounded according to the Kings desire. Meleager should have done well to consider, That such men as had one day demanded his head, were not like the day following to give him a principall place among them without any new occasion offered, had not some purpose of treachery lurked under their great facility. General peace was renewed, and much love protested where little was intended. The face of the Court was the same which it had been in Alexanders time: but no longer now did the same heart give it life; and windy spirits they were which moved in the arteries. False reports were given out by appointment of Perdiccas, to tending to his owne disgrace, but in such termes as might seeme to have proceeded from Meleager: who finding part of the drift, but not all, took it as an injury done to himselfe, and (as desirous of a true friendship) desired of Perdiccas, that such authors of discord might be punished. Perdiccas (as a lover of peace) did well approve the motion; and therefore agreed that a generall Muster should be made, at which time the disturbers of the common quiet should receive their punishment (as was the manner for Souldiers offending) in presence of the Army. The plot was mischievously layd. Had Meleager given way to seditious rumours, he must needs have incurred the general hatred of all, as a fower of dissention, & thereby with a publike approbation might have bin cut off, as having often offended in that kinde: his Prince being too weak a Patron. Now seeking redresse of these disorders, he hastened his owne ruine, by a lesse formall, but more speedy way. This kinde of Muster was very solemne, & practised with many ceremonies, as for cleansing of the Army. The Horse-men, the Elephants, the Macedonian foot, the Mercenaries were each according to their quality set in array, apart from others, as if they had bin of sundry sorts, met at adventure: which done, the manner was to skirmish (as by way of exercise) according to the direction of their severall Capitaines. But at that time the great battell of Macedonian Pikes, which they called the Phalanx, led by Meleager, was of purpose bestowed in a ground of disadvantage; and the countenance of the Horse and Elephants beginning to give charge upon them, was such, as discovered no jesting pastime nor good intent. Kings were allwayes wont to fight among the horse-men: of which custome Perdiccas made great use that day, to the utter confusion of his enemies. For Aridamus was alwaies governed by him, which for the present had him in possession. Two or three dayes before, he sought the death of Perdiccas at the instigation of Meleager: now he rides with Perdiccas up and downe about the foot-men, commanding them to deliver unto the death all such as Perdiccas required. Three hundred they were who were cast unto the Elephants, and by them slaine, in the presence of the King (who should have defended them) and of their affrighted companions. But these three hundred were not the men whose punishment Meleager had expected: they were such as had followed him, when he disturbed the first consultation that was held about the election of a new King, and some of them his especial friends. Having therefore kept himselfe quiet a while, as unwilling to give offence to them which had the advantage; when he saw their proceedings tend very manifestly to his destruction, he fled away into a temple, which he found no Sanctuary: for thither they sent and slew him.

The Army being thus corrected, was led into the City, where a new Councell of the Princes was held, who finding what manner of man their King was, divided all the Provinces of the Empire among themselves; leaving to Aridamus the office of a Visitor, and yet making Perdiccas his Protector, and Commander of the forces remaining with him. Then were the funerals of Alexander thought upon; whose body having bin seven daies neglected, was opened, and embalmed by the Egyptians: no signe of poyson appearing, how great soever the suspicion might be. The charge of his buriall was committed to Aridamus: one of the Captains, who was two years preparing of a great and costly shew, making a stately Chariot in which the corps was laid; many coarces of his friends being layd in the ground before that of Alexander was bestowed in Alexandria, a City of his owne building, in Egypt.

§. III.

§. III.

The beginning of the Lamian Warre.

Whilest these things were in doing, or presently after, Antipater & Craterus, two principall Noble-men, and inferiour to none of Alexanders followers, if not greater than any of the rest, were busied in Greece with a war, which the Athenians more bravely than wisely had begun in Alexanders life, but now did prosecute more boldly than before, upon the courage which they had taken by his death. Alexander not long before he died, had commanded that all the banished Greekes (few excepted) should be restored unto their former places. He knew the factious quality of the Grecian Estates, & therefore thought so to provide, that in every City he would have a sure party. But it fell out otherwise: For he lost the hearts of many more than he wan by this proud injunction. His pleasure indeed was fulfilled; yet not without great murmuring of the whole Nation, as being against all order of Law, and a beginning of open tyranny. The Athenians greatly decayed in estate, but retaining more than was needfull of their ancient spirits, forbade the execution of this decree in their Dominions; so did also the Ætolians, who were valiant men, and inhabited a Region well fortified by nature: yet neither of them tooke Armes, but seemed to beate themselves, as men that had done no more than they might well justifie by reason: nevertheless to prevent the worst, the Athenians gave secret instructions to Leosthenes, a Captaine of theirs, willing him to levie an Army, but in his owne name, and to keepe it in a readinesse for their use. This was no hard thing for Leosthenes to doe: great numbers of Greek Souldiers being lately returned from the Asian War in poor estate, as defrauded of their pay by the Capitaines. Of these he had gathered up eight thousand, when the certaine newes were brought of Alexanders death: at which the City of Athens declared it selfe, and more honourably than wisely, proclaimed open War against the Macedonians for the liberty of Greece. Hereupon Leosthenes drew in the Ætolians and some other Estates, gave battell to the Boeotians, who sided with Antipater, and overthrew them; growing so fast in reputation, and so strong in adherents, that Antipater (arming in all haste, yet suspecting his owne strength) was faine to send into Asia to Craterus for succour.

Nothing is more vaine than the feares and hopes of men, shunning or pursuing their desires a farre off, which deceive all mortall wisdom, even when they seem neare at hand. One moneth was scarcely past, since nothing so heavily burthened the thoughts of Antipater as the returne of Craterus into Macedon; which he then feared as death, but now desired as the most likely assurance of his life. Craterus, whom Alexander held as of all men the most assured unto him, was sent into Macedon to convey home the old Souldiers (that was the pretence) & to succeed Antipater in the government of Macedon and Greece. The suspicions were strong that he had a privie charge to put Antipater to death: neither did that which was commonly published sound much better; which was, That Antipater should be sent unto the King, as Captain of the young Souldiers, newly to be levied in Europe. For Alexander was much incensed against him by his Mother Olympias: and would sometimes give out speeches, testifying his owne jealousie and hatred of him; but yet he strove to smother it, which in a cruell Prince betokeneth little good. Few of Alexanders Lieutenants had escaped with life: most of them indeed were meane persons in regard of those who followed him in his Indian expedition, and were therefore (perhaps) removed to make place for their betters. But if the Kings rigour was such, as could finde rebellious purposes (for so hee interpreted even lewd government) in base persons; little might Antipater hope for, who having sitten Vice-roy ten or eleven years in the strongest part of the Empire, was called away to the presence of so fell a Master, and the envie of a Court, wherein they had been his inferiours, which would now repine to see him their equall. Therefore whether his feare drew him to prevention, working first the Kings death by poyson, given by his sonne Solani, Alexanders Cup-bearer; or whether it brake not forth until opportunity had changed it into the passion of revenge, which was cruelly performed by his sonne Cassander: great cause of much feare he had; which I note in this place, as the ground of effects to be produced in very few yeares.

At the present Craterus was sent for, and all the Capitaines of companies lying neare, solicited.

solicited to make haste. Not without cause: For in Macedon there could not at that time be raised more than thirteene thousand foot, and fixe hundred horse; which Mustar was of raw Souldiers, all the force of the Country being employed into Asia. The Thessalians indeed who had long stood firme for Philip & Alexander, who also were the best horsemen of Greece, furnished him with very brave troupes, that might have done great service, had their faith held out, which they changed for the liberty of Greece. With these forces did Antipater in Thessaly try the fortune of a battell with Leosthenes; rather (as may seem) fearing the increase of his enemies power, and rebellion of the Greeks, (were they not checkt at the first) than presuming on his strength. For Leosthenes had of Athenians, Ætolians; and Mercenaries, two and twenty thousand foot, besides the assistance of many petty Signories, and of some Illyrians and Thracians: of horse he brought into the field about two thousand and five hundred; but over-strong he was that way also, when once the Thessalians had revolted unto him. So Antipater lost the day: and his losse was such, that he neither was able to keepe the field, nor to make a safe retreat into his owne Country: therefore he fled into the Towne of Lamia, which was well fortified, and well provided of all things necessary to beare out a siege. Thither did Leosthenes follow him, present him battell againe, and upon refusal close uppe the Towne with earth-works, and a wall. There will we leave him for a while, travelling in the last honourable enterprize that ever was undertaken by that great City of Athens.

§. IV.

How Perdiccas employed his Army.

King Aridæus living under the rule of Perdiccas, when all the Princes were gone each to his owne Province, kept a naked Court: all his greatnesse consisting in a bare title, supported by the strength of his Protector, who cared not for him otherwise than to make use of him. Perdiccas had no Province of his owne peculiar, neither was he like to be welcome to any whom he should visit in his government. A stronger Army than any of the rest he had, which he might easily hope in that unquiet condition of things to make better worth to him than many Provinces could have bin. The 30 better to accomplish his desires, he closely sought the marriage of Cleopatra, the sister of Alexander; yet about the same time he either married Nicas the daughter of Antipater, or made such love to her as blinded their eyes, who did not somewhat narrowly search into his doings.

Ariarathes the Cappadocian, the second of that name, and tenth king of that Country, had continued faithfull to the Persian Empire as long as it stood: following the example of his forefathers, even from Pharnaces the first that reigned in Cappadocia, who married Asioffa sister to the great Cyrus. Some of his Ancestors had (indeed) been oppressed by the Persians: but what fortune tooke from them at one time, Vertue restored at another, and their faithfull Princes had much increased all. But now in the farall Period of 40 so great an Empire, with much wisdom, and (Darius being slain) with sufficient honour, he might have acknowledged the Macedonian in the Persians roome. This he did not; neither did Alexander call him to account, being occupied with great cares. But Perdiccas, who had no greater business wherein to entertain his Army, found it expedient both for the honour of the Empire, to take that in-land Kingdome, surrounded with Provinces of the Macedonian conquest, and for his own particular, to have one opportune place of sure retreat, under the government of a stedfast friend. Therefore he entered Cappadocia, fought with Ariarathes, who drew into the field thirty thousand foot, and fiftene thousand horse (a strong Army, had it not encountered a stronger, and better trained) won the victory, and thereby the whole Kingdome. But with much cruelty did he use the victory: for having taken Ariarathes prisoner with many others, he crucified him, and as many of his Kindred as he could light upon; and so delivered that Province to Eumenes, whom of all men living he trusted most.

Another part of his forces he committed to Pythion, rather as to the most honourable of such as remained about him, than as to the most assured. Pythion was to subdue the Greeks rebelling in the high Countries of Asia. About twenty thousand foot, and three thousand horse they were, (all old Souldiers) who, planted in Colonies by Alexander, to bridle the barbarous nations, were soon weary of their unpleasant habitations, & the rude people people, among whom they lived: and therefore took advantage of the present troubles to seek unto themselves a better fortune. Against these Pythion went, more desirous to make them his owne, than to destroy them: which intent of his, Perdiccas discovering, did both give him in charge to put all those Rebels to the sword, giving the spoyles of them to his Souldiers, and further enjoyed it unto *Pythion*s Capraines (his owne creatures) that they should see this commandment executed. These directions for use of the victory, might have proved needlesse; so uncertaine was the victory it selfe. A Capraine of the Rebels commanding over three thousand, corrupted by Pythion, did in the heat of the fight (which was very doubtfull) retire without necessity to a hill not farre off. This dismayed the rest, and gave the day to Pythion: who being far enough from Perdiccas, offered composition to the vanquished, granting unto them their lives and liberty, under condition of laying downe their armes; and hereupon he gave them his faith. Being master of these Companies, he might well have a good opinion of his owne power: all power being then valued by strength in followers, when as none could vaunt himselfe as free Lord of any Territory. He had thirteene thousand foot, and eight thousand eight hundred horse, besides these new Companions, whom needlesse feare without great losse had caused to leave the field: but in true estimation all the greatnesse whereof Pythion might thinke himselfe assured, was (and soon appeared to be) inherent in Perdiccas. For by his command were ten thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, of those which followed Pythion, levied; the Rulers of the Provinces carefully obeying the letters of Perdiccas, by which they were enjoined to give assistance to that business: and by vertue of the precept given unto them by Perdiccas, did the Macedonians cut in pieces all those poore men who had yeelded themselves; leaving Pythion as naked as he came forth to returne unto his great Master.

Now was Perdiccas mighty above the mighty, and had fair leisure to pursue his hopes of marriage with Cleopatra, and thereby to make himselfe Lord of all: but this must be secretly carried for feare of opposition. How it succeeded, will appear when the Lami-an War taketh ending.

§. V.

The proceesse of the Lami-an War.

Whe left Antipater hardly besieged, wanting means to free himselfe without succours from his friends in Asia. Those helps not appearing so soon as he expected, he came to parley with Leosthenes, and would have yeelded unto any termes of reason, wherewith men possessed with hope of victory, doe seldom limit their desires. Leosthenes willed him without further circumstance to submit himselfe to discretion. This was too much for him that had once commanded over them, who now required of him such a dishonourable composition. Wherefore knowing that the extreme 40 miles, from which as yet he was farre enough, could bring no worfe with it, Antipater prepared for the defence; and the other for winning the Towne, which felt great want of victuals.

In this lingering War the Ætolians (whether weary of sitting still at a siege, or having business which they pretended at home) took their leave, and returned into their owne Countrey. Their departure left the trenches so thinly manned, that Antipater found means to fall uppon his enemies to their great losse: for many were slain, and Leosthenes himselfe among them, ere he could be repulled into the Towne. Yet hereby the Macedonians were nothing relieved, their victuals wasted, and they were not strong enough to deale with the Greeks in open fight. Craterus was long in coming. Lyfima- 50 chus, who was nearest at hand in Thrace, had worke too much of his owne, leading no more than foure thousand foote, and two thousand horse, against Saulbas the Thracian King, who brought into the field above foure times that number; and though Lyfima- chus, not without losse had gotten one victory, yet the enemy abounding in multitude, felt not the blow so much as might abate his courage. Therefore Leonatus was earnestly solicited by *Antipater*s friends, to make all haste to the rescue. He had the government of Phrygia the lesse, and was able to raise an Army of more than twenty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse, whether levied out of his province, or appointed unto him out of the maine Army, it is uncertaine. Certaine it is, that he was more wil- ling ling to take in hand the journey into Greece, than Antipater was to have him come. For Cleopatra had written unto him, desiring his presence at Pella, the chiefe Citie of Macedonia, and very kindly offering herselfe to be his wife; which letters he kept not so close don, and very kindly offering herselfe to be his wife; which letters he kept not so close as had bin requisite, and therefore brought himselfe into great suspicion, that soon ended with his life. Antiphilus, chosen General by the Athenians in place of Leophanes, hearing of his approach, forsook the siege of Lamia, and tooke the ready way to these great Conquerors of Asia, with purpose to give them an evill welcome home, before Antipater and they should joyne in one. He had (notwithstanding the departure of the Ætolians) the advantage of Leonatus in horse, by the ods of 2000. Theffalians; in other things he was equall with him; in cause he thought himselfe Superiour; in the fortune of that day he proved so: for he was a great victory (chiefly by vertue of the Theffalians) which appeared the greater by the end of Leonatus himselfe; who fighting valiantly, was driven into a marish piece of ground, where he found his death, which he desperately had fought among the Indians, but it waited for him at home, not far from the place of his nativity. He was the first of Alexanders Captaines which dyed in battell, but all, or most of the rest shall follow him the same way. After this day, the Athenians did never any thing futable to their ancient glory.

The vanquished Macedonians were too weak to renew the fight, and too proud to flee. They betooke themselves to high grounds, unfit for service on horse-back, and so abode in the sight of the enemy that day; the day following Antipater with his men came into their Campe, and took the charge of all. The Athenians perceiving their strength to be at the greatest, and fearing lest that of the enemy should increase, did earnestly seek to determine the matter quickly by another battell. But still Antipater kept himselfe on ground of advantage, which gave more than reasonable confidence to the Greeks, many of whom departed to their homes, accounting the enemy to be vanquished. This wretchednesse (incorrigible in an Army of volunteers) was very inexcusable; seeing that the victories by Land were very much defaced by losses at Sea, where the Athenians, labouring to have made themselves once againe Masters, were put to the worst.

But now the fatall captivity of Greece came on, of which she never could be delivered unto this day. Craterus with a strong Army having made great marches from Cilicia, passed over into Europe, and coming into Tessaly, joynd himselfe with Antipater. The forces of Leonatus, Antipater, and Craterus being joynd in one, contained fony thousand weightily armed, three thousand light-armed men, and five thousand horse; of which numbers the Greeks wanted a thousand and five hundred in horse; in foot, eightene thousand. Carefully therefore did Antiphilus labour to avoyd the necessity of a battell, untill such time as the Towns confederate should returne unto the Camp those bands which had straggled from it. But those companies were so slow in coming, and Antipater urgent upon the Greeks, that compelled they were to put the matter in hazard without further attendance. Like enough it is, that with a little more help they had carried away the victory: for the Theffalians had the upper hand, and held it, untill such time as they perceived their battels (over-laid with multitude) retire unto the higher ground, which caused them also to fall back. So the Macedonians became Lords of the field, having little else to boast of, considering that with the losse of an hundred & thirty men, they had only purchased the death of some five hundred enemies. Yet hereof was great use made: For the Greeks, as not subject unto the full command of one General, and being every one desirous to preserve his own estate and City; concluded to make a treaty of peace with Antipater; who being a subtle Artificer, and well understanding their aptnesse to division, refused to hearken to any generall composition, but willed every City to deale apart for it selfe. The intent of his device was so apparent, that it was rejected; the Greeks choosing rather to abide the coming of their assistants, whose unreasonable carelesnesse betrayed the cause. Antipater and Craterus besieging and winning some Towns in Tessaly, which the Army of the Confederates wanted means and courage to relieve, wearied that Nation from attending any longer upon other mens unlikely hopes, with their owne assured and present calamity.

§. VI. of

of the peace granted to Athens by Antipater. of Demosthenes his death.

THE Theffalians falling off, all the rest soon followed severely, & sued for peace; the gentle conditions given to the most forward, inviting such as were slack. Only the Athenians and Ætolians held out. Little favour could they hope for, having been Authors of this tumult: and their feare was not great; the feat of the war being far from them. But the celerity of Antipater confounded all their imaginations; who late still at Athens, devising upon courses of prosecuting the War to come, which came to their dores before their consultation could finde issue. He was ready to enter upon their Frontiers; they had no ability to resist, and were as heartlesse as friendlesse. All that remained was to send Embassadors, desiring peace upon some good termes: necessity enforcing them to have accepted even the very worst. Phocion, with Demades the Orator, & Xenocrates the Philosopher, were chiefe of this Embassage; Phocion, as the most honourable; Demades, a strong perswader (both of them well respected by Antipater); and Xenocrates, as one admired for wisdom, gravity of manners, and vertue; but all these ornaments consisting in speculation, and therefore of lesse regard, when their admiration was to cost them much in real effects.

Antipater calling to mind the pride of Leophanes, required of the Athenians, that they should wholly submit themselves to his pleasure; which being (perforce) granted, he commanded them to defray the charges of the War past, to pay a fine, and entertaine a Garrison. Further, he abrogated the popular estate, committing the government of the City to those of most wealth, depriving of the right of suffrage all such as wanted a convenient proportion of riches.

About nine thousand they were, all men of good substance, to whom the administration of the Common-wealth was given; a number great enough to retaine the name and forme of a Democraticie. But the rascall multitude of beggarly persons, accustomed to get their livings out of the common troubles, being now debarred from bearing offices and giving their voices, cried out, that this was a meere Oligarchie, the violent usurpation of a few inchoaching upon the publike right. These turbulent fellows (of whom King Philip had bene wont to say, That war to them was peace, and peace war) Antipater planted in Thrace, & gave them lands to manure; leaving as few of them as he could to molest the quiet of Athens.

To the same end (yet withall for satisfying his owne suspitions and hatred) he caused Demosthenes and Hyperides, famous Orators, with some others, to be slaine. Had the death of these two, especially of Demosthenes, bene forborne, the rest of his proceedings in this action might well have passed for very milde: whereas now all such, as either are delighted with the Orations of Demosthenes, or have surrendered their judgements to Authors justly admiring him, as the most eloquent of all that ever did speake and write, condemne him utterly, calling him a bloudie tyrant. Such grace and reputation doe the learned arts finde in all civill Nations, that the evill done to a man, famous in one of them, is able to blemish any action, how good soever otherwise it be, or honourably carried.

Demosthenes had taken Sanctuarie in the Temple of Neptune, in the Isle of Calauria; there did Archias (sent with Souldiers by Antipater for the purpose) find him, and gently perswaded him to leave the place; but not to prevailing, he threatened violence. Then Demosthenes entreating a little respite as it had bene to write somewhat, secretly tooke poison, which he had kept for such a necessity, and so died; rather choosing to doe the last execution upon himselfe, than to fall into the hands of such as hated him. Only this act of his (commendable perhaps in a Heathen man) argued some valour in him; who was otherwise too much a coward in battell, howsoever valiant in perswading to enterprises, wherein the way to very honourable ends was to be made through passages exceeding dangerous. He loved money well, and had great summes given him by the Persians, to encourage him, in finding work for the Macedonians at home. Neither did he ill (me thinks) in taking from the Persians which loved not his Country, great reward, for speaking such things as tended to his Countreyes good; which he did not cease ling to take in hand the journey into Greece, than Antipater was to have him come. For Cleopatra had written unto him, desiring his presence at Pella, the chiefe Citie of Macedonia, and very kindly offering herselfe to be his wife; which Letters he kept not so close as had bin requisite, and therefore brought himselfe into great suspicion, that soon ended with his life. Antipater, chosen Generall by the Athenians in place of Leosthenes, hearing of this approach, forsook the siege of Lamia, and tooke the ready way to these great Conquerors of Asia, with purpose to give them an evil welcome home, before Antipater and they should joyne in one. He had (notwithstanding the departure of the Ætolians) the advantage of Leonatus in horse, by the odds of 2000. Theffalians; in other things he was equall with him; in cause he thought himselfe Superiour; in the fortune of that day he proved so: for he won a great victory (chiefly by vertue of the Theffalians) which appeared the greater by the end of Leonatus himselfe, who fighting valiantly, was driven into a marshy piece of ground, where he found his death, which he desperately had sought among the Indians, but it waited for him at home, not far from the place of his nativity. The Athenians perceiving their strength to be at the greatest, and fearing lest that of the enemy should increase, did earnestly seek to determine the matter quickly by another battell. But still Antipater kept himselfe on ground of advantage, which gave more than reasonable confidence to the Greeks, many of whom departed to their homes, accounting the enemy to be vanquished. But now the fatal captivty of Greece came on, of which the never could be delivered unto this day. Craterus with a strong Army having made great marches from Cilicia, passed over into Europe, and coming into Tessaly, joynd himselfe with Antipater. The forces of Leonatus, Antipater, and Craterus being joynd in one, contained forty thousand weightily armed, three thousand light-armed men, and five thousand horse; of which numbers the Greeks wanted a thousand and five hundred in horse; in foot, eightene thousand. Like enough it is, that with a little more help they had carried away the victory: for the Theffalians had the upper hand, and held it, untill such time as they perceived their battels (over-laid with multitude) retire unto the higher ground, which caused them also to fall back. So the Macedonians became Lords of the field, having little else to boast of, considering that with the losse of an hundred & thirty men, they had only purchased the death of some five hundred enemies. Yet hereof was great use made: For the Greeks, as not subject unto the full command of one General; and being every one desirous to preserve his own estate and City; concluded to make a treaty of peace with Antipater; who being a subtle Artificer, and well understanding their aptnesse to division, refused to hearken to any generall composition, but willed every city to deale apart for it selfe. The intent of his device was so apparent, that it was rejected; the Greeks choosing rather to abide the coming of their assistants, whose unreasonable carelesnesse betrayed the cause. Antipater and Craterus besieging and winning some Towns in Tessaly, which the Army of the Confederates wanted means and courage to relieve, wearied that Nation from attending any longer upon other mens unlikely hopes, with their owne assured and present calamity.

§. VI.

Of the peace granted to Athens by Antipater. of Demosthenes his death.

THE Theffalians falling off, all the rest soon followed severely, & sued for peace; the gentle conditions given to the most forward, inviting such as were slack. Only the Athenians and Ætolians held out. Little favour could they hope for, having bin from them. But the celerity of Antipater confounded all their imaginations; who late still at Athens, devising upon courses of prosecuting the War to come, which came to their dores before their consultation could finde issue. He was ready to enter upon their Frontiers; they had no ability to resist, and were as heartlesse as friendlesse. All that remained was to send Embassadors, desiring peace upon some good termes: necessity enforcing them to have accepted even the very worst. Phocion, with Demades the Orator, & Xenocrates the Philosopher, were chiefe of this Embassage; Phocion, as the most honourable; Demades, a strong perswader (both of them well respected by Antipater); and Xenocrates, as one admired for wisdom, gravity of manners, and vertue; but all these ornaments consisting in speculation, and therefore of lesse regard, when their admiration was to cost them much in reall effects.

Antipater calling to mind the pride of Leosthenes, required of the Athenians, that they should wholly submit themselves to his pleasure; which being (perforce) granted, he commanded them to defray the charges of the War past, to pay a fine, and entertaine a Garrison. Further, he abrogated the popular estate, committing the government of the City to those of most wealth, depriving of the right of suffrage all such as wanted a convenient proportion of riches.

About nine thousand they were, all men of good substance, to whom the administration of the Common-wealth was given; a number great enough to retain the name and forme of a Democratic. But the rascall multitude of beggarly persons, accustomed to get their livings out of the common troubles, being now debarred from bearing offices and giving their voices, cried out, that this was a meere Oligarchie, the violent usurpation of a few inroaching upon the publike right. These turbulent fellows (of whom King Philip had beene wont to say, That war to them was peace, and peace war) Antipater planted in Thrace, & gave them lands to manure; leaving as few of them as he could to molest the quiet of Athens.

To the same end (yet withall for satisfying his owne suspicions and hatred) he caused Demosthenes and Hyperides, famous Orators, with some others, to be slaine. Had the death of these two, especially of Demosthenes, beene forborne, the rest of his proceedings in this action might well have passed for very milde: whereas now all such, as either are delighted with the Orations of Demosthenes, or have surrendered their judgements to Authors justly admiring him, as the most eloquent of all that ever did speake and write, condemne him utterly, calling him a bloudie tyrant. Such grace and reputation doe the learned arts finde in all civill Nations, that the evill done to a man, famous in one of them, is able to blemish any action, how good soever otherwise it be, or honourably carried.

Demosthenes had taken Sanctuary in the Temple of Neptune, in the Isle of Calauria; there did Archias (sent with Souldiers by Antipater for the purpose) find him, and gently perswaded him to leave the place; but not so prevailing, he threatened violence. Then Demosthenes entreating a little respite as it had beene to write somewhat, secretly tooke poison, which he had kept for such a necessity, and so died; rather choosing to doe the last execution upon himselfe, than to fall into the hands of such as hated him. Only this act of his (commendable perhaps in a Heathen man) argued some valour in him; who was otherwise too much a coward in battell, howsoever valiant in perswading to enterprises, wherein the way to very honourable ends was to be made through passages exceeding dangerous. He loved money well, and had great summes given him by the Persians, to encourage him, in finding work for the Macedonians at home. Neither did he ill (me thinks) in taking from the Persians which loved not his Countrey, great reward, for speaking such things as tended to his Countreys good; which he did not cease cease to procure, when the Perfians were no longer able to give him recompence. Such as in tender contemplation of his death can endure no honourable, though true, mention of Antipater, may (if they can) beleeve Lucian, who tels us, That it was Antipaters purpose to have done him great honour. Sure it is, that he was a stedfast enimie to the Macedonians; therefore discretion required that he should be cut off.

The matters of Athens being thus ordered, the chiefe command was left in the hands of Phocion, a virtuous man, and lover of his Countrey, yet applying himselfe to the necessity of the times; by which commendations he had both at other times done the Citie much good, and now procured this peace, which (though grievous to free-men, yet favourable to the vanquished) he endeavoured carefully to preserve.

§. VII.

How Craterus and Antipater were drawn from their Etolian wars into Asia. The grounds of the first civill war between the Macedonian Lords.

SO Antipater with Craterus returned into Macedonia, where they strengthened their friendship with a new alliance; Craterus taking Phila, the Daughter of Antipater, to Wife.

Shortly after they went against the Etolians, whose povertie was not so easily daunted, as the luxurious wealth of the more powerfull State of Athens had bin. Their Countrey was rough and mountainous, having many places of great fastnesse, into which they conveyed such of their goods as they most esteemed, and of their people, as were least fit for war: with the rest they fortified the strongest of their Cities, and so abode the coming of the Macedonians, whom they manfully resisted. With great obstinacie did the Macedonians contend against the difficulties of the places, which the Etolians made good as long as their victuals held out. But when Craterus had shut up all passages, & utterly debarred them of reliefe, then were they put to a miserable choice; either to descend from their strong holds, and fight upon equal ground, with unequal numbers, or to endure the miseries of hunger & cold, against which they could make no long resistance, or to yield themselves to the Macedonians, who, incensed by the losse of many good Souldiers, were not like to leave so stubborn enemies in places, which might give confidence to rebellion. In cases of extremity, much finess of wit apprehending all circumstances of danger, commonly doth more hurt than a blunt consideration of that only, which at the present is in hand. These Etolians did not as yet want meat: but their enemies daily molested them: wherefore as yet they thought upon nothing but fighting. Fortune was gracious to their courage. For such newes came out of Asia into the Macedonian Camp, as made Antipater and Craterus think every houre a moneth, till they had rid their hands of these Etolians, giving them whatsoever conditions they would aske: yet with purpose to call them to severe account; yea, to root them out of Greece by death, or by captivitie, when once they should have settled the affairs of Asia; as they hoped and desired. But of mens purposes God is disposer: in whose high counsell it was ordained, that this poore Nation should continue a troublesome bar to the proceedings of Macedon and Greece, and (when time had ripened the next Monarchie) an open gate to let the Roman Conquerors into those and other Provinces. Likewise concerning the matters of Asia, the reformation intended by Antipater and Craterus, was so far from taking effect, that it served merely as an introduction to all the civill wars ensuing.

The grounds of the Asiaticque expedition, which did set the world in an uproare, were these. Antipater and Craterus were of Alexanders Capitaines the mightiest in reputation: The one, in regard of his ancient precedencie, and the present rule which he bare in the parts of Europe. The other, as of all men the best beloved, and most respected, both of Alexander & of the whole Armie. Next unto these had Perdiccas been; whom the advantage of his presence at the Kings death did make equal, or superiour, to either of these, if not to both together. The first intents of Perdiccas were, to have consorted with these two, and to have beene with them a third partner in the government of all; to which purpose hee entertained the discourse of marriage with one of Antipaters Daughters. But feeling in short space the strength of that gale of winde which boie him up, he began to take wing and soare quite another way. Aridius was a very simple man, yet yet served well enough to weare the title of that Majesty, whereof Perdiccas being Administrator, and hoping to become proprietary, the practice was more severe than had been in the dayes of Alexander: the desire to seeme terrible, being very familiar with weak Princes, and their ambitious officers, who know no other means of preserving themselves from contempt, and of giving such a fiery lustre to their actions, as may dazzle the eyes of the beholders. How cruelly the poor Greeks in the higher Asia were all put to the sword; and how tyrannously the King and Princes of Cappadocia were crucified, hath already been shewed. The Phidians were the next who felt the wrath of these counterfeit Alexanders. One City of theirs was utterly razed; the children sold for slaves, and all the rest massacred. The Isaurians by this example growne desperate, when after two or three dayes triall they found themselves unable to continue the defence, lockt themselves into their houses, and set the Town on fire, into the flame whereof the young men did throw themselves, after that they had a while repelled the Macedonians from the walls.

These exploits being performed, the Army had no other work than to sift the ashes of the burnt City for gold and silver; but Perdiccas had businesse of greater importance troubling his braines. Nothing was more contrary to his ends, than to sit still without employment: letting his Souldiers grow idle about him, whilst others grew great, and took deep root in their severall Provinces. He purposed therefore to transport his forces into Europe, under pretence of bringing the King into Macedonia, the fear of his Ancestors, and head of the Empire. The Kings presence would make the Offices of his Vice-Royes (during the time) actually voyd; Antipater with Craterus being once in case of private men, and only Perdiccas holding authority, the match with Cleopatra might easily be made. So should greatness meet with a good title; and what more could be wished? Some impediment the power of Ptolomy might give, who held Egypt well fortified with men, but much better with love of the people; yet if the businesse prospered in Macedonia, like enough it was that either Ptolomy would follow of himselfe, or be driven to come to reason. Antigonus likewise then governing in Phrygia, a busie headed man, and all affected to the side, was to be looked into and made away, for feare of further trouble. So thought Perdiccas, and was deceived in so thinking. Antigonus was as good a man of War, as deep a judgement, as high a spirit, and as great undertaking, as any of Alexanders Capitaines. His employments had been lesse than some of theirs, which made him all the lesse respected. But his thoughts were as proud as theirs: for he valued himselfe by his owne worth, not by the opinions of other men; with carefull attention had he watched Perdiccas, and founded the depth of his purposes, which it was now high time to discover. For Perdiccas having with a jealous eye pryed into the demeanour of Antigonus, and finding him no way fit for his turne, caused him to be charged with such accusations, as might suffice to take away his life, especially by a Judge that sought his death. This device Antigonus would not seeme to perceive, but prepared himselfe in shew to make answer, indeed, to make escape; which easily he did, putting himselfe and his Sonne Demetrius aboard of some Athenian Gallies, that carried him to Antipater, laden with such tidings as finished the Etolian War before mentioned.

As the coming of Antigonus made Craterus and Antipater manifestly perceive their owne danger: so his sight gave Perdiccas to understand that his intentions were layd open, and must now be justified by the sword. Therefore he prepared as fast as he could, not only for defence, but (as having on his side the Kings name) to meet with them at home, who were nothing slacke in providing to encounter him. Ptolomy being advertised of these proceedings, and considering how nearely they concerned him, sided with Antipater. To his government of Egypt he had annexed the Dominion of Cyrene, not without consent of the chiefe Citizens; and now in the midst of these garboyles he celebrated the funeral of Alexander with great solemnity, purchasing thereby to himselfe much good will and many partakers, notwithstanding the terrible report of the Kings Army coming against him.

§. VIII.

Perdiccas his voyage into Egypt, and his death.

Perdiccas, uncertaine which way to bend his maine power, at length resolved to set upon Ptolomy; leaving Eumenes to keepe to his use, against Craterus and Antipater, the parts of Asia bordering upon Europe.

It may seem strange, that he did not rather make head against those who were to come out of Greece with a great number, and of more able men than Ptolomy could bring. Perhaps he thought to make a quick end with Ptolomy; or beleeveth that Craterus would not be ready for him soone enough. Sure it is that he tooke a bad course, and made it worse with ill handling.

Ptolomy by his sweet behaviour allured many to his partie, without helpe of any bad arts. Perdiccas contrariwise was full of insolencie, which never failed to be rewarded with hatred; that is truly defined, An affection founded upon opinion of an unjust contempt. The whole storie of his proceedings in Egypt is not worth relation: for he did nothing of importance; but (as a wilfull man) tired his followers, and wasted them in hard enterprises without successe. His most forceable attempt was upon a little Town, called the Camels wall: thither he marched by night, with more hate than good speed; for Ptolomy preventing him, did put himselfe into the place, where behaving himselfe not only as a good Commander, but as a stout Souldier, he gave the foile to Perdiccas, causing him to retire with losse, after a vehement, but vaine, assault continued one whole day. The night following, Perdiccas made another journey (which was his last) and came to the divisions of Nile, over against Memphis. There with much difficultie he began to passe over his Armie into an Island, where he meant to incampe. The current was strong, the water deepe, and hardly foordable. Wherefore he placed his Elephants above the passage, to breake the violence of the streame, and his horse-men beneath it, to take up such as were carried away by swiftnesse of water. A great part of his Armie being arrived on the further banke, the channell began to waxe deep; so that whereas the former companies had waded up to the chin, they who should have followed could find no footing. Whether this came by the rising of the water, or sitting away of the ground; (the earth being broken with the feet of so many Men, Horse, & Elephants) no remedy there was, but such as had passed must repasse again, as well as they might: for they were too weak for the enemie, and could not be relieved by their fellowes. With great confusion therefore they committed themselves to the river, wherein above two thousand of them perished, a thousand were devoured by Crocodiles, a miserable spectacle even to such as were out of danger; such as were strong and could swim, recovered the Campe, many were carried down the stream, and driven to the contrary banke, whereby they fell into the hands of their enemies.

This misfortune exasperated the Souldiers against their Generall, giving libertie to their tongues, which long time had concealed the evill thoughts of their hearts. While they were thus murmuring, newes came from Ptolomy, which did set them in an uproar. Ptolomy had not only shewed much compassion on those who fell into his hands alive, but performed all rights of funerall to the dead carcases, which the river had cast upon his side: and finally, sent their bones and ashes to be interred by their Kindred or Friends. This did not only move the common Souldiers, but made the Captaines fall to mutinie, thinking it unreasonable to make warre upon so vertuous and honourable a person, to fulfill the pleasure of a Lordly ambitious man, using them like slaves. The sedition growing strong, wanted only a head, which it quickly found. Pythion was there, who inwardly hated Perdiccas, for the disgrace which he had suffered by his procurement, after the victorie upon the rebellious Greeks. Pythion had lived in honourable place about Alexander; he was in the division of the Provinces made Governour of Media, he had followed Perdiccas, and being in all things (the Protectorship excepted) equal to him, had neverthelesse been scornfully used by him, which now he requited. Drawing together a hundred of the Captaines, and a good part of the Horse, which consisted of the Gentrie, (the footmen having declared themselves before) he entred the Tent of Perdiccas, where without further circumstance they all ranne upon him, and slew him. Such end had the proud misgoverning authoritie of Perdiccas. He might have lived as great as any, could he have suffered any as great as himselfe; yea, peradventure master of all, had he not been too masterly over those which were already his.

The next day Ptolomy came into the Campe, where he was joyfully received; he excused himselfe of things past, as not having beene Author, or given cause of the warre, and was easily beleevd: the favour of the Army being such toward him, that needs they would have made him Protector in the roome of Perdiccas. But this he refused. It was an Office fit for one that would seeke to increase his greivance with his trouble. Ptolomy was well enough already; wherefore, for his own quiet he forbore to accept it, and for their well-deserving of him, he procured that honourable charge to Pythion, & to Arideus the Captain, who having had some companies of Souldiers, to furnish with their attendance the solemnities of Alexanders Funerals, did with them adhere to him against Perdiccas.

In the midst of these busineses came newes of two great victories obtained by Eumenes; which newes, had they arrived two or three dayes sooner, had been entertained with joyfull acclamations; and would have given such reputation to Perdiccas, as had caused both his private maligners to continue his open flatterers, and his open enemies to have accepted any tolerable composition. But these good tidings coming in ill time, when death had stopped the eares which would have given them welcome, found bad acceptance, as shall be shewed hereafter.

Victories of Eumenes in the lower Asia.

Before wee proceede in the relation of things happening about the person of the King, it is meet that we speake of those busineses in the lower Asia, which were handled by Eumenes with notable dexterity, whilst Perdiccas was occupied in the Egyptian Wars. Alcetas the brother of Perdiccas, and Neoptolemus, had received command from Perdiccas to be assistant to Eumenes, and to follow his directions. But Alcetas made flat answer that he would not; alledging the backwardnesse of his men to beare Armes against so great a person as Antipater, and a man so much honoured as Craterus. Neoptolemus was content to make faire shew, but inwardly he repined at the precedence given to Eumenes, as thinking himselfe the better man. Eumenes discovering, through the counterfeited looks of Neoptolemus, the mischief lurking in his heart, wisely dissembled with him, in hope to win him by gentle behaviour, and sweet language, that commonly are lost, when bestowed upon arrogant creatures. Yet the better to fortifie himselfe, that he might stand upon his own strength, he raised out of the Countries under his jurisdiction, about sixe thousand horse, giving many priviledges to such as were serviceable, and training them well up. Not without great need. For when upon advertisement of the great preparations made by Craterus and Antipater (who had newly passed the Hellespont) for the invasion of his Provinces, he willed Neoptolemus to come to him with all his power; Neoptolemus did (indeed) advance, but in hostile manner, though unprovoked, presented him battell. Neoptolemus had secretly covenanted with Antipater to lay open the way for him to the conquest of Asia, which now intending to performe, hee was shamefully disappointed. For though his footmen, being all Macedonians, had much the better, and prevailed far upon Eumenes his battels; yet were his horse driven out of the field, and himselfe compelled, with a few of them, to run away, leaving naked the backs of his Macedonian foot-men to be charged by Eumenes, who forced them in such wise, that casting down their Pikes, they cryed for mercy, and gladly took their oath to doe him faithfull service. Antipater and Craterus endeavoured with many goodly promises to draw Eumenes into their society, who contrariwise offered himselfe as a meane of reconciliation, betwene Perdiccas and Craterus, whom he dearly loved; professing withall his hatred to Antipater, and constant faith to the cause which he had undertaken to maintain.

Whilst these negotiations were on foot, Neoptolemus came with his broken crue to Antipater, and his Associates, vilifying Eumenes, & calling him a Scribe (at which foolish railing they laught) but extolling the vertue of Craterus (as well he might) with high commendations; assuring them, that if Craterus did but once appeare, or that his voyce were but heard by any Macedonian in Eumenes his Campe, the victory was wonne; for they would all forth-with revolt unto him. Earnestly therefore he desired them to give him ayd against Eumenes, and especially requested that Craterus might have the leading of the Army to be sent. Their owne affections did easily lead them to condescend to his motion; and good hope there was, that the reputation of Craterus might prevaile as much as the force which he drew along. For he had in the midst of Alexanders vanities, when others (imitating their King) betooke themselves to the Persian fashions of garments and customes, retained the ancient Macedonian form of behaviour, and apparel; whereby he became very gracious with the common Souldiers, who beheld these new tricks of Asia with discontented eyes, as reproachfull and derogatory to the manners of their native Countrey. So Antipater took the way toward Cilicia, to hold Perdiccas at bay, and to joyne with Prology. Craterus used great celerity, to have taken Eumenes revelling (as hee hoped) according to the common fashion of Captaines, after a great victory. But he had a wary and well advised enemy to encounter, who kept good espiall upon him, and with much wisdom fore-saw all that was to be feared, and the meanes of prevention, which his courage did not faile to execute. Eumenes was not ignorant that Craterus was able to defeat him without battell, yea without stroke; him therefore he feared more than the Army following him: (yet the Army following him was such, as much exceeded his own in foot-men, but was inferior in horse-men) & thought it more uneasy to keep the Macedonians from revolting to him, than from knowing him. Hereupon he took in hand a strange piece of work, which desperation of all courses else taught him, & wife managing prosperously accomplished. He gave out reports, that Neoptolemus was returned with such company as he could gather together, & had gotten Pigres (a Captain of no great estimation, who lay not far off) to joyn with him. Having animated his men against Neoptolemus, whom he knew to be despised & hated among them, (as having bin vanquished by some of them, & forsaken others in plain field, whilst they valiantly fought in his quarrel) he took great care to keep them from receiving any intelligence of the enemies matters. Peremptorily he commanded that no messenger nor trumpeter should be admitted; & not herewith satisfied, he placed against Craterus no one Macedonian, nor any other that much would have regarded him had he bin known: but Thracians, Cappadocians & Persians, under the leading of such, as thought more highly of none, than of Perdiccas & himselfe. To these also he gave in charge, that without speaking or hearkning to any word, they should run upon the enemy, and give him no leisure to say, or do any thing but fight. The directions which he gave to others, he did not faile to execute in his own person: but placing himselfe in the right wing of his battell, opposite to Neoptolemus, who (as he understood) conducted the left wing on the contrary side, he held the Macedonians arranged in good order, and ready to charge the enemy as soon as the distance would give leave. A rising piece of ground lay between them, which having ascended, the Armies discovered each other: but that of Eumenes every way prepared for the fight, the other wearied with long journies, which over-hastily they had made, seeking the deceitfull issue of frivolous hopes. Then was it high time for Craterus (having failed in surprizing them as enemies) to discover himselfe to his old friends, and fellow souldiers, of whom he could see none. Phenix a Tenidian, & Artaabazus a Persian, had the leading of that side, who mindfull of their instructions, began to give upon him, with such countenance as told him his error; which to redeem, he bad his men fight, and redeem the day, and take the spoyle to themselves, but the Bear whose skin he felt is not yet caught. The ground whereon the battell was fought gave most advantage to the horse, who encountered very roughly on all parts: especially about Eumenes and Neoptolemus; who as soon as they had discovered one another, could not containe themselves, but with great rage met body to body, & letting loose their bridles, grappled so violently together, that their horses ran from under them, leaving both of them tumbling on the ground. Neoptolemus rose first up, but Eumenes had his sword first drawn, wherewith he houghed the other, causing him to fall down & fight upon one knee. In this conflict they received many wounds, but Neoptolemus giving slight ones, took such as were deadly, by which he dyed in the place, and was there being halfe-dead, halfe-alive) stripped by his mortall enemy, whose revilings he requited, lying even at the last gaspe, with one wound in the groine, dangerous had it not wanted force. The death of Neoptolemus caused his followers to run away upon the spur, and seek shelter behinde the battels of their force. They were nothing hotly pursued. For Eumenes pained himselfe to carry succour succour to his left wing, which he suspected much to be distressed; but found accompanied with the same fortune, that had assisted him when he fought in person. Craterus had gallantly borne himselfe a while, and sustained the impression of Artaabazus and Phenix with more courage than force; holding it nothing agreeable with his honour to retire and protract the fight, when he was charged by men of little estimation or note. Otherwise it is not unlikely, that he might have either carried the day, or preserved himselfe to a better adventure by giving ground, as the rest (when he and Neoptolemus were slain) did. But whilst he fought to preserve his reputation, he lost his life by the fall of his horse, or his falling from his horse, through force of a wound received; upon which accident he was trampled under foot by many that knew him not, and so perished unknown, till it was too late to know it. Eumenes coming to the place where he lay, made great lamentation, as having alwayes loved and honoured Craterus, of whose death he was now become the instrument. The vanquished Army entertained a treaty of peace with Eumenes, making shew of willingness to become his followers; but their intent was only to refresh themselves, which (by his permission) having done, they stole away by night, and fled toward Antipater.

This battell fought within ten dayes of the former, wanne to Eumenes more reputation than good will: for his owne Souldiers took the death of Craterus heavily; and the Armies lying further off were enraged with the newes. But other matters there were which incensed men against him, besides the death of Craterus, whereof it manifestly appeared, that he was as sorry as any that pretended greater heavinesse. His Army wanted pay. This was a great fault; which he wisely amended by giving to them the spoyle of such Towns as were ill-affected to him. So he redeemed the love of his own men, who of their meere motion appointed unto him a Guard for defence of his person. Others were not so easie to be reconciled. They who had been Traytors to Perdiccas, hated him for his faithfulness, as greatly, as they thought he would hate them for their faithhood; neither found they any fairer way of excusing their late revolt, than by accusing and condemning the side which they had forsaken. Wherefore they proclaimed Eumenes a Traitor, and condemned him to die: but it was an easier matter to give that sentence, than to put it in execution.

Quarrell between Eurydice the Queene, and Python the Protector. Python resigns his office, into which Antipater is chosen.

Tibon and Aridaus being chosen Protectors of King Aridaus, and the children of Alexander, took the way to Asia the lesse, conducting the Armie through Syria. Of these two, Python was the greater in reputation, yet far too weak to sustaine so important a charge. For Eurydice wife to King Aridaus, was come to her husband, a Lady of a masculine spirit, well understanding what she was or should be, and thinking herselfe able to support the weight which fortune layd upon her foolish husband, being due to her owne title. Her Mother Cyna, sister to Alexander, by her Father King Philip, was married (as hath been shewed) to Amintas, who was the right Heire to the Kingdome of Macedon, being the only son of King Perdiccas, Philip selders brother. This Cyna was a warlike woman; she had led Armies, and (as a true sister of Alexander) fighting hand to hand with Carya Queene of the Phrygians, a Virago like unto her selfe, had slain her. Shee brought up this Eurydice in the same unwomanly Art of Warre, who now among the Souldiers beganne to put in practice the rudiments of her education, to the small contentment of Python, that could not brooke her too curious intermeddling in his charge. Whether it were so, that Python had some purpose to advance the sonne of Alexander by Roxane, to the Kingdome; (as once he had fought to doe) or whether the Queene did suspect him of some such intent; or whether only desire of rule caused her to quarrell with him; quarrell shee did, which disturbed the proceeding against Eumenes. The Army having shaken off such a raskle-rider as Perdiccas, would not afterward be reined with a twined thread. Python bearing himselfe upon his office, took upon him to give directions in the Kings name, which the Queene did oftentimes controul, using the same name, with more authority, and better liking of the Souldiers.

Python seeing this, would needs resigne his office, whether upon wearinesse of the contentions daily growing, or on purpose to bring the Queene into envie, it is uncertaine. Perhaps he thought, that now being the far worthiest man in the Campe, he should be intreated to retain the place, and have his authority confirmed, or (as might be) increased, were it but for want of a fit Successor. Eurydice was nothing sorry at this course; for now she thought to managge the affaires of the Empire at her own will, being freed from the troublesome assistance of a Protector. But the souldiers disappointed both her & Python of their contrary expectations; choosing Antipater, the only powerful man of Alexanders Captains, then living, into the room of Python. Hereat the Queen fretted exceedingly, & began to deale earnestly with the Macedonians, that they should acknowledge no Lord save only the King their Sovereigne. Yet she failed of her purpose, being hindered (as may seeme) by three things: the apparent weaknesse of her husband: the growth of Alexanders children, who (though born of out-landish women) were bred in the Macedonian Camp; and the mightinesse of Antipater, who commanding a great Army neare at hand, arrived in few daies at the Camp, and enforced Eurydice to hold her self content. Antipater was of such power, that he needed not to work by any close devices, as Perdiccas had done: he had no concurrents, all the Governors of Provinces that remained alive, acknowledged him their better: yea many of them he displaced out of hand, putting others in their rooms. This done, he took the King, Queene, and Princes along with him into Macedonia, leaving Antigonus General of the Royall Army: to whom for his good services done, and to be done against Eumenes, he gave the rule of Susiana, besides his former Provinces, and committed into his hands the government of Asia during that War.

§. XI.

Antigonus Lieutenant of Asia, wins a battell of Eumenes, and besiegeth him in Nora: He vanquishes both the followers of Perdiccas.

Here begins the greatnesse of Antigonus, whose power in few yeares overgrowing the rest, wanted little of spreading it selfe over the whole Monarchie. He was to make War upon Eumenes, Alceus the brother, and Attalus the brother-in-law to Perdiccas: work enough to keep his Army employed in the publicke service, till such time as he might finde occasion to make use of it in his owne businesse. The first of these which he undertooke was Eumenes, with whom Alceus and Attalus refused to joine, having unseasonably contended with him in time of common danger about the chiefe place. Eumenes had an Army strong in number, courage, and all needfull provisions; but obedient only at discretion. Therefore Antigonus tryed all wayes of corrupting his Souldiers; tempting first the whole Army with letters: which practice failing by the cunning of Eumenes (who made shew as if hee himselfe had scattered abroad those letters to try the faith of his men) he dealt apart with such Captains as he thought most easie to be wonne. Of these Captains one rebelled, breaking out too hastily before any helpe was neare him, yet looking so carelesly to himselfe, that he and his were surprised, when he thought his enemies far off. Another follower of Eumenes (or rather of good fortune, which he thought now to be in company with Antigonus) kept his treachery secret, reserving it for the time of execution. Upon confidence of the treason which this false man Apollonides had undertaken, Antigonus presented battell to Eumenes; in the heat wherof Apollonides, General of the horse to Eumenes, fled over to the contrary side, with such as he could get to follow him: but was closely followed by some, whose company he desired not. Eumenes perceiving the irrecoverable mischief which this traitorous practice had brought upon him, pursued the villain, & cut him off before he could thrust himselfe into the troups of Antigonus and boast of his treachery. This was some comfort to Eumenes in the losse of that battell, which disabled him utterly to keepe the field, & left it very hard for him to make a safe retreat. Yet one thing he did which much amazed his enemies, and (though a matter of small importance) caused Antigonus himselfe to admire his high resolution. It was held no small part of the victory to get possession of the dead bodies. Eumenes, whilst Antigonus held him in chase, turned out of the way, and fetching a compasse, returned to the place where the battell had bene fought; there he burned (according the manner of the time) the bodies of his owne men, men, and interred the bones and ashes of the Captains and common Souldiers apart, raising up heaps of earth as mountains over them, and so went his way. As this bold adventure bred in the Macedonians (returned to their Campe) great admiration of his brave spirit: so the newes which Menander (who was set to look unto their carriages) brought and published among them, enticed them to love him as their honourable friend. Hee had found Menander in an open Plaine, carelesse, as after an assured victory, and laden with the spoiles of many Nations, the rewards of their long service; all which he might have taken: but fearing lest such a purchase should prove a heavey burden to him, whose chiefe hope consisted in swift expedition, he gave secret warning to Menander to flee to the mountains, whilst he detained his men (whom authority could not have restrained) by this sleight, letting them to bait their horses. The Macedonians extolled him for this courtresie, as a noble Gentleman, that had forborne when it lay in his power to strip them out of all their wealth, and make their children slaves, and to ravish their wives: but Antigonus told them, that he had not forborne to do this out of any good will to them; but out of meere subtilty had avoyded those precious fetters, which would have hindered his speedy flight. He told them true. For Eumenes did not only think all carriages to be over-burden some, but the number of his men to be more troublesome than available in his intended course. Wherefore he sent them from him as fast as he could, wishing them to shift for themselves; and retaining only five hundred horse, and two hundred foot. When he had wearied Antigonus awhile in following him up and downe, he came to Nora: where againe keeping no more about him than necessity required to make good the place, he lovingly dismissed all the rest. Nora was a little fortresse in the borders of Lycania and Cappadocia, so strongly situated, that it seemed impregnable, & so well victualled and stored with all necessaries, that it might hold out for many yeares. Thither did Antigonus follow him, with more desire to make him his friend, than to vanquish him in War. To this purpose he entertained parley with him, but in vaine. For, whereas Antigonus offered him pardon and his love; Eumenes required restitution of his Provinces, which could not be granted without Antipaters consent. Then was Nora closed up; where Antigonus leaving sufficient strength for continuance of the siege, took his journey into Pisidia, against Alceus and Attalus, with whom he made short work. He came upon them unexpected, and seized on passages, which wanted not men, but such a Captain as Eumenes, to have defended them. Alceus and Attalus, as they had been too secure before his coming, so were they too adventurous, in fighting at the first sight, upon all disadvantages: and their folly was attended with futable event. Attalus with many principal Captains was taken; Alceus fled to the City of Termessus, where the love of the younger sort toward him was so vehement, that stopping their cares against all perswasions of the ancient men, they needs would hazzard their lives and their Country in his defence. Yet this availed him nothing: for the Governors of the Town having secretly compounded with Antigonus, caused the young men to fall out; & using the time of advantage, they with their servants did set upon Alceus, who unable to resist, slew himself. His dead body was conveyed to Antigonus, and by him barbarously torn, was cast forth without buriall. When Antigonus was gone, the young men interred the carcase with solemne funerals; having once been minded to set on fire their own towne in revenge of his death. Such favour had he purchased with courteous liberality: but to make an able General, one vertue, how great soever, is insufficient.

§. XII.

Ptolomie wins Syria and Phœnicia. The death of Antipater.

Whilst these things were in doing, the rest of the Princes lay idle, rather seeking to enjoy their Governments for the present, than to confirm or enlarge them. Only Ptolomie looking abroad, wan all Syria and Phœnicia: an action of great importance, but not remarkable for any circumstance in the managing. He sent a Lieutenant with an Army, who quickly took Laomedon prisoner, that ruled there by appointment of Antipater, and formerly of Perdiccas; but (as may seeme) without any great strength of Souldiers, far from assistants, and vainly relying upon the authoritie which had given him that Province, & was now occupied with greater cares, than with seeking to maintaine him in his Office.

Antipater was old and sickly, desirous of rest, and therefore contented to let Antigonus pursue the dispatch of those businesses in Asia. He had with him Polyperchon, one of the most ancient of Alexanders Captains, that had lately suppressed a dangerous insurrection of the Ætolians, which Nation had stirred in the quarrell of Perdiccas, prevailing far at the first, but soon losing all that they had gained, whilest Antipater was abroad in his Cilician expedition. In this Polyperchon Antipater did repose great confidence; so far forth, that (suspecting the youth of his own Son Cassander of insufficiency in so great a charge) he bequeathed unto him on his death-bed the government of Macedon and Greece, together with his office of Protectorship. So Antipater died, being four-score years old, having alwaies travelled in the great affaires of mighty Princes, with such reputation, that to Alexander in all his greatness was jealous of him, and the successors of Alexander did either quietly give place unto him, or were unfortunate in making oppositions. In his private qualities he was a subtle man, temperate, frugal, and of a Philosophicall behaviour, not unlearned, as having been Scholler to Aristotle, and written some Histories. He had been much molested by Olympias, Alexanders mother, whom after the death of her Son, he compelled to abstaine from coming into Macedonia, or entermingling in matters of Estate: yea, at his own death he gave especiall direction, that no woman should be permitted to deal in the administration of the Empire. But this precept was soon forgotten; and yet ere long, by sorrowfull experience approved to have been found and good.

§. XIII.

Of Polyperchon, who succeeded unto Antipater in the Protectorship. The insurrection of Cassander against him.

Polyperchon was very skillful in the Art of Warre, having long time bene Apprentice in that occupation; other qualities, requisite in so high an Office as hee under-went, either Nature had not given to him, or Time had robbed him of them. He managed his business more formally than wisely, as a man of a second wit, fitter to assist, than command in chiefe. At the first entrance upon the stage, he called to counsell all his friends, wherein for weighty considerations (as they who weighed not the contrary reasons held them) the Queene Olympias was revoked out of Epynus into Macedon, that the presence of Alexanders mother might countenance and strengthen their proceedings. For, the condition of the times requiring, that the Governours of Provinces abroad should keepe greater Armies, than were needfull or easie to be retained about the person of the King in Macedonia; it seemed expedient, that the face of the Court should be filled with all Majesty, that might give authority to the Injunctions from thence proceeding, and by an awfull regard containe within the limited bounds of dutie such as could not by force have bene kept in order, being strong, and lying too farre off.

Such care was taken for prevention of imaginary dangers and out of sight, whilest present mischiefs lay unregarded in their bosomes. Cassander, the Sonne of Antipater, was not able to discover that great sufficiency in Polyperchon, for which his father had reposed in him so much confidence: neither could he discern such odds in the quality of himselfe and Polyperchon, as was in their fortune. He was left Capitaine of one thousand; which Office by practice of those times was of more importance, than the title now seemes to imply. He should thereby have bene as Campe-master, or Lieutenant generall to the other: a place no way satisfying his ambition, that thought himselfe the better man. Therefore hee began to examine his owne power, and compare with the forces likely to oppose him. All that had relied on his father, were his owne assured, especially such as commanded the Garrisons bestowed in the principall Cities of Greece. The like hope was of the Magistrats, and others of principall authority, in those Common-weales, whose formes had bene corrected by Antipater, that they would follow the side, and draw in many partakers: it concerned these men in their owne particular to adhere unto the Captains, by whom their faction was up-held; and by whom the rascall multitude, covetous of re-gaining the tyrannous power which they had formerly exercised over the principall Citizens, were kept in order, obeying the betters perforce. Besides all these helps, Cassander had the secret love of Queene

Eurydice

Eurydice, who had in private rendred him such curtesie, as was due onely to her husband. But neither the Queenes favour, nor all his other possibilities, gave him confidence to break out into open rebellion; because he saw Polyperchon much revered among the Macedonians, and strong enough to suppress him, before he could have made head. Therefore he made shew of following his pleasures in the Countrie, and calling many of his friends about him, under pretence of hunting, advised with them upon the safest course, and most free from all suspicion. The necessity was apparent of raising an Armie, before the business was set on foot; and to doe this, opportunitie presented him with fair means. Protonie had by fine force, without any commission, annexed Syria to his government of Egypt and Cyrene: this was too much either for the King to trust him with, or for him to part with. Antigonus upon the first newes of Antipaters death, began to lay hold upon all that he could get, in such sort, that he manifestly discovered his intent of making himselfe Lord of all Asia. These two therefore stood in need of a civil war; which Cassander well noted, & presumed withall, that the friendship which had passed between his father and them, would avails him somewhat. Whereupon he secretly dispatched messengers to them both; and within a little while conveyed himself on a sudden over the Hellepont, that he might in person advance the business with greater speed. Much persuasion is needlesse in winning a man to what he desireth. Antigonus coveted nothing more, than to find Polyperchon weak, by raising some commotion in Greece. Yet (as for-malities must not be neglected) Cassander did very earnestly presse him, by the memorie of his Father, and all requisite conjurations, to assist him in this enterprise; telling him, that Protonie was readie to declare for them, and urging him to a speedie dispatch. Antigonus on the other side repaid him with the same coine, saying, that for his own sake, and his dead Fathers, whom he had very dearly loved, he would not faile to give him all manner of succour. Having thus feasted one another with words, they were nothing slacke in preparing the common means, leading to their severall ends.

§. XIV.

The unworthie courses held by Polyperchon, for the keeping down of Cassander.

Great necessity there was of timely provision. For, Polyperchon needed no other instructions to informe him of Cassanders drift, than the newes of his departure. He was not ignorant of the readie disposition, which might be found in Antigonus and Protonie, to the strengthening of rebellion; and well he knew that one principall hope of Cassander was reposed in the confidence of such as ruled in the Grecian Estate. Therefore (loving to work circumspectly) he called another Councell, wherein it was concluded, That the Popular forme of Government should be erected in all the Cities of Greece; the Garrisons withdrawn; and that all Magistrats and principall Men, into whose hands Antipater had committed the supreme authoritie, should forthwith be either slain or banished. This was a sure way to diminish the number of Cassanders friends, and to raise up many enemies to him in all quarters. Yet hereby was disclosed both an unthankfull nature in Polyperchon, and a factious malice in his adherents. For, how could he be excused of extreme ingratitude, that for hatred of the son went about to dishonour the Fathers actions, whose onely bounty had enabled him to doe it? Or what could be said in their defence, who fought to destroy many worthie men, friends to the State, by whom the Greekes were held restrained from stirring against the Macedonians; and in opposition to their private enemie, gave the rule of things to base Companions, and such as naturally maligne the Empire? But as in mans bodie, through sinnewes newly issuing from one branch, a finger is more vexed by inflammation of his next neighbour, than by any distemper in the contrarie hand: so in bodies politique, the humours of men, subdivided in faction, are more injured by the disagreeable qualities of such as curb them in their nearest purposes, than they are exasperated by the general opposition of such as are divided from them in the maine trunk. Hereby it comes to passe, that contrary religions are invited to helpe against neighbour Princes; bordering enemies drawn in, to the part in civill warres; and ancient hatred called to counsell against injurious friends. Of this fault Nature is not guiltie; shee hath taught the ameto offer it selfe unto manifest losse in defence of the head: They are depraved affections, affections, which render men sensible of their own particular, and forgetfull of the more generall good, for which they were created.

The decree, whereby the Greekes were presented with a vaine shew of libertie, ran under the Kings name; but so, as one might easily discern, that Polysperchon had guided his pen. For the maine point was, That they should follow such directions, as Polysperchon gave, and treat with him about all difficulties. In the rest it contained such a deale of kindnesse, as proceeding on a sudden from those who had kept them in hard subjection, might well appeare to have some other root than the pretended good wil; and was of it self too base and unfit for a King to use toward his conquered Subjects, and often-subdued Rebels.

§. XV.

Of the great commotions raised in Athens by Polysperchons decree. The death of Phocion.

Nevertheless the Athenians with immoderate joy entertained this happy-seeming Proclamation, and sought how to put it in execution without further delay. But Nicanor, Captain of the Garrison, which kept one of their Havens, called Munychia, in the lower part of the Town, would needs take longer time of deliberation, than was pleasing to their hasty desires.

Nicanor, as a trustie follower of Cassander, was by him shifted into the place, and Antipater (that was Captain there before) discharged, when Antipater was newly dead. His coming to Athens was no way gratfull to the Citizens, who soone after hearing the newes of Antipaters death, cried out upon Phocion, saying, That he had sufficient intelligence of that accident, and might, by advertising them in due time, have put into their hands a faire opportunitie of thrusting out the Macedonians. But these exclamations argued no more than a desire to shake off the Macedonian yoke. Farre more grievously would they have beene offended, had they knowne the instructions which Cassander had given to Nicanor, & his resolution to follow them. It was concluded, That he should not only retaine Munychia, any injunction to the contrary notwithstanding; but that he should finde means to thrust some companies into Piræum, and fortifie that also, which was the principall haven, against the high-town. How to accomplish this, he rather wanted some reasonable pretence, than good abilitie. But the Athenians were not long in giving him sufficient cause to do that, which he would have done without any cause given. They desired him to come unto their councill, assembled in the Piræum, there to consider of the Kings Proclamation: whither upon Phocions word and safe conduct he came, and earnestly pressed them to hold with Cassander in the war which was readie to break forth. Contrariwise, they urged him first of all, to make them masters of their own, which how to use, they might consult afterwards. Each of them refusing to condescend unto the others demand; the Athenians (who did alwayes measure justice by profit, yet seldom thrived by that course) practised with Dercillus, a Captain following Polysperchon, and then lying neare at hand, that he should enter into the Town, and take Nicanor prisoner. But Phocion, who then governed in Athens, a man very unlike to the rest of the Citizens, being nothing pleased with such a trick of politicke dishonestie, did quietly suffer him to depart and save himselfe.

Nicanor hereupon began to devise upon taking Piræum; not as following now the project of Cassander, but prosecuting his own just revenge. He levied as many Souldiers as he could, and drew them closely into Munychia; which done, he issued into Piræum, took it, and intrenched himselfe therein, to the exceeding discomfort of the Athenians, who lately impatient of his keeping the one Haven, saw him now Master of both. Alexander, the son of Polysperchon, came thither shortly after with an Armie. Then were the Citizens in great hope of recovering all, and addressed themselves unto him; who made faire shewes, intending meer mischief, which they perceived not; being blinded with the vaine Epistles of his Father, and of Olympias the old Queene. Olympias, taking upon her to command, before the durst well adventure to returne into Macedon, had peremptorily charged Nicanor to restore to the Athenians the places which hee held: but hee would first consider more of the matter. Polysperchon had further ordained, that the Ile of Samos should be rendered unto them: a goodly offer, had it accorded with his power and meaning. He was (indeed) so farre from purposing to let them have Samos, that as yet he did not thoroughly intend to let them have themselves. The commoditie of their Havens was such, as he would rather get into his owne hands, than leave in theirs; yet rather wished in theirs, than in Cassanders. His Son Alexander, not ignorant of this, made fair shew to the Athenians, and spent much labour in communing with Nicanor, but suffered not them, for whom he seemed to labour, to intermeddle with the businesse. Hereupon the Citizens grew jealous, and the displeasure they conceived against him, they poured out upon Phocion, depriving him of his office. This was done with much tumult: banished men and strangers thrusting themselves into the assembly of the Citizens, who distracted with sundrie passions, growing out of their present misfortunes, thought every one that best could inveigh against things past, a most likely man to finde some remedie for the evill threatening them. In this hurly-burly was Alexander devising how he might come to some good point of composition with Nicanor, & held much privie conference with him; which he could not so secretly carry, but that his negotation was discovered, whereby the uproare in the Town was so far increased, that Phocion with many of his friends, were accused, and driven to seek safeguard of their lives by flight. So they came to Alexander, who entertained them gently, and gave them his letters of commendation to his Father, desiring him to take them into his protection.

Polysperchon was in the Countrie of Phocion, readie to enter with an Armie into Attica. Thither came Phocion with his companions, hoping well that the letters which they brought, and their own deserts, (having alwayes been friends to the Macedonians, as far as the good of their Countrie gave leave) should be enough to get patronage to their innocencie. Besides all this, Dinarchus a Corinthian, Polysperchons familiar friend, went along with them (in an evil houre) who promised to himselfe and them great favour, by means of his acquaintance. But Polysperchon was an unstable man, very earnest in what he took in hand, yet, either for want of judgement in following them, or of honestie in holding the best of them, easily changing his intended courses, and doing things by the halves, which made him commonly faile of good successe. For fear of Cassander he had offered wonderfull kindnesse to the Athenians; this had caused them to love him: out of their love he gathered hope of deceiving them, which made him to change his minde, and seeke how to get into his owne hands those keys, with which Cassander held them fast lockt up: finding himselfe disappointed of this purpose, and suspected as a false dishonourable man, he stood wavering betweene the contrarie allurements of profit and reputation. To keepe the Athenians perforce at his devotion, would indeed have done well: but the effecting of this began to grow desperate; and many Towns of importance in Greece began to cast their eyes upon his proceeding in that action. Wherefore hee thought it the wisest way to redeme their good opinion; by giving all contentment unto the popular faction; which was then growne to be Master of that Citie. And in good time for this purpose were the Athenian Embassadors come, treading (as one may say) upon Phocions heeles; whom they were sent to accuse. These had some audience given to them in the Kings presence, who was attended by many great Lords, and for ostentations sake was glorified with all exterior shewes of Majestie; yet all too little to change Aridaus into Alexander: for hee did nothing there, but either laugh or chafe, as he saw others doe. For beginning of the businesse Polysperchon commanded that Dinarchus should bee tortured and flaine. This was enough to testifie his heartie affection to the Commonaltie of Athens, in that he spared not his old acquaintance for their sake; whose Embassadors he then bad to speake. When their errand was done, and answer to it made by the accused, who had no indifferent hearing, Phocion and the rest were pronounced guilty of treason; but to give sentence, and doe the execution upon them, was (for honours sake) referred unto the Citie of Athens, because they were Burgessees. Then were they sent away to Athens, where the rascal multitude, not suffering them to speake for themselves, condemned them to dye. So they perished being innocent. But the death of Phocion being very conspicuous, made the fortune of the rest to bee of the lesse regard. Five and fortie times had hee beene chosen Governour of the Citie, never sung for the place, but sent for when hee was absent, so well was his integritie knowne, and so highly valued, even of such as were no pretenders to the same vertue. He was a good Commander in War, wherein though his actions were not very great, yet were they of good importance; and

and never unfortunate. Never did the Citie repent of having followed his counsell: nor any private man of having trusted his word. Philip of Macedon highly esteemed himso, and much more did Alexander, who (besides other signes of his love) sent him two hundred talents of silver, and offered to bestow upon him of foure Cities in Asia any one which he would choofe. But Phocion refused these and other gifts, howsoever importunately thrust upon him; resting well contented with his honest povertie: wherein he lived above fourescore years, and then was compelled by the unjust judgment of wicked men, to drink that poyson, which by just judgment of the righteous God, so infected the Citie of Athens, as from that day forwards it never brought forth any worthy man resembling the vertue of their Ancestors.

§. XVI.

Of Polysperchon his vain expedition against Cassander.

Not long after these things were done, Cassander, with such forces as Antigonus lent him, entred into Piræus; which newes drew Polysperchon headlong into Attica, with a great Armie, but so ill victualled, that he was faine to depart without any thing done. Only he had given some impediment to the enimie; who, not contented with defending what he held, began to looke out, and make new purchases abroad. Finding therefore himselfe unable to drive Cassander out of Athens, he left his son Alexander, with such number of men as exceeded not the proportion of victuals, to withstand his further intrenching. The greatest part of his Armie he carried into Peloponnesus, to make the Countrey sure to himselfe, wherein Cassander had many Friends.

His doings in Peloponnesus were such, as they had been in other parts of Greece. First, he began to fight with Edicts, restoring the Democracie, or Popular forme of government. He commanded that the principall Citizens, that had by Antipater bene made Rulers, should be either slaine, or driven into exile. This decree tooke immediate effect in most places: The vulgar sort being very readie to seale the Charter of their freedome and authoritie, with the blood of those who had kept them in subjection. Yet many Cities there were, which delighted in the rule of the chiefe Citizens; and many which wished well to Cassander, especially they of Megalopolis, on whom Polysperchon meant to inflict an exemplarie punishment of disobedience to him, which he termed Rebellion. Megalopolis had in it fifteen thousand serviceable men, well furnished of necessaries, and resolved to endure the worst. And need there was of such resolution. For Polysperchon comming thither with all his power, did so much, that he overthrew, by a Mine, three of their Bulwarks, and all the space of wall between them. But the Descendants manfully repelled the Macedonians which came up to the breach; and at the same time with great labour they raised up an inner wall, to beare out the next assault. The Assaultants having failed to carry the Town at the first attempt, took much paine to cleare the ground, and make fair way for their Elephants, whose violence was likely to overthrow all that came in their way. But the Townsmen perceiving their drift, prepared boords driven through with long nailes, which they used as gal-throps, bestowing them slightly covered, with the points upwards, in the way by which the beasts were to passe. Neither did they set any to encounter them in front, but appointed certaine light-armed men to beate upon their sides with arrows and Darts, as they were instructed by some that had learned the manner of that fight in the Asian Wars. Of these provisions they made happy use in the next assault. For, by them were the Elephants (wherein the enimie chiefly trusted) either sorely hurt, or driven back upon the Macedonians, whom they trampled under feet. Polysperchon came as ill furnished for long abode to Megalopolis as before to Athens. Therefore being neither able to dispatch the businesse quickly, nor to take such leisure as was requisite, he forsooke the siege, with some losse, and much dishonour, leaving some part of his Armie to lye before the Town for his credit.

After this he sent Chim, his Admiral, to Sea, to joyne with Aridam that was come out of Phrygia, and to cut off all succour which might come to the enimie out of Asia. Cassander also sent his whole fleet under Nicanor, who taking along with him some ships of Antigonus, came to the Propontis, where he fought with Chim, and was beaten. But Antigonus hearing of the overthrow, gathered together the ships that were escaped, and and manning them very well, sent out Nicanor againe, assuring him of the victorie, as well he might. For he sent out sufficient numbers of light-armed men, whom he caused to be wafted over the streights in small Vessels by night; these before day-light setting upon Chim, drave his men, that lay securely on the land, head-long into their ships; in which tumult Nicanor arriving did assaile them so lustily, that few or none escaped him.

This losse at Sea, together with his bad successe by Land, brought Polysperchon into great contempt. He had a good facilitie in penning bloudie decrees, but when the execution was referred to his own sword, he could find the matter more difficult. Wherefore the Athenians, perceiving that he had left them to shift for themselves, and was not able to give them protection against the enimie which lay in their bosomes, came to agreement with Cassander; accepting a governour of his appointment; and restoring all things to the same state wherein Antipater had left them. The like inclination to the partie of Cassander, was found in very many Cities of Greece, which daily and willingly revolted unto him; as to an industrious man, and likely to prevail in the end. Thus was the whole Countrey set in a combustion, uncapable to be quenched; which presented unto Antigonus an opportunitie, that he neglected not, of making himselfe Lord of Asia.

§. XVII.

Antigonus seeks to make himselfe an absolute Lord: and thereupon treats with Eumenes, who disappointeth him. Phrygia and Lydia won by Antigonus.

Antigonus had in Antipaters life time a firm resolution, to make unto himselfe the utmost benefit that he might of the Armie committed to his charge. And in faire season for advancement of his purposes came the newes of Antipaters death; even then, when all the businesse in Pisidia was dispatched, and no more employment for the Armie remaining, save onely the continuance of the siege of Nora, a small thing of it selfe, but as hard as a greater matter; and requiring few men, but much time; when time of all things was most precious. Eumenes lay in that Fort of Nora, able to make the place good, and hoping that the mutabilitie, to which the present Estate was manifestly subject, would in continuance of some years (which he might abide) worke more for him, than his enemies in that space could worke against him. His most feare was, that for want of exercise in that narrow Castle, his men & horses might grow sickly and unserviceable: which made him to practise many devices of keeping them in health and lustie. But when he had continued shut up in this manner about a yeare, his hopes came to good passe, and he was eased of his cares by Antigonus himselfe, whose forces held him besieged.

Antigonus knowing the great sufficiencie of Eumenes, & considering his fidelitie shewed unto Perdiccas, thought that he could not find in all the world a fitter man than him, to employ in managing those high designes, wherein he doubted not that he should be withstood by the mightiest Princes of the Empire. He sent therefore to Eumenes by one that was friend to them both, acquainting him with some part of his intent, and promising to make him a better Lord than ever he had bin, and the next man to himselfe, if things fell out as he desired; in regard whereof he required only his friendship, and thereupon sent him an oath to take; which done, he might at his good pleasure issue safely out of Nora, and enjoy his perfect libertie. Eumenes perusing the form of the oath, did perceive the meaning of Antigonus; which was, rather to make him his follower than his fellow. For whereas in a few words, it mentioned the King and Princes of the blood, rather to keep the Decorum, than upon any loyall intent; the binding words and sum of all were such, as tied him fast only to Antigonus, omitting all reservation of dutie to the King or any other. This heliked not, holding it unseemly to become a sworn man to him, with whom he had sought for the masterie; and being assured that his voluntarie assistance, which way soever he gave, would be more acceptable, and farre more honourable, than the course propounded. Yet would he not therefore breake off the negotiation, and wait for some better occasion of enlargement, which might perhaps belong in coming: but seeming to be well agreed with Antigonus, he prepared to give up his Hold and depart. As for the oath it selfe, when he came to take it, he made shew of dislike, in that it was not solemne enough enough for such personages as they were, who could not be too ceremonious in testifying their allegiance. The Macedonians which lay incamped before Nora, liked his words, and gave him leave to put in Olympias and the children of Alexander, binding himself to them and their adherents, as well as to Antigonus; and so he departed.

Antigonus had taken upon him, as soone as he came downe to the Sea-side, to remove some of the Governours of the Provinces, behaving himselfe according to the authority which he had received of Antipater, to exercise in the time of war. Neither did he want sufficient pretence whereby to justify his proceedings. For if Polyperchon might lawfully hold the Protectorship, which the old man dying on his death-bed bequeathed unto him, as a legacie, without consent of the Princes or Souldiers; why might not he himselfe as well retain the Lieutenanthip of Asia, that was granted unto him for the generall good of the State, in presence of the whole Armie, by the King, and by Antipater, who had power to ordaine what should seem convenient whilst he lived, not to dispose of things that should happen after his death? To give a faire colour to his ambition, this was enough: if any were not herewith satisfied, he had three score thousand footmen, ten thousand horse, and thirtie Elephants in a readinesse to answer them.

The first that perceived his drift, and provided to resist him, was Arideus Governor of Phrygia; who fortified the Townes of his own Province, and fought to have won Cyzicus, a faire Haven Town, and seated very conveniently for him, but was faine to go away without it. Hereupon Antigonus took occasion to command him out of the countrie. Arideus was so far from obeying him, that he sent forces to relieve Eumenes. Nevertheless finding that he was unable of himselfe to make long resistance, he took such companies as he could draw along with him, and so passed over into Europe, to complain at the Court. The like fortune had Clitus, who ruled in Lydia, and sought the like remedy of his fortune, with some hope at the first (for both of them were entertained with very good words) which quickly vanished, and grew desperate, when they were beaten at Sea, as hath already been declared.

§. XVIII.

Antigonus pursues Eumenes. Eumenes having authoritie from the Court, raiseth great war against Antigonus in defence of the Royall house.

Antigonus having thus gotten into his hands all, or most of all Asia the lesse, was able to have entred Macedon, and seized upon the Court; which that he forbore to doe, it proceeded (as may seeme) from some of these reasons. It would have bred as much jealousie in Cassander, as feare in Polyperchon, which might have brought them to termes of reconciliation; It would aske more time than he could spare; and the envie which followed the Protectorship was such, as he that had power enough without the Office, ought rather to shun, than to pursue. Besides all this, it was manifest that Eumenes would not only refuse to take his part, but would make war upon him in defence of the Royall house; to which it was found that Antigonus did not stand well affected. Against him therefore he bent his course, and with an Armie of twentie thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, made great haste toward Cilicia, hoping to suppress him before he should be able to make head.

Eumenes was one of those few that continued faithfull to their dead master, which being well known in the Court, he had commission sent unto him from thence to raise an Armie, and make war upon Antigonus, taking of the Kings treasure as much as he should need. Other letters also there were directed to all the Governours of Provinces, requiring them to give assistance to Eumenes, and be ordered by his direction: especially to the Captaines of the old Souldiers, called the Argyraspides, or silver-shielded bands, commandment was given to be at his appointment. He had of his old followers gathered together two thousand foot, and five hundred horse, before this authoritie was given him: but now hee purposed with all the strength which he could make, to fight with Antigonus in defence of the Royall blood. Olympias had written to him, desiring him to bring helpe to her and her Nephew the son of Alexander; and in the meane time to give her his advice in that which Polyperchon required of her: for these were desirous to returne into Macedon, but suspected his ambition, as not contained within lawfull bounds. Eumenes therefore counselled her to remaine in Epirus, till such time as he could bring the warre to a good issue; which done, he promised that his faith and care should not be wanting to the feede of Alexander.

Strange it is to consider, that in all the Empire, scarce any one could be found among the Noble-men, in whom Alexanders mother, wives, and children, might repose firme confidence, saving onely this Eumenes, a stranger to the Macedonian blood, borne at Cardia, a Citie of Thrace. His reputation was no more than his owne vertue had made it; his followers obeyed at their owne discretion; and compelled he was to travaile as farre as Persia, to gather together an Army sufficient to resist the enemies that pursued his heeles.

§. XIX.

How the Princes of Macedon stood affected mutually. Olympias takes Andæus and Eurydice, whom she cruelly puts to death.

NOW, forasmuch as in this present Warre all the Rulers of the Provinces did intermeddle; and great alterations happened, not onely in the parts of Asia, but Macedon it selfe, which brought a new face unto the State, by the extirpation of the Royall house of Philip and Alexander: I hold it convenient in this place, before we enter into the particulars of the Warre it selfe, to shew briefly how the great ones did mutually stand affected; and by what passions they were dtawne into those courses, which over-threw most of them, and out of their ruines built the greatness of a few: as likewise to what extremity the faction brake out in Macedon it selfe, about the maine controverfie of the title to the Crowne, whereupon all other quarrels were or should have beene depending.

Arideus the King, being simple and fearefull, did onely what he was bidden.

Polyperchon, desirous to continue long in Office, had a purpose to advance the sonne of Alexander by Roxane to the Kingdome, and become Governour to a King of his own making.

Eurydice the Queene discovering plainly this intent, and meaning nothing lesse than to let her husband serve as a Stale, keeping the throne warme till another were growne old enough to fit in it, grew acquainted with Cassander, who hated the memory of Alexander, and was therefore the fitter for her turne.

Cassander held fresh in minde the danger wherein his family had been through Alexanders malice, together with the indignity offered to himselfe by Alexander, who knocked his head against a wall for deriding one that adored him after the Persian manner. The displeasure hereof, and the pleasure which he tooke in the amorous Queene, made him to resolve, both to suppress the lineage which he hated, and to maintaine his beloved mistresse, either by supporting her weak husband, or by taking her to be his owne wife.

The rest of the Lords held it a thing indifferent who reigned over all, so as they might reigne in their severall Countreies, & establish their authority in such wise, that it might not be taken from them.

Among these, Ptolomy and Antigonus were well enough already, if their ambition would have suffered them to see it.

Pithe and Seleucus lying farre off, and being strong, had some good hope to encroach upon their neighbours. Against these, Pencestes, and some others, with much ado hardly made resistance, untill such time as Eumenes came to them; who propounded to himselfe great matters, which he lived not to accomplish.

Olympias the old Queene (as it is common with step-dames) hated the children of her husband and by his other wives. It was thought that she had given poison to Arideus, which failing to take away his life, had much impaired both his body and wits. Now she considering, that Eumenes was too full of businesse to come home, so soone as she wished that he should; and that Cassander daily prevailed in Greece: thought it the best way to joyne with Polyperchon, & set up, as King, her Nephew Alexander, the son of Roxane, removing Arideus before Cassander were able to defend him. To this intent he procured men among her kindred in Epirus, and so tooke her way towards Polyperchon, who joyning with her, entred into Macedon.

Eurydice hearing these newes, wrote very earnestly to Cassander, praying him to set aside all other businesse, & come to succour her. She her selfe by entreaty, gifts, and promises, drew to her partie as many of the Macedonians as she could, untill she thought her owne side strong enough, and then taking her husband with her, went boldly forth against Olympias, and the Traitor Polyperchon.

These two Queens met armed, as if the matter should have beene determined by their own hands, which ended without any stroke stricken, by the revolt of those who followed Eurydice. For as soone as the Macedonians beheld Olympias; calling to minde her former Estate, and the victorious reignes of her husband and son, they refused to lift any weapon against her. Eurydice finding her selfe thus forsaken, fled towards Amphipolis, but was intercepted, and made prisoner with her husband.

Olympias having obtained this victory without blood, thought that all things would succeed as easily, and upon the same considerations for which they had refused to beare Armes against her, the Macedonians would not sticke to maintaine her, whatsoever her proceedings were. Having therefore shut up Aridam and his wife in a close room, where they could scarce turne round, she fed them through a little hole, till after a while it came in her head (for feare lest the people should have commiseration of him, that had reigned almost fixe yeeres and a halfe) to put them to death. So she delivered Aridam to some barbarous Thracians; who tooke away his life by cruell torments: to Eurydice she sent a sword, a halter, & a cup of poison, willing her to chooseth the instrument of her own death; who praying that the like presents might one day be sent to Olympias, yielded her necke to the halter, having spent her last curses not in vaine. Nicanor the brother of Cassander, and a hundred the chiefe of his friends, did Olympias then chooseth out, all whom she commanded to be slaine. His brother Solais that was already dead and buried, she accused of poison given to Alexander, & thereupon caused his Tombe to be thrown downe, and his bones to be scattered abroad. The Macedonians wondering at this fury, began to condemne themselves, and the folly of Polyperchon, who had, quite contrary to Antipaters charge given on his death-bed, called this outrageous woman to the government of the Empire.

§. XX.

How Cassander was revenged upon Olympias.

†. I.

The great expedition of Cassander. Olympias shuts her selfe into Pydna, where Cassander besieged her. Eacides King of Epirus, coming to succour Olympias, is forsaken, and banished by his owne Subjects.

Cassander at that time lay before Tegea in Peloponnesus; whither when all these ill tidings were brought to him, he never staid to take the City, nor to give order for the State of things in that Countrey, (though Alexander the sonne of Polyperchon were there with an Armie) but compounding with them of Tegea, he willed his associates to looke to themselves as well as they could, till his returne; and so in all haste he tooke his journey towards Macedon, carried headlong with the greedie desire of just revenge. The Aetolians had taken the Streights of Thermopylae, in favour of the Queene & Polyperchon, to hinder his passage; but he, not willing to mispend any time in dealing with them, got together as many shippes as he could, great and small, with which he transported his Army into Thessaly. There he divided his companies, appointing some under Callas, a subtle Captaine, to hold Polyperchon busied, who then lay incamped neere to Perhabia; with the rest he marched directly against Olympias. She, having once prevailed by the respect given to her dignity, tooke more care how to appeare Majestically, than to make her selfe strong. To this end she made a solemne progresse to Pydna, a Sea-towne, and well fenced, having in her company all the flowre of the Court, especially the great Ladies, among whom was Roxane, & her young son Alexander, heire to the great Alexander, by his grand-mothers designement: who, during his minority kept kept the Sovereigne power in her own hands. But all this pompe served to little use, against the violence of the enemy, that soone presented himselfe before the walls; only it fed the besieged with a vaine hope of succour, that would from all parts arrive, to rescue persons of their quality. And hereof there soone appeared faire likelihood, which as soone vanished, and went away in smoke.

For Acacides King of Epirus, made great haste to bring succour to Olympias, his cousen, with whom Deodamia his daughter was also shut up. Nevertheless, his Subjects were nothing forward in this expedition; but finding certaine passages taken in the way by Cassanders men, they called upon him to retire, & quit the enterprize. The Kings importunate urging them to proccede, and the obstinate refusal of the Army, brake out at length into such termes, that when he had raged in vaine against the multitude, his authority, with which he thought to have prevailed upon them, was by them taken from him, and he compelled to forsake his Kingdome, and to wander up and down in forraine Countries a banished man, his people joyning with the enemy, against whom hee had led them forth to war.

Pydna in the meane time was closed up streighly, both by Sea and Land, so that neither any could issue out of the City, nor any reliefe be conveyed into it, but it held out as long as any food was left, no memorable service being done there, whilst great actions were managed abroad.

†. II.

A continuation of Olympias her story. Polyperchon defeated. Extreme famine in Pydna. Olympias yeeldes to Cassander.

NOW, though order of time require it, that we should rehearse the doings of Eumenes & Antigonus in this place, leaving Olympias yet a while to the hour of her destiny; which growes the faster upon her, because she may discern it coming: yet that we may not be compelled to interrupt the course of our narration, by inserting her Tragedie in the midst of things not manifestly coherent with it; we will here (as elsewhere we have done, and elsewhere must) continue to an end one History, that we may not be therewith distracted, when we shall come to the relation of another. All the hope of the besieged, remaining in Polyperchon, was in like manner disappointed, as their former trust had bin, which was repoted in the succours of the Epirus. For Callas, who was sent against him, found the means to corrupt the greatest part of his Army with money, leaving him within a little while so slenderly accompanied, that hee was fit for no other businesse of warre, than a swift retreat. When famine had so farre prevailed in the City, that the horses were killed as a precious food, many men, feeding on the dead carcasses of their fellowes, and saw-dust being given to the Elephants for provender; some of the Souldiers obtaining the Queenes leave, (who could not denie it) others, without asking leave, yielded themselves to the enemy, and were by him gently relieved, and sent abroad into the Countrey. The newes of the Queenes affaires, dispersed by these men, did so affright her well-willers, that such as had reserved themselves to the event, came in apace, and submitted them to Cassander. At length, when the mortalitie was so great in the Towne, that the living were even poisoned with the noysome sent of the dead; Olympias bethought her selfe of stealing away by Sea in a Galley that she had: wherewith her successe was as bad as in the rest. For God had appointed this Towne, by her chosen as a place of refuge, to be unto her as a house of torment, and a Jail, out of which she should not be delivered, but unto an evill death. Being therefore utterly broken with miseries, which daily afflicted her & the other Ladies, unaccustomed to so wretched a kind of life, she offered composition, & with much labor hardly obtained of Cassander (who having fetcht her Gally out of the Haven, accounted himselfe as good as master of her body) a grant of her own life. Immediately upon her apprehension, Pella, the chiefe City of the Kingdome, was yeilded to Cassander. Amphipolis did stand out: for Aristonius (to whom Olympias had given charge of such forces as were left abroad in the Countrey, taking courage from the successe of some petty services wherein he had prevailed) began to promise himselfe great unlikelyhoods. But Olympias, to win Cassanders favour, very earnestly required him upon his faith to her, that he should give it up. He did so, and presently after was killed by his private enemies, that were set on by Cassander, who partly hated him upon old respects, partly doubted him, as a man likely to seeke innovation.

†. III.

The death of Olympias, and her conditions.

When Olympias had now heard sorrowfull tidings of all her friends, the her self was called into question, & accused in an assembly of the Macedonians, for the murders (they were so stiled in her affliction, which in time of prosperity she called justice) by her committed. There was she (being not heard, nor called to speake) condemned to die. The suite was commenced and prosecuted against her, by the kindred of those whom she had slaine. But it was at Cassanders instigation, who (to hasten the execution) sent her word, that he would furnish her with a ship, and other necessities, to save her self by flight: which when she refused, saying, that she would plead for her self, & tell her owne tale; he dissembled no longer, but sent unto her such men, as hated her most, who tooke away her miserable life. She was daughter, and sister, unto two Kings of Epirus; wife, & mother, unto two the mightiest Kings, of that, or many other ages; a stout Lady, and of unreprieveable chastity; but her ambition was boundlesse, her hatred unappeasable, and her furie in revenge most unwomanly. Her perverse conditions made her husband seeke other wives and Concubines, which caused her to hate both him, and them. She was thought privie to her husbands death; after which, very cruelly she slew his late wife Cleopatra, having first murdered one of her two children in her armes, and with a beastly fury broiled the other alive in fire, in a copper bason. For these things, her sonne Alexander (otherwise loving her well) forbade her to meddle in the government of Macedon. But God, more severe unto cruell Tyrants, than only to hinder them of their wils, permitted her to live and fulfill the rest of her wickedness, (which was his justice upon the adulteries of Philip, and the oppression done by him & others;) after all which, He rewarded her malice, by returning it upon her owne head.

†. IV.

Cassander celebrates the funerall of Aridaeus and Eurydice; and seekes to make himselfe King of Macedon.

After her death, Cassander gave honourable buriall to Aridaem & Eurydice, among their Progenitors, Kings of Macedon. And looking further into his own possibilities of greatness, he married the Lady Theffalonica, whom he had taken at Pythia, being the daughter of King Philip, by another of his wives; that by her he might have some title to the Crowne. For the same end he committed Roxane, & her young son to close prison, removing thereby some part of his impediment. And, the better to encrease his fame, and purchase love, built a City, called by his own name Cassandria, that soone grew to be very great and powerfull. He re-edified likewise Thebes in Greece, & restored it unto the old inhabitants, after it had laine twenty yeeres waste, being utterly razed by Alexander. By these means, especially by the restauration of Thebes, wherunto all Greece voluntarily contributed, he grew so strong, that few remained enemies unto him; and they, with much labour, hardly could resist him. Leaving him therefore daily prevailing in Greece, we will returne to them, who contended in Asia, for lesse titles, but larger Provinces, with greater forces.

CHAP.

CHAP. III.

Of the great Lordship which ANTIGONUS got in Asia.

§. I.

The journey of Eumenes into Persia. His wife dealing with those that joyned with him.

EUMENES, having joyned unto his company the Argyraspides, made haste into the Easterne parts, to take possession of those Countries, according to his commission, and strengthen himselfe against Antigonus. He tooke his journey through Caelosyria and Phoenicia, hoping to reclaime those Provinces, usurped with the rest of Syria (as hath beene shewed) by Ptolomy, to the Kings obedience. But to effect this, his haste of his passing forward was too great, his Army too little, and the readinesse of the people, to returne to their due obedience, none at all. Besides all which impediments, one inconvenience troubled him in all his proceedings, making them the lesse effectfull. The Capitaines of the Argyraspides were so froward, that they scorned to repaire to him, and take his directions; and their fidelity was so unsteady, that he might more easily have dealt with open traitors. It was not expedient, that he, being Generall, should weaken his authority by courting them; neither lay it in his power to keepe him in order by compulsion. Therefore he fained, that Alexander had appointed unto him, in a dream, a place for their meeting, namely, in a rich pavilion, wherein an empie throne was placed, as if Alexander himselfe had beene present at their consultations. Thus he freed himselfe from their vaine pride; but of their faith he could have no assurance. Yet when Ptolomy requested them, and Antigonus bribed them to forsake him, they continued (though not without considering of the matter) to take his part. So he marched on, sending before him the Kings warrant; which Pytho and Seleucus refused to obey; not as rejecting the Kings authority, but excepting the person of Eumenes, as a man condemned to die by the Macedonian Army, for the death of Craerus. Eumenes, knowing well that he was not to rely upon their assistance, who stood otherwise affected than his affaires required, and were not to be dealt with by persuasion, fought passage by strong hand through the Country of Babylon, in such wise that Seleucus, having in vaine assaid to hinder him, by opening the sluices of Euphrates, was glad at length to grant him friendly way, as desirous to be rid of him. Thus he came to Pencestes and the rest of the Easterne Lords, who were glad of his company, because of the differences betweene Pytho, Seleucus, and themselves. Yet the contention about superiority grew very hot among them, every one finding matter enough to feede his owne humour of selfe-worthinesse. But the former device of assembling in one pavilion, made all quiet; the conclusion ever being sure to follow that which Eumenes propounded, who was both wisest in giving advice, and best able to reward, by means of the authority given him, to take what he pleased of the Kings treasures. By these means he won to himselfe many of those, who had most power to doe good or hurt.

§. II.

How Antigonus, coming to set upon Eumenes, was driven off with losse.

ANTIGONUS, hearing that Eumenes lay in the Province of Susa, had an earnest desire to follow him, and drive him further from the Kings treasures, which were kept there. To which end, as soone as he had made himselfe strong enough, hee removed out of Mesopotamia, where he had wintered; and taking to him Pytho and Seleucus, with their men, he marched directly against the enemies, with intent to give them battell. Eumenes had fortified the Castle of Susa, and was retired back toward Persia, keeping the River of Tigris betweene him and his pursuers. The passages of the River were well guarded, & good espiall kept upon Antigonus, to observe which way he took.

Before he came to Tigris it selfe, he was to passe over Coprates, a great River, and not foordable, which he fought to doe by small vessells, whereof he had no great store. A great part of his Army had gotten over, when Eumenes, who kept a bridge upon Tigris, came with a thousand horse, & foure thousand foot, to see their demeanour: and finding them out of order, charged them, brake them, and drave them headlong backe into Coprates, wherein most of them were drowned; very few escaping with life, except foure thousand that yielded themselves prisoners in fight of Antigonus, that was not able to relieve them. This losse made Antigonus glad to fall off; and the heare of that Countrie in the dog-dayes, breeding diseases in his Army, by which many perished, caused him to remove as farre as into Media. So he tooke Python with him; (leaving Seleucus to besiege the Cattle of Susa) & seeking to goe the neere way, passed through savage Nations, that continually vexing him with skirmishes, slew great numbers of his men, before he could arrive in Media, with his troups that were quite heart-broken.

§. III.

Of Eumenes's coming. A battaile betwene him and Antigonus.

After his departure, Eumenes with his associates fell into consultation, about the remainder of their businesse. Faine he would have had them to enter upon those Provinces, which Antigonus had left behinde him; to which also the Captaines of the Argyrasides or Silver-shields were very inclinable, as desiring to draw neerer to Greece. But Peucestes, and the rest, whose dominions lay in the high Countries, had more care of their owne particular Estates, and would needs march Eastward. These carried it; for the Army was not strong enough to divide it selfe into parts.

When they came into Persia, Peucestes, ruling there, feasted them royally, and sought by all meanes to win the Souldiers love to himselfe. Eumenes perceiving whereunto those doings tended, suffered him a while to keepe good cheare, till the time of war drew neere. Then did he faine an Epistle, directed, as from Orontes Governor of Armenia, to Peucestes himselfe: The purport whereof was; that Olympias had vanquished Cassander, & sent over a great Army under Polysperchon, to joyne with Eumenes. These newes, as they filled the Campe with vaine joy, so they wrought in all mens mindes a great willingness to obey Eumenes, by whom was the likeliest appearance of their preferment; wherein they dealt wisely, he being farre the most sufficient Commander, as they found soone after. For when Antigonus, coming out of Media, drew neere unto them, Eumenes by some mischance was fallen sicke, and faine to be carried in a Litter; the Army marched in very bad array, and was likely to have bene forced to take battaile in that disorder. But Eumenes, when the rest of the Captaines were amazed, was carried about the Army in his Litter, and upon the sodaine did cast his men into so good forme, that Antigonus, perceiving him a far off, could not refrain from giving him deserved commendations. Yet he did not cease to promise great rewards to the Captaines, & all sorts of men, if they would forsake Eumenes: which hopes deceiving him, he came to the trial of a battaile. Eumenes had more Elephants than Antigonus; otherwise, he was inferiour in number both of horse and foote by a third part. The battaile was fought with variable successe, and great losse on both sides, continuing a great part of the day, & of the night following. Yet the victory was uncertaine. For Eumenes could not force his men to lye farre from their carriages: by which meanes Antigonus (who had a more absolute command over his) incamping on the ground whereon they fought, had in his power the dead bodies, which was accounted the signe of victory; for he buried his owne, & gave leave to his enemies craving it, to doe the like. But a greater signe of victory had Eumenes. For he abode still in the same place, & not only buried his men very honourably, at great leisure, but held the Countrie round about; whereas Antigonus was glad (having tarried but one day) to steale away by night, and returne into Media, from whence he came.

§. IV. of

§. IIII.

Of divers stratagems practised by Antigonus, and Eumenes, one against the other.

THus did the Warre continue doubtfull, and was protracted to a greater length, each part having stout Souldiers, and skillfull Generalls: but the side which had hitherto prevailed, being hindered by the equall authority of many, from pursuing all advantages to the best. Antigonus grew daily weaker, in men and reputation, so that to repaire himselfe he could finde no way safer, than to put all to adventure. He knew that his enemies lay in their wintering places, quartered far asunder, so that if hee could suddenly come among them, he was likely to put them in great distresse. Between him & them, the way was not long, being only nine daies journey, but very bad, through a rough drie wilderness, hardly passable. Another way, fairer and leading through a Country well peopled, but requiring 25. daies journey, he forsook, partly for the length, partly, and chiefly, because he would come undiscovered. So therefore taking his journey in the dead of winter, he forbade unto his men the use of fire by night, because he would not have them desired a farre off. This commandment had bene well observed foure or five daies, when continuance of time (as commonly) breeding negligence, & the cold weather pinching them, they were bold to cherish themselves, being neer to their waies end. The light of these fires gave notice of their comings; which being reported to Peucestes, and other Captaines, they were so astonied with the sudden danger, that in all haste they betooke themselves to flight. But Eumenes, meeting with the newes, began to hearken his affrighted companions, promising to make Antigonus march leisurely, and willing them to abide, and draw up their men together. They could scarce beleve him; yet they were content to be ruled, and did as he appointed, who failed not in making his word good. He tooke with him some companies of the readiest men, wherewith he occupied certaine tops of mountaines, looking toward the Campe of Antigonus: there he chose a convenient ground to incampe upon, and made great store of fires in sundry places, as if the whole Armie had bene present. This was a sorrowfull spectacle to Antigonus, who thought himselfe prevented of his purpose; and began to feare lest he should be compelled to fight, whilest his men were tired with a long and painful journey. Therefore he resolved to turne aside, and take the way to such places, as might better serve to refresh his Army. This he did with great care and circumspection, at the first, as knowing how ready Eumenes would be upon all advantages. But after a while, considering that no enemy stirred about him, he began to pause, and think in himselfe, that somewhat or other was not fallen out according to his opinion. To be the better informed in the matter, he caused some inhabitants of that desert to be taken, and brought before him; of whom he learned, that they had seene no other Army than his thereabout, but only a few men that kept fires on the hill tops. It vexed him exceedingly to finde that he had bene so deluded. Therefore he went against these troups with great fury, meaning to take sharpe vengeance on them, for having so deceived him. But by this time, sufficient strength was arrived there, which could not be forced without much businesse, and long stay. All the Army was come, save only Eudamus, Captaine of the Elephants, who, besides those beasts, had no more than foure hundred horsemen in his company. Antigonus hearing of this supply coming to his enemies, sent above two thousand horse, and all his light-armed foot-men, to cut it off by the way. Eudamus being fallen into this danger, was faine to place his Elephants round about his carriages, & so to defend himselfe as well as he could; for his horsemen, overlaid with multitudes, were quickly broken, and driven to run away upon the spur. Neither knew they, who sat upon the Elephants, which way to turne them, for on all sides they received wounds, and were not able to requite them with the like. In this extremity there appeared brave troups of horse and foot, that came unexpected to the rescue; and charging the assailants upon the backe, drave them to seeke their owne safety by speedy flight. These were sent by Eumenes; who though he knew not what his adversary meant to do, yet he knew very well what was fittest for him to doe: and therefore, playing both games himselfe, provided the remedy.

§. V. The

§. V.

The conspiracie of Peucestes and others, against Eumenes his life.

BY these meanes Eumenes wonne great honour, and was by the whole Army acknowledged a most expert Generall, and well worthy of the chiefe command. But Peucestes, and the other Capitaines, guilty of their owne much insufficiency, were so transported with envie, that they could no longer containe their vile thoughts, but held communication, as upon a necessary point, how they might finde meanes to murder him.

Surely, it is great injustice to impute the mischief contrived against worthy men, to their own proud carriage, or some other ill deserving: For, though it often happen, that small vices do serve to counterpoise great vertues; (the sense of evill being more quick and lasting than of good) yet he shall bewray a very foolish malice, that, wanting other testimonie, will thinke it a part of wisdom, to finde good reason of the evils, done to vertuous men, which oftentimes have no other cause than vertue it selfe. Eumenes, among many excellent qualities, was noted to be of singular courtlesie, of a very sweet conversation among his friends, and careful by all gentle meanes to winne their love, that seemed to beare him any secret ill affection. It was his meere vertue that overthrew him, which even they that sought his life acknowledged. For they concluded that he should not be slaine, before the battaile were fought with Antigonus, wherein they confessed that it stood best with their safety, to be governed by his direction. Of this treason he was quickly advertised by Eudamus, to whom he had done many pleasures, and by some others of whom hee used to borrow money when hee needed not, to the end that they should be careful of his good, for feare of losing their owne. Considering therefore, and discoursing with himselfe of the villany intended against him, he made his last Will, and burnt all his Writings that contained any matter of secret: which done, he revolved many things in his minde; being doubtfull what course he were best to follow. All the Nobles of the Empires stood ill affected to the Royall blood, excepting those which were with him, that were more in number than in worth. How things at that time stood in Macedon and Greece, either he knew not, or, knowing the truth, knew nothing that might incourage him to seeke their helpe, that needed his. To make his owne peace with Antigonus, had bene against his faith to Olympias, and the Princes, that had committed this great power into his hands. For which cause also it may be thought, that he forbore either to lose the battaile willingly, or to flie into Cappadocia, and make shift for himselfe among his old friends. At length he resolved to do his best against the common enemy, and afterwards to looke to himselfe as well as he might.

§. VI.

The last battaile betwene Antigonus and Eumenes.

THE Souldiers, especially those old bands of the Silver-Shields, finding Eumenes perplexed, and not knowing the cause, entreated him not to doubt of the victory, but onely to bring them into the field, and set them in array; for the rest, they alone would take sufficient order. The like alacritie was generally found in the common Souldiers faces; but the chiefe Commanders were so mischievously bent against him, that they could not endure to thinke of being beholding to him for the victory. Yet he ordered the battaile so well, that, without their owne great fault, they could hardly faile of getting the upper hand.

Before the Armies came to joyning, a horse-man from the side of Eumenes, proclaimed with a loud voice unto the followers of Antigonus, That their wickednes in fighting against their own Fathers, would now be punished, as it well deserved. This was not spoken in vaine. For the Silver-Shields were men of threescore or seventy yeeres old, and strengthened more by continuall exercise than decayed by age, and excelling in courage, as having passed through greater dangers, than any like to be presented in that fight. Therefore Antigonus his men (who had often bene beaten by them, and were now to trie their last hope with these resolute warriors, the most Ancient and best regarded of all all Alexanders Souldiers) grew very penfive, and advanced heavily, suspecting their owne cause, and fearing that the threatnings uttered would prove true.

Antigonus was now againe farre the stronger in horse, which gave him cause of great hope; the ground, on which they were to fight, being a plaine levelled field. Placing therefore himselfe and his son Demetrius in the right wing, and committing the left wing to Pythos, he did set forward couragiously against the Enemies, that were ready to give him a sharp entertainment.

Eumenes tooke unto him Peucestes, with the rest of the Lords, and stood in the left wing of his battaile, in the face of Antigonus; meaning both to prevent the Traitors, his Companions, of all meanes to make head against him on the sudden; & (withall) to give 10 proofe of his owne valour, which perhaps he should no more doe, in the face of all his Enemies. In the right wing, opposite unto Pythos, he bestowed the weakest of his horse and Elephants, under one Philip, an honest man, and (which was enough at such a time) obedient: commanding him to protract the fight, and make a reasonable retrait, expecting the event of the other side.

So they joynd very fiercely; Antigonus, labouring to make himselfe master of all; Eumenes, to die an honourable death, or to win such a victory upon his open enemies, as might give him leisure and opportunity to deale with his false friends.

The footmen of Antigonus, being even in their owne opinions, far inferiour to those 10 whom they must encounter, were at the first brunt presently defeated by the Silver-Shields, who slew above five thousand of them, losing of their owne not one man. But in Horse, Eumenes was so over-matched, that he could not repell Antigonus, who pressed him very hard, but was faine to stand wholly upon defence. Yet his courage wrought so well by example, among his followers, that the Enemy could not win one foot of ground upon him, untill such time as Peucestes, with one thousand five hundred Horse, withdrew himselfe out of the battell, leaving his companions fighting to defend his backe.

Then did Eumenes desperately rush amongst his Enemies, labouring to break open the 10 way unto Antigonus himselfe. And though he failed of his purpose; yet with great slaughter he did so beat upon them which came in his way, that the victory hung a long time in suspence, uncertaine which way to incline.

The ground whereon they fought, being of a slight sandie mould, through the trampling of horses, men, and Elephants, did cast up such a cloud of dust, as hindred the prospect, so that no man could see what was done a little from him. Antigonus finding this advantage, dispatched away some companies of horse, that passed undiscovered beyond Eumenes his battailes, and came to his carriages, which lay about halfe a mile from the place of fight, slenderly guarded, (for that the whole body of the Army lay betweene them and danger) and therefore easily taken. Had Peucestes retired himselfe no further than unto the carriages, he might not onely have defended them, but peradventure have surprised those which came to surprize them, & so have done as good a piece of service as a better man. But he was gotten somewhat further, to a place, where out of danger he might expect the event: and Eumenes was so over-laboured both in body and minde, that he could not possibly give an eye to every place, being not well able to continue where he was.

It happened so, that the Elephants meeting together, those of Antigonus had the better hand; whereupon Eumenes, finding himselfe every way over-charged, beganne to give backe, and withdrew himselfe and his companies in good order, to the other side of the battaile, where Philip (as he was directed) had by fighting and retiring together, kept that wing from losse. The Antigonians had felt so much of Eumenes that day, that they were well content to let him depart quietly, and wished not to see him come againe; as faine he would have done.

The losse of the carriages was reported unto him, as soon as he had any leisure to heare how things went: whereupon he presently ordered his men for a fresh charge, and sent for Peucestes that was not far off, requesting him to bring in his men, & renew the fight, whereby he trusted, not only to recover their own goods, but to enrich themselves with the spoiles of the enemies. Peucestes not onely refused to joyne with him, but immediately withdrew himselfe into a safer place, where he might be further from such dangerous temptations.

By this the night grew on; and both Armies, wearied with fighting, were desirous to returne into their Camps. Yet Antigonus conceived hope of doing somewhat more, & therefore taking halfe his horsemen, he waited upon Eumenes a part of his way homewards, but found no opportunity to offend him: the other halfe he committed to Python, willing him to set upon the Silver-Shields in their retreat; which yet he forbore to doe, because it appeared too full of danger. So the battaile ended; wherein Antigonus had not so much the better in horse, as the worse in foot: but the spoile which he got, by surprizing his enemies carriages, made amends for all his other losses.

§. VII.

How Eumenes was betrayed to Antigonus, and slaine.

Eumenes, comming into his Campe, and finding the Silver-Shields extremely discontented with their misfortune, began to cheere them up, and put them in hope of recovering all with advantage. For their brave demeanour that day had so crushed the enemy, that he had no power left, wherewith to abide them in open field, and was much lesse able to draw their Carts after him, through that great wilde mess, over the high mountains.

But these persuasions availed nothing. Peucestes was gone; the other Captaines would needs returne into the high Countries; and the Souldiers had no desire either to flee or to fight, but onely to recover their goods. Wherefore Tentamus, one of the two Captaines of the Silver-Shields, (who had in former times readily consented unto traiterous motions, in hope of gaine, but was letted by his partner Antigeneis) finding, as he thought, a fit occasion of making himselfe great, & winning the love of those bands, dealt secretly with Antigonus, requesting him to restore unto those old Souldiers their goods, which hee had taken, being the onely reward of their services, in the warres of Philip and Alexander.

Antigonus, as a subtil man, knew very well, that they which requested more than they had reason to expect, would also with little entreatie, performe a great deale more than they promised; and therefore he lovingly entertained the messengers, filling them with hopes of farre greater matter than they desired, if they would put Eumenes into his hands, by whom they were seduced to make war against him. This answer pleased them so well; that they forthwith devised how to deliver him alive. Wherefore comming about him, as at other times, to doe their dutie, & pretending more joy of their victory, than sorrow of their losse, which they said they would redeeme by another fight, in the midst of this goodly talke, they leapt upon him, caught hold of his sword, and bound him fast. So they haled him away; & stopping their eares against all persuasions, would not yeeld so far, as to loosen one of his hands, and let him kill himselfe, but brought him alive (that was their own Generall, under whom they had obtained many victories) as it had beene in triumph, into the Campe of their enemies.

The presse of men, running out of the Campe to see him, was so great, that Antigonus was faine to send a guard of horse-men & Elephants, to keep him from being smothered; whom hee could not suddenly resolve, either to kill or save. Very few they were that sued for his life; but of these, Demetrius the son of Antigonus was one; the rest were desirous to be rid of him quickly; thinking belike, that if he were saved, he would soone be the chiefe in reputation, for his great ability. So after long deliberation, Antigonus concluded, that it was the safest way, to put him to death; which intending to have done by famine (perhaps because he would keepe it a while in his owne power, to reverse the sentence, as desiring, if it might be, to have him live his friend) haste of other businesse made him doe it by the sword.

To this end came all the travailes of that worthy Generall Eumenes; who had with great wisdom, fidelity, & patience laboured in vaine, to uphold the family which God had purposed to cast down. Hee is reckoned among the notable examples of Fortunes mutability, but more notable was his government of himselfe, in all her changes. Adversity never lessened his courage, nor prosperity his circumspection. But all his vertue, industrie, and wit, were cast away, in leading an Army, without full power, to keepe it in due obedience. Therefore it was not ill answered by Gaspar de Coligny, Admirall of France in our daies, to one that foretold his death, which ensued soon after in the massacre of Paris; That rather than to leade againe an Army of Voluntaries, he would die a thousand times.

Antigonus himselfe gave to the body of Eumenes honourable Funerall; and rewarded the Treason, wrought against him, with deserved vengeance. One chiefe Captaine of the Silver-Shields he burnt alive; many of the other Captaines he slew; and to the whole multitude of the Silver-Shields, that had betrayed so worthy a Commander, he appointed a Leader that should carry them into farre Countries, under pretence of wars; but with privie charge, to consume them all, as perjured wretches, letting none of them returne alive unto his friends and kindred, or so much as once behold the Seas that beate upon the shores of Greece and Macedon.

§. VIII.

How Antigonus slew Python, and occupied Media. How he removed Governours of Provinces, and made himselfe Lord of Persia, carrying away Peucestes.

The two Armies being joyned thus in one, were carried into Media, where they spent the rest of the Winter: the common Souldier idly; the principall men intently bent unto the businesse ensuing. Python began to consider his owne deservings; for that the whole warre had beene chiefly maintained by the strength and riches of his Province. Besides, he thought himselfe as good a man as Antigonus, unless it were in the Souldiers opinion, which he judged easie to be purchased with gifts, and therefore spared not to assay them with great liberality. But in following this course he was driven by necessity to trust many, of whom hee stumbled upon some, that were unsecreet, and others, bearing him no sincere affection. Thus was his purpose discovered to Antigonus, who (nothing like to Python) dissembled his indignation, and rebuked the informers, as breeders of dissention betweene him, and his honourable friend, unto whom he meant to commit the Government of all those Countries: his owne businesse calling him into the lower Asia. These reports, comming daily to his eares, did finely delude Python. By his greatnesse with Alexander; his authority in that Province where they lay, whereof he was Governour; & the love of the Souldiers which hee had bought with money; he was strong enough to maintaine, even an offensive war. But what need had he to use the sword, when he was likely without contention, to obtaine more than his owne asking? Therefore he came as soone as he was sent for, to take his farewell of Antigonus, and to divide the Provinces with him, that meant nothing lesse than to yeeld to any such division. As soone as he came, he was taken, and accused, condemned to die, and slaine out of hand. For Antigonus, having begun with Eumenes his ancient friend, was not afterward restrained by any consideration of old acquaintance, from cutting downe indifferently all that stood in his way: but swamme carelessly through the blood, wherein at the first he doubtfully waded.

When this businesse was ended, he appointed a new Governour in Media, to order the Province, and a Captaine, to suppress all commotions: thinking belike, that the power and authority, so divided, would hardly agree in one against him, from whom both were derived.

After this he marched into Persia, where he was entertained as absolute Lord of Asia. There began he to shew how well he understood his owne mightinesse. For hee placed and displaced at his owne pleasure, Governours in all Provinces, leaving none in Office, that were not his owne creatures, except such as lay too farre off to bee dislodged easily.

Peucestes, who ruled in Persia, thought with good cheere to redeeme old offences; but was deceived, having to doe with one that could not be taken with such baits: he was carried away, and feasted with goodly words of promise, that never after rooke effect. Thus he, that envied the vertue of his friend, was driven to flatter (in vaine) the fortune of his enemy, after which he led a most contemptible life, till he died obscurely a man forgotten.

How Seleucus was chased out of Babylon by Antigonus. The great riches of Antigonus.

Seleucus was the next in this visitation; one that had from time to time continued in the same tenor of good will to Antigonus, and now gave proofe of his hearty affection toward him, by making the Capitaine of the Castle of Susa to meete him on the way, rendring unto him that strong Peece, and all the treasures therein bestowed. This offer was so great, that Antigonus (though having in his hands the Keeper of the place) could hardly beleieve it; but used him with excessive kindnesse, for feare ¹⁰ of the place) could hardly beleieve it; but used him with excessive kindnesse, for feare of good a mood should change. In that Castle he found all the treasures of Alexander, with the Jewels of the Persian Kings, which, added to his former store of mony, made up 25. thousand talents. Having all this, he might well account himselfe a happy man, if riches were sufficient to happinesse. But large dominion was the marke at which he aimed; therefore he proceeded, with intent to leave no Country behinde his backe, that should not acknowledge him for Sovereigne Lord. Comming to Babylon, he was entertained by Seleucus with all possible demonstration of love, and honoured with presents becoming the Majestie of a King. All this he accepted with great gravitie, as being due to him; and began to require an account of the revenues of that Province. This demand Seleucus held unreasonable; saying, That it was not needfull for him to render unto any man ¹⁵ account of that Province, which was given unto him, in respect of his many good services to the State. But whether hee spake reason or no, it sufficed, that Antigonus was powerful; who urged him daily to come to a reckoning. Manifest it was, that neither want of money, nor any other necessity, moved Antigonus to presse him thus, but onely the desire to picke matter of quarrell against him, whereof it was likely that he should finde such issue, as Python and Peucestes had done. Therefore taking with him only fifty horse, he conveyed himselfe away, & fled into Ptolomies Dominions; desiring him to protect him from such a man as went about to oppress all, that in former times had bene his betters, or at least his equals. Antigonus was glad of his flight; for now all those Countries were yielded unto him without battaile, whereas to fight with Seleucus for them, he ²⁰ wanted all pretence; and to kill him it was not his desire, having received many benefits of him, and those not intermixed, as commonly it happens, with any injuries. Yet it is reported, that the Chaldaans brought a strange Prophecie to Antigonus, bidding him looke well to himselfe, and know, that if Seleucus did escape his hands, he should recover Babylon, yea, winne all Asia, & kill Antigonus in battaile. Easie beleivers may give credit to this tale. Had it bene true, me thinkes, Antigonus rather should have hanged those Chaldaans, for giving him no warning till it was too late, than sent pursuers (as they say that he did) after him, whom the destinies preserved for so great purposes. When he had setled things at Babylon, he tooke his journe into Cilicia, where he wintered. There he tooke up ten thousand talents more of the Kings treasures, & casting his accounts, found ²⁵ his yearly in-come to amount unto eleven thousand Talents.

CHAP. V.

Of the great Warre betweene ALEXANDERS Captaines: and how they assumed the name and state of Kings.

§. I.

The combination of Ptolomy, Cassander, and others against Antigonus. Their demands, and his answer.

His great riches, and the rest of his power, made Antigonus dreaded, envied, and suspected, whereby he quickly was embarked in a new Warre. Ptolomy, Cassander, and Lyfimachus, had privily combined themselves together, intending to hinder his further growth, and bring him to more reason than of his owne accord he seemed like to yeeld unto. Of their practices he had some notice; the ^{good} good entertainment given unto Seleucus, giving him sufficient cause of mistrust. Therefore he sent Embassadors to them severally, entreating them to continue firme in their love toward him, that would bee ready to requite them with the like. The cold answers which they made, occasioned his hasty preparation against the most forward of them, which was Ptolomy, it being likely that a good army should prevail more than a faire message. Therefore, as soone as the season of the yeare would permit, he tooke the way toward Syria, & was encountered by Embassage from them all. These told him, that their Lords did much rejoyce at his victory, obtained against Eumenes their common enemy, and the honour that he had thereby gotten. In which warre, forasmuch as they being his ¹⁰ Confederates, must have endured great losse, with hazzard of their whole Estates, if the contrary faction had prevailed; they held it very just, that all should be partakers in the fruits of that voyage, wherein they had bene all adventurers. Wherefore they desired him, that making betweene them all an equall division of the treasures that were in his hands, (a thing easie to be done) he would also take some convenient order for enlarging their Dominions, according to the rate of his new purchases. This might best be to every ones liking, if he would make over Cappadocia, with Lycia, to Cassander; and Phrygia, bordering upon the Hellespont, to Lyfimachus: for whereas his own Dominions were so much extended Eastward by his late victory, he might well spare some of those Western Provinces, to those that were seated in the West. As for Ptolomy, he would not crave ¹⁵ any new addition, but rest contented within his own Territories. Provided alwaies, that Seleucus their common friend, and partner in the late warre, might be restored to his owne, out of which he had bene driven so injuriously, that all of them were forced to take it deeply to heart; requiring amends, with his friendly consent unto their demands, which otherwise they must labour to obtaine with armed hands.

Antigonus knew, that after many losses received, hee should yet be able to redeeme peace whensoever he listed, with these, or perhaps with easier conditions. Neither was hee so weak, to give away quietly any part of his strength into the hands of such bad friends, for feare only, lest it should be taken from him perforce. Rather he hoped that he should be able to finde them worke, more than enough to defend their owne. Therefore he roundly answered the Embassadors, that it was no part of his meaning to communicate with other men the profit of that victory, which he alone without other mens ²⁰ helpe had obtained. Though indeed they had already sufficiently gained by him, if they could see it, having by his meanes kept their governments, whereof they were like to be dispossessed by Polyperchon; and the councill of estate in Macedonia. But what marvell was it, if they considered not how he had saved them, seeing one of them had forgotten the time, when comming to him as a fugitive, and begging succour, he was by his meere bounty relieved; and enabled to get all that he now held? Cassander did not (said he) in those dayes command me to surrender Provinces, and give him his equall share of my treasures; but (for his Fathers sake) desired me to pity him, and helpe him against his enemies: which I did; by lending him an Army, and Fleet, on confidence whereof hee ²⁵ now presumes to threaten me. As for Seleucus, how can he complaine of wrong; that durst not stay to plead his right? I did use him well; but his conscience told him that he had deserved ill: if he would not have fled. Let them that so curiously search into my doings, consider well their owne, which some of them can hardly justifie. I am now in the way to Syria, meaning to examine Ptolomies proceedings, and utter him to deale with others, if they continue to provoke me.

§. II.

The preparation and beginnings of the warres.

When the Embassadors were dismissed with this answer, nothing was thought upon but Warre. Antigonus perceiving that he should be invaded from Europe, as soone as he was entered into Syria; left his Nephew Ptolomy to guard the Sea-coast, and hinder Cassander from landing in Asia: giving him also charge, to drive out of Cappadocia some that were already sent over to molest him. Likewise he dispatched Messengers into Greece and Cyprus, not unfurnished of money; to draw friends to his side, and raise up troubles to his enemies. Especially, he laboured to make himself the strongest by Sea; to which purpose he rather hastened, than foreflowed his journey into Syria, that he might get possession of Mount Libanus, which afforded many excellent commodities for building of a Navie. Therefore, having erected Beacons, & laid post-horses throughout all Asia, to give swift advertisement of all occurrences, he invaded Syria, that was not held against him by any power sufficient to maintain the field.

Ptolomy lay in Egypt, the strength and heart of his Dominion, where he was beloved and honoured of the people as their naturall Lord: his other Provinces he kept with a few Garrisons, better serving to containe the people within obedience, than to confront a forraigne enemy. So Antigonus tooke many Cities and Places of that Country, and began to set great numbers of Artificers on worke in making ships, which was one of his most earnest cares. In these businesses he consumed a yeare and three moneths; not idly. For hee tooke Joppa, and Gaza, which were yielded unto his discretion, and well used. The strong city of Tyrrus held out long, but was compelled in the end by famine, to render it selfe upon composition, that Ptolomies Souldiers might depart with their Armes, which was permitted.

Ptolomy was not asleep, whilest these things were in doing, though he kept himselfe within the bounds of Egypt, as indeed it behooved him to doe. His forces were not able to stand against Antigonus in plaine field, but likely they were to increase, which made him willing to protract the time. Nevertheless by Sea (where his enemy was as yet unready) he sent his Fleet into all quarters, whereof Seleucus had the chiefe command.

Seleucus passed with an hundred saile along the coast of Syria, in the full view of Antigonus, and his Army, to their no little discomfort. He landed in Cyprus, which was then governed by many petty Lords; of whom the greatest adhered to Ptolomy, the rest were by the Factors of Antigonus, bought for him with gold, but now redeemed by the Egyptian with sharp Steele.

The same commodity of aide by Sea encouraged the President of Caria (called also Cassander, but not the son of Antipater, howsoever by the paintull and learned writer Reimerus Reineccius, he is, by some oversight, counted for the same) to declare for Ptolomy and his Confederates, and busily imploy in their quarrell all his forces, which hee had hitherto kept in good neutrality, and thereby enjoyed rest; but now he threw himselfe into dangerous war, choosing rather to undergoe trouble at hand, than to fall under certaine ruine, though somewhat further distant, which would have overwhelmed him, if Antigonus had beaten all the rest.

§. III.

How each party sought to winne the assistance of Greece. Antigonus his declaration against Cassander. Alexander the sonne of Polysperchon revolteth from Antigonus who had set him up.

IN the meane season all care possible was taken on both sides, to assure unto them the people of Greece, whose aide, which way soever it inclined, was of great importance. Herein at the first, Antigonus sped so well by large effusion of his treasure, that he drew to him the Lacedaemonians, and other Peloponnesians, of whom he waged eight thousand, and caused Polysperchon (who had a good while made hard shifts) to rowle himselfe againe, and taking upon him the title of Captain of Peloponnesus, to make head against Cassander.

These hopefull beginnings encouraged him to proceed further in the same kinde. Wherefore to make Cassander the more odious, he called together both his owne Souldiers, and all the Greeks & Macedonians that were to be found thereabouts. To these he declared, that Cassander had very cruelly slain Olympias, mother to the great Alexander, and not herewith contented, had shut up in close prison the poore Lady Roxane, Alexanders wife, and his sonne begotten on her body. That all this proceeded from a desire to make himselfe King over the Macedonians, which well appeared by his crowning the Lady Thessalonica, Daughter to King Philip, a match unfit for a man of no greater partage than he, to joyne with him in marriage. That in meer despight of those dead Princes, Philip and Alexander, he had planted the Olynthians, rooted out by Philip in a new City by him built, and called by his own name Cassandria; and had re-edified the City of Thebes, which for the great treason of the inhabitants, was levelled with the ground by by the victorious hand of Alexander. For these reasons he required them to make a decree, that Cassander should restore to absolute liberty the Lady Roxane, and her son; & should yeeld obedience to the Lord Lieutenant Generall of the Empire, (by which name Antigonus himselfe was understood) or else should be reputed a Traitor, and open Enemy to the State. Furthermore he propounded, that all the Cities of Greece should bee restored into freedome: this hee did, not because he was carefull of their good, but for the need which he had of their assistance.

These things being decreed, Antigonus was perswaded, that not onely the Greekes would adhere unto him, as to their loving Patron, and fall off from Cassander; but that the rulers of Provinces, who had hitherto suspected him as a man regardfull of nothing but his owne benefit, would correct their opinion, and think him the most faithfull of all others to the Royall blood. But concerning his loyalty to the young Prince, the world was too wise to be deceived with vaine shewes. His undertaking for the liberty of the Greekes was more effectuell, and got easie believe, in regard of his present hatred to Cassander. Yet herein also Ptolomy strove to bee as earnest as he, making the like decree, in hope to win to himselfe that valiant Nation, which afforded men farre more serviceable in war, than were to bee found in any Province of the Empire.

And this indeed was the point at which both sides aimed. Wherein Antigonus thinking to make all sure, deceived himselfe, not without great cost. For he gave to Alexander the son of Polysperchon five hundred talents, willing him to set the war on foot in Peloponnesus, whereby it might appeare, that on his side was meant nothing else, than what was openly pretended.

In Peloponnesus, Cassanders men had with much blood-shed, grievously afflicted the contrary faction, and he himselfe perceiving, that they were more easily spoiled as enemies, than retained as friends, thought it the best way to make what use he could of them; that were not long like to continue his. Finally, perceiving that Alexander came furnished with plenty of gold, wherewith hee was able, not onely to win the doubtful, but to corrupt such as might seeme best assured: he thought it a part of wisdom, to surrender upon faire conditions, that which he could not assure himselfe to hold any long time by force. Therefore he sent one to deale with Alexander about the matters in controversy, telling him, that Antigonus was very skilfull in setting men together by the eares, not caring who prevailed, but only desiring to have them weary themselves, whilest hee was busied elsewhere; that so at length he might find opportunity to set upon the stronger. If therefore Alexander were so wise, as to keep in his purse the five hundred talents which he had, and without stroke stricken, to receive the whole Lordship of Peloponnesus, it should be freely put into his hands by Cassander. Provided, that he should from thenceforth renounce all confederacy made with Antigonus, and enter into a sure and faithfull league with Ptolomy, Cassander, and the rest of the Confederates. Otherwise he might well perswade himselfe, that the Country which his Father could not keepe, when hee was indeed the Lieutenant of the Empire, should not in haste bee won by him, that was onely the Factor of a proud injurious man, so stiling himselfe, but not acknowledged by others.

Alexander had lived a while with Antigonus since the beginning of these wars; among whose followers it was not hard to discover the intent, (which he did not carry very secret) of making himselfe absolute Lord of all. Therefore he was soone entreated to accept of good an offer; and did not sticke to enter into that league, wherby he was to become a free Lord, and subject unto no mans controll.

Howbeit, this his honour continued not long, ere he lost both it and his life together; by treason of the Sicyonians; who thinking thereby to have made themselves free, were soone after vanquished in battaile by Cratesipolus, Alexanders wife a discreet and valiant Lady. Shee in revenge of her husbands death, crucified thirty of the Citizens taken in fight; and having by severity taught them obedience, did afterwards continue her Army in good order, and governed those places that shee held, with the commendation of her Subjects and Neighbourts.

§. IIII.

The *Ætoli*ans rise against Cassander in favour of Antigonus, and are beaten. A fleet and land-army of Antigonus utterly defeated by Ptolomies Lieutenant. In what termes the warre stood at this time. Antigonus draws neerer to Greece.

A*ntigonus*, when he found, that with so much money he had only bought an enemy, began to raise troubles to Cassander and his other adversaries in Greece, by stirring up the *Ætoli*ans against them: Likewise he laboured to winne to his party the Islands in the Greek Seas, by whose assistance he might be the better able to deale with Ptolomy, that greatly prevailed by reason of his strong Fleet. But neither of these attempts had the successe which he expected. The *Ætoli*ans, a factious Nation, & alwaies envying the greatnesse of their Neighbours, were often in commotion, but so, that commonly their gaines equalled not their losses. Cassander wan some of their owne Countrey, fortified the Acamanians against them, & compelled Glancias, King of the Illyrians, whom he vanquished in battaile, to forsake their side, and binde himselfe to beare no Armes against Cassanders friends.

On the other side, as many petty Islands were drawne to joyne with Antigonus: so the Fleet of the *Rhodi*ans under Theodatus, who was Admirall to Antigonus, passing along the coast of Asia towards Cyprus, with an Army under conduct of Pterilaus marching on the shore for mutuall assistance, was quite overthrowne by Ptolomies Navie. Polyctus, who in Ptolomies behalfe had been sent into Peloponnesus against Alexander, finding no need of his service in that Countrey, because Alexander was come over to their side, returned homewards, and by the way heard of the course which these Antigonians held, whom he very cunningly surpris'd. He rode with his Fleet behind a Cape, which the enemies were to double; his Land-forces he placed in ambush, wherinto Pterilaus falling was taken prisoner, with many of his men, & many were slaine, making little resistance. Theodatus the Admirall perceiving this, made all haste to helpe his fellowes that were on Land; but whilest he with all his Fleet were intentive onely to that business, Polyctus appeared at their backs; who as soon as he perceived their disorder, hastened about the Cape, and charging them behind, suffered not one of them to escape him. These ill tidings caused Antigonus to deale with Ptolomy about some composition. First, he sent Embassadors; afterwards they met in person. But Antigonus would not yeeld unto the demands of Ptolomy: so the parley was vaine.

Hitherto each part seemed to have indifferently sped in the warre, & thereby to have equall cause of hope and feare. This late victory, with the good successe of his affaires in Cyprus, did seeme to make amends to Ptolomy for his losses in Syria. Likewise the revolt of Alexander from Antigonus did equal the confederacy made between the *Ætoli*ans & him; as also those petty skirmishes, that had been in Asia the lesse, to Antigonus his advantage, were sufficiently recompensed by others of like regard, but adverse to him, and by the troubles brought upon his estates in those parts by the two Cassanders.

Contrariwise, Antigonus valued the losse of his men, money, and ships, no otherwise than as the paring of his nailes, that were left long enough, and would easily grow againe, but the enlargement of his Territory by addition of Syria, he prized at a higher rate; as if thereby he had fed upon a limbe of Ptolomy his enemy, and strengthened the body of his owne Empire. Concerning other accidents, whereof the good were hitherto sufficient to counterpoize the bad, hee meant to proceed as occasion should direct, which commonly is not long wanting to them, that want no money.

That which most molested him, was the attempts of his enemies upon Asia the lesse, wherein though as yet they had gotten little, yet had he cause to feare, lest the people, being tried unto him by no bond of allegiance, might upon small occasion revolt from him, to men of as honourable reputation as he himselfe. To prevent this, and to be neerer to Greece, he held it expedient for him to be there in person, where his affaires did seeme to prosper the worse, by reason of his absence. Therefore he left part of his Army in Syria under his son Demetrius, to whom, being then but two & twenty years old, he appointed many ancient Captaines as assistants, or rather as Directors: the rest he carried with him into Phrygia, where he meant to winter.

§. V. How

§. V.

How Lyfimachus and Cassander vanquished some enemies, raised against them by Antigonus. The good successe of Antigonus in Asia and Greece: with the rebellion of many Cities against Cassander.

THe coming of Antigonus into those parts, wrought a great alteration in the proesse of his business thereabouts. For his enemies had short leisure to thinke upon molesting him in Asia: they themselves were held over-hardly to their owne worke on Europe side. Senthes a King of the Thracians, joyning with some to Townes that rebelled against Lyfimachus, brought also the bordering Scythians into the quarrell. All these relied upon Antigonus, who was to help them with money and other aide. The *Ætoli*ans likewise tooke courage, and rose against Cassander, having Acacides, lately restored to the Kingdome of Epirus, their assistant. But Lyfimachus gave unto his Rebels no time to confirme themselves. Hee suddainly presented himselfe before two of the Cities that had rebelled, and compelled them by feare to returne unto their former duty. Hee fought a battaile with the Scythians, and wilde Thracians, and drave them out of the Countrey. Finally, hee overcame Senthes, and following the heat of his victory, slew Pausanias in battaile, whom Antigonus had sent over with an Army; and all his men hee did either put to ransom, or fill up with them his owne Bands. The like successe had Philip, Cassanders Lieutenant, against the *Ætoli*ans. For hee wasted their Countrey; fought with the Epirotes, that came to helpe them: and after the victory, fought againe with their forces joyned in one, overthrowing them, & killing Acacides that unfortunate King. Finally, he drave the *Ætoli*ans out of most of their Countrey, and forced them to seeke their safety among the wilde Mountaines. Of the Epirotes he sent as prisoners to Cassander, the principall authors of the Kings restitution, and of the present War.

Yet these actions required some time, and wearied Antigonus his adversaries with painfull travaile; after which they remained onely favers. Antigonus himselfe at faire leisure wan all Caria the whilest, and sent Armies into Peloponnesus, and other parts of Greece, bestowing liberty upon all the Cities hee tooke out of Cassanders hands. The whole Countrey of Peloponnesus (excepting Sicyon and Corinth) with the Isle of Euboea, and many places of the firme Land, were by those means won to bee his in true and vehement affection, ready to doe or suffer any thing for him that had made so evident a demonstration of his readinesse, to give them the liberty in deed, which others had promised in idle words. Many States desirous of the same benefit, would faine have shewed their good will; but they were kept in by Cassanders Garrisons, who was too wise to trust them loose. Therefore Antigonus made shew as if hee would passe over into Macedonia: by which terrour he forced Cassander to repaire thither in all haste, with the best of his strength, leaving many good Towns of Greece so weakly guarded, that well they might take courage to help themselves, if any forraine succour appeared. The aide which they desired was not long wanting. The Lieutenant of Antigonus, taking the advantage of Cassanders departure, entred the Countrey; drave his Garrisons out of divers Cities; forced the Governour of Athens to enter into league with their Lord; wanne the Cittie of Thebes; and set the people at liberty. This last action was somewhat remarkable. For Thebes had not long before bin raised out of her old ruines by the meere power of Cassander; of which act he was accused by Antigonus, as if it had beene some heinous crime. Yet now the same Antigonus winneth the City, and the love of the Inhabitants, onely by expelling him that was their Founder. So much are men readier to thanke the Increaser, than the Author of their good; and rather to looke forward upon those hopes, which vainly they extend beyond all measure, than backward upon their miserable nullity, that held them incapable of being any thing.

§. VI. P.

§. VI.

Victories of Ptolomy by Sea. A great battaile at Gaza, which Ptolomy and Seleucus won, against Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus.

AS the presence or nearnesse of Antigonus gave life to his affaires in the lower Asia and Greece; so the designs of his enemies, taking advantage of his absence, ruined the very foundations of those great workes in the Easterne parts, where with in the yeare preceding he had over-topped them. The Isle of Cyprus, whose Princes wavered between contrary affections, inclining one while to Antigonus, another while faintly regarding their covenant with Ptolomy, was visited by an Egyptian Fleet, wherewith Ptolomy, in his owne person easily reduced them to a more settled order, putting some to death, carrying others away prisoners, & leaving a Lieutenant of his owne appointment, Governour of the whole Country. With the same Fleet he ran along the Sea-coasts, wasting a great part of Caria & Cilicia, with the spoiles of which he enriched his followers, and returned laden to Cyprus. Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus, hearing frequent reports of the miseries, wherewith his Fathers subjects were oppressed, made all haste out of Syria to the rescue, taking only his Horse and light-armed Foote with him, because the businesse required expedition. But in vaine did hee tie himselfe and his followers, in hasty seeking of one, that by lanching out into the deep, could in a few minutes delude the labour of so many dayes, if need had so required. Answerable to the vanity of this expedition was the successe. For Ptolomy was gone, before Demetrius came into Cilicia. Neither was it certain, whether having lightened his ships of their burthen in Cyprus, hee would return upon those maritime Countries, or make towards Syria, where his coming was expected. He was indeed gone into Egypt, and there with Seleucus was describing a Royall Army, which he levied with all convenient speed, for the recovery of Syria. This was more than Demetrius knew. Therefore he was faine to choose out of uncertainties the most likelihood, and returne the way that he came, with all his companies, which were fitter for service in the open field, than to be bestowed in Garrisons among the Cilicians. He had scarce refreshed his men and Horses in Syria, when the newes arrived of Ptolomies coming with a puissant Army, to give him battle. Hereupon hee called to counsaile his principall friends, who advised him to give way to the time, and expect some better opportunity in the future: being a young man, and weakly furnished with means to resist such ancient and famous Generalls, as Ptolomy & Seleucus. This counsaile seemed rather to proceed from the cold temper of those aged men that gave it, than from any necessity growing out of the present businesse. For Demetrius considering himselfe to be the son of Antigonus, and now Generall of his Fathers Army, thought his own title weightie enough to belaid in ballance against the bare names of those two great Commanders. Neither found hee much reason that should move him to distrust his forces, as insufficient. His men were better exercised than the enemies, & promised as much as could be required. Therefore perswading himselfe, that such odds of number, and of great fame, would rather serve to adorne his victory, than hinder him in obtaining it, he resolved to put the matter to triall, without expecting the advantage of more helpe. So animating his Souldiers with hope of spoile and rewards, he abode the coming of the Enemies at Gaza, with purpose to encounter them, as soone as they had finished their wearisome journey over the Desarts of Arabia.

Ptolomy and Seleucus issuing out of so rich a Province as Egypt, came so well provided of all necessaries, that their Army felt not any great grievance of the evill way, when battaile was presented them, which confidently they undertooke. In all things else they had the odds of Demetrius; of Elephants they were utterly unprovided. But how to deale with those beasts they were not ignorant. They had prepared a kinde of Palisado, fastened strongly together with chaines, and sharpened in such a manner, that the Elephants could not seeke to breake upon it, without receiving much hurt. The rest of their forces (which besides that they had advantage in multitude) were heartened with many fortunate services, by them performed that yeere, whilest the enemies had wearied themselves, either with vaine journeys, or long and dulling expectation, they disposed in such order, as best answered to the forme, wherein Demetrius was embattailed. The fight began, and was maintained with equall courage, for a long time, each part Arriving more to win honour, than to satisfie any other passion, as having little cause of hatred, or revenge. But after some continuance, the greater number holding better out, the error of Demetrius, who upon no necessity would needes fight a battaile with disadvantage, began to appeare by his losses. He had committed himselfe to Fortune, having more to lose by her than he could get: but in this fight shee was idle, and left all to be decided by strong hands; unlesse it may be said, that the terror brought upon his men, by the losse of his Elephants, was bad lucke. Those beasts were in that kinde of warre hardly to be resisted on plaine ground; and therefore at the first they made great spoile amongst Ptolomies men. Afterward seeking to breake through the Palisado, they were sorely hurt, and every one of them taken. This disaster caused the Horse-men of Demetrius to faint. They had laboured hard, & prevailed little, till now perceiving that all must lye upon their hands, who were ill able to make their owne places good, they began to shrink, and many of them to provide for their safety by timely flight, which example the rest quickly followed. When Demetrius had stroven so long in vaine to make his men abide, that he himselfe was likely to be lost; he was faine to give place to the stronger, making a violent retreat as far as to Azorus, which was about thirty miles from the place of battaile. A great part of his carriages was in Gaza, whither some of his company turned aside, hoping to save such goods, as in haste they could pack up. This foolish covetousnesse was their destruction, and the losse of the Towne. For whilest they, forgetfull of the danger, had filled the streets with sumpter-Horses, and cloyed up the gates, thronging, some to get in and fetch; others, to carry out what they had already laden, Ptolomies Army brake in without resistance, taking them with their goods and the City altogether.

Arriving

This victory restored unto Ptolomy the best part of Syria, a Province more easie in those times to get than to keepe, and opened the way unto all the greatnesse of Seleucus. For between Gaza & Phœnicia no place offered resistance. In Coelosyria & Phœnicia, some Townes held out a while, but were soon taken in by Ptolomy. Among these were the great Cities of Tyrus and Sidon; of which Sidon was given up by the inhabitants: Tyrus by the Garrison, falling to mutiny against their Captaine, who trusting to the strength of it, had made great vaunts, but was pardoned by Ptolomy, and honourably entertained in respect of his fidelity.

§. VII.

How Seleucus recovered Babylon, and made himselfe Lord of many Countries in the highest Asia. The Era of the Kingdom of the Greekes, which began with the Dominion of Seleucus.

WHILE Ptolomy followed this businesse with such prosperity, Seleucus tooke leave of him, and went up to Babylon, to try his owne fortune; which he found so favourable, that recovering first his owne Province, he became at length master of the better part of Alexanders purchases.

This expedition of Seleucus was very strange, and full of unlikelihoods. His train consisted of no more than eight hundred foot, and two hundred horse, a number too small to have been placed as Garrison, in some one of those maine great Cities, against which he carried it into the higher Asia. But little force is needfull, to make way into strong places, for him that already stands possessed of their hearts which dwell within the walls. The name of Seleucus was enough; whom the Babylonians had found so good a Governour, that none of them would finde courage to resist him; but lest that worke to Antigonus his owne men, wishing them ill to speed. Some of the Macedonians that were in those Countries, had the like affection; others made a countenance of warre, which by casie compulsion they left off, and followed new Ensignes. This added courage to the people, who came in apace, and submitted themselves joyfully to Seleucus. In a desertion so generall, it was not a safe course for the Antigoniens, to thrust themselves into the Townes of most importance: for every man of them should have beene troubled with daily enemies in his owne lodging. It remained that they should issue forth into the field, and try the matter by fight. But the treason of one principall man, who revolted to the enemy, with more than a thousand Souldiers following him, so dismayed the rest, that that they did no more than seeke to make good one strong place, wherein were kept the Hostages and Prisoners, that Antigonus held for his security in those quarters. This Castle, belike, they had not fortified in times of leisure, against dangers, that were not then apparent. Seleucus quickly took it; and so got the entire possession of Mesopotamia and Babylon.

Antigonus had bestowed in Media and Persia, forces convenient for defence of those Provinces, that were the utmost of his Dominion. In the Countries about Euphrates he had not done the like: for his owne great Army lay between them & all enemies. Therefore when the victory at Gaza had opened unto Seleucus the way into those parts; hee found little impediment in the rest of his businesse. Having now gotten what he sought, it behooved him to seeke how hee might keepe his gettings: for his owne forces were too small, and his friends were ill able to lend him any more. That which his friends could not doe for him, his enemies did. Nicanor, to whom Antigonus had committed his Army in Media, joining unto himselfe, out of Persia and other Countries, all needfull helpe, came, with ten thousand Foot, and seven thousand Horse, either to save all from being lost, or to drive Seleucus out of that which he had won.

Against this power, Seleucus had onely four hundred Horse, and somewhat above three thousand Foote, wherewith to oppose himselfe: his large Conquest of unwarlike Nations having yielded him many loving Subjects, but few Souldiers. Therefore when his enemies were neere to the River of Tigris, he withdrew himself from the place where his resistance was expected, into certaine marshes not farre off; where he lay secretly waiting for some advantage. Nicanor thought that he had been fled, and was the lesse carefull in fortifying his Campe. In recompence of this vaine security, his Campe was taken by surprize, the first night of his arrivall; the Satrapa, or Lievtenant of Persia, together with sundry of the Captaines, were slaine; hee himselfe was driven to flee for his life into the deserts, and the whole Army yielded unto Seleucus: whose gentle demeanour, after the victory, drew all Media, Sufiana, and the Neighbour Provinces, to acknowledge him their Lord without any further stroke stricken.

This victory of Seleucus gave beginning unto the new stile, of The Kingdome of the Greekes, an accompt much used by the Jewes, Chaldeans, Syrians, and other Nations in those parts. I will not make any long disputation about the first yeere of this Æra. The authority of that great Astrologer Ptolomy, from which there is no appeale, makes it plaine, that the five hundred and nineteenth yeare of Nabonassar, was the fourscore and two yeere of this accompt. Other inference hereupon is needlesse, than that note of the learned Gauricus, That the first of these yeers was reckoned compleat, at Babylon, together with the end of four hundred thirty and eight yeers after Nabonassar. With the observation of the Saturne, recorded by Ptolomy, agrees (as it ought) the calculation of Bunnings finding the same Planet to have beene so placed in the signe of Virgo, as the Chaldeans had observed it, in the same yeere; which was from Nabonassar the five hundred and nineteenth; from Seleucus the fourscore and two yeer; & the last of the hundred thirty and seventh Olympiad. These observations of the celestiaall bodies, are the surest marks of time: from which he that wilfully varies, is inexcusable. As for such occurrences in History, and the yeeres of succeeding Princes (that are not seldome ambiguous, by reason of unremembred fractions) if they seeme to be here-against, it is not greatly materiall. Yet thus much is worthy of note; that these yeeres of the Greekes were not reckoned in all Countries from one beginning; as plainly appears in the difference of one yeer, that is found between actions, related by the severall Authors of the two Books of the Maccabees, who follow divers accompts. He that shall adhere to the time defined by Ptolomy, may apply the other supputations thereunto, as being no farther from it, than a yeers distance.

§. VIII. How

§. VIII.

How Ptolomy lost all he wonne in Syria. What the causes were of the quiet obedience, performed unto the Macedonians, by those that had beene subject unto the Persian Empire. Of divers petty enterprizes, taken in hand by Antigonus and Demetrius, with ill success.

IN a happy houre did Seleucus adventure to goe up to Babylon, with so few men as his friend could then well spare: for had he staied longer upon hope of getting more Souldiers, Ptolomy could have spared him none at all. Demetrius the son of Antigonus, having lost the battaile at Gaza, received from Ptolomy all his owne goods, his Pages, and Servants, in free gift, and therewithall a courteous message, to his effect: That no personall hatred was the ground of this Warre, which he and his Confederates held with Antigonus; but only termes of honour, wherein they would seeke to right themselves after such manner, that other friendly Offices, without reference to the quarrell, should not be forgotten.

This Noble dealing of Ptolomy, did kindle in Demetrius an earnest desire of requiring him, with some as brave liberality. Which to effect, he gathered together the remainder of his broken troups; drew as many as could be spared, out of the Garrisons in Cilicia, or other Provinces thereabouts, and advertising his Father of his misfortune, besought him to send a new supply, wherewith he might redeeme his honour lost. Antigonus upon the first newes of this overthrow, had said, That the victory which Ptolomy won upon a beardless Boy, should be taken from him by bearded men: yet upon desire that his son, whom he tenderly loved, should amend his owne reputation, he was content to make a stand in Phrygia. Ptolomy hearing of Demetrius his preparations, did nevertheless follow his own businesse in Cœlolyria; thinking it enough to spend part of his Army under Cilles his Lievtenant, against the remnant of those, that had been already vanquished, when Cilles too much undervalued the power of such an Enemy. Hee thought that this young Gallant, having lately saved his life by flight, would now be more carefull of having a faire way at his backe, than adventurous in setting further forward, than urgent reason should provoke him. In this confidence he passed on without all feare; as one that were already Master of the field, and should meet with none, that would issue out of their places of strength, to make resistance. When Demetrius was informed of this careless march; he took the lightest of his Army, and made his journey with such diligence, one whole night, that early in the morning, he came upon Cilles unexpected, and was on the suddaine, without any battaile, Master of his Campe: taking him alive, with his Souldiers, and their carriages all at once.

This exploit served not only to repaire the credit of Demetrius, which his losse at Gaza had almost ruined: but further it enabled him, to recompence the bounty of Ptolomy, with equall favour, in restoring to him Cilles, with many other of his friends, accompanied with rich presents. But neither was Ptolomy so weakened by this losse, nor Demetrius so emboldened by his victory, that any matter of consequence thereupon ensued. For Demetrius feared the coming of Ptolomy; & therefore he fortified himselfe in places of advantage: Ptolomy on the other side was loth to engage himselfe in an enterprize, wherein he might perceive, that if the coming of Antigonus found him entangled, hee should either be driven to make a shamefull retreat, or a dangerous adventure of his whole estate, in hope of not much more than already he possessed.

Antigonus, indeede, was nothing slow in his way towards Syria; whither hee made so all haste, not so much to relieve his sonne, as to embrace him. For he rejoyced exceedingly, that the young man had so well acquitted himselfe, and being left to his owne advice, performed the office of a good Commander. Wherefore to increase the reputation of this late victory, he brought such forces, as might serve to re-conquer all Syria: meaning, that the honour of all should be referred unto the good foundation, laid by his son; whom from this time forwards, he imployed in matters of greatest importance.

Ptolomy had now lesse reason to encounter with Antigonus, than before his coming to have assailed the Campe of Demetrius. Yet he made it a matter of consultation; as if he

he had dared more than he meant. But all his Captaines advised him to retire into Egypt, alledging many good arguments to that purpose: which they might well perceive to be agreeable to his own intent, by his propounding that course; not without remembrance of the good successe against Perdiccas, in the like defensive warre. So he departed out of Syria, preserving his honour; as being rather led by mature deliberation, than any sudden passion of fear: and he departed at faire leisure, not only carrying his treasures along with him, but staying to dismante some principall Cities, that he thought most likely to trouble him in the future. All the Country that he left at his backe, fell presently to Antigonus, without putting him to the trouble of winning it by pieces: so easie was it in those times, for the Captain of a strong Army, to make himselfe Lord of a great Province.

We may justly wonder, that these Kingdomes of Syria, Media, Babylon, and many other Nations, (which the victory of Alexander had over-run, with so hasty a course, as gave him not leisure to take any good view of them) were so easily held not onely by himselfe, but by the Captaines of his Army after him. The hot contentions for superiority betweene the King of Israel, and those of Damascus; betweene Egypt, and Babylon; Babylon and Nineve; the Persians and many Countries; argue a more manly temper, to have once bene in those people; which are now so patient of a forraigne yoke, that like Sheepe or Oxen, they suffer themselves to be distributed, fought for, won, lost, and againe recovered by contentious Masters; as if they had no title to their owne heads, but were borne to follow the fortune of the Macedonians. This will appear the more strange, if we shall consider, how the severall States of Greece (many of which had never possessed so large Dominion, as might cause their spirits to swell beyond their ability) did greedily embrace all occasions of liberty: and how these proud Conquerours were glad to offer it, desiring to have them rather friends than servants, for feare of further inconvenience.

It must therefore bee noted, that most of these Countries had always bene subject unto the rule of Kings, or petty Lords, whom the Babylonians and Persians long since had rooted out, and held them in such bondage, that few of them knew any other Law, than the command of forraigne Masters. This had utterly taken from them all remembrance of home-borne Princes, & incorporated them into the great body of the Persian Empire: so that wanting within themselves all soveraigne power, or high authority, the life and spirit of every Estate; they lay as dead, and were bereaved of motion, when that Kingdom fell, whereof they lately had bene members.

Why the Persian Satrapa, or Princes of that Empire, did not when Darius was taken from them, as the Macedonian Captains, after the death of Alexander, strive to lay hold upon those Provinces, which had many ages bin subject unto them, & scarce foure years in quiet possession of their enemies; or why at least they contended not (when the terrible name of that great Conquerour did cease to affright them) to get their shares among his followers, if not wholly to dispossesse them of their new purchases: it is a question, wherein, who is not satisfied, may finde no lesse reason to suspect the History, than authority to confirme it. For wee seldome reade, that any small Kingdom, prevailing against a farre greater, hath made so entire a conquest, in the compass of ten yeares, as left unto the vanquished no hope of recovery, nor means to rebell; especially when such disorders, or rather utter confusion hath ensued, by the fury of civill warre among the Victors.

The cause why the Macedonians held so quietly the Persian Empire, is well set down by Machiavelli, and concerns all other Kingdomes, that are subject unto the like forme of Government: the summe whereof is this; Wheresoever the Prince doth hold all his Subjects under the condition of slaves, there is the conquest easie, and soone assured: Where ancient Nobility is had in due regard, there is it hard to winne all, and harder to keepe that which is won. Examples of this are the Turkish Empire, and the Kingdom of France. If any invader should prevaile so farre upon Turkie, that the great Sultan and his Children (for Brethren he useth not to suffer alive) were taken or slaine: the whole Empire would quickly bee wonne, and easily kept, without any danger of rebellion. For the Bassaes, how great soever they may seeme, are meer slaves; neither is there in all that large Dominion, any one man, whose personal regard could get the people to follow him in such an attempt, wherein hope of private gaine should not

countervail all apparent matter of feare. Contrariwise, in France, it were not enough for him that would make a conquest, to get into his hands the King and his Children; though he further got the better part of the Country, and were by farre the strongest in the field. For, besides the Princes of the Royall blood, there are in that Kingdom store of great men: who are mighty in their severall Countries, and having certaine Royalties and Principalities of their owne, are able to raise warre in all quarters of the Realme; whereunto the remembrance of their owne ancient Families, and long continued Nobility, will always stirre up and inflame them: so that untill every one piece were won, and every one (an endless worke) of the chiefe Nobility brought under or destroyed, the victory were not compleat, nor well assured. It is true, that such power of the Nobility, doth often-times make way for an Invader; to whom the discontentments of a few can easly make a faire entrance. But such assistants are not so easly kept, as they are gotten; for they looke to be satisfied at full, in all their demands; and having what they would, they soone returne to their old allegiance, upon condition to keepe what they have, unlesse they be daily hired with new rewards: wherein it is hard to please one man, without offending another as good as himselfe. The Turke, on the other side, needs not to fear any peril, that might arise from the discontented spirits of his principall men. The greatest mischief that any of them could worke against him, were the betraying of some frontier Towne, or the wilfull losse of a battaile: which done, the Traitor hath spent his sting, and must either flye to the enemy, whereby he loseth all that hee formerly did hold; or else, in hope of doing some further harme, he must adventure to excuse himselfe unto his Master, who seldome forgives the Captaine, that hath not striven by desperate valour against misfortune. As for making head, or arming their followers against the great Sultan, and so joyning themselves unto any Invader; it is a matter not to be doubted: for none of them have any followers or dependants at all, other than such as are subject unto them, by vertue of their Offices and Commissions. Now as this base condition of the principall men, doth leave unto them no means, whereby to oppose themselves against the flourishing estate of their Prince; so would it weaken both their power and their courage in giving him assistance, if adversity should make him stand in need of them. For there is scarce any one among the Turks Bassaes, or Provinciall Governours, that knows either from whence he was brought, or from whom descended, nor any one among them, that by the losse & utter ruine of the Turkish Empire, can lose any foote of his proper inheritance; and it is the proper inheritance of the subject, which is also a Kingdom unto him, which makes him fight with an armed heart against the Conquerer, who hath no other device painted on his Ensigne, than the picture of slavery.

As in the Turkish Empire, so was the Persian, void of liberty in the Subjects, and utterly destitute of other Nobility, than such as depended upon meere favour of the Prince. Some indeede there were of the Royall blood, and others, descended from the Princes that joynd with Darius, the Sonne of Hystaspes, in oppressing the Magi: the few were men of reputation in Persia, but their reputation consisted onely in their Pedegree, and their safety in not meddling with affaires of State, which made them little esteemed. In what small account these Persian Princes were held, it may appeare by this, that the Kings Uncles, Cousin Germans, and Brethren, were called by the Kings, Their Slaves, and so did stile themselves, in speaking unto these great Monarchs. That upon every light occasion of displeasure they were handled as Slaves, it is easie to be discerned, in that example of cruelty, practised by Xerxes upon his owne brother Masties; which hath bene formerly noted, in place more convenient. As for the Satrapae, or Governours of the Provinces, it is needlesse to cite examples, proving them to have bene meer slaves: it may suffice, that their heads were taken from them at the Kings will; that is, at the will of those Women and Eunuchs, by whom the King was governed.

To this want of Nobility in Persia, may be added the generall want of liberty convenient among the people: a matter no lesse available, in making easie and sure the conquest of a Nation, than is the cause assigned by Machiavelli. For as Aesop his Assle did not care to run from the enemies, because it was not possible, that they should load him with heavier burthens, than his Master caused him daily to beare: so the Nations, that endure the worst under their owne Princes, are not greatly fearfull of a forraigne yoke;

Not

Nor will be hasty to shake it off, if by experience they finde it more light, than was that whereunto they had been long accustomed. This was it that made the Gaſcoignes beare ſuch faithfull affection to the Kings of England; for that they governed more mildly than the French: this enlarged the Venetian jurisdiction in Lombardy; for the Townes that they wan, they wan out of the hands of Tyrannous oppreſſours: & this did cauſe the Macedonians, with other Nations, that had been ſubject unto the poſterity of Alexanders followers, to ſerve the Romans patiently, if not willingly; for that by them they were caſed of many burthens, which had been impoſed upon them by their own Kings.

So that of this tameneſſe, which we finde in thoſe that had been ſubjects of the Perſian Kings, the reaſons are apparent. Yet ſome of theſe there were, that could not ſo eaſily be contained in good order by the Macedonians: for they had not indeed been abſolutely conquered by the Perſian. Such were the Sogdians, Bactrians, and other Nations about the Caſpian Sea. Such alſo were the Arabians bordering upon Syria: againſt whom Antigonus ſent part of his Army; thinking therewith to bring them under, or rather to get a rich booty. The Captains that he ſent, ſell upon the Nabatheans, at ſuch time as they were buſied in a great Mart; wherein they traded with the more remote Arabians, for Myrrhe, Frankincenſe, & other ſuch commodities. All or moſt of theſe rich wares, together with five hundred talents of ſilver, and many priſoners, the Macedonians laid hold upon: for their coming was ſudden & unexpected. But ere they could recover Syria, the Nabatheans overtook them, & finding them weary with long marches, made ſuch a ſlaughter, that of foure thouſand foot, and fixe hundred horſe, only fifty horſe eſcaped. To revenge this loſſe, Demetrius was ſet out with a great power: yet all in vaine; for hee was not reſiſted by any Army, but by the naturall defence of a vaſt Wilderneſſe, lacke of water, and of all things neceſſary. Therefore he was glad to make peace with them; wherein hee loſt not much honour: for they craved it, and gave him preſents. Returning from the Nabatheans, he viewed the Lake Asphaltites, whence hee conceived hope of great profit that might bee raiſed, by gathering the Sulphure. With this good huſbandry of his ſon, Antigonus was well pleaſed, and appointed men to the worke: but they were ſlaine by the Arabians, and ſo that hope vaniſhed.

Theſe petty enterpriſes, with the ill ſucceſſe accompanying them, had much impaired the good advantage againſt Protolomy: when the newes of Seleucus his victories in the high Countries, married all together. For neither was the loſſe of thoſe great and wealthy Provinces, a matter to be neglected, neither was it ſafe to tranſport the warre into the parts beyond Euphrates, whereby Syria and the lower Aſia ſhould have beene expoſed, to the danger of ill-affected Neighbours. A middle courſe was thought the beſt; and Demetrius with fifteen thouſand foot and three thouſand horſe, was ſent againſt Seleucus. Theſe forces being ſent away, Antigonus did nothing, and his ſonne did leſſe. For Seleucus was then in Media; his Lieutenants about Babylon withdrew themſelves from neceſſity of fight; ſome places they fortified and kept; Demetrius could hold nothing that he got, without ſetting in Garrifon more men than hee could ſpare, neither did he get much; & therefore was faine to ſet out the bravery of his expedition, by burning and ſpoiling the Country; which he did thereby the more alienate, & as it were acknowledge to belong unto his enemy, who thenceforth held it as his owne aſſured.

Antigonus had laid upon his ſon a peremptory commandement, to returne unto him at a time prefixed: reaſonably thinking (as may ſeeme) that in ſuch an unſettled ſtate of things, either the Warre might bee ended, by the fury of the firſt brunt; or elſe it would be vaine to ſtrive againſt all difficulties likely to ariſe, where want of neceſſaries ſhould frustrate the valour, that by ſtrength of time was like to become leſſe terrible to the Enemy. Demetrius therefore leaving behinde him five thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe, rather to make ſhew of continuing the warre, than to effect much, where himſelfe, with greater forces could doe little more than nothing, forſooke the enterpriſe, and went backe to his Father.

A general peace made and broken. How all the houſe of Alexander was deſtroyed.

THEſe ambitious heads, having thus wearied themſelves with uneſſeſſuall travell, in ſeeking to get more than any one of them could hold; were contented at length to come to an agreement: wherein it was concluded; that each of them ſhould hold quietly, that which at the preſent he had in poſſeſſion. As no private hatred, but mere deſire of Empire, had moved them to enter into the warre; ſo was it no friendly reconciliation, but only a dulneſſe growing upon the ſlow advancement of their ſeverall hopes, that made them willing to breathe a while, til occaſion might better ſerve to fight againe.

Befides that maine point, Of retaining the Provinces which every man held, there were two Articles of the peace, that gave a faire, but a falſe colour, to the buſineſſe; That the ſon of Alexander by Roxane, ſhould be made King when he came to full age; and, That all the Eſtates of Greece ſhould be ſet at libertie. The advancement of young Alexander to his Fathers kindome, ſeems to have bin a matter forceably extorted from Antigonus; in whom was diſcovered a purpoſe, to make himſelfe Lord of all. But this, indeed, more neerly touched Cassander. For in his cuſtodie was the young Prince and his Mother: neither did he keepe them in ſort anſwerable to their degree; but as cloſe priſoners, taken in that warre, wherein they had ſeene the old Queene Olympias taken and murdered, that ſought to put them in poſſeſſion of the Empire. The mutuall hatred and feare betwene them, rooted in theſe grounds, of injuries done, and revenge expected; upon this concluſion of peace, grew up faſter than any time before, in the heart of Cassander: who ſaw the Macedonians turne their favourable expectation, towards the ſon of their late renowned King.

All this either little concerned Antigonus; or tended greatly to his good. The young Prince muſt firſt have poſſeſſion of Macedonia: whereby Cassander ſhould be reduced to his poor office, of Captain over a thouſand men, if not left in worſe caſe. As for them that held Provinces abroad, they might either doe as they had done under Aridemus; or better, as being better acquainted with their owne ſtrength. He in the meane time, by his readineſſe to acknowledge the true Heire, had freed himſelfe from that ill favoured imputation, of ſeeking to make himſelfe Lord of all that Alexander had gotten.

The like advantage had he in that Article, of reſtoring the Greeks to their libertie. This libertie had hitherto beene the ſubject of much idle diſcourſe: but it never tooke effect. Antigonus held ſcarce any Towne of theirs, Cassander occupied moſt of the Countrie: which if he ſhould ſet free, he muſt be a poore Prince; if not, there was matter enough of quarrell againſt him, as againſt a Diſturbur of the common peace.

In the meane ſeaſon, the Countries lying between Euphrates and the Greek ſeas, together with a great Armie, and mony enough to entertaine a greater, might ſerve to hold up the credit of Antigonus, and to raiſe his hopes as high as ever they had beene.

With much diſadvantage doe many men contend againſt one that is equall to them all in power. Cassanders friends had left him in an ill caſe; but he could not doe without: for where every one mans helpe is neceſſarie to the warre, there may any one make his owne peace; but no one can ſtand out alone, when all the reſt are wearie. The beſt was, that he knew all their affections: which tended to no ſuch end as the becoming Subjects unto any man, much leſſe to the ſon of an Aſiaticque woman, of whom they had long ſince reſuſed to heare mention. Therefore he tooke a ſhort courſe, and cauſed both the child and his Mother to be ſlaine: freeing thereby himſelfe in a trice, from the dangerous neceſſitie of yeelding up his government, which he muſt have done when the child had come to age. Roxane was a Ladie of ſingular beautie, which was perhappes the cauſe, why Perdiccas deſired to have her ſonne, being as yet unborn, proclaimed Heire to the great Alexander. Immediately upon the death of Alexander, he had uſed the favour (if it were not love) of Perdiccas, to the ſatiſfying of her owne bloudie malice, upon Stattira, the Daughter of King Darius, whom Alexander had likewiſe married, according to the cuſtome of thoſe Countries, wherein pluralitie of wives is held no crime. For, having by a counterſeit letter, in Alexanders name, gotten this poore Ladie into his hands, ſhe did, by aſſiſtance of Perdiccas, murder her and her Siſter, and threw their bodies into a Well, causing it to be filled up with earth. But now, by Gods just vengeance, were she and her son made away, in the like secret fashion; even at such time as the near approaching hope of a great Empire had made her life, after a wearisome imprisonment, grow dearer unto her than it was before.

The fact of Cassander was not so much detested in outward shew; as inwardly it was pleasing unto all the rest of the Princes. For now they held themselves free Lords of all that they had under them; fearing none other change of their estates, than such as might arise by chance of warre; wherein every one persuaded himselfe of success, rather better than worse. Hereupon all of them (except Lysimachus and Seleucus, that had work enough at home) began to rowze themselves: as if now the time were come, for each man to improve his own stocke. Antigonus his Lieutenants were busie in Peloponnesus, and about Hellepont: while their Master was carefull in following other, and some greater matters that were more secretly to be handled. He pretended the libertie of Greece: yet did the same argument minister unto Ptolomie matter of quarrell, against both him and Cassander; Ptolomie complaining (as if he had taken the matter deeply to heart) that Antigonus had put Garrisons into some Townes, which ought, in faire dealing, to be set at liberty. Under colour of redressing this enormitie, he sent an Armie into Cilicia, where he won foure Townes, and soon after lost them, without much labour of his owne or his enemies.

After this, putting to Sea with a strong Fleet, he ran along the coast of Asia, winning so many places: and in that voyage allured unto him a nephew of Antigonus (a good Commander, but discontented with the ill requirall of his services) whom finding shortly, as false to himselfe as he had been to his own Uncle, he was faine to put to death. But in doing these things, his desire to set the Greeks at libertie, appeared not so plaine, as he wished that it should: for their case was no way bettered by his molesting Antigonus in Asia. Therefore to get the love of that valiant Nation, he made at the last an expedition into Greece it selfe: where having first free some little Ilands, and landed in Peloponnesus, he raised so great an expectation of finishing the long desired work, that Cratipolis, the Widow of Alexander, *Polyperchon*s son, gave up into his hands the Towns of Sigon and Corinth.

Ptolomie had conceived a vain beliefe that the Greeks, emboldened by his countenance and assistance, would all of them take heart and rise up in armes; whereby with little labour their libertie might be gotten; and he be acknowledged as Author of this immortal benefit. But long servitude had well-near extinguished the ancient valour of that Nation: and their ill fortune, in many likely attempts to recover freedom, had fortified their spirits, that they would no more sit in pursuit thereof; but sat idly still, as wishing it to fall into their mouths.

The Lacedemonians, about these times, began to fortifie their Town with wals; strutting no longer in their vertue for both it, and the discipline that upheld it were too much impaired; that had been a wall to their Town and Territorie.

The Athenians were become as humble servants, as they had been in times past insolent Masters: erecting as many statues in honour of Demetrius Phalerus, as there were daies in the year. This Demetrius was now their Governour; and he governed them with much moderation: but in spight of their hearts, as being set over them by Cassander. By this base temper of the principall Cities, it is easie to gather, how the rest of the Country stood affected. Ptolomie could not get them to set their helping hands to their owngood, and to furnish him with the promised supplies of mony and victuals. Credible it is, that he had a true meaning to deliver them from thralldome; as judging the commoditie that would arise by annexing them to his partie, a matter of more weight than the losse that Cassander should receive thereby, who could hardly retain them, if once Antigonus took the worke in hand. But when he found such difficultie in the businesse, he changed his purpose: and renewing his former friendship with Cassander, he retained Sigon and Corinth in his own possession.

Before the coming of Ptolomie into Greece, Cassander had bene held occupied with very much worke. For (besides his paines taken in warres among barbarous Princes) hee found meanes to allure unto himselfe the Lieutenants of Antigonus, that were in Peloponnesus, and about Hellepont: making his owne advantage of their discontentments. By the like skilfull practice he freed himselfe from a greater danger, and made those those murders which he had committed seeme the lesse odious, by teaching his enemies to doe the like. Old Polyperchon, that had made so great a stir in the reign of Aridam, did after the death of Roxane and her child, enter againe upon the Stage: leading in his hand another sonne of the great Alexander; and meaning to place him in his Fathers Throne.

The name of this young Prince was Hercules: he was begotten on Barsine the daughter of Antabazuma a Persian; but had been lesse esteemed than the sonne of Roxane, either for that his Mother was held no better than a Concubine; or else perhaps, in regard of the favour which Perdiccas, and after him Olympias, did beare unto Roxane. At this time to the death of his brother had moved such compassion, and regard of his being *Alexander*s only living child, had procured unto him such good will, that the demand which Polyperchon made in his behalf, was deemed very just and honourable. There were indeed more hearts than hands, that joynd with this young Prince: yet wanted he not sufficient strength of hands, if the heart of him that least ought, had not been most false. Cassander had raised an Armie to withstand his entrie into Macedon: but little trust could he repose in that Armie, whose wishes he perceived to be with Hercules. Therefore he assailed Polyperchon himselfe with gifts and promises; wherewith at length he prevailed so far, that the old Villaine was contented to murder his Pupill; choosing rather with many curses and foule dishonour, to take the offered Lordship of Peloponnesus, and Commander of an Armie; than to purchase a noble fame with dangerous travell, in maintaining his faith unto both his dead and living Sovereignes.

Antigonus had not all this while bin asleep; though his losses were hitherto the chiefe winnesse, of his having bene a stirrer in these commotions. He thought it enough for him at the present to retaine his owne: and therefore tooke order for the recoverie of those places which Ptolomie had taken paines to winne. As for the rest, it no way grieved him to see Cassander incur the general hatred of men by committing those murders of which the profit was like to redound unto him that was the most powerfull, or to see Polyperchon and Ptolomie sweat in a busie warre against Cassander. If they would have continued their quarrels, he could well have afforded them leisure, and have thought to the time well spent in beholding their contentions. For he was thoroughly persuaded that when the rest had wearied themselves in vaine with long strife, his armies and treasures, wherein he exceeded them all, would bring all under. According to these haughty conceits, he demeaned himselfe among his followers; looking big upon them; and like a King before his time. This was it that caused so many of them to revolt from him: but it was no great losse to be forsaken by those that looked with envious eyes upon that fortune whereon their owne should have depended. Against this envie of his men, and the malice of others, Antigonus busily sought a remedie, such as was like to give him a goodly tide to the whole Empire.

Cleopatra, Sister unto the great Alexander, lay for the most part in Sardes: whom he had a great desire to take to wife. This his desire was not without good hope: for howsoever she discovered much unwillingnesse thereunto, yet was she in his power; and might therefore be entreated, were it only for feare of being enforced. But it was not his purpose to get her by compulsive means: either because his fancie, being an old man, was not over-violent; or rather because his ambition, whereunto all his affections had reference, could have made small use of her, by doing such apparent wrong. She had been married unto Alexander King of Epirus, after whose death she came to her brother in Asia; hoping belike to finde a new husband in his Campe. But neither any of those brave Captaines, that were, in times following, so hot in love with her, durst then aspire unto her marriage: nor did her brother, full of other cares, trouble himselfe with providing her of an husband. She therefore, being a lustie widow, suffered her blood so farre to prevail against her honour, that she supplied the want of an husband by entertainment of Paramours. Alexander hearing of this, turned it to a jest: saying, That she was his sister, and must be allowed this libertie, as her portion of the Empire. When by his death the Empire lay in a manner void, and the portion due to her thereingrew, in mens opinion, greater than it had bene: then did many seeke to obtaine her, while she her selfe desired only a proper man, with whom shee might lead a merrie life. To this purpose did the invite Leonatus unto her; who made great haste, but was cut off by death ere he came to her presence. Now at the last, after long tarrying, he had her choice of all the great Commanders: Antigonus, Ptolomie, Lysimachus, and Cassander, being all her earnest wooers. All these (Antigonus excepted) had wives already; Ptolomie had many wives, and many Concubines, whom he respected as much as his wives, being noted of too much dotage in that kind. This hindered not his suite: peradventure it advanced it, by giving to Cleopatra some hope of mutual toleration. To him therefore she bequeathed her self, and was taking her journey from Sardes towards him; when Antigonus his Deputie in that Citie, made her to stay, until his Masters further pleasure should be known. Antigonus had now a Wolfe by the eares: he neither could well hold her, nor durst let her goe. She would not be his wife; he had no honest pretence to force her; and to keepe her prisoner, had bin the way, by which he might have incurred a generall hatred, lasting perhaps beyond her life; as the course taken by Cassander against Poxane (a Ladie lesse respected than Alexanders own sister) did well testifie. Therefore he thought it the wisest way to procure her death: for to let any other enjoy the commoditie of so faire a title to the kingdome, it was no part of his meaning. To this purpose he sent instructions to the Governour of Sardes, willing him in any case to doe it secretly. So the fact was committed, and certain women about her put in trust with the murder: which women afterwards were put to death, as mischievous conspirers against the life of that good Ladie. So was Antigonus freed from blame, at the least, in his owne opinion: but the world was lesse foolish, than to be so deluded. How the murder was detected, we need not aske: for seldome is that bloudie crime un-revealed, and never so ill smothered, as when great persons are the Authors.

This was the whole race of Philip and Alexander the great extinguished, and it was extinguished by the hands of such as thought upon nothing lesse than the execution of Gods justice, due unto the cruelty of these powerfull, but mercilesse Princes. Wherefore the ambitious frames, erected by these Tyrants, upon so wicked foundations of innocent blood, were soon after cast down, over-whelming themselves or their children, with the ruines, as the sequell will declare.

How Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, gave libertie to Athens, expelling the Garrisons of Cassander out of those parts. The immoderate honour decreed by the Athenians to Antigonus and Demetrius.

None being left alive that had any title to the Kingdome; it stood with good reason, that they which were Lords of the Provinces, acknowledging no Superiour, should freely professe themselves Kings in name, as they were already in substance. Yet had this name it besmeared the weaker, while the strongest of all did forbear it: neither seemed it convenient in the judgement of Antigonus, to crowne his last action with such a title, as if he had attained unto greatness by that foule murder, the infamie whereof he was carefull how to discharge from his own head. He purposed therefore to undertake a plausible enterprise, even the libertie of Greece: whereby it was apparent, that he might get such honour as would not only drown all bad reports, but make him be thought equal to any name of royaltie, whereof in seeming modestie, he was not covetous. To this purpose he delivered a strong armie, with a Navie of two hundred and fiftie saile, and five thousand talents of silver, unto Demetrius his son: willing him to begin at Athens, and thence to proceed, in setting all the Countrey free.

Demetrius came to Athens before he was expected: so that without resistance he entered the Haven; it being thought that a fleet of Ptolomie, Cassanders good friend, had bin arrived. But when it was known, both who he was, & what was the cause of his coming; the joy of the Citizens brake out into loud acclamations: Demetrius Phalerus forsooke the town, and withdrew himself to Thebes under safe conduct; only the Garrison in Munychia strove to make good that piece, which after a while was won upon them by force. During the siege of Munychia, Demetrius went to Megara; whence he expelled the Garrison of Cassander, and so restored the Citie to libertie.

I think it not impertinent, sometimes to relate such accidents, as may seeme no better than meere trifles: for even by trifles are the qualities of great Persons as well disclosed disclosed, as by their great actions; because in matters of importance, they commonly strain themselves, to the observance of generall commended rules; in lesser things they follow the current of their owne Natures. The Lady Cratespolis lay in Paras, and had a great desire to see Demetrius; hoping, belike, that she might by his means a better her estate, and recover her Townes of Sydon and Corinth, detained by Ptolomie; to whose Lieutenant, in those places, Demetrius before his departure out of Greece, offered many for the surrender of them. Yet the onely business pretended was love. He being advertised hereof, left his forces in the Countrey of Megara, and taking a company of his lightest armed, for guard of his person, made a long journey to meet with her. This troupe also, he caused to lodge a great way from his Tent, that none might see her when she came. As closely as the business was carried, some of his enemies had gotten knowledge of it; whereby they conceived good hope, that the diligence of a very few men might overthrow all the great preparations of Antigonus; and bring him to any termes of reason, by taking his deare sonne prisoner. Their project fell but a little short of the effect. For they came so suddenly upon him, that he had no better shift, than to muffle himselfe in an old cloake, and creepe away disguised; leaving them to ranke his Tent. There was in this Prince a strange medley of conditions; especially an extreme dissoluteness in wanton pleasures, and a painefull industry in matter of Warre. He was of a most amiable countenance, a gentle nature, and a good wit; excellent in devising Engines of Warre, and curious in working them with his owne hands. He knew better how to reforme his bad fortune, than how to rule his good. For adversitie made his valour more active; prosperity puffed him with over-weening, wherein he thought that he might do what he listed. His fortune was changeable, as were his qualities: turning often round, like the picture of her wheele, till she had wound up the thread of his life, in such manner as followeth to be shewed.

Returning to his Campe, and finishing his business at Megara; he resolved no longer to attend the issue of a siege, to assail Munychia by force, that so he might accomplish the liberty of Athens: which, until it was fully wrought out, he refused to enter into the Citie. Munychia was strongly fortified: yet by continuance of the assault, the multitude without, through help of their Engines that scoured the walles, prevailed upon the resolution of those that lay within it, and won the place in two dayes. The wals, and all the defences of that piece against the Citie, were levelled with the ground, and so was it freely put into the Citizens hands, to whom withall was given their liberty, with promise to save them in maintaining it.

The fame of this action was lowder, than of any other victory, gotten by Demetrius with greater skill and industry. For the Athenians, having forgotten how to employ their hands, laboured to make up that defect with their tongues: converting to base flattery; that eloquence of theirs which the virtues of their Ancestors had suted unto more manly arguments.

They decreed unto Antigonus and Demetrius the name of Kings; they consecrated the place in which Demetrius leaped from his Chariot, when he entered their Citie, and built there an Altar, calling it of Demetrius the al-lighter; they called them by the names of the gods their Saviours, ordaining that every yeare, there should be chosen a Priest of these gods; and further, that such as were employed by their State, in dealing with either of these two Princes, should not be called Embassadors, but Theori, or Consulters with the gods; like as were they, whom they sent unto the Oracle of Jupiter or Apollo.

It were a frivolous diligence to rehearse all their flatteries, these being so grosse. Hereby they not onely corrupted the young Prince; but made that acclamation, which best would have pleased the old man, to be of no use. For he could not handsomely take upon him the name of King, as imposed by the Athenians; unless he would seeme to approve their vanity, in loading him with more than humane honours. Yet was he so tickled with this their fine handling him, that when their Theori or Consulters came shortly after, desiring him to relieve them with Corne and Timber to build ships; he gave them almost a hundred thousand quarters of wheate, and matter sufficient to make a hundred Gallies. So gracious was his first Oracle: or rather so weak is great power in resisting the assaults of flattery.

§. XI.

The great victorie of Demetrius against Ptolomie in Cyprus. How Antigonus and Demetrius tooke upon them the stile of Kings; wherein others followed their example.

FROM this glorious worke, Antigonus called away Demetrius, unto a businesse of greater difficultie; meaning to employ his service against Ptolomie, in Cyprus. Before his departure out of Greece, he was willed to establish a generall Counsell, that should treat of matters concerning the common good of the Countrey. About the same time Antigonus withdrew his owne Garrison out of Imbros, committing their libertie entire, into the peoples hands; whereby it might appeare, that as he would not permit any other to oppresse the Greekes, so would he be farre from doing it himselfe. This was enough to hold his reputation high, among these new purchased Friends: it followed, that hee should convert his forces, to the winning of ground upon his Enemies.

A pittifull Tragedie had lately hapned in Cyprus, through the indiscretion of Menelaus, Ptolomies brother, and his lieutenant in that Ile. Nicoles, King of Paphos, was entred into some practice with Antigonus: yet not so far that he thought himselfe past excuse; by which confidence, he was perhaps the more easily detected. To cut off this negotiation, and the false-hearted King of Paphos at one blow, Menelaus was sent thither: who surrounding Nicoles his house with Souldiers, required in Ptolomies name, to have him yielded to the death. Nicoles offered to cleare himselfe; but Menelaus told him, that dye he must, and bad him come forth quietly. This desperate necessitie caused the unhappie King to rid himselfe of life: and his death strooke such an impression into his wife, that she not onely flew her selfe, but perswaded the wives of her husbands brethren to doe the like. Also those brethren of Nicoles, unto whom Ptolomie had intended no ill, being amazed with the suddenesse of this calamitie, did shut up the Palace, and setting it on fire, consumed it, with all that was in it, and themselves together.

Whatsoever the crime objected was; Nicoles perished as a man innocent, because he was not suffered to make his answer. Of this sad accident, though Menelaus delivered the blame, for his rigorous proceeding: yet is it to be thought, that much dislike fell also upon Ptolomie: as men that are grieved, cast an ill affection even upon those that gave the farthest removed occasion.

Not long after this, Demetrius came into Cyprus, with a power sufficient, against any opposition that Ptolomie was like to make. The Cypriots did little or nothing against him: either because they had small strength, or for that they held it a matter indifferent, whom they acknowledged as their Lord, being sure that they should not themselves have the rule of their owne Countrey. Menelaus therefore, out of his Garrisons, drew forth an Armie, and fought with Demetrius. But he was beaten, and driven to save himselfe within the walls of Salamis, where he was so hardly besieged, that without strong succour, he had no likelihood to make good the place, much lesse to retaine possession of the whole Iland. His greatest helpe at the present was the fidelitie of his Souldiers; whom no rewards could win from him, nor good usage (when any of them were taken prisoners, and introlled in the enemies bands) keepe from returning to him, with the first opportunity. Most of them were Mercenaries: but all their goods were in Egypt, which was enough to keepe them faithfull. Yet could not this their resolution have stood long against the odds of number, which Demetrius had of men as resolute, and against his terrible Engines of batterie, if Ptolomie had not hastened to the rescue.

Ptolomie brought with him a hundred and fortie Gallies, besides two hundred ships of burden, for transporting his Armie and Carriages. This Fleet made a terrible shew, when it was descried afarre; though more than halfe of it was unfit for service in fight at Sea. Wherefore to make the opinion of his forces the more dreadful, Ptolomie sent unto Demetrius a threatening message: willing him to be gone, unless he would be overwhelmed with multitudes, and trampled to death in a throng. But this young gallant repaid him with words of as much bravery, promising to let him escape, upon condition, that he should withdraw his Garrisons out of Sycion and Corinth.

Demetrius had no more than one hundred and eightene Gallies; but they were, for the most part, greater than those of Ptolomie; better stored with weapons fit for that service;

vice; and very well furnished with Engines in the prow, to beat upon the enemy. Nevertheless he stood in great doubt of three score Gallies that lay in the Haven of Salamis, lest Menelaus with them should set upon his back: in which case, it was very likely that all would goe very ill with him. Against this mischance, he bestowed ten of his own Gallies in the mouth of that Haven, to keepe Menelaus from issuing forth, and setting his horsemen on the shore, to give what assistance they could, he with the rest of his Fleet, put to Sea against Ptolomie.

The fight began early in the morning, and continued long, with doubtfull successe. The Generals were not ranged opposite one to the other; but held each of them the left wing of his owne fleet. Each of them prevailed against the Squadron wherewith he encountered; but the successe of Demetrius was to better purpose. For his victorie in one part was such, as caused others to fall out of order, and finally drave all to betake themselves unto speedie flight. As for Ptolomie, he was faine to leave his advantage upon the enemy in one part of the fight; that he might relieve and animate those of his own which needed him in another: wherein he found his losse over-great to be repaired, by contending any longer against the fortune of that day; and therefore he laboured onely to save himselfe, in hope of better event, that might follow some other time.

There fell out in this battell no unusual accident; yet was the victorie greater than could have been expected. The occasions whereof were, partly the great skill in Sea-fencing, which the Greekes and Phenicians, that were with Demetrius, had above those which followed Ptolomie: partly the good furniture of the Ships, wherein consisted no lesse, than in the qualitie of those with whom they were manned. Further, we may reasonably judge, that the two hundred ships of burthen, carrying the strength of Ptolomies Armie, did not more encourage his own men, and terrifie his enemies the day before the fight, than breed in each part the contrarie affections, when in the beginning of the fight they fell off, and stood aloofe. For though it were fitting that they should so doe; yet a multitude, prepossessed with vain conceits, will commonly apprehend very sleight occasions to thinke themselves abandoned. Besides all this, the expectation that Menelaus, issuing with his fleet out of Salamis, should charge the enemies in sterne, was utterly frustrated. He was kept in perforce, by the ten ships appointed to bar up the mouth of the Haven: which they manfully performed, as great necessity required.

Such disappointment of expectation doth much abate the courage of men in Fight; especially of the assailants: whereas on the contrarie, they that find some part of their fears vaine, doe easily gather hopefull spirits, and conceive an opinion of their own ability, to doe more than they thought upon, out of their not suffering the harm that they had imagined.

Whatsoever the causes of this victorie were, the fruit was very great. For Ptolomie had no more than eight Gallies that accompanied him in his flight: all the rest of his fleet was either taken or sunk. Neither did Menelaus any longer strive against the violence of fortune; but yielded up all that he held in Cyprus, together with his Armie, consisting of twelve thousand foot, and a thousand and two hundred horse, and those Gallies in the Haven of Salamis. The same dejection of spirit was found in the common Souldier, as well that was taken at Sea, as that had served the Egyptian by Land; none of them refusing any more confidence in Ptolomie, but willingly becoming followers of a new Lord, whose Armie they now increased.

It was generally beleeved, that much more depended on the event of this fight, than the Ile of Cyprus for which they contended. Wherefore the common expectation was great; especially Antigonus, whom it most concerned, was deeply perplexed with cares, thinking every day a year, till he were advertised of the issue. In this mood Aristodemus found him, a noble flatterer, whom Demetrius had honoured with the Message of these good news. Aristodemus had bethought himselfe of a trick, whereby to double the welcome of his joyfull errand: He caused his ships to ride at Anchor, a good distance from the shore: he himselfe landed in a Cock-boat, which he sent immediately back to the ship; and soall alone he went forward, looking very fadly that no part of his tidings might appeare in his countenance. Report of his arrivall (for it was not known where he had bin) came presently to Antigonus, who sent Messenger after Messenger to meet him on the way, and bring speedie word how all went. But neither any answer, nor so much of a looke, as might intimate the purport of his errand, could be won from this demure demire Gentleman. Thus marched he faire and softly forward with a great throng at his heeles (that served well to set out his Pageant) untill he came in sight of Antigonus; who could not containe himselfe, but went downe to meet him at the Gate, and heare the newes. Then did Aristodemus, upon the sudden, with a high voyce salute Antigonus by the name of King; uttering the greatnesse of the victorie (with as much pomp, as before he had covered it with silence) in the hearing of all the people; who with loud acclamations, gave that name of King, both to Antigonus and his son Demetrius. Antigonus, in requittall of the long suspense, wherein Aristodemus had held him, sayd, That it should also be long ere he received his reward. But the Title of King, together with the Diademe, which his friends did set on his head, he could not with a fairer occasion to assume: wherefore he readily accepted them, and sent the like to his son.

When it was once noyfed abroad, that Antigonus and Demetrius called themselves Kings; it was not long ere their fellowes were ready to follow the good example. Ptolomie his friends would by no means endure, that their Lord should be thought a man dejected for the losse of a fleet; therefore they saluted him also King. Lysimachus in Thrace had boldnesse enough to put the Diademe about his own head. Seleucus had, before this time, among the barbarous people, taken upon him as King: but now he used the stile indifferently, as well among the Greeks and Macedonians, as in dealing with others. Only Cassander held himselfe contented with his own name: whereby howsoever he might shadow his pride, he no way lessened the fame of his crueltie against his Masters house. But the name which he forbore, his sons after him were bold to usurpe, though with ill successe, as will appeare, when they shall enter upon the Stage, whereon the se old Tragedians, under new habits, as no longer now the same persons, begin to play their parts, with bigger looks, and more boisterous actions, not with greater grace and judgement, than in the Scenes already past.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Warres betweene the Kings of Egypt, Asia, Macedon, Thrace, and others: untill all Alexanders Princes were consumed.

§. I.

The Expedition of Antigonus against Egypt, with ill successe.

LIke the rest of these Kings had taken that name upon them, in imitation of Antigonus himselfe, as becomming his greatnesse: which was such as gave him hope to swallow them up, together with their new titles. Being not ignorant of his own strength, he resolved to single out Ptolomie, and make him an example to others: who should hardly be able to stand, when the greatest of them was fallen. To this purpose he prepared an armie of eighteen thousand foot, & eight thousand horse, with fourscore and three Elephants: as likewise a fleet of a hundred and fiftie Gallies, and a hundred ships of burthen. The Land forces he commanded in person: of the Navie Demetrius was Admirall.

When all was ready for the journey, the Sea-men advised him to stay yet eight dayes longer, and expect the setting of the Pleades. But his hasty desire to prevent all preparations for resistance that Ptolomie should make, rejected this counsell; imputing it rather to their feare than skill: wherefore he departed from Antigonia (a Town which he had built in Syria, and called after his owne name, that was soon changed into Seleucia, by his mortall enemy) and came to Gaza, where he met with his Fleet. The nearer that he drew to Egypt, the more haste he made: thinking by celeritie to prevaille more than by his great power. He caused his Souldiers to carrie tenne dayes provision of Victuals; and had many Camels loaden with all necessaries for passing the Desert, over over which he marched with no small toyle, though he met with no resistance. At Mount Casius, which is neare adjoyning to Nilus, he saw his Fleet riding at Anchor, not farre from the shore, in ill case, and many Shippes wanting. It had beene forely beaten with foule weather, wherein some were lost, others driven backe to Gaza, or scattered else-where into such creekes as they could recover: Demetrius himselfe, with the best and strongest vessels, did so long beat it up against the wind, that all his fresh water was spent; in which extremity, he and all his must have perished, had not the tempest ceased when it did; and Antigonus appeared in sight, from whom these over-wearied, thirsty and Sea-beaten Souldiers received reliefe. After these painfull travels, there followed a Warre no lesse painfull than to litle purpose; for Ptolomie had so fortified all the passages upon the River of Nilus, as hee assured himselfe either to end the warre there, or if his guards should happen to be forc't, yet could it not be done but so much to the weakening of the Assailants, as he should afterward, with a second Army (which he held entire) entertain the Invader upon advantage enough. All that Antigonus sought, was to come to blowes speedily: Ptolomie on the contrary, to beat Antigonus by the belly. It is true that Nilus gave him water enough, but wood he had none to warme it, and while Antigonus assaulted the Rampiers raised upon the River in vaine, Ptolomie assailed the faith of his souldiers with good successe; for with great gifts, and greater promises, he ferried them over so fast; as had not Antigonus thrust some assured Regiments, upon the passages next the enemy, and in the mean while taken a resolution to returne, Ptolomie had turned him out of Egypt ill attended.

Some of them indeed he laid hands on, in the way of their escape, and those he put to death with extreme tortments; but in all likelihood with the same ill successe that Perdiccas had formerly done, when he invaded Egypt: had he not readily removed his Army further off, from the noyse of their entertainment, that had already been won from him. To prevent therefore as wel the present danger of his stay, as the shame following a forc't retreat, he secretly practised the advice of his Councell, upon whom the burthen must be laid of his entrance, and leaving Egypt.

It is indeed lesse prejudiciall in such like cases, that errors, dishonours, and losses be laid on Counsellors and Captains, than on Kings; on the Directed, than on the Director: for the honour and reputation of a Prince is farre more precious than that of a Vassall. Charles the first, as many other Princes have done, layd the losse and dishonour he received in the invasion of France, by the way of Provence, to Antoine de Leva, whether justly or no, I know not; but howsoever, all the Historians of that time agree, that the sorrow thereof cost that brave Captaine his life. Certainly to give any violent advice in doubtfull enterprises is rather a testimony of love, than of wisdom, in the giver; for the ill successe is alwaies cast upon the Councell, the good never wants a Father, though a false one, to acknowledge it. Yet I have sometime known it, that great Commanders, who are for the present in place of Kings, have not onely bene dissuaded, but held, in a kind, by strong hand, from hazzarding their own persons, and yet have those kind of Mutiners never been called to a Marshalls Court.

§. II.

How the Citie of Rhodes was besieged by Demetrius.

THIS departure of Antigonus, left behind it many dead carcasses, and a great deale of joy in Egypt. Ptolomie held a solemne Feast, and sent Messengers abroad, loaden with glad newes, to Seleucus, Lysimachus, and Cassander, his Confederates: strongly encouraging all that side, with the report of this his late felicity, though it appeared but in a defensive Warre. Antigonus on the contrary, flattered himselfe with another interpretation, calling the joyes of his enemies for witnesses of his owne greatnesse, seeing they arose but from so little things: his enemies being but bare savers by the last bargain, and himselfe, as he supposed, having lost but a litle time, and no part of his honour in the late retreat. Howsoever it were, yet he meant to follow his affaires henceforth in another fashion; for that which he could not cleave a sunder by great blowes, he purposed by litle and litle to pare off, by cutting off the branches first, to fell the the Tree it selfe with the more facility. To effect which, he resolved (leaving the great ones to grow awhile) to roote up the Dependants of his Enemies: Dependants, whom the fore-named Confederates should be forc'd either to relieve, or to lose; and hereby he doubted not to draw them into the field, where the advantage of power, and of all other warlike provision promised him victory.

At this time the Cite of Rhodes was very mighty, being well governed, and having long held it selfe in good Neutrality; it drew the better part of all the trade of those parts, and therein a great deale of riches to it selfe; to maintain which, and to increase it, it furnished and kept on the Seas a Fleet of well armed Shippes, by which it not onely beate off all Pyrates and petty Thieves, but the reputation of their strength was so thereby so much encreased, as all the neighbour Princes sought their alliance and confederacy.

In this so dangerous a time (in which they must either refuse all that sought them, and so stand friendlesse and apart; or joyne themselves to some one, and thereby forgoe the peace, by which their greatnesse had growne) their affections carryed them to the Egyptian: both because the greatest part of their trade lay that way, as also for that Antigonus his disposition, greatnesse, and neighbourhood was fearfull unto them. This affection of theirs, with some other passages more apparent, gave argument of quarrell to Antigonus, who began to declare himselfe against them by petty injuries, of taking some of their ships, with such other grievances, while he made a more weighty preparation, to pursue the War against them openly and strongly. All things soon after ordered according to the greatnesse of the enterprize, he employed his Sonne Demetrius against them in their owne Iland, who brought such terrour upon the Citizens, that laying aside all respect of friendship and honour, they offered him their assistance and service against whomsoever Demetrius, who knew from whence this change came, and that the alteration was perswaded by feare, and not by love; raised his demands to an intolerable height, requiring a hundred Hostages to be delivered him, and liberty to lodge in their Port as many ships of War as himselfe pleased. These conditions more properly to be imposed upon a State already conquered, than on those who as yet had heard of nothing but a constrained assistance, restored unto the *Rhodian*s their lost courage, and made them resolve to defend their liberty to the last man: this taught them to infranchise all their able bond-men, and wisely rather to make them their fellow-Citizens, than to make themselves fellow-slaves with them.

Demetrius having refused the faire conditions offered (as the *Rhodian*s the fearfull ones propounded unto them) makes preparation for a long siege, and finding no appearance to carry the place in furie, he set in hand with his Engines of battery; in the invention and use of which, he did never shew himselfe a greater Artisan, than in this War. But in conclusion, after the Citizens had sustained all the assaults given them for a whole year, after many brave sallies out of the Town, and the famine which they endured within the Towne, which had proved farre more extreme, if Pholomy had not with many hazards relieved them, Demetrius by mediation of the Grecian Embassadors, gave over the sieges, a hundred hostages they gave him for performance of the peace made, but with exception of all the Magistrats and Officers of the Cite.

Hereunto Demetrius was brought by the usuall policie of War, and state: for while with the flower of all his fathers forces he lay before Rhodes, Cassander recovered many of those places in Greece, which Demetrius had formerly taken from him; neither did Cassander make the War as in former times, by practice and surprise, but by a strong and well compounded army, which he himselfe led as far as into Asia, and therewith greatly distressed and endangered Athens it selfe. On the other side (though with lesse successe) did Polyperchon invade Peloponnesus. These dangerous undertakings upon Greece, advised the Athenians and Aetolians to dispatch their Embassadors towards Demetrius, and advised Demetrius rather to abandon the enterprize of Rhodes, than to abandon the great honour which he had formerly gotten by setting all Greece at liberty.

Demetrius was no sooner out of the Iland, than that the *Rhodian*s erected statues in honour of Lysimachus and Cassander; but for Pholomy, whom they most affected, and from whom they received their most relief, they consulted with the Oracle of Jupiter, whether it were not lawful to call him a god. The Priests which attended in the Temple of Hamon, gave the same fair answer for Pholomy, which they had formerly done for Alexander his Master; for as Alexander consulted the Oracle with an Army at his heeles, so was Pholomy at this time Lord of the soile: and yet was this a far more cleanly creation than that done by the Athenians, who Deified Antigonus and Demetrius by decree of the people. A mad age it was, when so many of *Alexander*s Captaines could not content themselves with the stile of Kings, but that they would needs be called gods.

§. III.

How Demetrius prevailed in Greece. Cassander desires peace of Antigonus, and cannot obtaine it. Great preparations of War against Antigonus.

Demetrius coming with a strong Fleete and Army into Greece, quickly drave Cassander out of Asia; and pursuing his fortune, chased him beyond the straits of Thermopyla. Herein his reputation did much avails him; which was so great, that sixe thousand of his enemies Souldiers revolted unto him. So, partly by the greatnesse of his name, partly by force, he recovered in short space all that Cassander held in those straits, and giving liberty unto the people, he bestowed upon the Athenians those peeces, which had been fortified against them, to blocke them up. Then went he into Peloponnesus, where he found the like, or more easie successe: for he suddenly tooke Argos, Corinth, Sicyon, and the most of the Country, bestowing liberty upon such as needed it. The Town of Sicyon he translated by consent of the Citizens, from the old seat into another place, and called it after his owne name, Demetrius. This done, he betooke himselfe to his pleasure. At the Isthman games, he caused himselfe to be proclaimed Captaine General of Greece, as Philip and Alexander had been in former times; whereupon (as if he were now become as great as Alexander) he despised all others, making it a matter of jest, that any, save himselfe or his father, should usurpe the name of King. But in his behaviour he was so farre unlike to a King, that in all the time of his leaseure, he deserved none other name than of a drunken Palliard. Yet were the Athenians as ready as ever to devise new honours for him: among which they made one Decree, That whatsoever King Demetrius should command, ought to be held sacred with the gods, and just with men.

All Greece being now at the disposition of Antigonus, Cassander stood in great feare, lest the war should fall heavily upon him in Macedon: which to avoyd, he knew no better way than to make peace with his enemies betimes. And to that purpose he sent Embassadors; but had no better answer from Antigonus, than that he should submit his whole estate to his discretion. This proud demand made him looke about him, and labour hard in solliciting his friends, both to assist him, and take heed to themselves; neither found he them slow in apprehending the common danger: for Lysimachus knew that if once Cassander had lost Macedon, Demetrius would soon be Master of Thrace. Neither were Pholomy and Seleucus ignorant of that which was like to befall them, if Antigonus were suffered to put himselfe in quiet possession of those Provinces in Europe. Wherefore it was agreed, that with joynt forces they should all together set upon the common enemy.

Hereof Antigonus had notice; but scorned all their preparations, saying, That he would easily scatter them, as a flock of birds are driven away with a stone. With these conceits he pleased himselfe, and no way hindred the proceedings of his Enemies. He lay at that time in his Towne of Antigonia (a name that it must shortly lose) where he was carefully providing to set out some stately game and Pageants, in ostentation of his glory. But thither was brought unto him the tumultuous newes of Lysimachus his victories about Hellepont. For Cassander had committed unto Lysimachus part of his forces, wherewith to passe over into Asia, while he himselfe with the rest should oppose Demetrius on Europe side. So Lysimachus passing the Hellepont, began to make hot War upon the subjects of Antigonus; getting some of the Cities in those parts, to joyne with him by faire means; winning others by force, and wasting the Country round about.

To repress this unexpected boldnesse, Antigonus made hasty journeys, and came soon enough to recover his losses; but not strong enough to drive Lysimachus home, or compell him to come to battell. Lysimachus waited for the coming of Seleucus; keep-ping himselfe the whilest from necessity of fighting. But Babylon was far off; and Seleucus his preparations were too great to bee foote in a readinesse. The Winter also did hinder his journey: which enforced them on both sides to rest in some quiet, without performing any matter of importance. This delay of debating the quarrell in open field, held all those Nations in a great suspense, & bred much expectation. Yet might all have come to nothing, had not Antigonus bin so forward, that he refused to yeeld upon any peaceable conditions. At length Seleucus drew neare with a mighty Army of his owne (for he had gathered strength in that long time of leasure, which Antigonus had given him) and with great aid from Ptolomie, that was joynd with his forces.

To helpe in this needfull case, Demetrius was called over into Asia by his Fathers letters: which he readily obeyed. Before his departure out of Greece, he made peace with Cassander, upon reasonable termes: to the end he might not be driven to leave any part of his Army for defence of the Country; and that his journey might be without any such blemish of reputation, as if hee had abandoned his Dependants: for one Article of the peace was, That all the Cities of Greece should be at liberty. Cassander was glad to be rid of an Enemy that was too strong for him. Yet would this league have done him little good, if things had fallen out contrariwise than they did in Asia; seeing the ratification thereof was referred unto Antigonus. It sufficed, that for the present, every one found means to cleare himselfe of all incumbrances else where, to the end that each of them might freely apply himselfe to the rryall of the maine controversie in Asia.

§. IIII.

How Antigonus was slaine in a great battell at Ipsus, neare unto Ephesus; wherein his whole estate was lost.

Seleucus, with his Sonne Antiochus, joyning with Lysimachus, compounded a great Army, which was (all considered) not inferiour to that of the Enemy. In greatnesse of name (that helpeth much in all Warres, but especially in the Civill) they were rather unanferable than unequal to their adversaries: for Antigonus had of long time kept them under with a mastering spirit, and had been reputed a King indeed, when the rest were held but Usurpers of the Title. Likewise Demetrius was generally acknowledged a brave Commander, having given proofe of his worth in many great services of all kinds, and enriched the art of war with many inventions, which even his enemies, and particularly Lysimachus, did much admire. Seleucus, who had some times flattered Antigonus, and fearfully stolne away from him to save his life, with young Antiochus, a Prince not heard of before this journey; and Lysimachus, that had lived long in a corner, hardly keeping his owne from the wilde Thracians; wanted much in reputation, of that which was yeelded to their opposites: yet so, that as ancient Captains under Philip and Alexander, two of them were held worthy enough to receive any benefit that fortune might give, and the third a Prince of great hope, whereof he now came to make experience.

The Souldiers, on both sides, were for the most part hardy and well exercised: many of them having served under Alexander; though of those old Companies, the long space of two and twenty years had consumed the greatest number. But concerning their affections, the followers of Seleucus were easily perswaded, that in this battell they must either get the upper hand, or put in extreme danger all that belonged unto the Confederate Princes; whereas Antigonus his men could discern no other necessity of fighting, than the obstinate quality of their Lord, that needs would be Master of all. Antigonus had about threecore and ten thousand foot, ten thousand horse, and threecore and fiftene Elephants. His enemies were fixe thousand short of him in number of their foot; in horse they had the oddes of five hundred; of Elephants they had foure hundred, and an hundred and twenty armed Chariots of War: which helpees, though they little had availed the Persians, yet were they not to be despised, in the hands of a good Captain.

Antigonus himselfe, either troubled with the unexpected greatnesse of his enemies forces, or presaging little good like to ensue, grew very pensive, consuming much in private private with his sonne whom hee commended to the Army as his Successor: whereas in former times he had never been so jocund, as towards the houre of battaile, nor had been accustomed to make his son, or any other, private to his counsaile, before it required execution. Other tokens of bad lucke, either foregoing the fight, or afterwards devised, I hold it needlesse to recount. Diana of Ephesus dwelt neere to the place of battell, a buisie goddess in many great fights; and therefore likely to have bene thrust into the fable, if any matter, neerly resembling a miracle, had chanced.

It is easie to beleeve, that these two so gallant Armies, containing well neere all the strength of Alexanders whole Empire, performed a notable fight, being led by such worthy Commanders, and whom the issue thereof did highly concerne. Yet are few of the particulars recorded: an easie losse in regard of the much variety, wherewith every story aboundeth in this kinde. The most memorable things in the battaile, were these: Demetrius with his best force of horse, charged valiantly upon young Antiochus; whom when he had broken, and put to flight, hee was so transported with the heat of his good successe, that he never gave over his pursuit, but left his Father naked, and lost thereby both him, and the victory. For when Seleucus perceived this advantage, hee enterposed his Elephants, betweene Demetrius and the Phalanx of Antigonus; and with many troupes of horse offering to breake upon the enemies battaile, whersoever it lay most open, he did so terrifie the Antigonians, that a great part of them rather chose to revolt from their Lord, whilst they were fairely invited, than to sustaine the fury of so dangerous an impression. This cowardize, or rather treason of some, discouraged others; and finally, cast them all into flight; exposing their Generall to the last end of his destinies. Antigonus was then fourescore yeares old, very fat and unwieldy, so that hee was unfit for flight, if his high spirit could have entertained any thought thereof. He had about him some of his most trusty followers, & as many others as he could hold together. When one that perceived a great troupe making towards his person, told him, Sir King, yonder company meanes to charge you; He answered, well may they; for whodefends me? but anon Demetrius will relieve me. Thus expecting to the very last, that his son should come to the rescue, he received so many Darts into his body, as tooke away his last ambitious hopes, but then fearfull hopes, together with his troublesome life.

His great ability in matter of Armes, together with his unsatiable desire of Empire, have sufficiently appeared in the whole Volume of his actions. He was more feared by his enemies, than loved by his friends; as one that could not moderate his fortune, but used insolence towards all alike, as if it had bin some vertue neere representing a Kingly Majestie. This was the cause that so many of his followers revolted to his enemies; and finally, that a great part of his Army forooke him in his last necessity. For those Kings and Princes that call all the carefull indeavours of their Vassalls, onely duty and debt; and are more apt to punish the least offences, than to reward the greatest services: shall finde themselves upon the first change of fortune, (seeing it is love onely that staies by adversity) not only the most friendlesse, but even the most contemptible, and despised of all other. This Antigonus found true in part, while he lived; in part he left it to be verified upon his son.

§. V.

How Demetrius, forsaken by the Athenians after his overthrow, was reconciled to Seleucus and Ptolomy, beginning a new fortune, and shortly entering into quarrels.

For Demetrius, at his returne from the idle pursuit of young Antiochus, finding all quite lost, was glad to save himselfe, with foure thousand horse and five thousand foot, by a speedy retrace unto Ephesus, whence hee made great haste unto Athen, as to the place, that for his sake would suffer any extremity. But whilest hee was in the midst of his course thither, the Athenian Embassadors met him with a decree of the people, which was, that none of the Kings should bee admitted into their Citie. These were Embassadors, not Theoris, or Consulters with the Oracle, it was a shamelesse ingratitude in the Athenians, to reward their Benefactor, in his misery, with such a decree: neither did any part of his calamity more afflict the unfortunate

Hhh

Prince,

Prince than to see his adversity despised by those whom hee had thought his surest friends. Yet was he faine to give good words. For he had left many of his ships in their Haven, of which he now stood in great need; & therefore was faine to speake them faire, that somtimes had grossly flattered him. But he shall live to reach them their old language, & speake unto them in another tune. When he had gotten his ships, he failed to the Milimus, where he found nothing but matter of discomfort. His Garrisons were every where broken up; the Souldiers having betaken themselves to his enemies pay. So that the was King only of a small Army and Fleet, without money or means wherewith to sustaine him & his followers any long time. All the rest, or the greatest part of his Fathers large Dominion, was now in dividing among the Conquerors, and those few places which he as yet held for him (having not perchance heard the worst of what had happened) he no way knew how to relieve: for to put himselfe into the field on that side of the Sea, hee had no power; and to inclose himselfe in any of them, how strong soever, were but to imprison his fortune, and his hopes, or therein indeede to bury himselfe and his estate: He therefore creeping thorow those bushes that had fewest briars, fell upon a corner of Lyfimachus his Kingdome, whereof he gave all the spoile that was gotten, to his Souldiers, his owne losses having beene too great to be repaid againe by small prizes.

In the meane while the Confederate Princes had wherewithall to busie themselves, in the partition of those Provinces, of which their late victory had made them Lords: wherein Seleucus had a notable advantage by being present, and Master of the field; for neither Ptolomy nor Cassander were at the overthrow given, having onely sent certaine troupes to re-inforce the Army which Seleucus led, who tooke hold of a part of Asia the lesse, and all Syria, being no otherwise divided from his owne Territory, than by the River of Euphrates. For there had not any order beene taken by the Confederates, for the division of all those Lands: because they did not expect so prosperous an issue of that warre, which they made onely in their owne common defence. It was therefore lawfull for Seleucus, to make the best benefit that hee could of the victory, at which nevertheless others did repine, and though they neither could nor durst accuse him of ill dealing for the present, yet seeing the over-greatenesse of Seleucus brought no lesse danger to the rest of the new Kings, than that of Antigonus had done, they consulted upon the same reason of State as before, how to oppose it in time. Neither was Seleucus ignorant of what they had determined; for he read it in the Law universall of Kingdomes and States, needing no other intelligence. Hereupon they forget friendships on all sides, and cure themselves of all unprofitable passion, the hatred of each to other, and their loves being laid on the one side, against their profits on the other, were found so far too light, as Seleucus, who had to day slaine Antigonus the father, and driven Demetrius the sonne out of Asia, sought to morrow how to march himselfe with Stratonica, Demetrius his Daughter, and so by Demetrius to serve his time against Lyfimachus.

The story of this Stratonica, with whom young Antiochus, the sonne of Seleucus fell so passionately in love, and so dis tempered, as Seleucus his father, to save his sonnes life, gave her (though shee were his wife) unto him; and how his passion was discovered by his pulse, is generally noted by all Writers. But neither did this alliance between Seleucus and Demetrius; betweene Ptolomy and Lyfimachus; betweene Demetrius and Cassander; betweene Demetrius and Ptolomy; though for the present it brought him againe into the ranke of Kings; otherwisely any of them to each other, than the marriages between Christian Kings have done in latter times, namely between the Austrians, the Aragonians, the French, & other Princes; neither have the Leagues of those elder times beene found more faithfull, than those of the same latter times have beene; as in the stories of Charles the eighth of France, & of Charles the Emperour, of France the first, and of the Kings of Naples, Dukes of Millan, and others, the Reader may observe: betweene whom from the year of our Lord, One thousand four hundred ninety and five, when Charles the eighth undertooke the Conquest of Naples, to the year One thousand five hundred fifty and eight, when Henry the second died, the Histories of those times tell us, that all the bonds; either by the Bedde or by the Booke, either by Weddings, or Sacramentall Oaths, had neither faithfull purpose nor performance. Yet did Demetrius reap this profit by giving his daughter to his enemy Seleucus, that he recovered Cilicia from Plistarchus, the brother of Cassander, who had gotten it as his share in the divison of Antigonus his possessions: for the Intruder was not strong enough to hold it by his proper forces from him; that entred upon it as a lawfull Heire, neither would Seleucus lend him any helpe, as by the rule of Confederacy hee should have done against the common enemy. So Plistarchus with very angry complaint, as well against Seleucus as Demetrius, went unto Cassander; whither Phila, their sister, followed him shortly, to pacifie them both, & keep all quiet; being sent for that purpose by Demetrius her husband, that was not strong enough to deale with Cassander; and therefore glad to make use of that bond of alliance betwixt them, whereof in his owne prosperity, he never tooke notice to the others good. About the same time hee tooke to Wife a daughter of Ptolomy (plurality of Wives being familiar with these Macedonians, who had learned it in their Eastern conquests) & so was he by two marriages rather freed from two enemies, than strengthened with two friends; for neither of them wished him any good, otherwise than might seeme to advance their owne ambitious desires.

Seleucus and Ptolomy could both of them have beene contented better, that Demetrius, with helpe of their countenance, should seeke his fortune somewhat farther off, than settle his estate under their noses. Particularly, Seleucus thought that Cilicia lay very fitly for himselfe: and Ptolomy had a great appetite (which yet he concealed a while) to the Ile of Cyprus. Now whether it were so, that Seleucus would faine have set his new father-in-law upon the necke of Lyfimachus; or whether hee were indeede greedy of the bargain; he offered to buy of Demetrius for ready money, his late purchase of Cilicia. Hereunto Demetrius would not haerken, but meant to keep as much land as he could, having already found in Cilicia twelve thousand talents of his fathers treasure, that would serve him to make sport a while. This refusall so displeased Seleucus, that in angry terms he demanded the Cities of Tyre and Sidon, to be surrendered unto him; which were the onely places in Syria, that had not followed the fortune of the late great battaille. In stead of giving them up, Demetrius tooke present order to have them better manned; & spake it stoutly, That were hee overcome a thousand times, yet would he not hire Seleucus to become his Son-in-law. In this quarrell Seleucus was generally reprehended, as one of a malignant disposition, that would breake friendship with his Father-in-law for two Townes, from whom he had already taken more than well he knew how to govern. But the fire consumed it selfe in words, which had it fastened upon armes, like it is that the weaker should have found friends out of envie to the stronger.

§. V I.

How Demetrius won the City of Athens, and prevailed in Greece, but lost in Asia.
Of troubles in Macedon following the death of Cassander.

In the meane while, the Athenians not knowing how to use the liberty which Demetrius had bestowed on them, were fallen by sedition, under the tyranny of Laches. Through which alteration their dis tempered City was so weakened, that it seemed ill able to keepe off the punishment due to their late ingratitude. This advantage hastened him, whom they had once called their God and Saviour, to present himselfe unto them, in the habit of a revenging fury. He brought against them all the force that hee could well spare from other employments; which were at that time perhaps the more, because his doubtfull Easternne friends, were unwilling to give impediment to any business, that might entangle him in Greece. His first enterprize in Athens had ill successe; a great part of his fleet perishing in a tempest. But he soone repaired the losse; and (after some victories in Peloponnesus, where hee wan divers Towns that had fallen from him) returning to the enterprize, wasted the Country of Attica, and cut off all reliefe from the City, both by Land and Sea.

Athens was not able to feed the great multitude within it, any long time: for it stood in a barren soile, and wanted now the command of those Ilands, and places abroad, from whence it was wont to be stored with victuals; being also destitute of means to keep such a Navie, as might bring in supply, or dare to do any thing at Sea, against that of Demetrius. Yet was there some hope of succour from Ptolomy, who (trusting thereby to win the love of Greece) had laden a hundred and fifty ships with corn, and sent them to relieve the hungry City. But these hundred and fifty were unable to deale with three hundred good fighting ships, which Demetrius had; rather they feared to become a prey to him, & therefore hastened them away betimes, as having done enough, in adventuring to come so neere that they might be defied. This brake the heart of the people, among whom the famine was so extreme, that a Father and his Son did fight for a dead Mouſe, which dropped downe betwene them from the house top. Wherefore they sent Embassadors to yeeld up the Towne, and crave pardon, having so farre offended, that out of desperation, they made it a capitall offence to propoſe any motion of peace. Yet were they faine to abolish this decree: rather because they knew not what else to do, than because they hoped to be forgiven.

Demetrius, contented with the honour of the victory, did not only forbear to take away the lives of these unthankfull men, which they had submitted unto his mercy; but out of his liberality gave them food, & placed in Office amongst them such as were most acceptable to the people. Nevertheless he was growne wiser than to trust them so far as he had done in times past. And therefore, when (among other flattering acclamations) they bade him take their Havens, and dispose of them at his pleasure; hee was ready to lay hold upon the word, & leave asure Garrison within their walls, to keep them honest perforce. After this hee went into Peloponnesus, vanquished the Lacedemonians in two batailles, and was in very faire possibility to take their City: when the dangerous newes of Lysimachus and Ptolomy, that prevailed faster upon him elsewhere, than himselfe did upon his enemies in Greece, called him in all haste. Lysimachus had won many Towns in Asia; Ptolomy had gotten all the Isle of Cyprus, except the City of Salamis, wherein Demetrius had left his Children & Mother, that were straightly besieged. Whilst he was bethinking himselfe which way to turne his face, a notable piece of businesse offered it selfe, which thrust all other cares out of his head.

Cassander was lately dead in Macedon, and soon after him, Philip his eldest son, whose two younger brethren, Antipater & Alexander, fought for the Kingdom. In this quarrell Thellonica the Daughter of King Philip, whom Cassander had married, seemed better affected to Alexander, than to her elder son: who thereupon grew so enraged, that most barbarously he flew his owne Mother. The odiousness of this fact gave a faire lustre to Alexander's cause: drawing the generality of the Macedons to take his part, as in revenge of the Queens death, upon that wicked parricide Antipater. But Antipater was so strongly backed by Lysimachus, whose daughter he had married; that Alexander could not hope to make his party good without some forraigne aide. For which cause he called in both Pyrhus & Demetrius; who how they dealt with him, it will soon appeare in the following Tragedy, of him and his brother. Their Father Cassander had been one that shined well for himselfe, at such time as every man sought how to get somewhat, in the ill ordered division of the Empire. He was cunning in practice, & a good Souldier: one of more open dealing than were his Companions, but withall more impudent, rudely killing those, whom others would more wisely have made away. He deeply hated the memory of Alexander, that had knocked his head against a wall, upon some opinion of contempt; & With Olympias he had an hereditary quarrell, derived from his father, whom the could not abide. Her feminine malice did so exasperate him, by cruelty that the used against his friends, both alive and dead; as it made him adventure upon shedding the Royall blood: wherewith, when once he had stained his hands, he did not care how farre he proceeded in that course of murder. His carelesness to destroy those women and children, whose lives hindred his purpose, argues him to have beene rather skilfull in matters of Armes, than a valiant man: such cruelty being a true marke of cowardize, which feares a far off the dangers, that may quietly passe away; and seeks to avoid them by base & wicked means, as never thinking it self safe enough, untill there be nothing left, that carries likelihood of danger. Of Olympias & Roxane it may be said, that they had well deserved the bloody end which over-tooke them; yet ill befecmed it Cassander to doe the office of a Hang-man. But Alexander's children had by no law of men, deserved to die for the tyranny of their Father. Wherefore, though Cassander died in his bed, yet the divine Justice brought swords upon his wife and children, that well revenged the cruelty of this bloody man, by destroying his whole house, as he had done his Masters.

§. VII.

Of Pyrhus and his doings in Macedon. The death of Cassanders children. Demetrius gets the Kingdome of Macedon; prevails in warre against the Greeks; Loseth reputation in his warre against Pyrhus, and in his civill Government, and prepares to win Asia. How all conspire against Demetrius. Pyrhus and Lysimachus invade him, his Army yeelds to Pyrhus, who shares the Kingdome of Macedon with Lysimachus.

Pyrhus, the Sonne of that unfortunate Prince Acacides, which perished in warre against Cassander, was hardly preserved, being a suckling Infant, from the fury of his Fathers enemies. When his Fosterers had conveyed him to Glaucias King of Illyria; the deadly hatred of Cassander would have bought his life with the price of two hundred Talents. But no man can kill him that shall be his heire. Glaucias was so farre from betraying Pyrhus, that he restored him byforce to his Fathers Kingdome, when he was but twelve yeeres of age. Within the compasse of fixe yeeres, either the indiscretions of his youth, or the rebellious temper of his Subjects, drave him out of his Kingdome, and left him to trie the world anew. Then went he to Demetrius (who married his sister) became his Page, followed him a while in his warres, was with him in the great battell of Ipsus, whence he fled with him to Ephesus; & was content to be hostage for him, in his reconciliation with Ptolomy. In Egypt he so behaved himselfe, that he got the favour of Berenice, Ptolomies principall wife; so that he married her Daughter, & was thereupon sent home, with mony & men, into Epirus; more beholding now to Ptolomy, than to Demetrius. When he had fully recovered the Kingdome of Epirus, and was settled in it, then fell out that busines between the children of Cassander, which drew both him and Demetrius into Macedon.

Antipater, the elder of Cassanders sons, was so farre too weake for Pyrhus, that he had no desire to attend the coming of Demetrius, but made an hasty agreement, and divided the Kingdome with his younger brother Alexander; who likewise felt the aide of Pyrhus so troublesome, that he was more willing to send him away, than to call in such another helper. For Pyrhus had the audacity to request, or take as granted, by strong hands, Ambracia, Acarnania, & much more of the Country, as the reward of his pains: leaving the two brethren to agree as well as they could about the rest. Necessity enforced the brethren to composition: but their composition would not satisfie Demetrius, who tooke the matter hainously, that he was sent for, and made a foole, to come so farre with an Army, and finde no worke for it. This was a frivolous complaint; whereby it appeared, that Demetrius had a purpose to doe as Pyrhus had done, and so much more, by how much he was stronger. Hereupon it seemed to Alexander a wife course, to remove this over-diligent friend, by murdering him upon some advantage. Thus Demetrius reported the story, and it might bee true; though the greatest part, and perhaps the wisest, beleaved it not. But the issue was, that Alexander himselfe was feasted and flaine by Demetrius; who tooke his part of the Kingdome, as a reward of the murder; excusing the fact so well, by telling his owne danger, and what a naughty man Cassander had beene, that all the Macedonians grew glad enough to acknowledge him their King. It fell out happily, that about the same time Lysimachus was buſied in warre with the King of the wilde Thracians: for thereby he was compelled to seek peace of Demetrius, which to obtaine he caused the remainder of Macedon to bee given up; that is, the part belonging to Antipater, his Son-in-law. At this ill bargain Antipater grievously stomed, though he knew not how to amend it: yet still he stomed; untill his Father-in-law, to save the labour of making many excuses, tooke away his troublesome life. Thus in haste, with a kinde of neglect, and as it were to avoid molestation, were flaine the children of Cassander: of Cassander that had slain his owne Masters children, in a wise course of policy, with carefull meditation (so much the more wicked as the more long) studying how to erect his owne house, that fell downe upon his grave, ere the earth on it was thoughtly settled.

It might be thought, that such an acceſſe of Dominion, added much to the greatnesse of Demetrius. But indeed it shewed his infirmity; and thereby made him neglected by many, and at length hated by all. For he had no Art of civill Government: but thought (or shewed by his actions that he thought) the use and fruit of a Kingdome, to be none

(who is highly commended for a wife and vertuous Lady) did poyson her selfe, upon desperate griefe for his misfortune. The first, upon whom he attempted to shew his anger, were the Athenians that had well deserved it. He began to lay siege to their Towne; but was pacified by Crates the Philosopher, whom they had made their spokel-man, and taking faire words in stead of satisfaction, passed over into Asia, with eleven thousand Souldiers, meaning to trie his fortune against Lysimachus, for the Provinces of Lydia and Caria.

At his first comming into those parts, fortune seemed to smile upon him. For many good Townes, willingly, or by compulsion, yielded to his obedience. There were also some Captaines that fell from Lysimachus to him, with their companies and treasures. But it was not longer ere Agathocles the son of Lysimachus, came upon him with an Army so strong, that it was not for Demetrius his good, to hazzard his last stocke against it. Wherefore, he resolved to passe through Phrygia & Armenia, into Media, & the Provinces of the higher Asia; trusting to finde a Kingdome somewhere in those remote quarters. The execution of this counsaile was grievously impeached by Agathocles: who pursued him close, and cut off all his provisions, driving him to take which wayes hee could, without following his intended course. In many skirmishes Demetrius vanquished this troublesome Enemy: nevertheless, he could not be shaken off, but continued afflicting the poore titular King, with extreme famine. At length, in passing the river Lycus, so many of Demetrius his men were lost, that the rest could no longer make resistance: but were driven to travaile with such speed as might well be called a plain flight. So that with famine, pestilent diseases following famine, and other accidents of warre, eight thousand of them were consumed: the rest, with their Captaine, escaped into Cilicia. Seleucus had gotten possession of Cilicia, whilst Demetrius was occupied in Greece: yet was it no part of Demetrius his errand, to lay claime to the Country; but with vehemence & humble letters he besought his Son-in-law, to call to mind their alliance, & to pity him in his great misery. These letters, at the first wrought well with Seleucus, and he condescended to the request: yet considering further how Demetrius had carried himselfe, when he recovered strength after the battell at Ipsus, he changed his purpose, and went against him with an Army.

Many treaties were held between them; of which none tooke effect, through the jealousy of Seleucus. Therefore, meer desperation enforced Demetrius to fight like a mad man, and his furies got him some victories, though of small importance. At length sickness tooke and held him forty dayes, in which time, a great number of his few men, ran to the enemy. This notwithstanding he still held out, and once had like to have taken Seleucus in his bed, had not his comming bene discovered by fugitives, that gave alarme. Finally, when all his Army had forsaken him, and left him with a few of his friends to shift for himselfe, he was compelled by the last of those adherents (for even some of those few forsooke him) to yeeld unto Seleucus.

Seleucus hearing this, was exceeding glad, and sent him very comfortable messages. But the approbation of his owne humanity, by his followers, was such, as renewed his jealous thoughts; and hindred him from admitting Demetrius to his presence, though otherwise he used him with as much favour, as any prisoner could wish. He was kept under sure guard in a demy-lland, wherein were goodly Walkes, Orchards, and Parkes for hunting. He had all that he asked royally, & friends allowed to visit him, at his, and their pleasure. Only his liberty was reserved unto the coming of young Antiochus and Syratonicus, out of the high Countries. In this sort he spent three years, living merrily all the while (as one that now enjoyed the happinesse, which with so much travaile and blood-shed, he had fought in vaine) and then dyed, leaving to his sonne Antigonus, the same which his father had left unto himselfe; that is, friends and hope. His ashes were honourably buried in Corinth; his qualities have appeared in his actions, and the fortune of his House will shew it selfe hereafter, in times and places convenient.

The death of Ptolomy, of Lysimachus, and of Seleucus, that was last of Alexander Captaines: with other occurrences.

About the same time that Demetrius died, died also Ptolomy King of Egypt, a vertuous Prince, warlike, gentle, bountifull, & (which in those times was a rare commendation) regardfull of his word. He had, by many Wives and Concubines, many children, out of whom he selected Ptolomy Philadelphus, and caused him to reigne together with himselfe, two or three yeares before he died, that so he might confirme him in the inheritance of the Kingdome. At this, Ptolomy Ceraunus (for all of that house assumed the name of Ptolomy) was grievously incensed. But no man cared for his anger. Therefore he went to Seleucus, who gave him loving entertainment. There were now only two of Alexanders Captaines left, Seleucus & Lysimachus. These two needs would fight for it, who should be the longest liver of that brave Company. The true ground of their quarrell, was their neere equality of strength, and want of one to part them. The pretence was the murders which Lysimachus had committed upon many of his Nobles, together with his poysoning Agathocles his eldest son: whose wife and children fled unto Seleucus for aide.

The Macedons after seven Moneths pause, having spent their first heat of admiration, began to harken so well to Lysimachus, their naturall Country-man, that they forsooke Pyrhus, upon none other ground than because hee was an Alien. This they had knowne well enough before: but they did him no great wrong in taking lightly from him, that they lightly gave him. Lysimachus had reigned about five yeares alone, when the City of Lysimachia (built by him, and called after his name) falling by an earth-quake, appeared by events, to have foreshewed the fall of his house. His owne jealousy, and the instigation of a Mother-in-law, caused him to poyson his Son Agathocles, which drew upon him that War, wherein (after the losse of all his fifteen children that were taken away by divers accidents) he perished himselfe.

Seleucus was encountered by Lysimachus on Asia side, where one battell concluded the warre, with Lysimachus his death. It pleased Seleucus more than the victory, that he was the last of all the great Heroes that followed Alexander. For now he seemed to himselfe as Lord and Heire of all the conquered World. So he passed over into Macedon, to take possession of Europe, where there was none to withstand him. But there he ended his days, and within seaven Moneths followed Lysimachus, and other of his fellows, by a bloody death, being treacherously slaine by Ptolomy Ceraunus, whose friend and Patron he had bin. Seventy & seven year old he was, when he fought with Lysimachus, and Lysimachus was seventy and foure. With them ended the generation of old Captaines, that had seen the daies as it were of another World under the Persian: yet was there left one equal to any of them in the Art of Warre: even Pyrhus the Epirot, of whom we spake before; that is now ready to enter into warre with the Romans, a more warlike people than Alexander himselfe did ever encounter. Of which warre, and of which people, it seemed full that wee here make mention, as of a story more important, than any likely to ensue in Greece, or in the great Kingdomes that were held by Alexanders Successors; with lesse (and still decreasing) vertue, than was that, by which they were first purchased.

CHAP. VII.

The growth of Rome: and settling of the Easterne Kingdomes.

S. I.

How the Romanes enlarged their Dominions in Italy, from the death of Tullus Hostilius; unto such time as they were assailed by Pyrrhus.

OW Rome was founded by Romulus; settled in good order by Numa Pompilius; and by many, though small, victories, it gathered strength, unto such time as it became the head of Latium, by the conquest of Alba, in the reign of Tullus Hostilius: it hath become already noted, in due order of time. But whereas now the Roman greatnesse beginneth to encounter the power of Greece; and extending it selfe out of Italy, to overwhelme the Dominions of other States and Princes: I hold it convenient (as in like cases I have done) briefly to set downe the growth of this mighty City in a compendious relation of those many actions, which could not have bene delivered in the ages, wherein they were severally performed, without much interruption of the History, that was then occupied in matter more important.

After the death of Tullus Hostilius (who when he had reigned two and thirty years, was burnt together with his house by lightning) Ancus Martius, Grand-child to Numa Pompilius by his daughter, and not much unlike him in disposition, succeeded in the Kingdom of Rome. He walled the City about; enlarged it with the hill Aventine, which he enclosed; built a bridge over Tybris, and the City of Ostia upon the Sea, sixteen miles distant from Rome. Finally, having reigned foure and twenty years, he died, and by his last Will he left his children in charge with one Lucumon, the son of Damaratus, a Corinthian, who avoiding Cypselus King of Corinth his tyranny, had fled into Hetruria, and dwelt in Tarquinii, by the name of which Towne he was afterwards called Tarquinus. From that City in Hetruria comming to Rome, & encouraged by some ominous occurrences, together with his wife Tanaquil's prophesie, he grew a favorite of Ancus Martius; by his Grecian wit humouring the factions of the Roman Court, in so much that after his decease, he became not only Protector to the children, but Governour to the City. He doubled the number of Senatours, and enlarged the Centurions of Horsemen: neither was he lesse eminent in warre, than in peace: for he prevailed often against the Tuscans, and from his victories, the chiefest ornaments of triumph tooke their originall. When this Lucius Tarquinus had reigned eight and thirty yeeres, hee was slaine by the sons of Ancus Martius, to whom he had been left Guardian. But Tanaquil his wife, perceiving what was done, informed the people, from out of an high Turret, that her Husband was wounded, and sicke, but not dangerously. And withall signified unto them, that in the interim of this sickness, one Servius Tullius, whom from his birth she alwaies prophesied to be borne to great hopes (the sonne of P. Corniculannus and Oerisina, a well defended, but captive woman) brought up in her house, and husband unto her daughter, should supply her husbands place, in governing the State, untill his recovery: which government, being thus at first obtained by cunning, he afterwards usurped as his right. He first ordained Ratements, Subsidies, and valuations of the peoples wealth; among whom, at that time, fourescore thousand were mustered, of which number consisted their whole corporation; and by distinction of Dignities, Ages, Trades, and Offices, he managed the Kingdom in as good sort, as if it had beene a private household. At length, having two daughters of different natures, the one milde and gentle, the other fierce and outrageous: and finding also that the two sonnes of Tarquinus Priscus, Sextus and Aruns, which had bene committed unto his tuition, were of different dispositions, proportionably answering to his daughters; he (willing to adde water, not oyle, to fire) gave the milde daughter to Sextus the hot-headed son, & the violent, to Aruns the gentle in marriage. But whether by intended courses, or by accident, it hapned; the two milde ones being made away, the furious natures were readily joined in marriage: who soon concurring, and calling the Senate together, began to lay claime to the Kingdome. Upon this tumult, Servius Tullius hastning to the Senate, (where hee thought by authority to have the way, when he had reigned forty & foure yeeres. Then Tullia his daughter, first proman to drive his Chariot over her fathers corpses; whereupon the street had the denomination of wicked street. This Tarquinius, exercising cruelty without justice, & tyranny without mercy, upon the people & Senators; having tired himselfe & them at home, uled the same rage of treachery upon his borders. He tooke Ocriculum, Sueffa, Fometia, and the Gabii. The issue of besieging Ardea, a towne eighteen miles distant from Rome, was of bad successe. In the heat of which warre, his sonne Sextus Tarquinus violently ravished that chaste Lady Lucretia, his kisman Collatines wife: who in way of expiation for so unchaste a deed, thought good to wash out those spots of infamy with her owne blood; so having first bequeathed the revenge unto her father Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, her husband Collatine, and Junius Brutus (she kill'd her selfe: whereupon chiefly by Junius Brutus his resolution) Tarquinus Superbus, with his wife & children, was depofed and banished; & fled to Porfenna King of Hetruria for succour, in the five & twentieth year of his reign, and the two hundred forty and fourth from the building of their City: in which space Rome had scarce gotten possession of fifteene miles round about her.

Junius Brutus by the helpe of Collatine, having expelled Tarquinius, & freed his Country from that heave yoke of bondage, enforced the people by solemne oath, never to admit any government by Kings amongst them: whereupon they ransacked their Kings goods, consecrated their fields to Mars, & conferred the government of the State upon Brutus and Collatine. But because the name of King was odious in their eares, they changed the manner of their government, from perpetuall to annuall, and from a single governour to a double; left perpetuall or sole dominion might be some motive to usurpation; & in stead of Kings they called them Consuls, signifying, as it may be interpreted, Providers: that their titles might remember them of their place, which was to bee always mindefull of their Citizens welfare. And yet was it so hard settling of troubled waters, that the people, after this innovation of State, scarce daring to assure themselves of their owne security, enforced Tarquinus Collatine to resigne up his authority, fearing that tyranny would bee hereditary, and supposing that the very name and affinity with the house of Tarquinius, favoured already of their condition. In his room he substituted Valerius Publicola, who that he might (as his name importeth) be gracious in the peoples eyes, gave liberty, in matters of controversie, to appeale from the Consuls to the people: and that hee might as well in goods as in person, avoid occasion of suspition, caused his owne house to be pulled downe, because it was built in a place defensible, as if it had beene a Cittadell. Neither was Brutus any wayes deficient in matter of greater moment; which concerned as well the peoples safety, as their favour: for having got intelligence, that some greener wits, and in the first ranke his owne sonnes, were itching after innovations, hoping to restore the banished Kings; hee caused them, publicly in the Market-place, to be whipt, and then to be brought all impartially to the blocke.

Hitherto the Romanes, having by the unblemished integrity of Brutus, well appeased all kindred quarrels at home, now hereafter employ their military designements against their neighbours: first, for their liberty; secondly, for enlarging of their possessions; & lastly, for defending their confederate Provinces, & extending their Empire. For Rome, situated as it were in the mid-way betwixt Latium and the Tuscans, having as yet but narrow bounds, being in her minority, could not but give occasion of offence to her neighbours; untill by maine opposition, having prevailed against her borderers, shee used them as instruments, whereby to obtaine the rest.

Their first war, in the first yeere of Consuls, was against Porfenna King of Hetruria: who being over-perswaded by Tarquinius lamentation, came to Rome, together with the banished King, and with great forces, to seate him againe in his Kingdome. In the first conflict, Horatius Coclus, having long time borne the maine brunt of his enemies, on the bridge over Tibris; at length, feeling himselfe too faint to stand against so many, caused the bridge behinde him to be broken downe, and with his armour, leaping into into the River, like a hunted Stagge, refreshed his hot spirits, and returned safe to his fellows, with the like resolution to sustaine a new charge. Porfenna, although by this he had well-nigh won the hill Janiculus, which is the very entrance into the City, & found the victory, in a manner, assuredly his owne: yet admiring their valour, & terrified by the constant resolution of Marius Scævola (who having by error slaine Porfenna his Secretary, in stead of the King himselfe, did in scorn of torments threatned, burne off his own hand) he thought it not any whit prejudiciall, either to his safety, or credit, to enter league with them at the worst hand. And yet the edge of Tarquinius his spleen was not quite abated, though Aruns his sonne, & Brutus his enemy, in single combat, had slaine each other. And here the Romans, although they lost Brutus, got the field; and their Ladies, whose Champion he was, for their chastity, not for beauty, mourned the losse of him one whole yeare. Into his place, for the residue of his yeare, was subrogated Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, father to Lucretia: and in his roome (deceasing naturally before the yeare expired) Horatius Pulvillus.

Tarquine, upon his overthrow, feeling the fates distastefull, thought it no boot to strive against the streame, but spent the residue of his time, which was about fourteene yeares, privately at Tusculum. Yet his Son-in-law Mamilius Tusculanus, stomaching a-fresh at those old repulses, because Porfenna had made peace with the Romans, and denied further succour unto the Tarquines, mustered up his Latines, & gave battell to the Romans, at the Lake Regillum; where the conflict was fierce, & the issue uncertaine, untill Anlus Posthumus, the Roman Dictator, (for they had created this Magistracy greater than Consuls, purposely for this Warre, when first it was expected) to exasperate his Souldiers courage, threw their owne Ensignes amidst the Enemies; & Cassius or Spurius Cassius, (Master of the Horse-men, an assistant Officer to the Dictator) commanded to take off their bridles, that they might run with free violence, to recover againe their Ensignes. This fight was so well performed, that a report went of Castor and Pollux, two gods, who came on milke-white Steeds, to be eye-witnesses of their valour, and fellow-helpers of their victory; for the Generall consecrated a Temple to them, as a stipend for their paines. After this the Romans fierce spirits, having no object of valour abroad, reflected upon themselves at home; and the sixteenth yeare after the Kings expulsion, upon instigation of some desperate bankrupts, thinking themselves wrongfully oppressed by the Senate and Consuls, they made an uproare in the holy Mount, untill by Meventus Agrippa, his discreet allusion, of the inconvenience in the head and bellies discord, to that present occasion, they were reconciled to the Senate: with condition, that they might have some new Magistrates created, to whom they might appeale in cases of variance, and make them Solicitors in all their controversies, the Consuls authority notwithstanding. This was enacted, and they were called the Tribunes of the people. After this attonement among themselves, they had continuall Warre with the Latines, concerning their bounds and limits, and with other neighbouring States. Among these, the Volsi and Aequi held them longest; who made Warre of themselves upon the Romans: whereby they lost the best City in their whole jurisdiction, Corioli.

In this conquest, T. Marius got the surname of Coriolanus: a name honorable then, as derived from a great victory; although, by reason of the poverty of the Towne, a Roman General, in after times, would have bin ashamed of that title. But yet these graces had bin no occasion of disparagement, had he not afterwards in a great time of dearth, advised to sell corne, which they procured from Sicily, at too high a rate, to the people, whereupon, Decius Mus, their Tribune, in their behalfe, accused him, & after judgement banished him. Coriolanus flying to the Volsi, whom lately before he had vanquished, incensed them to renew their forces againe; which being committed unto him, and to Aruns Tullus, he prevailed in field, so far forth, that he was come within foure or five miles of the City. Incamping there, he made so sharp warre, and was at such defiance with his Country, that he would not relent by any supplication of Embassadors, untill his Mother Veturia, & Volumnia his wife, with a pittifull tune of deprecation, shewing themselves better Subjects to their Country, than friends to their Son and Husband, were more available to Rome, than was any force of Armes. Hereupon Coriolanus dismissing his Army, was after put to death among the Volsi, as a Traitor, for neglecting such opportunity, or (as others surmise) living with them untill old age, he died naturally.

No

Not long after this the Veii in Hetruria, provoked the Romans; against whom the Fabii, three hundred and sixe in number, all of one Familie, intreated and obtained, that they only might be employed, as it had bin in a private quarrell. These Fabii, after some good services, lying incamped at Cremera, were circumvented, and all slaine: one only of that whole houle had bin left, by reason of infancie, at home; from whom afterward sprang Publius Maximus, who vanquished Hannibal.

In proceesse of time, the Romans were also troubled with the Volsi, at the hill of Algidum, two miles from Rome; where Lucius Minutius their Consul, with his whole armie, had bin discomfited, had not L. Quintius Cincinnatus chosen Dictator, and taken from the plough to the highest honour in Rome, with successe answerable to his expedition, dispersed his enemies, and freed his Countrey in the space of sixteen dayes. In the continuance of this Volsian war it was that Appius Claudius, one of the ten men, whom they had two yeares before chosen Governors of the State, and Inactors of Solons lawes amongst them, procured from Athens (abrogating in the mean while the Consuls, and all other Magistrates) would have ravished Virginitas, the daughter of T. Virginus, Captain of a company, and lying then in a Campe at Algidum. Hereupon the people in an uproare tooke the Hill Aventine, and after much variance, enforced the ten men to resign up their authority againe to new Consuls.

After this, either new quarrels, or desire to revenge old losses, drew the Romans into a new war against the Veientes and their adherents; upon whom, having tried their forces with diversitie of Capitaines, and varietie of event, they vanquished the Falisci; and the Fidenates, and utterly subdued the Veientes. In conquering the Falisci, Furius Camillus shewed no lesse integritie than fortitude. For when a Schoolemaster, by trayning forth into the Roman campe, many children of the principall Citizens, thought to betray the Towne, yielding them all up as Hostages: Camillus delivered this Traitor bound unto his Schollers, willing them to whip him backe into the Citie; which forthwith yielded unto him in reverence of his justice. The siege of Veii was ten yeares, and so troublefome, that the Romans were there first enforced to winter abroad under beasts skins (to which they were the more easily induced, because then first they received pay) and to make vows never to return without victorie.

At length winning the Citie by a Mine, they got so large spoils, that they consecrated their tents to Apollo Pythius; and the whole people in generall were called to the ransacking of the Citie. But yet they were no less unthankful to Camillus for his service, than before they had been to Coriolanus; for they banished him the Citie, upon some occasion of inequality in dividing the spoils: yet he requited their unkindnesse with a new peece of service against the furie of the Gauls; who being a populous Countrey, and very healthfull, the fathers (as sometimes now) lived so long, that the sons, destitute of means, were enforced to roave abroad, seeking some place where to set up their rest: and withall being a Nation vaste in bodie, rude by nature, and barbarous in conditions, were wondered as Rovers over many Countries. Some of them fighting on Italie, set upon Chusum a Towne in Hetruria: whereof Rome having information, (and being careful of other Confederate Townes) sent Embassadors, warning them to desist from such injurious enterprises. But the barbarous people, not regarding the message, upon some injury offered by the Roman Embassadors, converted their forces from Chusum towards Rome; and giving a great overthrow unto the Romans, by the River Allia, upon the sixteenth day before the Calends of August (which day was after branded for unlucky, & called Alifensis in the Roman Kalender) they hastned towards the Citie. Then was Rome the true map of miserie and desolation. For some leaving the Citie; some creeping into holes; Priests hiding their reliques; and every one shifting for himselfe ere the pernicie came; Rome was abandoned as indefensible. The Vestall Virgins, in this tumult, were safely conveyed away; the Ancients of the Citie, gathering boldnesse out of desperate fear, did put on their Robes, and taking their leave of the world, did seat themselves in Thrones, in their severall houses, hourly expecting the messengers of death, and meaning to dye, as they had lived, in State. The younger sort, with M. Manlius their Capitaine, took upon them to make good the Capitoll.

By this the Gauls were entred the Citie, who seeing all quiet, at first suspected some ambush; afterward finding all secure, they fell to the spoyle, committing all to the fire and sword. As for the old Senators, they fate in their Majestie with a grave resolution, having having first revered them as gods, anon they tried whether they would die like men. When the Citie was thoroughly rifed, they attempted the Capitoll: which held them work for the space of seven months. Once they were like to have surpris'd it by night, but being defcried by the gagling of Geefe, M. Manlius did awaken, and kept them from the entrance. At length a composition was agreed upon: the Gauls being weary, and the Romans hungry. The bargain was, that the Gauls should take a thousand pound weight in gold, to desist from their siege. Whilest the gold was inweighing, the Gauls, with in open infolenie, made their weights too heave: Brennus their Captain, casting his sword into the ballance, and with a proud exprobration, saying, that the vanquish'd must be patient perforce. But in the middle of this cavilling came Furius Camillus with an Army from Ardea, (where he had lived in his banishment) and fell upon the Gauls, with such violence, that he disperfed their troupes, quenched the fire of the Citie with their blood, forcing them to restore the spoyles with advantage, and forbore the gold, in accepting which they had lately been so nice. Further, having rid the City of them, he so hotly pursued them through a great part of Italie, that the remainder of their Army, which escaped from him, was very small. Other Armies of the Gauls, which followed this first, had the like ill successe. They were often beaten by the Romans; especially the victories of M. Torquatus, and of M. Valerius Cervinus (each of which in single fight slew a severall Champion of the Gauls) abared their presumption, and restored courage to the Romans. Camillus, for his notable service, was afterwards accounted a second Romulus.

The people, after this destruction of their Citie, were earnestly bent to go to the Vei to inhabit; but Camillus dissuaded them.

About the sametime, somewhat before the siege of Vei they changed their government from Consuls to military Tribunes. The government of these also, after some yeares, was by civill dissention interrupted: so that one while Consuls ruled, another while there was an Anarchie: Then the Tribunes were restored and ruled againe, till after many yeares expired, the Consular authority was established, it being enacted, that one of the Consuls should alwaies be a Plebeian. This was after the building of the City 365. yeares. And now Rome by suppression of her neighbour Countries, creeping well forward out of her Minority, dares let forth against the warlike Samnites, who dwelt almost one hundred and thirty miles off: situated betwene Campania and Apulia. These did so strongly invade the Campanians their Neighbours, that they forced them to yield themselves subjects to Rome, and undergoe any conditions of Tribute, or whatsoever else to obtaine protection: which the Romans, although both Countries had been their Confederates, yet not willing that the greater, like fish, should devour the lesse, easily allowed of; aiming themselves at the good situation of Campania, the abundance of Come and Wine, pleasant Cities and Townes, but especially Capua it selfe, the fairest City then in all Italy.

The families of the Papirii and Fabii were most employed in the managing of this War, which endured the space of fifty yeares. And in this season were the Romans oftentimes dangerously encountered by the Samnites, as when T. Veturius and Sp. Posthumus were Consuls, and discomfited by Pontius at Caudium, with no small ignominie: and when Q. Fabius Gurges lost the field with three thousand men. But for those losses, many great victories made large amends: The greatest whereof were gotten by L. Papirius, and by Quintus Fabius Maximus.

The Samnites drew the Hetrurians into their quarrell. But the force of the Samnites was well broken, ere the Hetrurians (the greater and richer, but lesse warlike Nation) began to stir. So the one and the other of these two Countries, became at length tributary to Rome. In the continuance of this long war it was, (though in time of truce between the Romans and Samnites) that the Laines began to challenge equall freedome in the Corporation of Rome, and right in bearing office, so that they required to have one of the Consuls yearly chosen out of them.

This demand of the Laines was not unreasonable. For the Romans themselves were a Latine Colonie; besides all which, they made offer to change their name, and to be call'd Romans. But the Romans were too proud to admit any such capitulation. So a great battell was fought between them: wherein the fortune of Rome prevailed, by the virtue of the Consuls.

Manlius

Manlius Torquatus and the elder Decius were then Consuls, whom the Soothsayers advertis'd, that the side should be victorious which lost the Generall in fight. Hereupon Decius the Consull expos'd his life to the Enemie, and purchas'd victorie (as was beleev'd) by his death. In which kinde of devoting himselfe for his Armie, the sonne of this Decius being after Consull, did imitate his father in the Hetrurian warre. But (as Tully well notes) it was rather the desperate resolution of these Decii, that purchas'd victorie, by rushing into the midst of the enemies, wherein their Souldiers followed them, than any great commendation of such a religion, as required the lives of so wortheie Citizens, to be sacrific'd for their Countrey. The discipline of Manlius was no lesse resolute, than the valour of Decius. He forbade any one to forsake his place, and fight single with an enemy. For breach of which order he caus'd his own son to be put to death, who had slain a Captain of the Laines, being challenged in single fight.

Whenthe Laines, the Equi, Volsci, Hernici, Campani, Samnites, and Hetrurians, with some other people, were brought under obedience; it was a vain labour for any people of Italy to contend against the Romans.

Yet the Sabines adventured to trie their fortune, and found it bad. For Curius Dentatus the Roman Consull, waiting all their Countrey with fire and sword, from the River Nar and Velia, to the Adriatique Sea, brought them into quiet subjection.

The last of the Italians that made triall of the Roman arms, were the Tarentines and their adherents. These had interpos'd themselves as mediators between the Romans and Samnites; with a peremptorie denunciation of War, unto that partie which should dare to refuse peace by them tender'd. These threats which discover'd their bad affection unto Rome, ended in words; but when the Samnites were utterly subdued, matter enough of quarrell was found to examine their abilitie of performance.

The Romans complain'd that certain ships of theirs were robbed, and sent Embassadors unto Tarentum, to require amends. Upon some wrong done to these Embassadors, was laid the foundation of that War, wherein the Lucans, Messapians, Brutians, and Apulians, joyning with the Tarentines, procur'd the Samnites, and other Subjects of Rome to rebell, and take their part. But some experience of the Roman strength, taught all these people to know their own weaknesse. Wherefore they agreed to lend for Pyrrhus, by whose aide (being a Grecian, as the Tarentines also were) great hope was conceiv'd, that the Dominion of Rome should be confin'd unto more narrow bounds than all Italy, which already in a manner it did over-spread.

§. II.

How Pyrrhus warred upon the Romans, and vanquish'd them in two battailes.

Pyrrhus, forsaken by the Macedonians, and unable to deal with Lysimachus, was compell'd a while to live in rest: which he abhorred no lesse than a wiser Prince would have desired. He had a strong Armie, and a good Fleet, which in that unstudied estate of things, was enough to purchase a kingdom: but the fall of Demetrius had so increased the power of Lysimachus, that it was no point of wisdom to make an offensive war upon him, without far greater forces: Antigonus, the son of Demetrius, held Corinth at the same time, and some other Townes, with the remainder of his Fathers Armie and treasures, left in his hand. Upon him it is like that Pyrrhus might have won; but it was better to let him alone, that he might serve to give some hindrance to Lysimachus.

In this want of imployment, and covetous desire of finding it, the Tarentine Embassadors came very fitly to Pyrrhus: and they came with brave offers, as needing no other aide than his good conduct, which to obtaine, they would cast themselves under his protection. They had in their companie some of the Samnites, Lucanians, Messapians, and others; which promised, in behalf of their severall Nations, as much as could be desired. This encouraged Pyrrhus, and filled him with hopes of goodly conquests; that hee might enlarge his Empire to the West, as farre as Alexander had gotten Eastward; and fill by one victorie open the gate unto another. To which effect it is say'd, that once he answered Cineas his chiefe Counsellour, asking what hee meant to doe after every of the victories which he hoped to get: that having wonne Rome, hee would soone bee Master of all Italy; that, after Italy hee would quickly get the Isle of Sicily; that, out of Sicill, he would passe over into Affrick, and winne Carthage, with all the rest of the Country; and being strengthened with the force of all these Provinces, he would be too hard for any of those that were now so proud and troublesome. But Cyneas enquired yet further, what they should doe, when they were Lords of all: Whereunto Pyrrhus (finishing his drift) answered pleasantly, that they would live merrily; a thing (as Cyneas then told him) that they presently might doe, without any trouble, if he could be contented with his owne.

Nevertheless, this Italian expedition seemed unto Pyrrhus a matter of such consequence, as was not to be omitted, in regard of any scholasticall disputation. Wherefore he prepared his Army, of almost thirty thousand men, well sorted, and well trained fouldiers: part of which he sent over before him under Cyneas, with the rest he followed in person. At his comming, he found the Tarentines, very prompt of tongue, but in matter of execution, utterly carelesse to provide for the War. Wherefore he was faine to shute up their Theater, and other places of pleasure and resort; enforcing them to take Armes, and making such a strict muster, as was to them very unpleasing, though greatly behoo-ving to their estate.

Whilest he was occupied with these cares, Levinus the Roman Consul drew near, and began to waste Lucania, a Province confederate with the Tarentines in this War.

The Lucanians were not ready to defend their own Country; the Samnites were carelesse of the harme; that fell not (as yet) upon themselves; the Tarentines were better pleased than they would have beene, but their valour was little: all of these had beene accustomed to shrinke for feare, of the Roman fortitude: and therefore it fell out happily, that Pyrrhus relied more upon his owne forces, than the issue of their vaunting promises. He was now driven either to set forward with those that himselfe had brought into Italy, and the assistance of the Tarentines, wherein little was to be reposed; or else to weaken the reputation of his own sufficiency, which by all meanes he was carefull to uphold. In good time a great part of his forces, that had been scattered by foule weather at Sea, were safely come to him: with which he resolved to assay the valour of the Romans, against whom he proudly marched.

Levinus the Consul was not affrighted with the terrible name of a great King; but came on confidently to meet him, and gave him battell ere all his adherents should be ready to joyne with him. This boldnesse of the Roman, and the slacknesse of the Messapians, Lucanians, Samnites, &c others, whom the danger most concerned, caused Pyrrhus to offer a treaty of peace: requiring to have the quarrell between the Romans and his Italian friends, referred to his arbitrement. Whether he did this to win time, that the Samnites and their fellows might arrive at his Camp; or whether, considering better at neere distance, the weight of the businesse which he had taken in hand, he were desirous to quit it with his honour; the short answer that was returned to his proposition, gave him no means of either the one or the other: for the Romans sent him this word, that they had neither chosen him their Judge, nor feared him their enemy.

Hereupon both Armies hastened their march unto the River of Siris: Levinus intending to fight before the arrivall of the Samnites; Pyrrhus, to hinder him from passing that River, untill his own Army were full. Upon the first view of the Roman Campe, it was readily conceived by Pyrrhus, that he had not now to do with barbarous people, but with men well trained in a brave discipline of War: which caused him to set a strong Corps de garde upon the passage of the river, that he might not be compelled to fight, untill he saw his best advantage. But he quickly found, that this new enemy was not only skillfull in the Art of War, but courageous in execution. For the Roman Army entred the Foord, in face of his Corps de garde; and their horse, at the same time began to passe the River, in sundry places: which caused the Greekes to forsake the defence of their bank, and speedily retire unto their Camp.

This audacity forced Pyrrhus to battell; wherewith hee thought it best to present them, ere the whole Army had recovered firme footing, and were in order. So directing his Captaines how to marshall his battels; himselfe with the horse, charged upon the Romans: who stoutly received him, as men well exercised in sustaining furious impressions. In this fight, neither did his courage transport him beyond the duty of a carefull Generall; nor his providence in directing others, hinder the manifestation of his personall valour. It behoooved him indeed to do his best; for he never met with better opposers. Once, and shortly after the fight began, his horse was slaine under him: afterwards, he changed armour with a friend; but that friend paid his life for the use of his Kings armour, which was torne from his backe. This accident had almost lost him the battell: but he perceiving it, discovered his face, and thereby restored courage to his men, and took from the Romans their vain joy. The fight was obstinate, and with the greater losse (at least of more eminent men) on Pyrrhus his side, as long as onely speare and sword were used. But when the Elephants were brought into the wings, whose unusual form and terrible aspect, the horses of the Romans (unaccustomed to the like) were not able to sustaine; then was the victorie quickly gotten. For the Roman battels, perceiving their horse put to rout, and driven out of the field; finding also themselves both charged in flanke, and over-borne, by the force and huge bulke of those strange beasts; gave way to necessity, and saved themselves, as well as they could, by hasty flight: in which conformation, they were so forgetfull of their discipline, that they carried not to defend their Campe, but ran quite beyond it, leaving both it, and the honour of the day, entirely to Pyrrhus.

The fame of this victorie was soon spread over Italy; and the reputation was no lesse than the fame. For it was a matter very rare to be heard, that a Roman Consul, with a select Armie, should lose in plaine battell, not onely the Field, but the Campe itselfe, being so notably fortified as they alwaies were. And this honour was the more bravely won by Pyrrhus, for that he had with him none of his Italian friends, save the unwelcome Tarentines. Neither could he well dissemble his content that he took, in having the glory of this action peculiarly his own, at such time as he blamed the Lucans & Samnites, for comming (as we say) a day after the Faire. Nevertheless he wisely considered the strength of the Romans, which was such, as would better endure many such losses, than he could many such victories. Therefore he thought it good to compound with them, whilst with his honour he might; and to that purpose he sent unto them Cyneas his Embassador, demanding only to have the Tarentines permitted to live at rest, and himselfe accepted as their especiall friend. This did Cyneas, with all his cunning, and with liberal gifts labour to effect: but neither man nor woman could be found in Rome, that would take any bribe of him; neither did their desire of recovering their captives, or their danger, by the rising of many States in Italy against them, so incline them to peace, as the vehement exhortation of Appius Claudius, an old and blind Senatour, did stirre them up to make good their honour by war. So they returned answer, that whilst Pyrrhus abode in Italy, they would come to no agreement with him.

Such was the report that Cyneas made at his return, of the Roman puissance and vertue, as kindled in Pyrrhus a great desire of confederacie with that gallant Citie. Hereupon many kinde Offices passed between them: but still when he urged his motion of peace, the answer was; He must first depart out of Italy, and then treat of peace.

In the meane season, each part made provision for war; the Romans levying a more mighty armie than the former; and Pyrrhus being strengthened with access unto his forces of all the East parts of Italy. So they came to triall of a second battell, wherein (though after long and cruell fight) the boisterous violence of the Elephants gave to Pyrrhus a second victorie. But this was not altogether so joyfull as the former had bin: rather it gave him cause to say, that such another victorie would be his utter undoing. For he had lost the flower of his Armie in this battell: and though he drave the Romans from their Campe, yet he could not force them out of it, nor saw any likelihood of prevailing against them, that were like to be relieved with daily supplies, whilst he should be driven to spend upon his old stock. Neither could he expect that his Elephants should stand him in stead. A little knowledge of their manner in fight would soon teach the Romans, that were apt Schollers in such learning, how to make them unserviceable. Wherefore he desired nothing more, than how to carrie his honour safe out of Italy: which to doe (seeing the Romans would not helpe him, by offering or accepting any faire conditions of peace, or of truce) he tooke a sleight occasion, presented by fortune, that followeth to be related.

§. III.

The great troubles in Macedon and Sicill. How Pyrrhus, being invited into Sicill, forsook Italy, and the most of the Illes lost it in short space. Pyrrhus returns into Italie, where he is beaten by the Romanes, and so goes backe to his own Kingdome.

When Ptolomie Ceraunus had traiterously murdered his Benefactor and Patron Seleucus, he presently seized upon all the Dominions of Lysimachus in Europe, as if they had bin the due reward unto him, that had slain the Conqueror. The houses of Cassander and Lysimachus were then fallen to the ground: neither was there in Macedon any man of strength and reputation enough to advance himself against Ceraunus. The friends of Lysimachus were rather pleased to have him their King, that had (as he professed) revenged their Lords death; than any way offended with the odiousness of his fact, by which they were freed from subjection, to one, against whom they had stood in opposition. Many there were, that upon remembrance of his fickers great vertue, gathered hope of finding the like in Ceraunus: perswading themselves that his reign might prove good, though his entrance had bin wicked. These affections of the Macedonians did serve to defeat Antigonus the son of Demetrius, that made an attempt upon the Kingdome. As for Antigonus the sonne of Seleucus, he was far off, and might be questioned about some part of Asia, ere he should be able to bring an Armie neere unto Europe. Yet he made great shew of meaning to revenge his Fathers death: but being stronger in money than in armes, he was content, after a while, to take faire words, and make peace with the murderers. While these three strove about the kingdome, Pyrrhus, who thought his claime as good as any of theirs, made use of their diffention: threatening war, or promising his assistance to every one of them. By these meanes he strengthened himselfe, and greatly advantaged his Italian voyage, which he had then in hand: requesting money of Antiochus, ships of Antigonus, and souldiers of Ptolomie, who gave him his daughter in marriage, and lent him a strong power of Macedonian souldiers, and of Elephants (covenanting to have them restored at two years end) more for feare than for love: that so he might free himselfe from trouble, and quietly enjoy his kingdome.

Thus Ptolomie grew mightie on the sudden; and the power that by wicked meanes he had gotten, by meanes as wicked he encreased.

All Macedon and Thrace being his, the strong Citie of Cassandria was held by Antioe his sister, the widow of Lysimachus, who lay there with her young children. Her being circumvented by making love to her, and (according to the fashion of those times, wherein Princes regarded no degree of consanguinitie) taking her to wife, with promise to adopt her children: a promise that he meant not to performe; for it was not long, ere he flew them, and drave her into exile.

In the pride of this good successe, which his villanie found, vengeance came upon him from a farre, by the furie of a Nation that he never heard of. Belgus a Captaine of the Gauls, having forced his passage through many Countries, unto the confines of Macedon, sent a proud message to Ceraunus, commanding him to buy peace with money, or otherwise, to look for all the miseries of warre. These Gauls were the race of those, that issued out of their Countie, to seeke new seats in that great expedition, wherein Brennus tooke and burnt the Citie of Rome. They had divided themselves at their setting forth, into two companies; of which the one fell upon Italie; the other, passing through the Countries that lye on the Northerne side of the Adriaticke Sea, made long abode in Pannonia, & the Regions adjoining, where they forced all the neighbour Princes to receive peace with tribute, as now they would have compelled Ceraunus to doe; unto whose borders they came about an hundred and eight years after such time as their fellows had taken Rome.

When their Embassadors came to Ptolomie, asking what he would give: His answer was, That he would be contented to give them peace, but it must be with condition, that they should put into his hands their Princes as hostages, and yeeld up their armes; for otherwise, he would neither pardon their boldnesse, nor give any credit to their words. At this answer, when it was returned, the Gauls did laugh; saying, That they would soone confute with deeds, the vanitie of such proud words. It may seeme strange that he, who had given away part of his Army unto Pyrrhus, for very feare; should bee so confident in undertaking more mighty enemies. The King of the Dardaniens offered to lend him twenty thousand men against the Gauls: but he scorned the offer; saying, That he had the children of those, which under the conduct of Alexander had subdued all the East. Thus he issued forth against all the barbarous people, with his famous Macedonians, as if the victory must needs have followed the reputation of a great name. But he soone found his great error when it was too late. For the Enemies were not onely equall in strength of body, and fiercenesse of courage, but so farre superiour to the Macedonians in number, that few or none escaped their furie. Ptolomie himselfe grievously wounded, fell into their hands, whilest the battell continued; and they presently strook off his head, which they shewed to his men, on the top of a Lance, to their utter astonishment.

The report of this great overthrow filled all Macedon with such desperation, that the people fled into walled Townes, and abandoned the whole Countie as lost. Only Sophanes, a valiant Captaine, animating as many as he could, gathered a small Army, with which he many times got the upper hand, and hindred Belgus from using the victory at his whole pleasure. In regard of this his vertue, the Souldiers would have made him King; which title he refused, and was contented with the name of a Generall. But (as mischiefs doe seldom come alone) the good successe of Belgus drew into Macedon, Brennus, another Captaine of the Gauls, with an hundred and fifty thousand foot, and fifteen thousand horse; against which mighty Army, when Sophanes with his weake troups made opposition, he was easily beaten, and the Macedonians againe compelled to hide themselves within their wals, leaving all their Countie to the spoile of the Barbarians.

Thus were the Macedonians destitute of a king, & trodden down by a Nation that they had not heard of, in lesse than fifty years after the death of Alexander, who fought to discover and subdue unknowne Countries, as if all Greece, and the Empire of Persia had been too little for a King of Macedon.

Very seasonably had these newes beene carried to Pyrrhus in Italie, who sought a faire pretext of relinquishing his Warre with the Romanes; had not other tidings out of Sicill distracted him, and carried him away in pursuit of nearer hopes. For after the death of Agathocles, who reigned over the whole Island, the Carthaginians sent an Armie to conquer Sicill, out of which, by him, they had beene expelled. This Armie did so fast prevaile, that the Sicilians had no other hope to avoyd slavery, than in submitting themselves to the rule of Pyrrhus; whom, being a Grecian, and a noble Prince, they thought it more for their good to obey, than to live under the well known heave yoke of Carthage. To him therefore the Syracusans, Leontines, and Agriagintines, principall Estates of the Isle, sent Embassadors, earnestly desiring him to take them into his protection.

It grieved Pyrrhus exceedingly, that two such notable occasions of enlarging his Dominions, should fall out so unluckily, both at one time. Yet whether he thought the business of Sicill more important, or more full of likelihood; or whether perhaps he beleaved (as came after to passe) that his advantage upon Macedon would not so hastily passe away, but that he might find some occasion to lay hold on it at better leisure; over into Sicill he transported his army, leaving the Tarentines to shift for themselves, yet not leaving them free as he found them, but with a Garrison in their town, to hold them in subjection.

As his departure out of Italie was rather grounded on head-long passion, than mature advice; so were his actions following, untill his returne unto Epirus, rather many and tumultuous, than well ordered or note-worthy. The Army which he carried into that Isle, consisted of thirty thousand foote, and two thousand five hundred horse: with which, soone after his descent into Sicill, he forced the Carthaginians out of all in effect, that they had therein. He also won the strong Citie of Eryx, and having beaten the Maeritines in battell; he began to change condition, and turne Tyrant. For he drave Sofraus, to whom his cruelty was suspected out of the Island, & put Theron of Syracuse to death, being jealous of his greatness; which two persons had faithfully served him, and delivered the great and rich Citie of Syracuse into his hands. After this, his fortunes declined so fast, as he served himselfe, and saved the disreputation of his leaving Sicill, by an Ambassage sent him from the Tarentines, and Samiters, imploring his present helpe against against the Romans, who since his leaving Italie, had wel-neare dispossessed them of all that they had.

Taking this faire occasion, he embarked for Italie; but was first beaten by the Carthaginian Gallies, in his passage, and secondly assailed in Italie it selfe, by eighteen hundred Mamertines; that attended him in the straits of the Countrey. Lastly, after he had recovered Tarentum, he fought a third battell with the Romans, led by M. Curius, who was victorious over him, and forc't him out of Italie into his owne Epirus.

A Prince he was far more valiant than constant, and had hee beene but a Generall of an Armie for some other great King or State, and had beene directed to have conquered any one countrey or kingdome, it is to be thought, that he would have purchased no lesse honour than any man of warre, either preceding or succeeding him; for a greater Capitaine, or a valiant man, hath beene no where found. But he never stayed upon any enterprise, which was, indeed, the disease he had, whereof not long after he died in Argos.

§. IIII.

How Antigonus, the son of Demetrius, delivered Macedon from the Gauls. How Pyrrhus won the Kingdome of Macedon from Antigonus.

THE vertue of Sophanes being too weak to defend the kingdome of Macedon, and the fortune which had accompanied him against Belgium, failing him in his attempts against Brennus: the Macedonians were no lesse glad to submit themselves unto the government of Antigonus, than they had been formerly desirous to free themselves from the impotent rule of his Father Demetrius. His comming into the Countrey with an Armie, Navie, and Treasure becomming a king, did rather breed good hope in the people, than fill them with much confidence: for he was driven to use against the Barbarians, onely those forces which he brought with him, having none other than good wishes of the Macedons to take his part. Brennus, with the maine strength of his Armie, was gone to spoyle the Temple of Apollo at Delphos, having left no more behind him, than he thought necessary to guard the borders of Macedon and Pannonia; which were about fifteen thousand foot, and three thousand horse. These could not be idle, but thought to get somewhat for themselves, in the absence of their fellows: and therefore sent unto Antigonus, offering to sell him peace, if he would pay well for it; which by the example of Cerannus, he had learnt (as they thought) not to refuse. Antigonus was unwilling to weaken his reputation by condescending to their proud demands: yet he judged it unfit to exasperate their furious choler, by uncourteous words or usage, as Cerannus had overfondly done. Wherefore he entertained their Embassadors in very loving and sumptuous manner, with a royall feast: wherein he exposed to their view such abundance of masse gold and silver, that they were not so much delighted with the meat, as with sight of the vessels, wherein it was served. He thought hereby to make them understand how great a Prince he was, and how able if need required, to wage a mighty Army.

To which end, he likewise did shew unto them his Camp and Navie, but especially his Elephants. But all this bravery served only to kindle their greedy appetites; who seeing his ships heave loaden, his Camp full of wealth, and ill fortified, himself (as it seemed) secure, and his men, both in strength and courage, inferiour unto the Gauls, thought all time lost, wherein they suffered the present possessors to spend the riches which they accounted assuredly their owne. They returned therefore to their companions with none other newes in their mouths, than of spoile and purchase: which tale carried the Gauls head-long to Antigonus his Camp, where they expected a greater booty, than the victory over Cerannus had given to Belgium. Their comming was terrible and sudden; yet not so sudden, but that Antigonus had notice of it, who distrusting the courage of his owne men, dislodged somewhat before their arrivall, and conveyed himself, with his whole army and carriage, into certaine woods adjoining, where he lay close.

The Gauls, finding his Campe forsaken, were not hasty to pursue him, but fell to ransacking the emptic Cabbins of the Souldiers; in hope of finding all that was either lost or hidden. At length, when they had searched every place in vaine, angry at their lost labour; they marched with all speed towards the Sea-side; that they might fall upon him, whilest he was busie in getting his men and carriages a ship-board. But the successe was no way answerable to their expectation. For being proud of the terrour which they had brought upon Antigonus, they were so careless of the Sea-men, that without all order, they fell to the spoyle of what they found on the shore, and in such ships as lay on ground.

Part of the Armie had left Antigonus, where he lay in covert; and had saved it self by getting aboard the fleet: in which number were some well experienced men of war: who discovering the much advantage offered unto them, by the desperate presumption of their enemies, took courage, and encouraged others to lay manly hold upon the opportunity. So the whole number, both of Souldiers and Mariners, landing together, with great resolution, gave so brave a charge upon the disorderd Gauls, that their contemptuous boldnesse was thereby changed into sudden feare, and they, after a great slaughter, driven to cast themselves into the service of Antigonus.

The fame of this victorie caused all the barbarous Nations in those quarters, to re-entertain their ancient beleefe of the Macedonian valour: by which the terrible and resistance oppressors of so many Countreys were overthrowne.

To speake more of the Gauls in this place, and to shew how, about these times, three Tribes of them passed over into Asia the lesse, with their wars and conquests there; I hold it needlesse: the victorious armies of the Romans taming them hereafter in the Countreys which now they wan, shall give better occasion to rehearse these matters briefly.

Howsoever the good successe of Antigonus got him reputation among the barbarous people, yet his owne Souldiers, that without his leading had won this victorie, could not thereupon be persuaded to thinke him a good man of war: knowing that he had no interest in the honour of the service, wherein his conduct was no better than creeping into a wood.

This (as presently will appeare) was greatly helpfull unto Pyrrhus: though as yet he knew not so much. For Pyrrhus, when his affaires in Italie stood upon hard termes, had sent unto Antigonus for helpe: not without threats, in case it were denied. So was he faine to get either a supply, wherewith to continue his war against the Romans, or some seeming honourable pretence, to forsake Italie, under colour of making his word good, in seeking revenge. The threats which he had used in braverie, meer necessitie forced him, at his returne unto Epirus, to put in practise.

He brought home with him eight thousand foot, and five hundred horse: an armie no little to be employed, by his restlesse nature, in any action of importance; yet greater than he had meanes to keepe in pay. Therefore he fell upon Macedon; intending to take what spoile he could get, & make Antigonus compound with him, to be freed from trouble. At his first entrance into this businesse, two thousand of Antigonus his Souldiers revolted unto Pyrrhus; and many Cities, either willingly or perforce, received him. Such fair beginnings easily persuaded the courage of this daring Prince to set upon Antigonus himselfe, and to hazzard his fortune, in triall of a battell, for the whole kingdome of Macedon.

It appeares, that Antigonus had no desire to fight with this hot warrior; but thought it the wisest way, by protracting of time, to wearie him out of the countrey. For Pyrrhus overrooke him in a streight passage, and charged him in the reare; wherein were the Gauls and the Elephants, which were thought the best of his strength: a manifest proofe that he was in retreat. The Gauls very bravely sustained Pyrrhus his impression; yet were broken at length (when most of them were slaine) after a sharpe fight: wherein it seems that Antigonus keeping his Macedonian Phalanx within the streight, & not advancing to their succour, tooke away their courage by deceiving their expectation. The Captaines of the Elephants were taken soone after; who finding themselves exposed to the same violence that had consumed so many of the Gauls, yielded themselves and the beasts. All this was done in full view of Antigonus and his Macedonians, to their great discomfort; which emboldned Pyrrhus to charge them where they lay in their strength. Where the Phalanx could be charged only in a front, it was a matter of extreme difficulty (if not impossible) to force it. But the Macedonians had scene so much, that they had no desire to fight against Pyrrhus; who discovered so well their affections, that he adventured to draw neare in person, and exhort them to yield. Neither the common Souldier nor any Leader refused to become his follower. All forsooke Antigonus, a few horsemen excepted, that fled along with him to Thessalonica; where he had some small forces left, and money enough to entertaine a greater power, had he known where to levie it. But whilest he was thinking how to allure a sufficient number of the Gauls into his service; whereby he might repaire his losse: Ptolomie, the sonne of Pyrhus, came upon him, and easily defeating his weak forces, drave him to flye from the parts about Macedon; to those Townes as farre off in Peloponnesus, in which he had formerly lurked, before such time as he looked abroad into the world, and made himselfe a King.

This good successe revived the spirits of the Epirot, and caused him to forget all sorrow of his late misfortunes in the Roman warre: so that he sent for his sonne Helennus (whom he had left with a Garrison in the Castle of Tarentum) willing him to come over into Greece, where was more matter of conquest, and let the Italians thirst for themselves.

§. V.

How Pyrhus assailed Sparta without successe. His enterprife upon Argos, and his death.

Pyrhus had now conceived a great hope that nothing should be able to withstand him; seeing that in open fight he had vanquished the Gauls, beaten Antigonus, and wonne the Kingdome of Macedon. There was not in all Greece, nor, indeed, in all the Lands that Alexander had wonne, any Leader of such name and worth, as deserved to be set up against him: which filled him with the opinion that he might doe what he pleased. He raised therefore an Armie, consisting of five and twentie thousand foot, two thousand horse, and foure and twentie Elephants; pretending warre against Antigonus, and the giving libertie to those Townes in Peloponnesus, which the same Antigonus held in subjection; though it was easily discovered, that such great preparations were made, for accomplishment of some designe more important than warre against a Prince already vanquished, and almost utterly dejected. Especially the Lacedaemonians feared this expedition, as made against their State. For Cleonymus, one of their Kings, being expelled out of his Countrey, had betaken himselfe to Pyrhus: who readily entertained him, and promised to restore him to his kingdome. This promise was made in secret; neither would Pyrhus make shew of any displeasure that hee bare unto Sparta; but contrariwise professed, that it was his intent, to have two of his owne younger sons trained up in that Citie, as in a place of noble discipline. With such colours he deluded men, even till he entred upon Laconia; where presently he demeaned himselfe as an open enemy: excusing himselfe and his former dissembling words with a jest; That hee followed herein the Lacedaemonian custome, of concealing what was truly purposed. It had been, indeed, the manner of the Lacedaemonians, to deale in like sort with others, whom, in the time of their greatnesse, they fought to oppress: but now they complained of that, as falshood, in Pyrhus, which they alwaies practised in wisdom, till it made them distrustful, forsaken, and almost contemptible. Nevertheless, they were not wanting to themselves in this dangerous extremitie. For the old men and women laboured in fortifying the Towne; causing such as could beare armes to reserve themselves fresh against the assault: which Pyrhus had unwisely deferred, upon assurance of prevailing.

Sparta was never fortified, before this time, otherwise than with armed Citizens: soon after this, (it being built upon uneven ground, and, for the most part, hard to approach) the lower and more accessible places, were fenced with wals; at the present only trenches were cast, and barricadoes made with carts, where the entrance seemed most easie. Three dayes together it was assailed by Pyrhus exceeding fiercely, and no lesse stoutly defended. The desperate courage of the Citizens preserved the Town the first day; whereinto the violence of Pyrhus had forced entrance the second day, but that his wounded horse threw him to the ground, which made his Souldiers more mindfull of saving the person of their King, than of breaking into the Citie, though already they had borne in sunder the Barricadoes. Presently after this, one of Antigonus his Captains got into Sparta with a good strength of men; and Arcus the King returned out of Crete (where he had bin helping his friends in war) with two thousand men, little knowing the danger, in which his own Countrey stood, until he was almost at home. These succours did not more animate the Spartans, than kinde in Pyrhus a desire to prevaile against all impediments. But the third dayes worke shewed how great his error had beene, in forbearing to assault the Town at his first coming. For he was so manfully repelled, that he saw no likelihood of getting the place, otherwise than by a long siege: in which tedious course he had no desire to spend his time.

Antigonus had now raised an Armie, though not strong enough to meete the enemy in plaine field; yet able to hinder all his purposes. This made Pyrhus doubtfull what way to take; being diversly affected, by the difficultie of his enterprife in hand, and the shame of taking a repulse in his first attempt. Whilest he was thus perplexed, letters came from Argos, inviting him thither; with promise to deliver that Citie into his hands.

Civill dissention raging then hotly in Argos, caused the heads of several factions to call in Pyrhus and Antigonus; but the coming of these two Princes taught the Citizens wit, and made them desirous to rid their hands of such powerfull assistants, as each of the two Kings pretended himselfe to be. Antigonus told the Argives, that he came to save them from the tyrannie of Pyrhus: and that he would be gone if they needed not his help. On the other side, Pyrhus would needs perswade them, that he had none other errand, than to make them safe from Antigonus; offering in like manner, to depart, if they so desired.

The Argives tooke small pleasure in hearing the Foxe and Kite at strife, which of them should keepe the Chickens from his enemy: and therefore prayed them both to divert their powers some other way. Hereunto Antigonus readily condescended, and gave hostages to assure his word: for he was the weaker; and stood in need of good will. But Pyrhus thought it enough to promise: Hostages he would give none; to his inferiours: especially, meaning deceipt. This made them suspect his purpose to be such, as indeed it was. Yet he lesse regarded their opinions, than to hold them worthy of assurance, by giving such a bond, as he intended to breake ere the next morning.

It was concluded, that a Gate of the Citie should be opened by night unto Pyrhus, by his Complices within Argos: which was accordingly performed. So his Armie without any tumult, entred the Citie: till the Elephants, with Towers on their backs, cloyed the way, being too high to passe the Gate. The taking off, and setting on againe of those Towers, with the trouble thereto belonging, did both give alarme to the Citie, and some leisure to take order for defence, before so many were entred, as could fully master it. Argos was full of ditches, which greatly hindred the Gauls (that had the Vanguard) being ignorant of the wayes, in the darke night. The Citizens, on the other side, had much advantage, by their knowledge of every by-passage: and setting upon the enemies on all sides, did put them to great losse and more trouble.

Pyrhus therefore, understanding by the confused noyse, and unequall shoutings of his owne men, that they were in distresse, entred the Citie in person, to take order for their reliefe, and assurance of the place. But the darknesse, the throng, and many other impediments, kept him from doing any thing of moment, untill breake of day. Then began he to make his passage by force, and so farre prevailed, that he got into the market place. It is said, that seeing in that place the Image of a Wolfe and a Bull, in such posture as if they had been combatant, he called to minde an Oracle, which threatened him with death, when he should behold a Bull fighting with a Wolfe: and that hereupon he made retreat.

Indeed, the coming of Antigonus to the rescue, the disorder and confusion of his owne men, with divers ill accidents, gave him reasonable cause to have retired out of the Citie, though the Wolfe and Bull had beene away. The tumult was such, that no directions could be heard; but as some gave backe, so did others thrust forward, and the Argives pressing hard upon him, forced Pyrhus to make good his retreat, with his own sword:

sword. The tops of the houses were covered with women, that stood looking on the fight. Among these was one, that saw her owne son in dangerous case, fighting with Pyrrhus. Wherefore she tooke a tile-stone, or slate, and threw it so violently down on the head of Pyrrhus, that he fell to ground astonished with the blow; and lying in that case, had his head cut off.

Thus ended the restlesse ambition of Pyrrhus, together with his life: and thus returned the Kingdome of Macedon to Antigonus; who forthwith possessed the armie, the bodie, and the children of his enimie. The bodie of Pyrrhus had honourable buriall, and was given by Antigonus unto Helenu his son; which young Prince he graciously sent home into his fathers Kingdome of Epirus. From this time forwards, the race of Antigonus held the Kingdom of Macedon; the posteritie of Seleucus reigned over Asia and Syria; and the house of Ptolomie had quiet possession of Egypt: untill such time as the Citie of Rome, swallowing all up, digested these, among other Countries, into the bodie of her owne Empire.

Of the first Punicke Warre.

§. I.

Admission of that probleme of Livie; Whether the Romans could have resisted the great Alexander. That neither the Macedonian nor the Roman Souldier, was of equall valour to the English.

THat question handled by Livie; Whether the great Alexander could have prevailed against the Romans, if after his Easterne conquest, he had bent all his forces against them, hath been, and is the subject of much dispute; which (as it seemes to me) the arguments on both sides do not so well explaine, as doth the experience that Pyrrhus hath given of the Roman power in his daies. For if he a Commander (in Hannibals judgment) inferior to Alexander, though to none else, could with small strength of men, and little store of mony, or of other needfull helps in War, vanquish them in two battels, and endanger their Estate, when it was well settled, and held the best part of Italie, under a confirmed obedience: what would Alexander have done, that was abundantly provided of all which is needfull to a Conquerour, wanting only matter of employment, comming upon them before their Dominion was halfe so well settled? It is easie to say, that Alexander had no more than thirty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse (as indeed, at his first passage into Asia, he carried over not many more) and that the rest of his followers were no better than base effeminate Asiaticques. But he that considers the Armies of Perdiccas, Antipater, Craterus, Eumenes, Ptolomie, Antigonus & Lyfimachus, with the actions by them performed, every one of which (to omit others) commanded only some fragment of this dead Emperours power, shall easily find, that such a reckoning is far short of the truth.

It were needlesse to speake of Treasure, Horses, Elephants, Engines of battery, and the like : of all which the Macedonian had abundance ; the Roman having nought, save men and armes. As for Sea-forces ; he that shall consider after what sort the Romans, in their first Punick Warre, were trained in the rudiments of Navigation ; sitting upon the shoare, and beating the sand with poles, to practice the stroke of the Oare, as not daring to launch their ill-built vessels into the Sea ; will easily conceive how farre too weak they would have proved in such services.

Now for helpers in Warre ; I do not see why all Greece and Macedon, being absolutely commanded by Alexander, might not well deserve to be laid in ballance against those parts of Italy, which the Romans held in ill-assured subjection. To omit therefore all benefit that the Easterne world, more wealthy, indeed, than valiant, could have afforded unto the Macedonian : let us onely conjecture, how the States of Sicill and Carthage, nearest neighbours to such a quarrell (had it happened) would have stood affected. The Sicilians were for the most part Grecians; neither is it to be doubted, that they would readily have submitted themselves unto him, that ruled all Greece besides them. In what termes they commonly stood, and how ill they were able to defend themselves, it shall appear anon. Sure it is, that Alexanders coming into those parts, would have brought excessive joy to them that were faine to get the helpe of Pyrrius, by offering to become his subjects. As for the Carthaginians, if Agathocles the Tyrant of Syracuse, hated of his people, and ill able to defend his owne besieged Citie, could by adventuring to fall into Affrick, put their Dominion, yea, and Carthage it selfe, in extreme hazzard ; shall we thinke that they would have been able to withstand Alexander ? But why doe I question their ability, seeing that they sent Embassadors, with their submission, as faine as Babylon, ere the Warre drew neare them ? Wherefore it is manifest, that the Romans must, without other succour, than perhaps of some other few Italian friends (of which yet there were none that forsooke them not, at some time, both before and after this) have opposed their valour and good militarie discipline, against the power of all Countreies to them knowne, if they would have made resistance. How they could have sped well, in undertaking such a match ; it is uneasie to finde in discourse of humane reason. It is true, that vertue and fortune worke wonders : but it is against cowardly fooles, and the unfortunate : for whosoever contends with one too-mighty for him ; either must excell in these, as much as his enemy goes beyond him in power ; or else must looke both to be overcome, and to be cast downe so much the lower, by how much the opinion of his fortune and vertue renders him suspected, as likely to make head another time against the vanquisher. Whether the Roman or the Macedonian were in those dayes the better Souldier, I will not take upon me to determine : though I might, without partiality, deliver mine owne opinion, and preferre that Army, which followed not only Philip and Alexander, but also Alexanders Princes after him, in the greatest dangers of all sorts of Warre ; before any, that Rome either had, or in long time after did send forth. Concerning fortune, who can give a rule that shall alwaies hold ? Alexander was victorious in every battell that he fought : and the Romans in the issue of every Warre. But forasmuch as Livie hath judged this a matter worthy of consideration ; I thinke it a great part of Romes good fortune, that Alexander came not into Italy : where in three years after his death, the two Roman Consuls, together with all the power of that State, were surprized by the Samnites, and enforced to yeeld up their armes. We may therefore permit Livie to admire his own Romans, and to compare with Alexander those Captains of theirs, which were honoured sufficiently, in being thought equal to his followers : that the same conceipt should blind our judgement, we cannot permit without much vanity.

Now in deciding such a controversie, me thinks it were not amisse, for an Englishman, to give such a sentence betweene the Macedonians and Romans, as the Romans once did (being chosen Arbitrators) betweene the Ardeates and Aricini, that strove about a peece of land ; saying, That it belonged unto neither of them, but unto the Romans themselves.

If therefore it be demanded, whether the Macedonian or the Roman were the best Warriour ? I will answer : The English-men. For it will soone appeare to any that shall examine the noble acts of our Nation in warre, that they were performed by no advantage of weapon ; against no savage or unmanly people ; the enemy being farre superior unto us in number, and all needfull provisions, yea as well trained as we, or commonly better, in the exercise of Warre.

In what sort Philip wan his Dominion in Greece ; what manner of men the Persians and Indians were, whom Alexander vanquished ; as likewise of what force the Macedonian Phalanx was, and how well appointed, against such armes as it commonly encountered : any man, that hath taken paines to reade the foregoing storie of them, doth sufficiently understand. Yet was this Phalanx never, or very seldom, able to stand against the Roman Armies ; which were embattailed in so excellent a forme, as I know not whether any Nation besides them have used, either before or since. The Roman weapons likewise, both offensive and defensive, were of greater use than those with which any other Nation hath served, before the fiery instruments of Gun-powder were known. As for the enemies with which Rome had to doe, we finde, that they which did over-march her in numbers, were as far over-matched by her in weapons ; and that they, of whom she had little advantage in arms, had as little advantage of her in multitude. This also (as Plutarch well observeth) was a part of her happinesse, that she was never over-laid with two great wars at once.

Hereby it came to passe, that having at first increased her strength by accession of the Sabines, having won the State of Alba, against which she adventured her own selfe, as it were in wager, upon the heads of three Champions : and having thereby made her selfe Princesse of Latium, she did afterwards, by long war, in many ages, extend her Dominion over all Italy. The Carthaginians had well-near oppressed her : but her Souldiers were Mercenarie ; so that for want of proper strength, they were easily beaten at their owne doores. The Aetolians, and with them all, or the most of Greece, assisted her against Philip the Macedonian : he being beaten, did lend her his helpe to beat the same Aetolians. The wars against Antiochus, and other Asiaticques, were such as gave to Rome small cause of boast, though much of joy : for those opposites were as bafe of courage, as the lands which they held were abundant of riches. Sicill, Spain, and all Greece, fell into her hands, by using her aide to protect them against the Carthaginians and Macedonians.

I shall not need to speake of her other conquests : it was easie to get more when shee had gotten all this. It is not my purpose to disgrace the Roman valour (which was very noble) or to blemish the reputation of so many famous victories : I am not so idle. This I say, that among all their wars, I finde not any, wherein their valour hath appeared comparable to the English. If my judgement seem over-partiall, our wars in France may help to make it good.

First therefore it is well knowne, that Rome (or perhaps all the world besides) had never any so brave a Commander in war as Julius Caesar : and that no Roman armie was comparable unto that which served under the same Caesar. Likewise, it is apparent, that this gallant Armie, which had given faire proofe of the Roman courage, in good performance of the Helvetian war, when it first entred into Gaul, was nevertheless utterly disheartned, when Caesar led it against the Germans. So that we may justly impute all that was extraordinary in the valour of Caesars men, to their long exercise, under so good a Leader, in so great a war. Now let us in generall compare with the deeds done by those best of Roman Souldiers, in their principall service ; the things performed in the same Countrey, by our common English Souldiers, levied in haste, from following the Cart, or sitting on the shop-stall ; so shall we see the difference. Herein will we deale fairly, and beleeve Caesar, in relating the acts of the Romans : but will call the French Historians to witnesse, what actions were performed by the English. In Caesars time France was inhabited by the Gauls, a stout people, but inferior to the French, by whom they were subdued ; even when the Romans gave them assistance. The Countrey of Gaul was remein funder (as Caesar witnesseth) into many Lordships : some of which were governed by petty Kings, others by the multitude, none ordered in such sort as might make it applicable to the nearest Neighbour. The factions were many, and violent : not onely in generall through the whole Countrey, but between the petty States, yea in every Citie, and almost in every house. What greater advantage could a Conquerour desire ? Yet there was a greater. Ariovistus, with his Germans, had over-run the Countrey, and held much part of it in subjection, little different from meere slaverie : yea, so often had the Germans prevailed in warre upon the Gauls, that the Gauls, (who had sometimes been the better Souldiers) did hold themselves no way equal to those daily Invaders. Had France bin so prepared unto our English Kings, Rome it selfe by this time, and long ere this time, would have bin outs. But when King Edward the third began his War upon France, he found the whole Country settled in obedience to one mighty King; a King whose reputation abroad, was no lesse than his puissance at home; under whose Ensigne, the King of Bohemia did serve in person; at whose call the Genowayes, and other Neighbour States, were ready to take arms: finally a King, unto whom one Prince gave away his Dominion, for love; another fold away a goodly City and Territory for money. The Country lying so open to the Romans, and being so well fenced against the English; it is note-worthy, not who prevailed most therein (for it were meer vanity to march the English purchases with the Roman conquest) but whether of the two gave the greater proof of military vertue. Cesar himselfe doth witnesse, that the Gaules complained of their owne ignorance in the Art of War, and that their owne hardinesse was overmastered by the skill of their enemies. Poore men, they admired the Roman Towers, and Engines of battery, raised and planted against their walles, as more than humane workes. What greater wonder is it, that such a people was beaten by the Romans; than that the Caribes, a naked people, but valiant, as any under the skie, are commonly put to the worke by small numbers of Spaniards? Besides all this, we are to have regard of the great difficulty that was found, in drawing all the Gaules, or any great part of them, to one head, that with joynt forces they might oppose their assailants: as also the much more difficulty of holding them long together. For hereby it came to passe, that they were never able to make use of opportunity: but sometimes compelled to stay for their fellows; and sometimes driven to give or take battell upon extreme disadvantages, for feare lest their Companies should fall asunder: as indeed, upon any little disaster, they were ready to break and return every one to the defence of his own. All this, and which was little lesse than all this) great odds in weapon gave to the Romans the honour of many gallant victories. What such helpe? or what other worldly helpe, than the golden metall of their Souldiers, had our English Kings against the French? Were not the French as well experienced in feats of Warre? Yea, did they not thinke themselves therein our superiours? Were they not in arms, in horse, and in all provision, exceedingly beyond us? Let us heare what a French writer saith of the inequality that was between the French and English, when their King John was ready to give the on-set upon the Blacke Prince, at the battell of Poitiers. John had all advantages over Edward, but of number, force, shew, Country and conceit, (the which is commonly a consideration of no small importance in worldly affaires) and withall, the choice of all his horse-men (esteemed then the best in Europe) with the greatest and wisest Captaines of his whole Realme. And what could he more?

John de Serres.

JEAN avoit tout l'avantage par dessus EDWARD. Je n'en bre, la force, le lustre, le pay, le prestige (qu'on est pas communement une consideration de peu d'importance aux affaires de monde) & avec soy l'est de sa Cavalerie, les meilleurs de tout son Royaume.

I thinke it would trouble a Roman antiquary to finde the like example in their Histories; the example I say, of a King, brought prisoner to Rome, by an Army of eight thousand, which he had surrounded with forty thousand, better appointed, and no lesse expert Warriours. This I am sure of, that neither Syphax the Numidian, followed by a rabble of halfe Scullions, as Livie rightly termes them, nor those cowardly Kings, Persens and Gentius, are worthy patternes. All that have read of Cressy and Agincourt, will beare me witnesse, that I do not alledge the battell of Poitiers, for lacke of other, as good examples of the English vertue: the proove whereof hath left many a hundred better markes in all quarters of France, than ever did the valour of the Romans. If any man impute these victories of ours to the long Bow, as carrying farther, piercing more strongly, and quicker of discharge than the French Crosse-bow: my answer is ready; That in all these respects, it is also (being drawne with a strong arme) superiour to the Musket; yet is the Musket a weapon of more use. The Gunne and the Crosse-bow are of like force, when discharged by a Boy or Woman, as when by a strong Man: weaknesse or sicknesse, or a fore finger makes the long Bow unserviceable. More particularly, I say, that it was the custome of our Ancestors, to shoot, for the most part, point blank: and so shall hee perceive, that will note the circumstances of almost any one battell. This takes away all objection: for when two Armies are within the distance of a Butts length, one sight of arrowes, or two at the most can be delivered before they cloffe. Neither is it in general true, that the long Bow reacheth farther, or that it pierceth more strongly than the Crosse-bow: But this is the rare effect of an extraordinary arme; whereupon can be grounded no common rule. If any man shall aske, How then came it to passe, that the English wan so many great battells, having no advantage to helpe him? I may, with best commendation of modestie, referre him to the French Historian: who relating the victorie of our men at Crevent, where they passed a bridge, in face of the enemy, useth these words: The English comes with a conquering braverie, as he that was accustomed to gaine every where, without any stay: he forceth our guard, placed upon the bridge to keepe the passage. Or I may cite another place of the same Author, where he tels, how the Britons, being invaded by Charles the eighth, King of France, thought it good policie, to apprell a thousand and five hundred of their owne men in English Callocks; hoping that the very sight of the English red crosse, would be enough to terrifie the French. But I will not stand to borrow of the French Historians (all which, excepting De Serres and Paulus Amylin, report wonders of our Nation) the proposition on which first I undertooke to maintaine; That the military vertue of the English, prevailing against all manner of difficulties, ought to be preferred before that of the Romans, which was assisted with all advantages that could be desired. If it be demanded, why then did not our Kings finish the conquest, as Cesar had done? my answer may be (I hope without offence) that our Kings were like to the race of the Acidae, of whom the old Poet Ennius gave this note; Bellipotentes sunt magis quam sapientis potentes; They were more warlike than politicke. Who so notes their proceedings, may find, that none of them went to worke like a Conquerour, save onely King Henrie the fifth; the course of whose victories it pleased God to interrupt by his death. But this question is the more easily answered, if another be first made. Why did not the Romans attempt the conquest of Gaule before the time of Cesar? why not after the Macedonian war: why not after the third Punic, or after the Numantian? At all these times they had good leisure: and then especially had they both leisure and fit opportunitie, when under the conduct of Marinus, they had newly vanquished the Cimbri, and Tעותones, by whom the country of Gaule had bin piteously wasted. Surely the words of Tullie were true; That with other Nations the Romans fought for Dominion, with the Gaules for preservation of their own safety.

Therefore they attempted not the conquest of Gaule, until they were Lords of all other Countries, to them knowne. We on the other side, held only the one halfe of our owne Iland; the other halfe being inhabited by a Nation (unlesse perhaps in wealth and numbers of men somewhat inferiour) every way equall to our selves; a Nation anciently and strongly allied to our enemies the French, and in that regard enemy to us. So that our danger lay both before and behinde us: and the greater danger at our backs; where commonly we felt, always we feared, a stronger invasion by land, than we could make upon France, transporting our forces over Sea.

It is usual with men, that have pleased themselves in admiring the matters which they find in ancient Histories; to hold it a great injurie done to their judgment, if any take upon him, by way of comparifon, to extoll the things of later ages. But I am well perswaded, that as the divided vertue of this our Iland, hath given more noble proove of it selfe, than under so worthie a Leader, that Roman Armie could doe, which afterwards could win Rome, and all her Empire, making Cesar a Monarch; so hereafter, by Gods blessing, who hath converted our greatest hinderance, into our greatest helpe, the enemy that shall dare to trie our forces, will find cause to wish, that avoyding us, he had rather encountered as great a puissance as was that of the Roman Empire. But it is now high time, that, laying these comparifons, we return to the rehearfall of deeds done: wherein we shall find, how Rome began, after Pyrrhus had left Italie, to strive with Carthage for Dominion, in the first Punic war.

§. II.

The estate of Carthage before it entred into war with Rome.

THE Cite of Carthage had stood above fixe hundred yeares, when first it began to contend with Rome for the masterie of Sicill. It forewent Rome one hundred and fiftie yeares in antiquitie of foundation: but in the honour of great achievements, it excelled farre beyond this advantage of time. For Carthage had extended her Dominion Africa it selfe, from the west part of Cyrene, to the streights of Hercules; about one thousand and five hundred miles in length, wherein stood three hundred Cities. It had subjecked all Spaine, even to the Pyrenean Mountaines, together with all the Ilands in the Mediterranean Sea, to the west of Sicily; and of Sicily the better part. It flourished about seven hundred and thirtie yeares, before the destruction thereof by Scipio: who, besides other spoyle, and all that the Souldiers reserved, carried thence foure hundred and seventie thousand weight of silver, which make of our money (if our pounds differ not) fourteen hundred and ten thousand pound sterling. So as this glorious Citie ran the same fortune, which many other great ones have done, both before and since. The ruine of the goodliest pieces of the world fore-shewes the dissolution of the whole.

About one hundred yeares after such time as it was cast downe, the Senate of Rome caused it to be re-built: by Gracchus it was called Junonia: it was againe and againe abandoned and re-peopled, taken and re-taken; by Genfericus the Vandal, by Belisarius under Iustinian, by the Persians, by the Egyptians, and by the Mahometans. It is now nothing. The seat thereof was exceeding strong: and while the Carthaginians commanded the Sea, invincible. For the Sea compassed it about, saving that it was tied to the maine by a necke of land; which passage had two mile and more of breadth (Appian saith, three mile and one furlong) by which we may be induced to beleve the common report, that the Citie it selfe was above twentie miles in compass; if not that of Strabo, affirming the circuit to have been twice as great.

It had three wals without the wall of the Citie; and betweene each of those, three or foure streets, with vaults under ground, of thirtie foot deepe, in which they had place for three hundred Elephants, and all their food: over these they had stables for four thousand horse, and Granaries for their provender. They had also lodgings in these streets, betweene these out-walls, for foure thousand horse-men, and twentie thousand foot-men, which (according to the discipline used now by those of China) never pestered the Citie. It had towards the South part, the Castle of Byrsasto which Servius gives two and twentie furlongs in compass, that make two mile and a halfe. This was the same piece of ground which Dido obtained of the Libyans, when she got leave to buy only so much Land of them, as she could compass with an Oxe hide. On the West side it had also the salt Sea, but in the nature of a standing poole; for a certaine arme of Land, fastened to the ground on which the Citie stood, stretched it selfe towards the west continent, and left but seventie foot open for the Sea to enter. Over this standing Sea was built a most sumptuous Arsenal, having their Ships and Gallies riding under it.

The forme of their Common-weale resembled that of Sparta; for they had titulare Kings, and the Aristocraticall power of Senators. But (as Regius well observeth) the people in later times usurped too great authoritie in their Councils. This confusion in government, together with the trust that they reposed in hired Souldiers, were helping causes of their destruction in the end. Two other more forcible causes of their ruin, were their avarice and their cruelty. Their avarice was shewed both in exacting from their Vassals (besides ordinarie tributes) the one halfe of the fruits of the earth; and in conferring of great offices, not upon gentle and mercifull persons, but upon those who could best tyrannize over the people, to augment their treasures. Their cruelty appeared, in putting them to death without mercie, that had offended through ignorance: the one of these rendered them odious to their vassals, whom it made readie, upon all occasions, to revolt from them: the other did breake the spirits of their Generals, by presenting in the heat of their actions abroad, the feare of a cruell death at home. Hereby it came to passe, that many good Commanders of the Carthaginian forces, after some great losse received, have desperately cast themselves, with all that remained under their charge, into the throat of destruction; holding it necessary, either to repair their losses quickly, or to ruine all together: and few of them have dared to manage their owne best projects, after that good forme, wherein they first conceived them, for feare lest the manner of their proceeding should be mis-interpreted: It being the Carthaginian rule, to crucifie, not only the unhappy Captain, but even him, whose bad counsell had prosperous event. The Carthaginians & faults, wherewith, in generally, they of Carthage are taxed, by Roman Historians, I finde to be these, lust, cruelty, avarice, craft, unfaithfulness, and perjurie. Whether the Romans hath taught them to raise their Rents, since by inclosures and dismembring of Manors, the Court Baron, and the Court Leet, the Principallities of the Gentrie of England, have bene dissolved, the Tenants having payed unto their Lords their racke Rents, owe them now no service at all, and (perchance) as little love.

themselves were free from the same crimes, let the triall be referred unto their actions. The first league betweene Carthage and Rome, was very ancient: having bin made the yeare following the expulsion of Tarquinius. In that league the Carthaginians had the superiority, as imposing upon the Romans the more strict conditions. For it was agreed, that the Romans should not so much as have trade in some part of Africa, nor suffer any ship of theirs to passe beyond the headland, or cape, then called the faire Promontorie, unless it were by force of tempest: whereas on the other side, no Haven in Italie was forbidden to the Carthaginians. A second league was made long after, which (howsoever it hath pleased Livius to say, that the Romans granted it, at the Carthaginians intreatie) was more strict than the former: prohibiting the Romans to have trade in any part of Africa, or in the Iland of Sardinia.

By these two treaties, it may appeare that the Carthaginians had an intent not only to keepe the Romans (as perhaps they did other people) from getting any knowledg of the state of Africa, but to countenance and uphold them, in their troubling all Italy, wherby they themselves might have the better meanes to occupie all Sicily, whilst that Iland should be destitute of Italian succours. Hereupon we finde good cause of the joy that was in Carthage, and of the Crowne of gold, weighing twentie and five pound, sent from thence to Rome, when the Samnites were overthrowne. But the little state of Rome prevailed faster in Italie, than the great power of Carthage did in Sicily. For that mightie Arme of three hundred thousand men, which Hannibal conducted out of Africa into Sicily, was only two Cities therein: many great fleets were devoured by tempests; and howsoever the Carthaginians prevailed at one time, the Sicilians, either by their own valour, or by the assistance of their good friends out of Greece, did at some other time repaire their own losses, and take revenge upon those Invaders. But never were the people of Carthage in better hope of getting all Sicily, than when the death of Agathocles the Tyrant, had left the whole Iland in combustion; the estate of Greece being such, at the same time, that it seemed impossible for any succour to be sent from thence. But whilst the Carthaginians were busie in making their advantage of this good opportunitie; Pyrhus, invited by the Tarentines and their fellows, came into Italie, where he made sharp war upon the Romans. These newes were displeasing to the Carthaginians, who, being a subtle Nation, easily foresaw, that the same busie disposition which had brought this Prince out of Greece into Italie, would as easily transport him over into Sicily, as soon as he could finish his Roman war. To prevent this danger, they sent Mago Embassador to Rome; who declared in their name, that they were forry to heare, what misadventure had befallen the Romans, their good friends, in this war with Pyrhus; and that the people of Carthage were very willing to assist the state of Rome, by sending an army into Italie; if their helpe were thought needfull, against the Epirus.

It was indeede the maine desire of the Carthaginians, to hold Pyrhus so hardly to his worke in Italie, that they might, at good leisure, pursue their businesse in Sicily: which caused them to make such a goodly offer. But the Romans were too high-minded: and refused to accept any such aide of their friends, lest it should blemish their reputation, and make them seeme unable to stand by their own strength. Yet the message was taken lovingly, as it ought; and the former league betweene Rome and Carthage renewed; with covenants added, concerning the present businesse; That if either of the two Cities made peace with Pyrhus, it should be with reservation of libertie, to assist the other, in case that Pyrhus should invade either of their Dominions. All this notwithstanding, and notwithstanding that the same Mago went and treated with Pyrhus, using all means to found his intentions (a matter very difficult, where one upon every new occasion, changeth his owne purposes) yet Pyrhus found leisure to make a step into Sicily: where, though in fine he was neither getter nor fayer, yet hee cleane defeated the purposes of Carthage, leaving them, at his departure from thence, as farre from any end, as when they first began.

So many disasters, in an enterprize that from the first undertaking had bin so strongly pursued, through the length of many generations, might well have induced the Carthaginians to beleve; that a higher providence resisted their intendment. But their desire of winning that fruitfull Iland, was so inveterate, that with unwearied patience, they still continued in hope of so much the greater harvest, by how much their cost and paines therein buried had bin the more. Wherefore they re-continued their former courses;

b The Tunies, at this day, doe also take the one halfe of the poore mans come, that labors the earth: yea, they take tribute both of the bodies, and of the soules of the Christians their Vassals, by becrasing them of their ablest children, and bringing them up in the Mahometan Religion. The English take the fourth sheaf: and were wont to cate up with their horken, foomen, and dogs, what they pleased of the other three parts remaining. The busbandmen, and the yeoman of England, are the freest of all the World: And reason good for of them have the bodies of our victorious armies bin compounded. And it is the freeman, and not the slave, that hath courage, & the sense of shame detested by cowardise.

How freethe English yeomen have bene in times, not long since past, Forsetius hath shewed in his praise of our countries laws. But I may say, that they are more free now than ever: and our Nobilitie & Gentrie more servile. For, since the excessive faults, wherewith, in generally, they of Carthage are taxed, by Roman Historians, I finde to be these, lust, cruelty, avarice, craft, unfaithfulness, and perjurie. Whether the Romans hath taught them to raise their Rents, since by inclosures and dismembring of Manors, the Court Baron, and the Court Leet, the Principallities of the Gentrie of England, have bene dissolved, the Tenants having payed unto their Lords their racke Rents, owe them now no service at all, and (perchance) as little love.

and by force or practice, recovered in few yeares all their old possessions: making peace with Syracuse, the chiefe Citie of the Iland, that so they might the better enable themselves to deal with the rest.

Somewhat before this time, a troupe of Campanian Souldiers, that had served under Agathocles, being entertained within Messana as friends, & finding themselves too strong for the Citizens, tooke advantage of the power that they had to doe wrong; and with perfidious crueltie, slue those that had trusted them; which done, they occupied the Citie, Lands, Goods, and Wives of those whom they had murdered. These Mercenaries called themselves Mameritines. Good Souldiers they were: and like enough it is, that meere desperation of finding any that would approve their barbarous treachery, added rage unto their stoutness. Having therefore not any other colour of their proceedings, than the law of the stronger, they over-ran the Countrey round about them.

In this course, at first, they sped so well, that they did not only defend Messana against the Cities of Sicil Confederates to wit, against the Syracusians, and others, but they rather wan upon them, yea and upon the Carthaginians, exacting tribute from many Neighbour places. But it was not long, ere fortune turning her back to these Mameritines, the Syracusians wan fast upon them, and finally, confining them within the wals of Messana, they also with a powerfull Armie besieged the Citie. It hapned ill, that about the same time, a contention began, betweene the Syracusian Souldiers, then lying at Megara, and the Citizens of Syracuse, and Governors of the Common-wealth; which proceeded so far, that the Armie elected two Governors among themselves, to wit, Artemidorus and Hieron, that was afterward King. Hieron, being for his yeares excellently adorned with many virtues, although it was contrary to the policie of that State, to approve any elevation made by the Souldiers; yet for the great clemencie he used at his first entrance, was by generall consent established and made Governor. This Office, he rather used as a Scale, thereby to climb to some higher degree, than rested content with his present pre-eminence.

In brife, there was somewhat wanting, whereby to strengthen himselfe within the Citie; and somewhat without it, that gave impediment to his obtaining, and safe keeping, of the place he sought; to wit, a powerfull partie within the Towne, and certaine mutinous troupes of Souldiers without, often and easily moved to sedition and tumult. For the first, whereby to strengthen himselfe, he tooke to wife the daughter of Leptines, a man of the greatest estimation and authoritie among the Syracusians. For the second, leading out the Armie to besiege Messana, he quartered all those companies, which he held suspected, on the one side of the Citie, and leading the rest of his horse and foot unto the other side, as if he would have assaulted it in two severall partes, he marched away under the covert of the Towne walls, and left the Mutiners to be cut in pieces by the assieged: So returning home, and levying an Armie of his owne Citizens, well trained and obedient, he hastned again towards Messana, and was by the Mameritines (growne proud by their former victorie over the Mutiners) incountred in the plains of Myleum, where he obtained a most signall victorie, and leading with him their Commander Captive into Syracuse, himselfe by common consent was elected and saluted King. Hereupon the Mameritines, finding themselves utterly enfeebled, some of them resolved to give themselves to the Carthaginians, others to crave assistance of the Romans: to each of whom the severall factions dispatched Embassadors for the very same purpose.

The Carthaginians were soone readie to lay hold upon the good offer: so that a Captaine of theirs got into the Castle of Messana, whereof they that had sent for him gave him possession. But within a little while, they that were more inclinable to the Romans, had brought their Companions to so good agreement, that this Captaine, either by force, or by cunning, was turned out of doores, and the Towne reserved for other Masters.

These newes did much offend the people of Carthage; who crucified their Captaine as both a Traitor and Coward; and sent a Fleet and Armie to besiege Messana, as a Towne that rebelled, having once bin theirs. Hieron, the new-made King of Syracuse (to gratifie his people, incensed with the smart of injuries lately received) added his forces to the Carthaginians, with whom he entred into a league, for exterminating the Mameritines out of Sicil. So the Mameritines on all sides were closed up within Messana: the Carthaginians lying with a Navie at Sea, and with an Army on the one side of the Towne, whilst Hieron with his Syracusians, lay before it on the other side.

Mameritines

In this their great danger came Appius Claudius the Roman Consul, with an Army to the streights of Sicil: which passing by night with notable audacity, he put himselfe into the Towne, and sending Messengers to the Carthaginians, and to Hieron, required them to depart; signifying unto them that the Mameritines were now become confederate with the people of Rome, and that therefore he was come to give them protection, even by force of War, if reason would not prevail.

This message was utterly neglected; And so began the War betweene Rome and Carthage; wherein it will then be time to shew on which part was the justice of the quarrell, when some actions of the Romans lately foregoing this, have been first considered.

§. III.

The beginning of the first Punick Warre. That it was unjustly undertaken by the Romans.

When Pyrrhus began his wars in Italie, the Citie of Rhegium, being well affected to Rome, and not only fearing to be taken by the Epirots, but much more distrusting the Carthaginians, as likely to seize upon it in that busie time, sought aide from the Romans, & obtained from them a Legion, consisting of 4. thousand Souldiers, under the conduct of Decius Campanus, a Roman Prefect; by whom they were defended and assured for the present. But after a while, this Roman Garrison, considering at good leisure, the fact of the Mameritines, committed in Messana (a City in Sicil, situate almost opposite to Rhegium, and no otherwise divided than by a narrow Sea, which severeth it from Italie) and rather weighing the greatnesse of the booty, than the odiousnesse of the villanie, by which it was gotten; resolved finally, to make the like purchase, by taking the like wicked course. Confederating therefore themselves with the Mameritines, they entertained their Hosts of Rhegium, after the same manner; dividing the spoil, and all which that State had, among themselves.

When complaint was made to the Senate and people of Rome, of this outrage; they finding their honour thereby greatly stained (for no Nation in the world made a more severe profession of justice, than they did during all the time of their growing greatnesse) resolved, after a while, to take revenge upon the offenders. And this they performed shortly after, when they had quenched the fires, kindled in Italie by Pyrrhus. For, notwithstanding that those Romans in Rhegium (as men for the foulness of their fact, hopelesse of pardon) defended themselves with an obstinate resolution: yet in the end, the assailants forced them; and those which escaped the present fury, were brought bound to Rome, where, after the usuall torments by whipping inflicted, according to the custome of the Country, they had their heads stricken from their shoulders, and the people of Rhegium were againe restored to their former liberty and estates.

This execution of Justice being newly performed, and the same thereof founding honourably through all quarters of Italy: messengers came to Rome from Messana, desiring helpe against the Carthaginians, and Syracusians, that were in a readinesse to inflict the like punishment upon the Mameritines, for the like offence. A very impudent request it was, which they made: who having both given example of that villany to the Roman Souldiers, and helpen them with joynt forces to make it good, do intreat the Judges to give them that assistance, which they were wont to receive from their fellow-thieves.

The Romans could not suddenly resolve, whether the way of honesty or of profit were to be followed; they evermore pretended the one, but they many times walked in the other. They considered, how contrary the course of succouring the Mameritines was to their former counsels and actions: seeing for the same offences they had lately put to torment, and to the sword, their owne Souldiers, and restored the oppressed to their libertie. Yet when they beheld the description of the Carthaginian Dominion, and that they were already Lords of the best part of Africa, of the Mediterran Ilands, of a great part of Spain, and some part of Sicil itselfe; whilst also they feared, that Syracuse therein therein seated (a City in beauty and riches, little at that time inferiour to Carthage, and farre superiour to Rome it selfe) might become theirs; the safety of their owne estate spake for these Mamertines: who, if they (driven to despair by the Romans) should deliver up Messana, with those other holds that they had, into the hands of the Carthaginians, then would nothing stand betwene Carthage and the Lordship of Sicily: for Syracuse it selfe could not, for want of succour, any long time subsist, if once the Carthaginians, that were Masters of the Sea, did fasten upon that passage from the maine Land. It was further considered; that the opportunity of Messana was such, as would not onely debarre all succours out of the continent, from arrivall in Sicily; but would serve as a bridge, whereby the Carthaginians might have entrance into Italy, at their owne pleasure.

These considerations of profit at hand, and of preventing dangers, that threatened from a farre, did so prevaile above all regard of honesty, that the Mamertines were admitted into Confederacy with the Romans, and Ap. Claudius the Consull, presently dispatched away for Messana: into which he entred, and undertooke the protection of it, as is shewed before. The besiegers were little troubled with his arrivall; and lesse moved, with his requiring them to desist from their attempt. For they did farre exceede him in number of men; The whole Iland was ready to relieve them in their wants; and they were strong enough at Sea, to hinder any supply from getting into the Towne. All this Appian himselfe well understood: and against all this he thought the stiffe metal of 20 his Roman Souldier a sufficient remedy. Therefore he resolved to issue out into the field, and to let the enemies know, that his coming was to send them away from the Town; not to be besieged by them within it.

In executing this determination, it was very beneficiall to him, that the enemy lay encamped in such sort, as one quarter was not well able to relieve another in distresse. Hieron was now exposed to the same danger, whereinto he had wilfully cast his owne mutinous followers not long before: onely he was strong enough (or thought so) to make good his owne quarter, without helpe of others. Against him Ap. Claudius issued forth, and (not attempting, by unexpected sally, to surprize his trenches) arranged his men in order of battell, wherewith he presented him. The Syracusan wanted not courage to 30 fight; but surely he wanted good advice: else would he not have hazarded all his power against an enemy of whom he had made no tryall; when it had bene easie, and as much as was requisite, to defend his owne Campe. It may be, that he thought to get honour, wherewith to adorne the beginning of his reigne. But he was well beaten, and driven to save himselfe within his Trenches: by which losse, he learned a point of wisdom, that stood him and his Kingdome in good stead all the daies of his life. It was a foolish desire of revenge, that had made the Syracusians so busie, in helping those of Carthage, against the Mamertines.

Had Messana bin taken by the Carthaginians, Syracuse it selfe must have sought helpe from Rome, against those friends which it now so diligently assisted. Hieron had (in respect of those two mighty Cities) but a small stocke, which it behooved him to governe well: such another losse would have made him almost bankrupt. Therefore he quietly brake up his Campe, and retired home: intending to let them stand to their adventures, that had hope to be gainers by the bargain. The next day, Claudius perceiving the Sicilian Army gone, did with great courage, & with much alacrity of his souldiers, give charge upon the Carthaginians: wherein he sped so well, that the enemy forsook both field and camp, leaving all the Country open to the Romans; who having spoiled all round, without resistance, intended to lay siege unto the great City of Syracuse.

These prosperous beginnings, howsoever they animated the Romans, and filled them with hopes of attaining to greater matters, than at the first they had expected: 50 Yet did they not imprint any forme of terrour in the Citie of Carthage, that had well enough repaired greater losses than this; in which no more was lost, than what had been prepared against the Mamertines alone, without any suspicion of Warre from Rome.

Now in this place I hold it seasonable, to consider of those grounds, whereupon the Romans entred into this War; not how profitable they were, nor how agreeable to rules of honesty (for questionles the enterprize was much to their benefit, though as much to their shame) but how allowable in strict termes of lawfulness; whereupon they built all all their allegations in maintenance thereof. That the Mamertines did yeeld themselves, and all that they had, into the Romans hands (as the Campanes, distressed by the Samnites, had done) I cannot finde: neither can I finde how the messengers of those folke, whereof one part had already admitted the Carthaginians, could be enabled to make any such surrendry in the publike name of all.

If therefore the Mamertines, by no lawfull surrendry of themselves and their possessions, were become subject unto Rome, by what better title could the Romans affist the Mamertines, against their most ancient friends the Carthaginians, than they might have ayded the Campanes, against the Samnites, without the same condition? which was (as they themselves confessed) by none at all. But let it be supposed, that some point serving to clear this doubt, is lost in all Histories. Doubtlesse it is, that no company of Pyrates, Theeves, Out-lawes, Murderers, or such other Malefactors, can by any good successe of their villanie, obtaine the priviledge of civill societies, to make league or truce; yea, or to require faire Warre: but are by all meanes, as most pernicious vermine, to be rooted out of the world. I will not take upon me to maintaine that opinion of some Civilian, consequence: This I hold; that no one Prince or State can give protection to such as these, as long as any other is using the sword of vengeance against them, without becoming accessary to their crimes. Wherefore we may esteeme this action of the Romans so farre from being justifiable, by any pretence of Confederacie made with them; as that contrariwise, by admitting this nest of Murderers and Theeves into their protection, they justly deserved to be warred upon themselves, by the people of Sicil; yea, although Messana had been taken, and the Mamertines all slain, ere any newes of the Confederacy had been brought unto the besiegers. The great Alexander was so farre persuaded herein; that he did put to sword all the Branchidae (a people in Sogdiana) and razed their Citie, notwithstanding that they joyfully entertained him as their Lord and Kings, because they were descended from a Company of Milefians, who to gratifie King Alexes, had robbed a Temple, and were by him rewarded with the Towne and Country, which these of their posterity enjoyed: Nevertheless, in course of humane justice, long and peaceable possession gives jus acquisitum, a kinde of right by prescription unto that which was first obtained by wicked means: and doth free the Descendants from the crime of their Ancestors, whose villanies they doe not exercise. But that the same generation of Theeves, which by a detestable fact hath purchased a rich Towne, should be acknowledged a lawfull company of Citizens, there is no shew of right. For even the Conqueror that by open Warre obtaineth a kingdome, doth not confirme his title, by those victories which gave him first possession: but length of time is requisite to establish him, unlessse by some alliance with the ancient inheritors, he can better the violence of his claime, as did our King Henry the first, by his marriage with Maud, that was daughter of Malcolme, King of the Scots, by Margaret, the Niece of Edmund Ironside. Wherefore I conclude, that the Romans had no better ground (if they had so good) of justice, in this quarrell, than had the Gothes, Hunnes, Vandalls, and other Nations, of the Wars that they made upon the Roman Empire, wherein Rome her selfe, in the time of her visitation, was burnt to the ground.

§. IIII.

Of the Iland of Sicil.

†. I.

The qualitie of the Iland: and the first inhabitants thereof.

THE defence of the Mamertines, or the possession of Messana, being now no longer since the first victories of Appius Claudius, the objects of the Roman hopes; but the Dominion of all Sicil being the prize, for which Rome and Carthage are about to contend: it will be agreeable unto the order, which in the like cases we have observed, to make a briefe collection of things concerning that noble Iland, which hath bin the stage of many great acts, performed as well before and after, as in this present War.

and the same beginning of Nations, after the flood; & that the first planters of all parts of the World, were said to be mighty and Giant-like men; & that, as Phœnicia, Aegypt, Lybia, & Greece, had Hercules, Orestes, Amant, Typhon, and the like; as Denmarke had Starchatorm, remembered by Saxo Grammaticus; as Scythia, Britanie, & other Regions had Giants for their first Inhabitants; so this Ile of Sicill had her Leſtrigones & Cyclopes. This discourse I could also reject for fained and fabulous, did not Moses make us know, that the Zamzumims, Emims, Anakims, & Og of Baſan, with others, which sometime inhabited the Mountaines and Defarts of Moab, Ammon, and Mount Seir, were men of exceeding strength and stature, and of the races of Giants: and were it not, that Tertulian, S. Auguſtine, Nicephorus, Procopius, Iſidore, Plinie, Diodore, Herodotus, Solinus, Plutarch, and many other Authors, have confirmed the opinion. Yea, Vespasian, in his second Navigation into America, hath reported, that himselfe hath seene the like men in those parts. Again, whereas the selfe-same is written of all Nations, that is written of any one; as touching their simplicity of life, their meane fare, their feeding on acorns and rootes, their poore cottages, the covering of their bodies with the skins of beasts, their hunting, their armes, and weapons, and their warfare, their first passages over great Rivers & Armes of the Sea, upon rafts of trees tied together; & afterward, their making boats, first of twigs and leacher, then of wood; first with Oares, & then with Saile; that they esteemed as gods, the first finders out of Arts; as of Husbandrie, of Lawes, and of Policie: it is a matter, that makes me neither to wonder at, nor to doubt of it. For they all lived in the same newnesse of time, which we call Old time, and had all the same want of his instruction, which (after the Creator of all things) hath by degrees taught all Mankind. For other reaching had they none, that were removed farre off from the Hebrewes, (who inherited the knowledge of the first Patriarchs) than that from variable effects they beganne, by time and degrees, to finde out the causes: from whence came Philosophic Natural; as the Morall did from disorder and confusion; and the Law from cruelty and oppression.

But it is certaine, that the Age of Time hath brought forth stranger and more incredible things, than the Infancie. For wee have now greater Giants, for vice and injustice, than the World had in those daies; for bodily strength, for cottages, and houses of clay and timber, we have raised Palaces of stone; we carve them, we paint them, and adorne them with gold, inſomuch as men are rather knowne by their houses, than their houses by them; we are fallen from two dishes, to two hundred; from water, to wine & drunkenness; from the covering of our bodies with the skinnies of beasts, not onely to silke and gold, but to the very skinnies of men. But to conclude this digression, Time will also take revenge of the excefſe, which it hath brought forth; Quam longa dies peperit, longiorque auxis, longissima subruet: Long time brought forth, longer time increased it, and a time, longer than the rest, shall overthrow it.

†. II.

The plantation of the Greekes in Sicill.

WHen the first inhabitants had contended long enough about the Dominion of all Sicill: it happened, that one Theocles, a Greek, being driven upon that coast by an Easterly wind; & finding true the commendations thereof, which had been thought fabulous, being delivered only by Poets, gave information to the Athenians of this his discovery, & propoed unto them the benefit of this easie conquest, offering to become their guide. But Theocles was as little regarded by the Athenians, as Columbus, in our Grand-fathers times, was by the Engliſh. Wherefore he took the same course that Columbus afterwards did. He over-laboured not himselfe in perswading the Noble Athenians (who thought themselves to bee well enough already) to their own profit; but went to the Chalcidians, that were needie and industrious, by whom his project was gladly entertained. By these was built the Citie of Naxos, and a Colony planted of Eubœans.

But the rest of the Greekes were wiser than our Westerne Princes of Europe: they had no Pope, that should forbid them to occupie the voide places of the World. Archias of Corinth followed the Eubœans, and landed in Sicill, neere unto that City called afterward * Syracuse, of which, that part onely was then compassed with a wall, which the Aetolians called Homotherman; the Greeks, Nafos; the Latines, Insula. He with his Corinthians having overcome the Siculi, drave them up into the Country; and after a few years, their multitudes increasing, they added unto the City of the Iland, that of Acradina, Tycha, and Neapolis. So as well by the commodity of the double Port, capable of as many ships, as any Haven of that part of Europe, as by the fertility of the soyle; Syracuse grew up in great haſte, to be one of the goodliest Townes of the world. In short time the Greeks did possesse the better part of all the Sea-coast; forcing the Sicilians to withdraw themselves into the fast and mountainous parts of the Iland, making their Royall residence in Trinacia.

Some seven years after the arrivall of Archias, the Chalcidians, encouraged by the success of the Corinthians, did assaile, & obtaine the city of Leontium, built & posselt by the Siculi. In briefe, the Greeks win from the Siculi, & their Associates, the cities of Catana and Hybla, which, in honour of the Megarians that for't it, they called Megara.

About 45. years after Archias had taken Syracuse; Antiphemus and Entimus, the one from Rhodes, the other from Crete, brought an Army unto Sicil, and built Gela, a whole Citizens, one hundred and eight years after, did erect that magnificent and renowned city of Agrigentum, governed according to the Lawes of the Dorians.

The Syracusians also, in the seventieth year after their plantation, did set up the city of Acras, in the Mountaines; and in the ninetieth year Casmena, in the Plaines adjoining; & againe in the hundred and thirtieth year of their dwelling in Syracuse, they built Camerina: & soon after that, Enna, in the very Center of the Iland. So did the Cumani about the same time, recover from the Siculi the city of Zancle, which they had founded in the flight betwene Sicil and Italy. They of Zancle had bene the founders of Himera.

Not long after this, Dorians the Lacedæmonian built Heraclea, which the Phœnicians, and Carthaginians, fearing the Neighbourhood of the Spartans, soon after invaded and ruined, though the same were againe ere long re-edified.

Selinus also was built by a Colony of Megara: & Zancle was taken by the Messinians; who having lost their owne Country, gave the name thereof unto this their new purchase. Such were the beginnings of the greatest cities in this Iland.

†. III.

Of the Government and affaires of Sicil, before Dionysius his tyranny.

THe most part of the cities in Sicil, were governed by the rule of the people, till such time as Phalaris began to usurpe the state of Agrigentum, and to exercise all manner of tyranny therein.

This was that Phalaris, to whom Perillus, the cunning Artificer of a detestable Engine, gave an hollow Bull of brass, wherein to inclose men, and scorch them to death: praising the device with this commendation; That the noise of one tormented therein, should bee like unto the bellowing of a Bull: The Tyrant gave a due reward to the Inventour; by causing the first triall to be made upon himselfe. He reigned one and thirty years, laich Eusebius; others give him but sixteen: Howsoever it were, one Telemachus in the end, fell upon him with the whole multitude of Agrigentum, and stoned him to death; being thereto animated by Zeno, even whilest the Tyrant was tormenting the same Zeno, to make him confesse some matter of conspiracy.

After the death of Phalaris, the Citizens recovered their liberty, & enjoyed it long, till Thero usurped the government of the Common-weale: at which time also Panarus first made himselfe Lord of Leontium; & Cleander, of Gela: but Cleander, having ruled seven years, was slain by one of the Citizens. Cleander being dead, his brother Hypocorates succeeded in his roome, & greatly afflicted the people of Naxos, of Zancle, or Messena, and of Leontium; whom with divers others of the ancient inhabitants, he forced to acknowledge him their Lord. He also made warre with the Syracusians, and, in the end, got from them by composition, the City of Camerina. But when he had reigned seven years, he was slain in a battell against the Siculi, before Hybla.

At this time did the Syracusians change their form of government, from Popular to Aristocratical; a preparation towards a principality, wherinto it was soon after changed.

After the death of Hippocrates, Gelon (descended from the Rhodians, which together with the Cretans had long before, among other of the Greeks, feared themselves in Sicily) that had commanded the forces of Hippocrates, in the former war, with notable successe, became Lord of Gela. He, after his Masters death, breaking the trust committed unto him by Hippocrates over his childen, and being in possession of Gela, tooke the occasion and by advantage of a contention in Syracuse, betweene the Magistrates and the People. For comming with a strong Army to the succour of the Governours, driven out by the multitude, they elected him their Prince, being the first, and (indeed) the most famous, that ever governed the Syracusians. This change happened in the second yeere of the three-score and twelfth Olympiad, wherein the better to establish himselfe, he tooke to wife the Daughter of Thero, who had also usurped the state of Agri-gen-tum.

Paul. lib. 8.

Now this Gelon, the sonne of Dinomenes, had three brethren; Hiero, Polyzelus, and Thrasylbulus: to the first of which he gave up the Citie of Gela, when hee had obtained the Principalltie of Syracuse. For, after that time, all his thoughts travelled in the strengthening, beautifying, and amplifying of Syracuse. He defaced Camerina, that a little before was fallen from the obedience of the Syracusians who built it, and brought the Citizens to Syracuse. The Megarians that had moved a war against him, he overcame; the richer sort he brought unto Syracuse; and the people he sold for slaves. In like manner dealt he with other places upon the like occasion. Not long after this, Thero, a Prince of the Agri-gen-tines, having dispossessed Anaxilus of his Citie Himera; the Carthaginians were drawne into the quarrell by Amilaxus, Lord of Messena, Father-in-law to Terrillus: and Gelon was also solicited by his Father-in-law, Thero. Gelon was content, and in fine, after divers conflicts, the Carthaginians, and other Africans, led by Amilax, were overthrowne by Gelon: and an hundred and fifty thousand of them left their bodies in Sicily.

Herd. & Din.

This Gelon it was, to whom the Athenians and Lacedæmonians sent for succour, when Xerxes with his huge Army past the Hellefont. He, for their reliefe having armed thirty thousand Souldiers, and two hundred ships, refused nevertheless to send them into Greece, because they refused him the commandement of one of their Armies, either by Sea, or Land. So hee used to their Embassadors only this saying, That their Spring was withered; accounting the Army, by him prepared, to be the very flower of the Greece Nation.

The Carthaginians, after this great losse received, fearing the invasion of their owne Countrey, sent to Gelon by their Embassadors, to desire peace, who grants it them on these conditions: That from thenceforth they should not sacrifice their children to Saturne; That they should pay him 2000. talent of silver, and present him with two armed ships, in signe of amitie. These conditions the Carthaginians, not only willingly accepted, but with the two thousand talents, and the ships for warre, they sent unto Demarata, Gelons wife, a crowne, valued at an hundred talents of gold, with other presents. Whereby we see, that some Nations, and some Natures, are much the better for being well beaten. The warres ended, and Sicily in peace, Gelon beautified the Temples of the gods, & erected others in honour of them. So being exceedingly beloved and honoured of his Subjects, he left the World, and left for his Successor his brother Hiero. Plutarch and Pliny report, That, when his body was burnt, according to the custome of that Age, a Dogge of his, which alwaies waited on him, ranne into the fire, and suffered himselfe to be burnt with him.

To Gelon, Hiero his brother succeeded, a man rude, cruell, covetous, and so suspicious of his brethren Polyzelus, and Thrasylbulus, as hee sought by all meanes to destroy them. Notwithstanding all this, by the conversation which he had with Simonides, he became of better condition, and greatly delighted with the study of good Arts. Divers quarters he had, as well with Theron of Agri-gen-tum, as with other cities: all which he shortly after compounded, and gave a notable overthrow to the Carthaginians, whom Xerxes had incited to invade Sicily, fearing the succours which Gelon had prepared, to aide the Greeks, against him. He also overthrowne in battaile Thrasylbulus, the sonne of Theron, and thereby restored the Agri-gen-tines, to their former liberty. But in the end, he lost the love of the Syracusians; and after he had reigned eleven yeeres, he left the Kingdome to his brother Thrasylbulus, who became a most unjust and bloody Tyrant. Thrasylbulus enjoyed his Principallty no longer than ten moneths. For, norwithstanding the force force of mercenary Souldiers, which he entertained for his guards, he was beaten out of Syracuse by the Citizens; to whom, being besieged in Acradina, he restored the government, and was banished the Island. From whence he sailed into Greece, where he died a private man, among the Locrians.

And now had the Syracusians recovered againe their former liberty, as all the rest of the Cities did, after which they had never fought, had the Successors of Gelon inherited his vertue, as they did the Principallty of Syracuse. For in all changes of Estates, the preservation ought on answer the acquisition. Where a liberrall, valiant, and advised Prince, hath obtained any new Signiory, and added it to that of his owne, or exalted himselfe from being a private man, to the dignity of a Prince; it behooveth the Successour to maintaine it by the same way and art, by which it was gotten.

To conclude, Syracuse (though not without blowes, ere that she could cleanse her selfe of the creatures and lovers of Gelon) was now againe become Mistresse of her selfe, and held her selfe free, well neere three-score yeeres, to the time of Diopysius; though she were in the meane while greatly endangered by a Citizen of her owne, called Tindario.

Now, to prevent the greatnesse of any one among them, for the future, they devised a kinde of banishment of such among them, as were suspected; taking patterne from the Athenian Ostracisme. They called this their new devised judgment of exile, Petalisme, wherein every one wrote upon an Olive leafe (as at Athens they wrote upon shells) the name of him, whom he would have expelled the City. He that had most suffrages against him, was banished for five yeeres. Hereby in a short time, it came to passe that kinde of judgement, and best able to governe the Common-weale, were by the worst able, either suppress, or thrust out of the City. Yea, such as feared this Law, though they had not yet felt it, withdrew themselves as secretly as they could; seeking some place of more security, wherein to maintaine themselves. And good reason they had to doe; seeing that there is nothing so terrible in any State; as a powerfull and authorized ignorance. But this Law lasted not very long. For their necessity taught them to abolish it, and restore againe the wiser sort unto the Government; from which, the Nobility having practised to banish one another, the State became altogether Popular. But after a while, being invaded by Ducetius, King of the Sicilians, that inhabited the inner part of the Island (who had already taken Enna, and some other of the Gracian Cities, and overthrowne the Army of the Agri-gen-tines) the Syracusians sent forces against him, commanded by an unworthy Citizen of theirs, called Balscon. This their Captaine made nothing so much haste to finde out Ducetius, against whom he was employed, as he did to flee from the Army, he led, as soone as Ducetius presented him battell. So for want of conduct, the greatest number of the Syracusians perished.

But making better choice among those whom they had banished, they levie other troups: by whom, in conclusion, Ducetius being beaten, submitte himselfe, and is constrained to leave the Island for a time. Yet it was not long ere he returned againe, and built the City Collatina on the Sea-side.

Ducetius being dead; all the Greek Cities did in a sort acknowledge Syracuse. Trinacria excepted; which also by force of armes, in the fourescore and fift Olympiad, they brought to reason.

But they doe not long enjoy this their Superintendencie. For the Citizens of Leontium, being oppressed by the Athenians, seeke aide from the Athenians, about the first year of the Peloponnesian Warre. In this suite they prevailed by the eloquence of Gorgias their Orator; and got an hundred Athenian Gallies to succour them, under the leading of Laches, and Charæades. To this fleet, the Leontines, and their Partners, added one hundred more; with which forces, and with some supplies brought by Sophocles, Pythodorus, Euphronon and other Athenian Captains, they invaded the Territories of the Syracusians, and their Partisans; wanne and lost divers places; tooke Messana; and, in the seventh yeare of the Peloponnesian Warre, lost it againe. They also at the same time, attempted Himera, but in vaine. The fire of this quarrell tooke hold upon many Cities, which did invade each others Territory with great violence. But when they had wearied themselves on all hands; & yet could see none issue of the warre, the Leontines, without the advice of the Athenians, came to an accord with the Syracusians, and were admitted into their society, with equall freedom. So the Athenians, who hoped to have greatened themselves in Sicily, by the division and civill warre, were disappointed of their expectation, by the good agreement of the Sicilians, and faine to be gone with the broken remainder of their fleet. This they knew not how to amend; but (according to the custome of popular Estates) by taking revenge upon their owne Commanders. So they banished Pythodorus, & Sophocles, & laid an heave fine upon Eurymedon. Shortly after this, followed the most memorable war, that ever was made by the Greeks in Sicily: which was that of the Athenians, against the Selinuntines & Syracusians, in favour of the Cities of Egesta, Leontium, and Catana. They of Selinus had oppressed the Egestians; & they of Syracuse the Leontines, & the Catanians: which was the ground of the war. For, the Athenians undertooke the protection of their old friends: and, in hatred of the Athenians, aide from Lacedemon was sent to the Syracusians. The Lacedemonians dealt plainly, having none other end, than that which they pretended, namely, to help a people of their owne Tribe, that craved their succour, being in distresse. The Athenians scarce knew what to pretend: for their preparations were so great, as discovered their intent to be none other, than the conquest of the whole Iland. Yet they which had called them in, were so blinded with their owne passions, that they would not beleve their owne eyes; which presented unto them a Fleet and Army, far greater, than the terrible report of fame had made it.

In this expedition, the city of Athens had engaged all her power; as regarding, not only the greatnesse of the enterprise, but the necessity of finishing it in a short space of time. For the Lacedemonians (as hath already been shewed in due place) stood at that time in such broken terms of peace with Athens, as differed not much from open warre. Wherefore it was thought necessary, either to spare cost in this great expedition, or altogether to forbear it: which was likely to be hindred by warres at home, if their proceedings were slacke abroad. And surely, had not the desire of the Athenians bin overpassionate, the arguments of Nicias had caused them to abstaine from so chargeable a businesse, and to reserve their forces for a more needfull use. But young counsailes prevailed against the authority of ancient men, that were more regardfull of safety than of honour.

Of this businesse, mention hath beene already made, in that which wee have written of the Peloponnesian warre. But what was there delivered in generall termes, as not concerning the affaires of Greece, otherwise than by consequence, doth in this place require a more perfect relation, as a matter, wherein the whole State of Sicily was like to have felt a great conversion.

Though Alcibiades had prevailed against Nicias, in exhorting the people to this great voyage; yet Nicias, together with Alcibiades and Lamachus, was appointed to be one of the chiefe Commanders therein.

These had commision & direction, as well to succour the Segestians, & to re-establish the Leontines, cast out of their places by the Syracusians; as also by force of armes, to subject the Syracusians, and all their adherents in Sicily, and compell them by tribute, to acknowledge the Athenians for their supreme Lords. To effect which, the fore-named Captaines were sent off, with an hundred and thirty Gallies, and five thousand an hundred Souldiers, besides the thirty ships of burden, which transported their victuals, engines, and other munitions for the war: and these were Athenians, Masinians, Rhodiens, and Candians: there were, besides these, sixe thousand Megarians light-armed, with thirty horse-men.

They saild.

With these troupes & fleets they arrive at Rhegium, where the Rhegians refuse to give them entry; but sell them victuals for their money. From thence they sent to the Egestians, to know what treasure they would contribute towards the warre, seeing for the sakes they had entred therein. But they found by their answers, that these Egestians were poore, and that they had abused the Athenian Embassadours with false shewes of gold, having in all but 30. talents. The Athenians further were discouraged, when they found that the Rhegians, their ancient friends, and allied unto the Leontines, refused to trust them within their Walls. Hereupon Nicias adviseth to depart towards the Selinuntines, and to force them, or persuade them to an agreement with the Egestians: likewise to see what disbursements the Egestians could make; and so returne againe into Greece, and not to waste Athens in a needlesse war. Alcibiades, on the other side, would solicite the cities of Sicily to confederacie against the Syracusians & Selinuntines, where-by to force them unto restitution of all that they had taken from the Leontines. Lamachus, he persuades them to assaile Syracuse it self, before it were prepared against them. But in the end (being excluded out of divers Cities) they surpris Catana: and there they take new counsell how to proceed. Thence they imployed Nicias to thoe of Egesta, who received from them thirtie talents towards his charges; and one hundred and twentie talents more there were of the spoyles they had gotten in the Iland. Thus, the Summer being spent in idle consultations, and vaine attempts, the Athenians prepare to assaile Syracuse. But Alcibiades having been accused at home, in his absence, was sent for back by the Athenians to make his answer: and the Annie was left to the conduct of Nicias and Lamachus. These Commanders obtaine a landing place very neer unto Syracuse, by this device.

They imploy to Syracuse an inhabitant of Catana, whom they trust; and instruct him, to promise unto the Syracusians, that he would deliver into their hands all the Athenians within Catana. Hereupon the Syracusians draw thitherward with their best forces. But in the mean while, the Athenians, setting sail from Catana, arrive at Syracuse, where they land at faire ease, and fortifie themselves against the Town. Shortly after this, they fight, and the Syracusians had the losse: but the Athenians, wanting horse, could not pursue their victorie to any great effect. They then retire themselves, with a resolution to refresh their Armie at Catana, for the winter-season. From thence they made an attempt upon Messina, hoping to have taken it by an intelligence, but in vain. For Alcibiades had discovered such as were Traitors within the Citie to the Messinians. This he now did, in despite of his own Citizens, the Athenians; because they had recalled him from his command, with a purpose either to have put him to death, or to have banished him: whereof being assured by his friends, he tooke his way towards the Lacedemonians, and to them he gave mischievous counsell against his country. While this Winter yet lasted, the Syracusians send Embassadours to Lacedamon, and Corinth, for aid: as likewise the Athenian Captains in Sicily, send to Athens for supplies. Which both the one and the other obtained.

In the Spring following (which was the beginning of the eighteenth year of the Peloponnesian war) the Athenians in Sicily saile from the Port of Catana to Megara, forsaken of the Inhabitants; from whence, foraging the Country, they obtain some small victories over the struggling Syracusians: and at their return to Catana, they receive a supplie of two hundred men at arms, but without horse, which they hoped to furnish in the Iland from the Segestians, and other their adherents: they were also strengthened with a compaignie of Archers, and with three hundred talents in money.

Hereupon they take courage, and intampe neere Syracuse, upon the banks of the great Port, repelling the Syracusians, that failed to impeach their in-reinforcements. They also received from their Confederates foure hundred horse-men, with two hundred other horse, to mount their men at arms. Syracuse was now in effect blockt up, so as hardly any succours could enter, but such as were able to force their passage: yet the Athenians received divers losses; among which it was not the least, that Lamachus, one of their best Commanders, was slain.

In the mean while, Gylippus and Pytho, with the Lacedemonian and Corinthian forces, arrive, and take land at Hymera. The Citizens of Hymera, and of Gela, together with the Selinuntines, joyne with them; so that with these and his owne troupes, Gylippus adventured to march over-land toward Syracuse. The Syracusians send a part of their forces to meet him and conduct him. The Athenians prepare to encounter them, expecting his arrivall neere unto the Citie upon a place of advantage. At the first encounter they had the better of their enemies, by reason that the Syracusan horse-men could not come to fight in those streights: but soone after, Gylippus charging them againe, brake them, and constrained Nicias to fortifie himselfe within his Campe. Whereupon Nicias made the state of his affaires knowne, by his letters to the Athenians; shewing, that without great supplies by Sea and Land, the enterprise would be lost, together with the small Army remaining. These letters received, the Athenians appoint two other Generals, Eurymedon and Demosthenes, so joyne with Nicias: the one they dispatch presently with some supplies, the other they send after him in the Spring following.

In the meane while, Gylippus at Syracuse, fights with the Athenians both by Sea and Land, Land, sometimes with ill, and at other times with good successe: but in conclusion, he took from their Fort, neer unto Syracuse, the Promontorie called Phymyrum; where- in the Athenians lost their treasure, and a great part of all their provisions. Notwithstand- ing which losse, and that the Athenians themselves, in Greece, were (in effect) besieged within Athens, by the Lacedæmonians; yet were they most obstinate in prosecuting the War in Sicily, and dispatched away Demosthenes with new succours. Demosthenes, in his way towards Sicily, encountered with Polyanthes the Corinthian, with his fleet: both the Captaines being bound for Sicily, the one to succour Nicias, the other Gylippus. The losse betweene them was in effect equal; and neither so broken, but that each of them prosecuted the enterprise they had in hand. But before the succours arrived to either, Gylippus 10 and Arifson had assailed the Athenians in the great Port of Syracuse, and in a Sea fight put them to the worst, to the great discouragement of the Athenians. On the neck of this, Demosthenes arrived with threescore and thirteen Gallies, charged with footmen; and (blaming the slooth of Nicias) he invaded the Syracusians the same day that he arrived. But he made more haste than he had good speed, being shamefully beaten, and repul- sed with great losse. Hereupon Demosthenes and Eurymedon determine to rise up from before Syracuse, and returne to the succour of Athens: but Nicias disputed to the con- trarie, pretending that he had good intelligence within Syracuse, whereby he learned, that the Towne could not long hold out.

Whatsoever Nicias his intelligence was; upon the arrivall of a new supplie into the Towne, the Athenians had all consented to depart, and to lodge at Catana: had not an Eclipse of the Moone, boding (as was thought) ill successe, caused them to deferre their departure. But this superstition cost them dear. For the Syracusians, Lacedæmonians, and Corinthians, with threescore and seventeen saile of Gallies, entered the great Port of Syracuse, wherein the Athenians kept their fleet, & whereon they had fortified themselves. The Athenians, in the same Port, encountered them with fourescore & sixe Gallies, com- manded by Eurymedon, in which the Athenian fleet was beaten, by the lesser number, & Eurymedon slaine. Now, though it were so, that the Syracusians received the more losse by land (for the fight was generally yet when the Athenians were beaten by sea, in which kinde they thought themselves invincible, they were wonderfully cast downe. For it was well said of Gylippus, to the Syracusians; When any people doe finde themselves van- quished in that manner of fight, and with those weapons, in which they persuade themselves that they exceede all others, they not onely lose their reputation, but their courage. The Athenians, besides the Gallies suncke and wrackt, had severene taken, & posselt by the enemy: & with great labour and losse they defended the rest from being fired, having drawn them within a Palefado, in one corner of the Port, unadvisedly: for it is as contra- ry to a Sea-war, to thrust ships into a streight roome and corner, as it is to scatter foot in a plaine field against horse; the one subsisting by being at large, the other by close im- battailing.

The Syracusians, having now weakened the Athenian fleet, resolve to imprison them within the Port. And to that purpose they range all their Gallies in the mouth of the Haven, being about a mile over, and there they came to Anchor; filling the out-let with all manner of Vessells; which they man most strongly, because the Athenians, being now made desperate, should not with double ranks of Gallies break through the Syracusan fleet; which lay but single, because they were forc't to range themselves over all the Out-let of the Port. They therefore, not onely mored themselves strongly by their Anchors, but chained the sides of their Gallies together, and laid behinde them againe certaine ships, which served in the former warre for victuallers: to the end, that if any of their Gallies were sunke; or the chaine, which joyned them to their fellows, broken, the Athenians might yet find themselves, a second time, intangled and arrested. To disorder also those Athenian Gallies, which came on in forme of a wedge, to breake through, and force a passage, the Syracusians had left within these Gallies & Ships, chained to- gether, a certain number of loose ones, to stop their course and fury. For where the way of any vessell, using oare or sailes, is broken, and their speede fore-slowed, they cannot force with any weight and violence, the resistance opposing.

On the other side, the Athenians knew that they were utterly lost, except with an in- vincible resolution, they could make their way, and breake downe this great bridge of boats; or (at least) force a passage through them in some part or other: which they resolve to hazzard, with all their shipping (to the number of one hundred & ten, of all sorts) and with all the strength of their Land-armie, in them imbarqued. But the Gallies, which were within the bridge of boats, did so disorder the Athenian fleet, ere they came to force the bridge, as, albeit some few of them had broken through the chaines, yet being stop't with the ships without, and assailed by other loose Gallies of the Syracusians, which were purposely left at large in the sea, they were either taken or sunk. Three great disadvantages the Athenians had: the first, that fighting within a Haven, and (as it were) in a streight, they had no room to turn themselves, nor to free themselves one from another, being intangled; the second, that having over-pestered their Gallies with Souldi- 10 ers, who used offensive armes of darts and slings, they had not place upon the decks to stretch their armes; the third was, the discomfortable end for which they fought, name- ly, to force a passage, by which they might save themselves by running away. To be short, the fight was no lesse terrible than the confusion; the slaughter great on all sides, and the noise, and the cries, so lowd and lamentable, as that no direction could be heard. But in the end, the Athenians, as many as survived, were beaten backe to the Land, with losse of threescore of their Gallies, broken, sunke, or abandoned. The Syracusians did al- so lose twentie of theirs, with Pythion, Commander of the Corinthians. The rest of the Athenian Gallies, running themselves into the bottom of the Port, saved themselves by the helpe and countenance of the Land-armie there fortified. In this desperate estate, the Athenian Commanders goe to counsell. Demosthenes persuades them to furnish with fresh Souldiers those few Gallies which remained; and while the Syracusians were tri- umphing, and made secure by their present victorie, to set upon them, and forcing their way out of the Port, to returne to Athens. This was no ill counsell. For, as we have heard of many great Captaines (yea, the greatest number of all that have bene victori- ous) that have neglected the speedie prosecution of a beaten enemy; so might we pro- duce many examples of those, who, having slept securely in the bosome of good successe, have bene suddenly awaked, by the re-allied Companies of abroken Armie; and have thereby lost again all the honour and advantage formerly gotten. But Nicias opposeth the advice of Demosthenes: Others say, that the Sea-men were against it. Whereupon abandoning their Gallies, they all resolve to march over land to the Cities of their Con- federates, all some more favourable fortune should call them thence. On the other side, Gylippus, & other the Lacedæmonian & Corinthian Captains, with Hermocrates, exhort the Syracusians to put themselves presently into the field; & to stop all the passages, lea- ding to those Cities of their enemies, to which the Athenians might make retreat. But many were weary, and many were wounded, and many of them thought that they had done enough for the present. Which humour in some of our Commanders at Cadez, lost us both the Indian fleet, and the spoiles of many other Neighbour-places. Hermocrates, the Syracusan, finding it a lost labour, to perswade his Countreimen to any hasty prosecution, devised this good stratagem, thereby to gaine time; not doubting, but that after a day or two, he should draw them willingly out. He sent two or three horse-men out of Syracuse by night, willing them to finde Nicias, and (after they had assured him, that they were of the Athenians faction) to give him advice not to march away over- hastily from the place, wherein hee was fortified; alledging that the Syracusians had lodged their Armie, which could not long stay there, upon the passages and places of ad- vantage, leading towards the cities of their Allies. These tidings Nicias easily beleaved, and put off his journey to the third day. For men newly beaten, are (for the most part) more fearefull than wise; and to them, every thistle in the field appears, by night, a man armed.

The third day (leaving all their Gallies, and all their baggage) they remove; being pierced and pursued with the lamentable out-cries of those that were sicke and hurt: whom they abandon to the cure of their enemies swords. The rest march away, to the number of forty thousand; and make their first passage by force, over the River of At- tami, notwithstanding the opposition of their enemies. But being every day charged in their marches, and by the Syracusan horse-men, beaten in from forraging and provision of food, they grow weake and heartlesse. The Syracusians also possesse the Moun- taine Lepas, by which they were to passe towards Camerina, and thereby force them to fall backe againe towards the Sea-coast, and to take what way they could: being unable to proceed in their journey intended. Many hard shifts they made, in difficult passages, and and blinde marches by night; which they were faine to endure, as having none other meanes to escape from the enemy that pursued them, and held them waking with continual skirmishing. To keep all in order, Nicias undertooke the leading of the Vanguard; & Demofthenes conducted the Reare. At the River Erineus, Nicias takes the start of a whole nights march, leaving Demofthenes to make the retreat: who being incompassed, and overprest with numbers, in the end renders himselfe. The conditions he obtained, were farre better than he could have hoped for; and the faith of his enemies farre worse than he suspected. For he was afterward, with Nicias, murdered in prison. The Army of Demofthenes being dissolved, they pursue Nicias with the greater courage: who being utterly broken, upon the passage of the River Asinarus, rendered himselfe to Gylippus, upon honest conditions. Gylippus fought to preserve him, and to have had the honour, to have brought these two to Sparta; Nicias, as a Noble Enemy to the Lacedemonians, and who, at the overthrow which they received at Pylus by the Athenians, had saved the lives of the vanquished; Demofthenes, as one that had done to Lacedemon the greatest hurt. Hermocrates also, the Commander of the Syracusan Army, dissuaded the rest, by all the art he had, from using any barbarous violence, after so noble a victory. But the cruell, and the cowardly sort, (cowardise and cruelty being inseparable passions) prevailed, and caused these brave Captains to be miserably murdered; one part of their Souldiers to be starved in loathsome prisons; and the rest, sold for slaves. This was the success of the Sicilian warre: which tooke end at the River Asinarus, the foure and twentieth day of May, in the fourescore and eleven Olympiad.

The Athenians being beaten out of Sicily, the Egestans (for whose defence, against the Selinuntines, this late war had bene taken in hand) fearing the victorious Syracusians, sought helpe from the Carthaginians; to whom they offered themselves, and their Citie, as their vassals. The Carthaginians, though ambitious enough of enlarging their Dominion in Sicily, yet considering the prosperity of the Syracusians, & their late victories over the Athenians, they stayed a while to dispute of the matter, whether they should refuse or accept the offer made unto them: for the Selinuntines were strictly allied to the Syracusians, as may appear by what is past. In the end, the Senators of Carthage resolve upon the enterprise; & (by a trick of their Punick wit) to separate the Syracusians from the Selinuntines, they send Embassadors to Syracuse: praying that Citie, as in the behalfe of the Egestans, to compell the Selinuntines to take reason, and to rest content with so much of the lands in question, as they of Syracuse should thinke meet to allow them. The Syracusians approved the motion; for it tended to their owne honour. But the Selinuntines would make no such appointment: rather they tooke it ill, that the Syracusians, with whom they had run one course of fortune, in the Athenian warre, should offer to trouble them, by interposing as Arbitrators, in a businesse that themselves could end by force. This was right as the Carthaginians would have it. For now could they of Selinus with an ill grave aide of Syracuse; and the Syracusians as ill grant it unto those, that had refused to stand to the Arbitrement, which the Carthaginians would have put into their hands. Hereupon, an Army of three hundred thousand men is set out from Carthage, under the conduct of Hannibal, Nephew to that Amilcar, who (as you have heard before) was overthrowne with the great Carthaginian Army at Himera by Gelon. Hannibal was exceeding greedy of this employment, that he might take revenge as well of his Uncles, as of his Fathers death; the one of them having bin slaine by the Himercians, the other by those of Selinus. Both the Cities, Hannibal, in this war, won by force of armes, sackt them, and burnt them; and having taken three thousand of the Himercians prisoners, he caused them to be led unto the place, where Amilcar was slaine; and buried them there.

After this followed some trouble at Syracuse, occasioned by the banishment of Hermocrates, who had lately bin Generall of the Syracusan forces, against the Athenians. The malice of his enemies had so farre prevailed with the ingratefull multitude, that he was condemned to exile for his meeke vertue, at such time as he was aiding the Lacedemonians, in their warre against Athens; wherein he did great service. All the noblest sort within Syracuse were sorry for the injury done unto him; and sought to have him repealed. Hermocrates himselfe, returning into Sicily, gathered an Army of six thousand; with which he began to repaire Selinus; & by many noble actions laboured to win the love of his Citizens. But the faction that opposed him was the stronger. Wherefore hee was advised to seize upon a Gate of Syracuse, with some strength of men; whereby his friends, within the Towne, might have the better meanes to rise against the adverse party. This he did: but presently the multitude fell to armes, & set upon him; in which conflict he was slaine. But his Son-in-law, Dionysius, shall make them with Hermocrates alive againe.

Of Dionysius the Tyrant: and others, following him, in Syracuse.

THE Syracusians had enjoyed their liberty about threecore years, from the death of Thrasylbulus, to the death of Hermocrates: at which time Dionysius was raised up by God, to take revenge, as well of their cruelty towards strangers, as of their ingratitude towards their owne best Citizens. For before the time of Dionysius, they had made it their pastime, to reward the vertue of their worthiest Commanders with death, or disgrace: which custome they must now be taught to amend.

Dionysius obtained the principality of Syracuse, by the same degrees, that many others, before him, had made themselves Masters of other Cities, and of Syracuse it selfe. For being made Prator, and commanding their Armies against the Carthaginians, and other their enemies, he behaved himselfe so well, that he got a generall love among the people, and men of war. Then began he to follow the example of Pisistratus, that made himselfe Lord of Athens; obtaining a band of fixe hundred men, to defend his person: under pretence, that his private enemies, being traiterously affected to the State of Syracuse, had laid plots how to murder him, because of his good services. Hee doubled the pay of his Souldiers; alledging, that it would encourage them to fight manfully: but attending thereby to assure them to himselfe. He perswaded the Citizens, to call home, out of exile, those that had bene banished, which were the best men of Syracuse; and these were afterwards, at his devotion, as obliged unto him by so great a benefit. His first favour, among the Syracusians, grew from his accusation of the principall men. It is the delight of base people to reigne over their betters: wherefore, gladly did he helpe them to breake downe, as fetters imprisoning their liberty, the bars that held it under safe custody. Long it was not, ere the chiefe Citizens had found whereat hee aimed. But what they saw, the people would not see: and some that were needy, and knew not how to get Offices without his helpe, were willing to helpe him, though they knew his purposes to bee such, as would make all the Citie to smart. Hee began early to hunt after the tyranny; being but five and twenty yeers of age when he obtained it: belike, it was his desire to reigne long. His first worke, of making himselfe absolute Lord in Syracuse, was, the possession of the Citadell; wherein was much good provision, & under it the Gallies were moored. This he obtained by allowance of the people; and having obtained this, he cared for no more, but declared himselfe without all shame or feare. The Armie, the chiefe Citizens, restored by him from banishment; all the needy sort within Syracuse, that could not thrive by honest courses; and some neighbour-townes, bound unto him, either for his helpe in warre, or for establishing the faction, reigning at that present, were wholly affected to his assistance. Having therefore gotten the Citadell into his hands, he needed no more, save to assure what hee had already. Hee strengthened himselfe by divers marriages; taking first to wife the daughter of Hermocrates; and after her, two at once; the one a Locrian, Doris, by whom he had Dionysius, his Successor; the other, Arifomache, the daughter of Hippiaricus, and sister to Dian, honourable men in Syracuse; which bare unto him many children, that served to fortifie him with new alliances.

Yet it was not long, ere some of the Syracusians (envying his prosperity) incited the multitude, and tooke armes against him, even in the noveltie of his Rule. But their enterprise was more passionately, than wisely governed. He had shamefully bene beaten by the Carthaginians at Gela: which, as it vexed the Sicilian men at armes, making them suspect that it was his purpose to let the Carthaginians wait all, that he might afterwards take possession of the desolate places; so it inflamed them with a desire to free themselves from his tyranny. They departed therefore from him, and marched hastily to Syracuse, where they found friends to helpe them: there they forced his Palace, ran facked his treasures, and so shamefully abused his wife, that for the griefe thereof he poisoned her selfe. But he followed their heeles apace; and firing a Gate of the Citie by night, entred soone enough to take revenge, by making a speedy riddance of them. For he spared none of his knowne, nor not his suspected enemies. After that, hee grew so doubtfull of his life, as he never durst trust Barber to trim him, nor any person, no not so much as his brother, to enter into his chamber, unstript and searched. Hee was the greatest Robber of the people that ever reigned in any State, and withall the most unrepentively cruell.

After this, he separated with fortification that part of the Citie, called the Iland, from the rest; like as the Spaniard did the Citadell of Antwerpe: therein he lodged his Treasures, and his Guards.

He then began to make warre upon the free Cities of Sicil: but while hee lay before Herbesse, an in-land Towne, the Syracusians rebelled against him; so, as with great difficulty he recovered his Citadell: from whence, having allured the old Souldiers of the Campanians, who forced their passage through the Citie, with one thousand and two hundred horse, he againe recovered the mafferie over the Syracusians. And when a multitude of them were busied in gathering in their harvest, he disarmed all the Towns-men remayning, and new strengthened the Fort of the Iland, with a double wall. Hee inclosed that part also, called Epipolis; which, with threescore thousand labourers, he finished in three weekes, being two leagues in compasse. He then built two hundred new Gallies, and repaired one hundred and ten of the old; forged one hundred and forty thousand Targets, with as many swords, and head-peeces, with fourteene thousand corslets, and all other futable armes. Which done, he sent word to the Carthaginians, (greatly infected by the plague) That except they would abandon the Greek Townes, which they held in Sicil, he would make war upon them: and, not staying for answer, hee tooke the spoile of all the Phœnician ships, and merchandize, within his Ports; as King Philip the second did of our Englisb, before the warre in our late Queenes time. He then goes to the field with fourescore thousand foot, and three thousand horse, and sends his brother Leptines to sea, with two hundred Gallies, and five hundred ships of burden. Most of the Townes which held for Carthage yielded unto him; saving Panormus, Segesta or Egesta, Ancyræ, Motya, and Entella. Of these, he first wan Motya by assault, and put all therein to the sword; but before Egesta he lost a great part of his Army, by a fallie of the Citizens. In the meane while Himilco arrives; but, ere he tooke land, he lost in a night at Sea, with Leptines, fiftie ships of warre, and five thousand Souldiers, besides many ships of burden. This notwithstanding, hee recovered againe Motya upon his first descent. From thence marching towards Messena, he tooke Lypara, and (soon after) Messena, and razed it to the ground. Now began Dionysius greatly to doubt his estate. Hee therefore fortified all the places he could, in the Territorie of the Leontines, by which he supposed that Himilco would passe toward Syracuse; and hee himselfe tooke the field againe, with foure and thirty thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Now, hearing that Himilco had divided his Army into two parts, marching with the one halfe over-land, and sending Magos with the other by Sea: he sent Leptines, his brother, to encounter Magos. But Leptines was utterly beaten by the Carthaginians; twenty thousand of his men were slaine, and an hundred of his Gallies lost. It is very strange, and hardly credible, which yet good Authors tell us; That one Citie should be able to furnish five hundred saile of ships, and two hundred Gallies: (for, so many did Syracuse arme in this warre) and more strange it is, that in a battaile at Sea, without any great Artillerie, or Musket-shot, twenty thousand should be slaine in one fight. In all our fights against the Turkes, of which that at Lepanto was the most notable, wee heare of no such number lost; nor in any other fight by Sea, that ever happened in our age, nor before us. When Charles the first went to besiege Algier, he had in all his fleet, transporters and others, but two hundred and fiftie saile of shippes, and threescore and five Gallies: for the furnishing of which fleet, he sought helpe from all the Cities and Ports of Spain, Naples, and the rest of Italy. But in old times it was the manner to carry into the field, upon extremity, as many as were needfull, of all that could beare armes, giving them little wages, or other allowance: in our dayes it is not so; neither indeed, is it often requisite. Upon this overthrow, Dionysius posseth away to Syracuse, to strengthen it: Himilco followeth him, and besiegeth the Towne by Land & Sea. But the Tyrant having received aide from the Lacedæmonians, under the conduct of Pharacidas, puts himselfe to Sea, to make provision for his Citizens, who, in his absence, take twentie of the Carthaginian Gallies, and sinke foure. Hereupon, finding their owne successe prosperous, and that of the Tyrant exceeding ill; having also at the present weapons in their hands, they consult how to recover their libertie. And this they had done, had not Pharacidas the Lacedæmonian resisted them. It also fell out, to his exceeding advantage, that above an hundred thousand of them died thereof. He therefore, with the power that he could gather together, sets upon them both by Sea and Land; and having slaine great numbers of them, forceth Himilco to desire peace. This peace Dionysius sold him for a great summe of money; on condition, that he should steale away with his Carthaginians onely: which he basely accepted, betraying the rest of the Africans and Spaniards. Yet no faith was kept with him: for he was pursued, and left many of his Carthaginians behind him. The rest of the Africans fell under the swords of their enemies; only the Spaniards, after they had a while bravely defended themselves, were (after their submission) entertained, and served the Conquerour.

Many such examples of perfidious dealing have I noted in other places, and can hardly forbear to deliver unto memorie the like practices, when they meet with their matches: That which hapned unto Monsieur de Piles, was very futable to this treacherie, to wherewith Dionysius pursued Himilco. I was present when De Piles related the injurie done unto him. He had rendred S. John d' Angellie to the French King Charles the ninth, who besieged him therein. He rendred it, upon promise made by the faith of a King, that he should be suffered to depart in safetie, with all his followers. Yet in presence of the King himselfe, of the Duke of Anjou his brother, Generall of his Armie, of the Queene Mother, and of divers Dukes and Marshals of France, he was set upon, and broken in his March; spoyled of all that he had, and forced to save his life by flight; leaving the most of his Souldiers dead upon the place; the Kings hand and faith warranting him to march away with ensignes displaid, and with all his goods and provisions, no whit availing him. It needs not therefore seeme strange, that an Heathen Tyrant should thus break his faith, since Kings, professing Christianity, are bold to doe the like, or command their Captaines to doe it for them.

Dionysius, after this great victorie, took care to re-edifie Messena, Magos, who stayed in Sicil, to hold up the Carthaginians therein, is againe beaten by Dionysius; who is also beaten by the Tauromenians. A new supplie of fourescore thousand Souldiers is sent from Carthage to Magos; but these take egges for their money, and make peace with Dionysius, leaving the Sicilians in Tauromenium, to shift for themselves: whom Dionysius, after a long siege, overcame, and gave their Citie to his mercenarie Souldiers.

He then past into Italie, obtained divers victories there, brought the Rhegiens on their knees, forced them to pay him one hundred and fourescore thousand crowns, to furnish him with threescore Gallies, and to put in an hundred pledges, for assurance of their future observance of covenants. This he did, not with any purpose to performe unto them the peace that they had so dearly bought; but that having taken from them their Gallies, he might besiege them, and ruine them utterly, with the more ease. Now to the end he might not, without some colour, falsifie the faith that he had given to them; he pretended to want victuall for his Armie, at such time as he seemed readie to depart out of Italie, and sent to them to furnish him therewith, promising to return them the like quantitie at his coming home to Syracuse.

His resolution was, that if they refused to furnish him, he would then make their refusal the cause of his quarrell: if they yielded to aide him with the proportion which he desired, that then they should not be able, for want of food, to endure a siege any long time against him. For, to ruine them he had fully determined, at what price soever. And great reason he had to take revenge of them, if he had done it fairly, and without breach of faith. For when in the beginning of his reigne, he desired them to bestow a daughter of some of their Nobilitie upon him for a wife; they answered, that they would not any one fit for him, save the Hang-mans daughter. Princes doe rather pardon ill deeds, than villanous words. Alexander the great forgave many sharpe swords, but never any sharpe tongues; no, though they told him but truly of his errors.

and certainly, it belongs to those that have warrant from God, to reprehend Princes; and to none else, especially in publike.

It is said, that Henry the fourth of France, had his heart more inflamed against the Duke of Biron, for his over-bold and biting taunts, that he used against him before Amiens, than for his conspiracie with the Spaniard or Savoyan: for he had pardoned ten thousand of such as had gone farther, and drawn their swords against him. The contemptuous words that Sir John Parer used of our late Queene Elizabeth, were his ruine; and those words that Romish Priest, produced against him. So fared it with not the counterfeit letter of the Romish Priest, that thereby ranne the same, and a worse fortune, soone after.

To be short, he made them know new bred from old. He assaulted their Towne on all sides, which he continued to doe eleven moneths, till he wonne it by force. He used his victorie without mercie, specially against Phyton, who had commanded within it.

Some other wars he made with the Carthaginians, after the taking and razing of this Citie; and those with variable successe. For as in one encounter he slue Mago, with ten thousand Africans: so the sonne of Mago beat him, and slue his brother Leprines, with foureteene thousand of his Souldiers. After which he bought his peace of the Carthaginians, as they had formerly done of him; following therein the advice of Prosperitie and Adversitie, as all Kings and States doe.

When he had reigned eight and thirtie years, he died: some say in his bed peaceably, which is the most likely, though others report it otherwise. A cruell man he was, and a faithlesse; a great Poet, but a foolish one. He entertained Plato a while, but afterward, for speaking against his tyrannie, he gave order to have him slaine, or sold for a slave. For he could endure no man that flattered him not beyond measure. His Parasites therefore flattered his crueltye, The hate of evil men; & his lawlesse slaughters, The ornaments and effluvia of his justice. True it is, that flatterers are a kind of vermine, which poyson all the Princes of the World; and yet they prosper better than the worthiest and valiantest men doe: and I wonder not at it, for it is a world: and, as our Saviour Christ hath told us, They will love her owne.

To this Dionysius his sonne of the same name succeeded, and inherited both his Kingdom and his Vices. To win the love of the People, he pardoned, and released out of prison, a great number of persons, by his Father lockt up and condemned. Withall, he remitted unto his Citizens divers payments, by his Father imposed upon them. Which done, and thereby hoping that he had fastned unto himselfe the peoples affections; he cast off the Sheepes skin, and put on that of the Wolfe. For being jealous of his own Brethren, as men of more vertue than himselfe, he caused them all to be slaine; and all the Kingdome that they had by their Mothers side. For Dionysius his Father (as hath bin said) had two Wives; Doris of Locris, and Aristomache a Syracusan, the sister of Dion, which Brother-in-law of his he greatly enriched.

By Doris he had this Dionysius, who succeeded unto him; and by Aristomache he had two Sons and two Daughters; of which the elder, called Sophrosine, he gave in marriage to his eldest sonne, and her halfe-brother Dionysius; the younger, called Arete, he bestowed on his Brother Theorides: after whose death Dion tooke her to wife, being in Necessitie.

This Dion, a just and valiant man, finding that Dionysius had abandoned all exercise of vertue, and that he was wholly given over to sensualitye, prevailed so much with Plato, whose Disciple he had bene, as he drew him into Sicily, to instruct the young King. And having perswaded the King to entertaine him, he wrought so well with him, as Dionysius began to change condition; to change Tyrannie into Monarchie; and to hold the Principallitie that he had, rather by the love of his People, and his Nationall Lawes than by the violence of his Guards and Garriisons. But this goodnesse of his lasted not long. For Philistus the Historian, and other his Parasites, that hated *Dion*s severitye wrought him out of the Tyrants favour, and caused him soone after to be banished out of Sicily, to the great griefe of the whole Nation. For whereas Dion had made offer to the King, either to compound the quarrels betweene him and the Carthaginians, of whom Dionysius stood in great feare; or (at least) if they refused it, to furnish him with fiftie Gallies at his owne charge, during the warre against them: his enemies found means, by finistier interpretation, to convert his good will into matter of treason. They told Dionysius, that all the great commendations, given of Plato, had tended to none other end, than to soften his minde, and to make him neglect his owne affaires, by the studie of Philosophie; whilst Dion in the meane time having furnished fifty Gallies, under colour of the Kings service, had it in his owne power either to deliver to the Syracusians their former liberty, or to make himselfe Lord and Sovereigne of their State.

It is likely, that the honest and liberall offer which he made, to serve the King with so great a preparation, at his owne charge, begot him many enemies. For they that had loved the King for none other end than to raise and enrich themselves, and had already bene raised and enriched, thought themselves bound to make the same offer that Dion had made, if the King had had the grace to conceive it aright. But the covetous and ignorant cowards, that had neither the knowledge, nor the daring that Dion had, were bold to stile his Love and Liberality, Pride and Presumption; and heartned the young King in his oppressing, and eating up his owne people, of whose spoyle they themselves shared no small portion. I have heard it, That when Charles the fifth had the repulse at Algier, in Africa, Ferdinando Cortese, one of the bravest men that ever Spain brought forth, offered unto the Emperour, to continue the siege at his owne charge. But he had never good day after it. For they that envied his victories, and his conquest of Mexico in the West Indies, perswaded the Emperour, that Cortese sought to value himselfe above him; and to have it said, That what the Emperour could not, Cortese had effected, and was therefore more worthy of the Empire, than hee that had it.

When Dion was newly banished, the Tyrant was contented, at first to send him the revenues of his Lands, and permit him to dispose of his moveables, at his owne pleasure: not without giving hope to recall him in short time. Had hee continued in this good moode, like enough it is, that Dion would have bene well pleased to live well, as he did at Athens. But after some time, Dionysius made Port-sale of this Noble-mans goods, and thereby urged him to take another course, even to seek the restitution of his Countrey to liberty. The vertues of Dion, especially his great liberality, had purchased much love in Greece. This love made him suspected and hated of the Tyrant: but it stood him in good stead, when he sought to raise men, with whose helpe he might returne into Sicily. Yet he got not above eight hundred (for he carried the matter closely) to follow him in this adventure. But many of them were men of quality, and fit to be Leaders. Neither did hee doubt of finding in Syracuse, as many as should be needfull, that would readily assist him. Therefore he landed boldly in Sicily, marched to Syracuse, entered the City without resistance, armed the multitude, and won all, save the Citadel.

Dionysius was then absent in Italie, but hee quickly had advertisement of this dangerous accident: Wherefore hee returned hastily to Syracuse: whence, after many vaine treaties of peace, and some forcible attempts to recover the Towne, hee was faine to depart; leaving yet the Cattle to the custody of Apollocrates his eldest Sonne. There hee went, his Minion Philistus, comming with a strength of men to assist him, was beaten, taken, and put to death by torment. But Dion, for the recovery of his Countreys liberty, had the same reward that all worthy men have had from popular Estates. He was disgraced, assaulted, and forced to abandon the Citie. He retired himselfe to the Leontines, who received him with great joy. Soone after his departure from Syracuse, new troupes enter the Cattle: they fall out, assaile, spoyle, and burne a great part of the City. Dion is sent for, with humble request: yet, ere hee could arrive, Dionysius his Souldiers were retired; and the Towns-men thinking themselves secure, shut the gates against Dion. But the next night they of the Cattle fall againe, with greater fury than ever; they kill Man, Woman, and Childe, and set fire in all parts of the Towne. In this their extremity Dion comes the second time to their succour; the love of his Countrey surmounting all the injuries that he had received. Hee fers upon the Garrison of the Cattle, with the one part of his Army; and quencheth the fire every where kindled, with the other part. In conclusion, after he had conquered both the fire and the sword, that had wel-near burnt to ashes, and depopulated Syracuse, he recovered the Cattle, with the munition and furniture thereof, and sent Apollocrates after Dionysius his Father, into Italie. But their malice, of whom he had best deserved, and whom he had loved most, gave an untimely end to his dayes. For hee was soon after his victorie, murdered by Gylypus; who, after he had, with ill success, a while governed Syracuse, was slaine with the same Dagger, with which hee had murdered Dion.

Ten yeares after the death of Dion, Dionysius, with the assistance of his friends in Italie, recovers his estate, and returns to Syracuse, driving Nysseus thence, whom he found Governour therein. The better sort of the Citizens, fearing more than ever, his cruelty, flee to Icetes, a Syracusan borne, and then ruling the Leontines. Icetes enters into confederacie with the Carthaginians, hoping by their assistance, not only to prevail against Dionysius; but by the hatred of the Syracusians towards Dionysius, to make him also Lord of their Citie. The Syracusians, being deservedly afflicted on all sides, send to the Corinthians for succour. Icetes also sends thither, and dissuades the Corinthians, as well as he can, from intermeddling in the businesse. He tells them, by his Messengers, That he had entred into league with the Carthaginians, who were so strong by Sea, that it was not in the power of Corinth to land an Armie in Sicily. But the Corinthians, being by this treason of Icetes, more enraged than dissuaded, sent Timoleon with nineteene Gallies, to deliver Syracuse from tyrannie. In the meane while, Icetes had entred Syracuse, and with the helpe of the Carthaginians, driven Dionysius into the Castle, where he besieged him.

Icetes, being himselfe a Tyrant in Leontium, rather sought how to enlarge his power, than how to deliver his Countrey. Therefore, hearing that Timoleon was arrived at Rhegium, he sent to perswade him, to returne his fleet; for that all things were (in effect) established in Sicily. The Carthaginian Gallies were also in the same Port of Rhegium, whose Captaines advised Timoleon to get him gone in peace. They had farre more Gallies there than he had, and were like to compell him, if he would not be perswaded. Timoleon, finding himselfe over-mastered, makes request to the Carthaginian Captaines, that they would be pleased to enter into Rhegium, and there, in an open assembly of the people, to deliver unto him those arguments, for his return, which they had used to him in private; that he might, by publike testimonie, discharge himselfe to the Senate of Corinth.

The Carthaginians, perswading themselves, that a victorie, obtained by a few faire words, was without losse, and farre more easie, than that of many blowes and wounds, yeelded to Timoleon's desire. But while the Orations were delivering, Timoleon, favoured by the Rhegians, stole out of the preasse; and having set saile, before the Gates were opened to the Carthaginians, he recovered the Port of Tauromenium, where he was joyfully received by Andromachus the Governour. From thence he marched toward Adranum, where surprizing Icetes his Armie, he slew a part thereof, and put the rest to run. It is the nature of victorie to beget friends. The Adranitans joined with him, and so did Mamercus, the Tyrant of Catana. Dionysius also sent to Timoleon, offering to surrender the Castle of Syracuse into his hands, as thinking it better to yeeld up himselfe, and the places which he could not defend, unto the Corinthians, than either to Icetes, whom he disdained, or to the Carthaginians, whom he hated. Now Timoleon, who, within fiftie dayes after his arrivall, had recovered the Castle of Syracuse, and sent Dionysius to Corinth, to live there a private man, was still invaded by the armies, and molested by the practices of Icetes. For he besieged the Corinthians within the castle of Syracuse, and attempted (but in vaine) the murder of Timoleon.

The Corinthians send unto Timoleon a supplie of two thousand foot, and two hundred horse, which are stayd in Italie by foule weather. Icetes is strengthened with three score thousand Africans, brought unto him by Mago (all which he lodgeth within Syracuse) & with an hundred and fiftie Gallies, to keep the Port. This was the first time that ever the Carthaginians had dominion within the walls of that Citie. With this great Armie Icetes assaileth the Castle. Timoleon sends them victuals, and succour, in small boats, by night, from Catana. Mago and Icetes doe therefore resolve to besiege Catana; but they were no sooner on their way towards it, with part of their forces, than Leon, Captain of the Corinthians, sallied out of the Castle, and tooke that part of Syracuse, called Acra, which hee fortified.

In the meane while, the two thousand Corinthians arrive: with whom, and two thousand other Souldiers, Timoleon marcheth toward Syracuse. Mago abandoneth Icetes, being being frighted out of Sicily (which he might easily have conquered) with an idle rumour of treason. This made him return to Carthage; where the generall exclamation against his cowardize, did so much affright him, that for feare of further punishment he hanged himselfe. Timoleon enters the Citie, and bears down the Castle (which he called the nest of Tyrants) to the ground. But he found the Citie, when the strangers were fled, in effect desolate; so as their horses did feed on the grasse growing in the market-place. Therefore he writes to Corinth for people to re-inhabit it. Ten thousand are sent out of Greece; many come from Italy; others from other parts of the Iland.

But a new storme ariseth. Ashdrubal and Amilear, Carthaginians, arrive about Lilybæum, with three score and ten thousand Souldiers, transported (with all their provisions) in a thousand ships of burden, and two hundred Gallies. Timoleon marcheth thither, and chargeth this great Armie upon the passage of a River.

Attempt of raine, haile, and lightning, with boisterous windes, beating upon the faces of the Carthaginians, they are utterly broken, ten thousand slaine; five thousand taken, with all their carriages and provisions: among which there were found a thousand corselets gilt and graven. After this, Timoleon gave an overthrow to Icetes, and following his victorie, tooke him, with his son Eupolemus, and the Generall of his horse, prisoners; whom he caused all to be slain: and afterwards (which was imputed to him for great cruelty) he suffered Icetes his wives & daughters to be put to death. But this was the revenge of God upon Icetes, who (after the murder of Dion) had caused Areta, Dions wife, and a young child of his, with Aristomache his sister, to be cast into the Sea.

He againe prevailed against Mamercus Tyrant of Catana, and won Catana itself. Mamercus fled to Hippon Tyrant of Messena: but Timoleon, pursuing him, won the town; delivering Hippon to his Citizens, who tormented him to death. The same end had Mamercus, and all other the Tyrants in Sicily.

Finally, he made peace with the Carthaginians, on condition, That they should not gulle the River of Lycus. After this, he lived in great honour among the Syracusians, till his death; and was solemnly buried by them in the market-place of their Citie: the day of his Funerals being for ever ordained to be kept holy among them.

After such time as Timoleon had delivered Syracuse from the tyrannie of Dionysius, and brought peace to the whole Iland; the Inhabitants enjoyed their libertie in peace, about twentie yeares. The Cities and temples were repaired; the Trade renewed; the Merchant sailed in safetie; and the Labouring man enjoyed the fruits of the earth in quiet. But it was impossible that a Nation which neither knew how to governe, nor how to obey; which could neither endure Kings, nor men worthe to be Kings, to govern them; should any long time subsist.

Twentie yeares after the death of Timoleon, there started up one Agathocles among them, a man of base birth, and of baser condition; who from a Beggar, to a common Souldier; from a Souldier to a Captaine; and so from degree to degree, rising to be a Prætor; finally, became Lord and Sovereigne of the Syracusians. Many fortunes he won, and under-went as many dangers, ere he obtained the Principalltie. For he had more than once attempted it, and was therein both beaten and banisht. A passing valiant man he was, and did notable service, as well for those by whom he was employed, as also for the Syracusians, and against them. For in their wars against those of Enna, and the Campanes, he did them memorable service: and on the contrarie, as memorable service for the Murgantines against the Syracusians. For being entertained by the people of Murgantia, and made Generall of their forces, he sackt Leontium, and besieged Syracuse so freightly, that the Citizens were driven to crave aid, even from their ancient and natural enemies, the Carthaginians. Amilear was sent by the Carthaginians to relieve Syracuse. With him Agathocles wrought so well, that he got him to make peace between himselfe and the Syracusians; binding himselfe by promise and oath to remaine a friend and servant to the State of Carthage, for ever after. Amilear entertained the businesse, and compounded the quarrels betweene Agathocles and the Syracusians. Agathocles is chosen Prætor; he entertaines five thousand Africans, and divers old Souldiers of the Murgantines, under colour of a purpose to besiege Herbita. With these, and with the assistance of the poore and discontented Syracusians (the Citie also being divided into many factions) he assailes the Senators, kills all his enemies and opposites; divides and unexperienced in dangers; the mercenary forces, that they levie in these parts, will rather follow us than them, if we offer greater wages than they can give: which we may better promise and make good, by letting them have some share with us in all the wealth of the Carthaginians, than our enemies can doe, by making some addition to their stipends. Thus he talked, as one already Master of all the riches in Africke; and with many brave words encouraged his men so well, that they were contented to set fire on all their ships (reserving one or two to use as Messengers) to the end that no hope should remaine, save only in victorie. In this heat of resolution, they win by force two Cities; which after they had thoroughly sacked, they burnt to the ground: as a mark of terror to all that should make resistance. The Carthaginians hearing this, are amazed; thinking that Amilcar is broken, and his whole Armie destroyed in Sicily. This impression of disdainie them, that when they know the truth of all, by such as had escaped in the late Sea fight, yet still they feare, and know not what. They suspect Amilcars faith, who had suffered Agathocles to land in Africke: they suspect their principall Citizens at home, of a meaning to betray Carthage unto the enemy; they raise a great Armie, and know not to whose charge they may safely commit it.

There were at that time two famous Captaines in the Citie, Hanno and Bomilcar; great enemies, and therefore the more unlikely to conspire against the Common-wealth. These are made Generals of the Armie levied, which farre exceeded the forces of Agathocles. But it seldom happens, that dissension betweene Commanders producem any fortunate event. Necessitie drave Agathocles to fight: and the courage of his men, resolved to deale with the whole multitude of the Carthaginians, made easie the victorie against the one halfe of them. For Bomilcar would not stirre, but suffered Hanno to be cut in pieces.

The reputation of this great victorie, brought over a King of the Africans, from the Carthaginian societie, to take part with Agathocles: who pursuing his victorie, winneth many Townes, and sends word to Syracuse of his good successe. The Carthaginians also send into Sicily, willing Amilcar, their General, to succour the State of Africke, which was in danger to be lost, whilst he was travelling in the conquest of Sicily. Amilcar sends them five thousand men: all his forces he thought it not needfull to transport; as hoping rather to draw Agathocles back into Sicily, than to be driven home by one, that could scarce retain his owne Kingdome. But these good hopes had a bad issue. He spent some time in winning a few Townes that adhered unto the Syracusians: and having brought his matters to some good order, he conceived a sudden hope of taking Syracuse by surprise. It was a prettie (though tragically) accident, if it were true, as Tullie relates it. Amilcar had a dreame which told him that he should sup the next day within Syracuse. His fancie begot this dreame, and he verily beleaved it. He made more haste than good speed toward the Citie: and coming upon it on the sudden, had good hope to carrie it. But his enemies were prepared for him, and had layed an ambush to intrap him, whereinto he fell. So he was carried prisoner into the Citie; in which it was likely that he had no great cheare to his supper: for they struck off his head, and sent it into Africke (a welcome present) to Agathocles.

This good successe of things at home, did put such courage into the Sicilian Armie, that Agathocles was bold to wear a Crown, and stile himselfe King of Africke. He had allured Ophellus, King of the Cyrenians, to take his part, by promises to deliver the Countie into his hands: for that (as he said) it was sufficient unto himselfe to have diverted the Carthaginians from Sicily, wherein (after this warre ended) he might reigne quietly. Ophellus came with a great Armie, and was friendly entertained. But the traitorous Sicilian, taking an advantage, did murder this his assistant; and afterwards by good words, and great promises, drew all the Cyrenian Armie to follow him in his Warres. Thus his villanie found good successe; and he so prevailed in Africke, that he got leave to make a step into Sicily. Many Townes in Sicily had embraced a desire of recovering their libertie; thinking it high time to fight at length for their owne freedome, after that they had so long bene exposed, (as a reward of victorie) either unto Aliense, or to Tyrants of their owne Countie. These had prevailed farre, and gotten many to take their parts, as in a common cause: when the coming of Agathocles abated their high spirits, and his good successe in many fights, compelled them to Obedience. Out of Sicily he returned into Africke, where his affaires stood in very bad terms. Archagathus, his sonne had lost a battell; and (which was worse) had ill means to help himselfe: his Armie being in mutinie for lacke of pay. But Agathocles pacified the tumult, by the accustomed promises of great bootie and spoyle. It had now bene time for him to offer peace to the Carthaginians: which to obtaine, they would (questionlesse) have given to him, both money enough to pay his armie, and all that they then held in Sicily. For their Citie had bene distressed, not only by this his warre, but by the treason of Bomilcar, who failed not much of making himselfe Tyrant over them. But ambition is blind. Agathocles had all his thoughts fixed upon the conquest of Carthage; it selfe out of which dreame he was awaked, by the losse of a battell, not so memorable in regard of any accident therein, as of the strange events following it. The Carthaginians, after their great misfortunes in this warre, had renewed their old sacrifices of children to Saturne: from which they had abstained ever since they made peace with Gelon. And now they made choice of some, the goodliest of their prisoners, taken in the battell, to offer unto the said Idoll, in way of thankfulness for their victorie. The fire, with which these unhappy men were consumed, caught hold upon the lodgings neere unto the Altar; and spreading it selfe farther through the Campe, with the destruction of many men, caused such a tumult as is usuall in the like cases. At the same time, the like accident of fire burnt up the Pavillion of Agathocles. Hereupon both the Armies fled away; each of them beleiving, that the noyse in the adverse Campe, was a signe of the enemies coming to invade it. But the Carthaginians had a safe retreat: Agathocles, by a second error, fell into a new calamitie. In the beginning of this his flight in the darke, he met with his own African Souldiers; and thinking them to be enemies, (as indeed the one halfe of them had revolted from him, to the Carthaginians, in the last battell) hee began to assault them, and was so stoutly resisted, that the lost in this blinde fight above foure thousand of his men. This did so discourage his proud heart, that, being fallen from the chere of taking the Citie of Carthage, unto some distrust of his own safetie, he knew no more how to moderate his present weak feares, than lately he had known how to governe his ambition. Therefore he tooke the way that came next into his head; which was, to steale closely a-board his ships, with his younger sonne (the elder he suspected of Incest, and of Ambition) and so to flee into Sicily; thinking it the best course to shift for himselfe, as wanting vessels wherein to transport his Armie. His elder son Archagathus, perceiving his drift, arrested him, and put him under custodie: but by means of a sudden tumult, he was let loose, escaped, and fled alone, leaving both his sonnes behinde him. His flight being noyed through the Armie, all was in uproare; and extremitie of rage caused not onely the common Souldier, but even such as had bene friends to the Tyrant, to lay hold upon his two sonnes, and kill them. That this flight of Agathocles was extremely base, I need not use words to prove: That his feare was truly, as all feare is said to be, a passion, depriving him of the succours which reason offered, the sequell doth manifest. His forsaken Souldiers, being now a headlesse company, and no longer an Armie to be feared, obtained neverthelesse a reasonable composition from the Carthaginians: to whom they sold those places, whereof they had possession, for nineteene talents. Likewise, Agathocles himselfe, having lost his Armie, did neverthelesse, by the reputation of this late war, make peace with Carthage upon equal termes.

Sicily

After this, the Tyrant, being delivered from forraigne enemies, discovered his bloudie nature, in most abominable cruelties, among the Sicilians. His wants, and his feares, urged him so violently, that he was not satisfied with the spoyle of the rich, or the death of those whom he held suspected: but in a beastly rage depopulated whole Cities. Hee devised new engines of torment; wherein striving to exceed the Bull of Phalaris, he made a frame of brasse, that should serve to scorch mens bodies, and withall give him leave to behold them in their miserie. So divellish is the nature of man, when reason, that should be his guide, is become a slave to his brutish affections. In these mischiefs he was so outrageous, that he neither spared Sexe, nor Age; especially, when he was informed of the slaughter of his children in Africke. But this was not the way to preserve his estate: it threw him into new dangers. They whom he had chafed out of their Countrey tooke armes against him, and drave him into such feare, that he was faine to seeke the love at Carthage, which by ruling well he might have had in Sicily. Hee freely delivered livered into the Carthaginians hands, all those Townes of the Phenicians in Sicil, belonging unto them, which were in his possession. They required him honourably, with great store of corne, and with four hundred talents of gold and silver. So (though not without much trouble & hazzard) he prevailed against the Rebels, and settled his estate. Having no further business left in Sicil, he made a voyage into Italie. There he subdued the Brutians, rather by terror of his name than by any force, for they yielded at his first coming. This done, he went to the Isle of Lipara, and made the Inhabitants buy peace with one hundred talents of gold. But when he had gotten this great summe, he would needs exact a greater; and finding plainly that they had no more left, he was bold to spoyle the Temples of their gods. Herein (me thinks) he did well enough. For how could he believe those to be gods, that had continually given deaf eares to his horrible perjuries? Then he returned richly home, with eleven ships loaden with gold: all which, and all the rest of his fleet, were cast away by foule weather at Sea; one Gallie excepted, in which he himselfe escaped, to suffer a more miserable end. A grievous sickness fell upon him, that rotted his whole bodie, spreading it selfe through all his veines and sinewes. Whilest he lay in this case, all desiring his end, save only Theogenia (a wife that he had taken out of Egypt) and her small children: his Nephew, the sonne of Archagathus, before mentioned, and a younger sonne of his own, began to contend about the Kingdome. Neither did they seeke to end the controversie by the old Tyrants decision; they regarded him not so much. But each of them laid wait for the others life: wherein the Nephew sped so well, that he slue his Uncle, and got his grand-fathers Kingdome, without asking any leave. These tydings wounded the heart of Archagathus with feare and sorrow. He saw himselfe without helpe, like to become a prey to his ungracious Nephew, from whom he knew that no favour was to be expected, either by himselfe, or by those, whom only he now held deare, which were Theogenia and her children. Therefore he advised her and them to flie before they were surprised; for that otherwise they could by no means avoid, either death, or somewhat that would be worse. He gave them all his treasures and goods, wherewith he even compelled them (weeping to leave him desolate in so wretched a case) to imbarke themselves hastily, and make speed into Egypt. After their departure, whether he threw himselfe into the fire, or whether his disease consumed him, there was none left that cared to attend him; but he ended his life as safely, as obscurely, and in as much want as he first began it.

After the death of Agathocles it was, that the Mamertines, his Souldiers, traiterously occupied Messana, and infested a great part of the Island. Then also did the Carthaginians begin to renew their attempts of conquering all Sicil. What the Nephew of Agathocles did, I cannot finde. Likely it is that he quickly perished. For the Sicilians were driven to send for Pyrrius to help them, who had married with a daughter of Agathocles. But Pyrrius was soone wearie of the Countie (as hath been shewed before) and therefore left it; prophesying that it would become a goodly champion field, wherein Rome and Carthage should fight for superiortie. In which business, how these two great Cities did speed, the order of our storie will declare.

§. V.

A recontinnation of the Roman war in Sicil. How Hieron, King of Syracuse, forsook the Carthaginians, and made his peace with Rome.

WHEN Appius Claudius, following the advantage of his victorie gotten at Messana, brought the war unto the Gates of Syracuse, and besieged that great City; Hieron found it high time for him to seek peace: knowing that the Carthaginians had neither any reason to be offended with him, for helping himselfe by what means he could, when they were not in case to give him assistance; and foreseeing withall, that when once he had purchased his quiet from the Romans, it would be free for him to sit still, without feare of molestation, whilest Rome and Carthage were fighting for the masticke. In this good mood the new Roman Consuls M. Valerius, and C. Otacilius found him, and readily embraced the offer of his friendship. Yet they made use of their present advantage, and sold him peace for an hundred (some say two hundred) Talents.

These Consuls had brought a great Armie into Sicil; yet did they nothing else in effect, than bring over Hieron to their side. If the Syracusan held them busied (which I find not, otherwise than by circumstances, as, by the summe of money imposed upon him, and by their performing none other piece of service) all the whole time of their abode in the Island; then was his departure from the friendship of Carthage, no lesse to his honour than it was to his commoditie. For by no reason could they require, that he should suffer his owne Kingdome to run into manifest perill of subversion, for their sakes that should have received all the profit of the victorie: seeing they did expose him to the whole danger, without straining themselves to give him reliefe. But the Carthaginians had lately made good proofe of the strength of Syracuse, in the daies of Agathocles: and therefore knew, that it was able to beare a very strong siege. And hereupon it is like that they were the more slacke, in sending helpe: if (perhaps) it were not some part of their desire, that both Rome and Syracuse should weaken one the other, whereby their owne work might be the easier against them both. Yet indeed, the case of the besieged Citie was not the same, when the Romans lay before it, as it had bin when the Carthaginians attempted it. For there was great reason to trie the uttermost hazzard of war against the Carthaginians, who sought no other thing than to bring it into slavery: not fo against the Romans, who thought it sufficient if they could withdraw it from the partie of their enemies. Besides, it was not all one to be governed by Agathocles, or by Hieron. The former of these cared not what the Citizens endured, so long as he might preserve his owne tyrannie: the latter, as a just and good Prince, had no greater desire than to win the love of his people, by seeking their commoditie; but including his owne felicitie within the publicke laboured to uphold both, by honest and faithfull dealing. Hereby it came to pass, that he enjoyed a long and happy reign, living deare to his own Subjects, beloved of the Romans, and not greatly molested by the Carthaginians; whom, either the consideration, that they had left him to himselfe, ere he left their societie, made unwilling to seeke his mine; or their more earnest business with the Romans, made unable to compasse it.

§. VI.

How the Romans besiege and winne Agrigentum. Their beginning to maintaine a fleet. Their first losse, and first victory by sea. Of sea-fight in generall.

Hieron, having sided himselfe with the Romans, aided them with victuals, and other necessities: so that they, presuming upon his assistance, recall some part of their forces. The Carthaginians finde it high time to bestirre them; they send to the Ligurians, and to the troupes they had in Spain, to come to their aide; who being arrived, they made the Citie of Agrigentum the seat of the war, against the Romans, filling it with all manner of munition.

The Roman Consuls, having made peace with Hieron, returne into Italie; and, in their places, Lucius Posthumus and Quintus Mamilius arrive. They goe on towards Agrigentum: and finding no enemy in the field, they besiege it, though it were stuffed with fiftie thousand Souldiers. After a while, the time of harvest being come, a part of the Roman Armie range the Countie to gather corn, and those at the siege grow negligent; the Carthaginians sallie furiously, and endanger the Roman Armie, but are in the end repelled into the town with great losse; but by the smart felt on both sides, the Assaultants redoubled their guards, and the besieged kept within their covert. Yet the

about the walls; and it had sometimes in it eight hundred thousand Inhabitants. This Citie, by reason of the fertility of the soyle, and the neighbourhood of Carthage, grew in a short space from small beginnings, to great glorie and riches. The plenty and luxury thereof was greivous, as it caused Empedocles to say, that the Agrigentines built Palaces of such sumptuousness, as if they meant to live for ever; and made such feasts, as if they meant to dye the next day. But their greatest pompe and magnificence, was in their godly temples, and theatres, water-conduits, and fish-ponds: the number whereof at this day are sufficient argument, that Rome it selfe could never boast of the like. In the Porch of the temple of Jupiter Olympius, (by which I meanly judge of the Temple it selfe) there was set out on one side the full proportion of the Giants, fighting with the gods, all cut out in polished marble of divers colours; a work the most magnificent and rare that ever hath beene scene: on the other side the warre of Troy, and the encounters which happened at that siege, with the personages of the Heroes that were doers in that warre; all of the like beautiful stone, and of equal stature to the bodies of those men in ancient times: In comparison of which, the laterer workes of that kinde, are but pette things, and meere trifles. It would require a volume to expresse the magnificence of the Temples of Hercules, Atalapha, Concord, Juno Lucina, Chastitie, Proserpine, Cybele, and Pallas; wherein the Master-peeces of those exquisite Painters and Carvers Phidias, Xeusis, Myron, and Polyclitus, were to be scene. But in process of time it ran the same fortune that all other great Cities have done, and was ruined by divers calamities of warre: whereof this war present brought unto it not the least.

Romans, the better to assure themselves, cut a deepe trench betweene the walls of the Citie and their Campe: and another on the out-side thereof; that neither the Carthaginians might force any suddenly, by a sallie, nor those of the Countrey without, breake upon them unawares: which double defence kept the besieged also from the receiving any reliefe of victuals, and munitions, whilest the Syracusan supplies the assailants with what they want. The besieged send for succour to Carthage, after they had beene in this fort pent up five moneths. The Carthaginians imbarke an Armie, with certaine Elephants, under the command of Hanno; who arrives with it at Heraclea, to the West of Agrigentum. Hanno puts himselfe into the field, and surpriseth Erbesia, a Citie wherein the Romans had besetwold all their provision. By meanes hereof, the famine without grew to be as great, as it was within Agrigentum; and the Roman campe no lesse streightly assieged by Hanno, than the Citie was by the Romans: insomuch, as if Hieron had not supplied them, they had beene forced to abandon the siege. But seeing that this distresse was not enough to make them rise, Hanno determined to give them battell. To which end departing from Heraclea, hee makes approach unto the Roman campe. The Romans resolve to sustaine him, and put themselves in order. Hanno directs the Numidian horsemen to charge the Vanguard, to the end to draw them further on; which done, he commands them to returne as broken, till they came to the bodie of the Armie, that lay shadowed behinde some rising ground. The Numidians performe it accordingly; and while the Romans pursued the Numidians, Hanno gives upon them, and having slaughtered many, beats the rest into their Trenches.

After this encounter, the Carthaginians made no other attempt for two moneths, but lay strongly encamped, waiting untill some opportunite should invite them. But Annibal that was besieged in Agrigentum, as well by signes as messengers, made Hanno know how ill the extremite which he endured, was able to brooke such dilatorie courses. Hanno thereupon, a second time, provoked the Consuls to fight: But his Elephants being disordered by his owne Vanguard, which was broken by the Romans, hee lost the day: and with such as escaped, he recovered Heraclea. Annibal perceiving this, and remaining hopelesse of succour, resolved to make his owne way. Finding therefore that the Romans, after this daies victorie, wearied with labour, and secured by their good fortune, kept negligent watch in the night; he rusht out of the Towne, with all the remainder of his Armie, and past by the Roman campe without resistance. The Consuls pursue him in the morning, but in vaine: sure they were, that he could not carry the Citie with him, which with little a-doe the Romans entred, and pitifully spoiled. The Romans, proud of this victorie, purposed rather to follow the direction of their present good fortunes, than their first determinations. They had resolved in the beginning of this Warre, onely to succour the Mamertines, and to keepe the Carthaginians from their owne coasts: but now they determine to make themselves Lords of all Sicily, and from thence, being favoured with the winde of good success, to saile over into Africa. It is the discafe of Kings, of States, and also of private men, to covet the greatest things, but not to enjoy the least; the desire of that which we neither have nor need, taking from us the true life and fruition of what wee have already. This curse upon mortall men, was never taken from them since the beginning of the World unto this day.

To prosecute this War, Lucius Valerius and Titus Otilius, two new Consuls, are sent into Sicily. Whereupon, the Romans being Masters of the field, many in-land towns gave themselves unto them. On the contrarie, the Carthaginians keeping still the Lordship of the Sea, many maritime places became theirs. The Romans therefore, as well to secure their own coasts, often invaded by the African Fleets, as also to equall themselves in every kinde of warfare with their enemies, determine to make a fleet. And herein fortune favoured them with this accident, that being altogether ignorant in ship-wrights craft, a storme of winde thrust one of the Carthaginian Gallies, of five bankes, to the shore.

Now had the Romans a patterne, and by it they beganne to set up an hundred Quinqueremes, which were Gallies, rowed by five on every banke; and twentie, of three on a banke: and while these were in preparing, they exercised their men in the feat of rowing. This they did after a strange fashion. They placed upon the Sea-sands many seats, in order of the bankes in Gallies, whereon they placed their water-men, and taught them to beate the sand with long poles, orderly, & as they were directed by the Master, that so they might learne the stroke of the Gallie, and how to mount and draw their Oares.

When their fleet was finished, some rigging and other implements excepted, Cornelius, one of the new Consuls (for they changed every year) was made Admirall: who being more in love with this new kinde of warfare, than well advised, past over to Messana with severenteen Gallies, leaving the rest to follow him. There he staid not, but would needs row along the coast to Lipara, hoping to doe some piece of service. Hannibal, a Carthaginian was at the same time Governour in Panormus; who being advertised of this new Sea mans arrivall, sent forth one Boodes, a Senator of Carthage, with twenty Gallies to entertaine him. Boodes, falling upon the Consul unawares, took both him and the fleet he commanded. When Hannibal received this good newes, together with the Roman Gallies, and their Consul; he grew no lesse foolish hardie than Cornelius had bin. For he, fancying to himselfe to surprize the rest of the Roman fleet, on their owne coast, ere they were yet in all points provided; sought them out with a fleet of fiftie saile: wherewith falling among them, he was well beate, and leaving the greater number of his owne behinde him, made an hard escape with the rest: for of one hundred and twenty Gallies, the Romans under Cornelius had lost but severenteen, so as one hundred and three remained, which were not easily beaten by fifty.

The Romans, being advertised of Cornelius his overthrow, make haste to redeem him, but give the charge of their fleet to his Colleague, Duilius. Duilius, considering that the Roman vessels were heave and slow, the African Gallies having the speed of them, devised a certaine Engine in the prow of his Gallies, whereby they might fasten or grapple themselves with their enemies, when they were (as we call it) boord and boord, that is, when they brought the Gallies sides together. This done, the weightier ships had gotten the advantage, and the Africans lost it. For neither did their swiftnesse serve them, nor their mariners craft; the Vessels wherein both Nations fought, being open: so that all was to be carried by the advantage of weapon, and valour of the men. Besides this, as the heavier Gallies were accidentally likely to crush and cracke the sides of the lighter and weaker, so were they by the reason of their breadth, more steady; and those that best kept their feet, could also best use their hands. The example may be given betweene one of the long boates of his Majesties great ships, and a London barge.

Certainely, he that will happily performe a fight at Sea, must be skillfull in making choice of Vessells to fight in: he must believe, that there is more belonging to a good man of Warre, upon the waters, than great daring; and must know, that there is a great deale of difference, between fighting loose or at large, and grappling. The Gunnes of a slow ship pierce as well, and make as great holes, as those in a swift. To clasp ships together, without consideration, belongs rather to a mad man, than to a man of war: for by such an ignorant braverie was Peter Straffie lost at the Azores, when he fought against the Marquesse of Santa Cruz. In like sort had the Lord Charles Howard, Admirall of England, beene lost in the yeere 1588. if he had not bene better advised, than a great many malignant fooles were, that found fault with his demeanour. The Spaniards had an Arme aboard them; and he had none: they had more ships than he had, and of higher building & charging; so that, had he intangled himselfe with those great and powerfull Vessels, he had greatly endangered this Kingdom of England. For twenty men upon the defences, are equall to an hundred that boord and enter; whereas then, contrariwise, the Spaniards had an hundred, for twenty of ours, to defend themselves withall. But our Admirall knew his advantage, & held it: which had he not done, he had not been worthy to have held this head. Heere to speake in generall of Sea-fights (for particulars are fitter for private hands than for the Presse,) I say, That a flecte of twenty shippes, all good sailers, and good ships, have the advantage, on the open Sea, of an hundred as good ships, & of slower sayling. For if the fleet of an hundred saile keepe themselves neere together, in a grosse Squadron; the twenty ships, charging them upon any angle, shall force them to give ground, and to fall backe upon their owne next fellows: of which so many as intangle, are made unserviceable or lost. Force them they may easily, because the twenty ships, which give themselves scope, after they have given one broad side of Artillerie, by

* If we may give credit to Antiquities, which Plutarch a diligent writer, hath left us in his history of Sicily: Panormus, now called Palermo, is one of the first cities that hath been built in all Europe. For whereas Thucydides seems to make it a Colonie of the Phoenicians: Ranzanus, in his lib. 6. affirms that it was built & long before the time which Thucydides fixes down, founded about the West part of Sicily; where they raised the siege layed upon Syracusa, by the Carthaginians, and wonne the Towne of Macella, with some other places.

Of the Art of Warre by Sea, I had written a Treatise, for the Lord Henry, Prince of Wales; a subject, to my knowledge, never handled by any man, ancient or moderne: but God hath spared me the labour of finishing it, by his losse; by the losse of that brave Prince; of which, like an Eclipse of the Sunne, we shall finde the effects hereafter. Impossible it is to equall words and sorrowes; I will therefore leave him in the hands of God that hath him. Cura leves loquuntur, ingentes stupent.

But it is now time to returne to the beaten Carthaginians; who by losing their advantage of Swift boats, & boarding the Romans, have lost fifty faile of their Gallies: as on the other side, their enemies by commanding the Seas, have gotten libertie to saile down, founded about the West part of Sicily; where they raised the siege layed upon Syracusa, by the Carthaginians, and wonne the Towne of Macella, with some other places.

Dixers enterseas of warre, betweene the Romans and Carthaginians, with variable successe. The Romans prepare to invade Africke: and obtaine a great victory at Sea.

§. VII.
The victorie of Duilius, as it was honoured at Rome, with the first Navall Triumph, that was ever scene in that Citie; so gave it unto the Romans a great encouragement, to proceede in their warres by Sea; whereby they hoped, not onely to get Sicily, but all the other Iles between Italy and Africke, beginning with Sardinia, whicher soon after they sent a fleet for that purpose. On the contrary side, Amilcar, the Carthaginian, lying in Panormus, carefully waited for all occasions, that might helpe to recompence the late misfortune: and being advertised, that some quarrell was grown betweene the Roman Souldiers, and their Auxiliaries, being such as caused them to incampe a-part, he sent forth Hanno to set upon them; who taking them unawares, put to flight foure thousand of them in the place. Now during the continuance of the Land-warre in Sicily, Hannibal, who had lately been beaten by Sea, but escaped unto Carthage, meaning to make amends for his former error, obtained the trust of a new fleet, wherewith he arrived at Sardinia: the conquest of which Iland, the Romans had entertained for their next enterprize. Now it so fell out, that the Romans, crossing the Sea from Sicily, arrived in the port where Hannibal with his new fleet anchored. They set upon him unawares, and took the better part of the fleet which he conducted; him selfe hardly escaping the danger. But it little availed him to have escaped from the Romans. His good friends the Carthaginians, were so ill pleased with this his second unfortunate voyage, that they changed him up for his diligence: for (as it hath bene said of old) Non est vis in bello peccare; In warre it is too much to offend twice.

After this, it was long ere any thing of importance was done by the Consuls; till  Panormus* was besieged: where, when the Romans had fought in vaine to draw the Carthaginians into the field; being unable to force that great Citie, because of the strong Garrison therein bestowed: they then departed from thence, and tooke certaine In-land Townes, as Mystratum, Enna, Camerina, Hippana, and others, betwene Panormus and Messana.

The yearre following, C. Atilius the Consul, who commanded the Roman fleet, discovered a company of the Carthaginian Gallies, ranging the coast: & nor staying for his whole number, pursued them with ten of his. But he was well beaten for the haste he made, & lost all, save the Gallie which transported him: wherein himselfe escaped with great labour. But ere all was done, the rest of Atilius his fleet was gotten up: who renewing the fight, recovered from the Carthaginians a double number of theirs; by which the victory remaining doubtfull, both challenge it. Now to try at once, which of these two Nations should command the Seas, they both prepare all they can. The Romans make a fleet of three hundred and thirty Gallies; the Carthaginians, of three hundred and fifty,  Triemes*, Quadrيرهmes, and Quinqueremes.

The Romans resolve to transport the warre into Africke, the Carthaginians, to arrest them on the coast of Sicily. The numbers, with which each of them filled their fleet, was (perhaps) the greatest that ever fought on the waters. By Polybius his estimation, there were in the Roman Gallies an hundred and forty thousand men; and in those of Carthage, an hundred and fifty thousand: reckoning one hundred and twenty Souldiers, and three hundred rowers to every Gallie, one with the other. The Roman fleet was divided into foure parts, of which the three first made the forme of a Wedge or Triangle; the two first squadrons making the Flanks, and the third squadron, the Base: the point thereof (wherein were the two Consuls as Admiralls) looking toward the enemy, and the middle space lying emprise. Their Vessels of carriage were towed by the third squadron. After all came up the fourth, in forme of a Crescent; very well manned, but exceeding thinn: so that the horns of it inclosed all the third squadron, together with the corners of the first and second. The order of the Carthaginian fleet I cannot conceive by relation; but, by the manner of the fight afterwards, I conjecture, that the front of their fleet was thinn, and stretched in a great length, much like to that which the French call Combat en baze, a long front of horse, and thinn: which forme, since the Pistoll prevailed over the Lance, they have changed. Behind this first outstretched front, their Battalions were more solide: for Amilcar, Admirall of the Carthaginians, had thus ordered them, of purpose, (his Gallies having the speed of the Romans) that, when the first fleet of the Romans halted to break through the first Gallies, they should all turne taile, and the Romans pursuing them (as after a victory) disorder themselves, and, for eagernesse of taking the Run-aways, leave their owne three squadrons far behind them. For so it must needs fall out; seeing that the third squadron towed their horse boats, and victuallers; and the fourth had the Rearward of all. According to Amilcars direction it succeeded. For when the Romans had charged, and broken, the thinn front of the Carthaginian first fleet, which ran away, they forthwith gave after them with all speed possible, nor so much as looking behind them for the second squadron. Hereby the Romans were drawne neere unto the body of the Carthaginian fleet, led by Amilcar, and by him (at the first) received a great losse, untill their second squadron came up, which forced Amilcar to betake him to his Oares. Hanno also, who commanded the right wing of the Carthaginian fleet, invaded the Romane Rearward, and prevailed against them. But Amilcar being beaten off, Marcus Atilius fell back to their succour, and put the Carthaginians to their heeles; as not able to sustain both squadrons. The Rear being relieved, the Consuls came to the aide of their third Battalion, which towed the victuallers, which was also in great danger of being beaten by the Africans: but the Consuls, joyning their squadrons to it, put the Carthaginians on that point also to running.

This victory fell unto the Romans, partly by the hardinesse of their Souldiers; but principally, for that Amilcar, being first beaten, could never after joyne himselfe unto any of his other squadrons, that remained as yet in a faire likelihood of prevailing, so long as they fought upon equal termes, and but Squadron to Squadron. But Amilcar, forsaking the fight, thereby left a full fourth part of the Romane fleet uningaged, and ready to give succour to any of the other parts that were oppressed. So as in conclusion, the Romans got the honour of the day: for they lost but foure and twenty of theirs; Nnnn 2 yhetas

* The Quinqueremes are Gallies, where, in every Oare hath five men to draw it: the Quadrيرهmes had foure to an Oare; and the Triemes, three. Some have thought, that the Quinqueremes had five ranks of Oares; one over another; and the other Gallies (scarcely) fewer. But had this beene so, they must then have had five decks each over other: which hath seldom beene seen in ships, of a thousand runs, neither could the third, fourth, & fifth ranks, have reached unto the water with the Oares.

whereas the Africans lost thirty that were funke, and threecore and three that were taken.

Now, if Amilcar, who had more Gallies than the Romans, had also divided his fleet into foure Squadrons, (besides those that he ranged in the front to draw on the enemies, and to engage them) & that, whilest he himselfe fought with one Squadron that charged and to engage them) & that, whilest he himselfe fought with one Squadron that charged and to engage them, all the rest of the enemies fleet had beene at the same time entertained, he had prevailed: But the second Squadron, being free, came to the rescue of the first, by which Amilcar was oppress'd: and Amilcar, being oppress'd and scattered, the Consuls had good leisure to relieve both the third and the fourth Squadron, and got the victory.

Charles the first, among other his Precepts to Philip the second his sonne, where hee adviseth him concerning Warre against the Turkes, tells him, that in all battailes between them and the Christians, he should never faile to charge the Janissars in the beginning of the fight, & to engage them at once with the rest. For (saith he) the Janissars, who are alwaies reserved intire in the Reare of the battaile, and in whom the Turke reposest his greatest confidence; come up in a grosse body, when all the troups on both sides are disbanded and in confusion; whereby they carrie the victory before them without resistance. By the same order of fight, and reservation, did the Romans also prevail against other Nations. For they kept their Triarii in store (who were the choice of their Armie) for the up-shot and last blow. A great and victorious advantage it hath ever beene found, to keepe some one or two good troups to looke on, when all else are disbanded and engaged.

§. VIII.

The Romans prevaile in Africk. Atilius the Consul propoundeth intolerable conditions of peace to the Carthaginians. He is utterly beaten, and made prisoner.

Now the Romans, according to their former resolution, after they had repaired and re-victualled their fleet, set saile for Africa, and arrived at the Promontory of Hercules, a great Head-land, somewhat to the East of the Port of Carthage, & some forty leagues from Hercules in Sicily, where Amilcar himselfe as yet staid. From this Head-land (leaving the entrance into Carthage) they coasted the East-side of the Promontory, till they came to Clypea, a Towne about fifty English mile from it. There they disembarked, and prepared to besiege Clypea; which, to ease them of labour, was yielded unto them. Now had they a Port of their owne on Africa side; without which all invasions are foolish. By this time were the Africans also arrived at their owne Carthage, fearing that the Roman fleet and army had directed themselves thither: but being advertised that they had taken Clypea, they made provisions of all sorts, both by Sea and Land, for their defence. The Romans send to Rome for directions, and in the meane while waste all round about them. The order given from the Senate, was, That one of the Consuls should remaine with the Army, and that the other should returne, with the fleet into Italy. According to this direction, Manlius the Consul is sent home to Rome; whither he carried with him twenty thousand African Captains, with all the Roman fleet and Armie; except forty ships, fiftene thousand foot, and five hundred horse, that were left with Atilius.

With these forces, Regulus easily wanne some Towns and Places that were unwall'd, and laid siege to others. But he performed no great matter, before he came to Adis. Yet I hold it worthy of relation, that neere unto the River of Bagrada, he encountered with a Serpent of one hundred & twenty foot long, which he slue, not without losse of many Souldiers, being driven to use against it such engines of warre, as served properly for the assaulting of Towns. At Adis he met with the Carthaginian Army, whereof the Captains were Hanno and Boscar, together with Amilcar, who had brought over out of Sicily five thousand foote, and five hundred horse to succour his Countrey. These (belike) had an intent, rather to wearie him out of Africa, by warie protraction of time, than to undergoe the hazard of a maine fight. They were careful to hold themselves free, from necessity of comming to blowes: yet had they a great desire, to save the Towne of Adis out of his hands. Intending therefore to follow their generall purpose, and yet to disturbe him in the siege of Adis, they incampe neere unto him, and strongly (as they think) on the top of an hill: but thereby they lose the services, both of their Elephants, & of their horse-men. This disadvantage of theirs, Regulus discovers, & makes use of it. He assailes them in their strength, which they defend a while, but in fine the Romans prevaile, & force them from the place, taking the spoile of their campe. Following this their good fortune at the heeles, they proceed to * Tunis a City within fiftene miles of Carthage, which they assault and take.

By the losse of this battaile at Adis, & more especially by the losse of Tunis, the Carthaginians were greatly diminished. The Numidians, their next Neighbours towards the West, insult upon their misfortunes; invade, and spoile their Territory, and force those that inhabite abroad, to forsake their villages and fields, and to hide themselves within the walls of Carthage. By reason hereof, a great famine at hand threatens the Citizens. Atilius findes his own advantage, and assures himselfe that the City could not long hold out: yet he feared lest it might defend it selfe, untill his time of Office, that was neere expired, should bee quite run out, whereby the new Consuls were like to reape the honour of obtaining it. Ambition therefore, that hath no respect but to it selfe, perswades him to treat of peace with the Carthaginians. But he propounded unto them so unworthy and base conditions, as thereby their hearts, formerly possessed with feare, became now so courageous and disdainfull, that they resolved, either to defend their liberty; or die to the last man. To strengthen this their resolution, there arrived at the same time a great troupe of Greeks, whom they had formerly sent to entertaine. Among these was a very expert Souldier, named Xantippus, a Spartan: who being informed of what had passed, & of the overthrow which the Carthaginians received neere unto Adis, gave it out publicly, that the same was occasioned by default of the Commanders, and not of the Nation. This bruit, ran till it came to the Senate; Xantippus is sent for; gives the reason of his opinion; and in conclusion, being made General of the African forces, he puts himselfe into the field. The Army which he led, consisted of no more than twelve thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, with an hundred Elephants. No greater were the forces wherewith the Carthaginians fought for all that they had, Libertie, Lives, Goods, Wives, and Children: which might well make it suspected, that the Armies by Sea, before spoken of, were misenumbered; the one consisting of an hundred & forty thousand, and the other of an hundred and fifty thousand: were it not commonly found that they which use the service of mercenary Souldiers, are stronger abroad, than at their owne doores.

Xantippus, taking the field with this Army, marched directly towards the Romans, and ranging his troups upon faire and level ground, fittest both for his Elephants and Horse, presented them battaile. The Romans wondered much, whence this new courage of their enemies might grow: but confident they were, that it should soone bee abated. Their chiefe care was, how to resist the violence of the Elephants, Against them they placed the Velites, or light-armed Souldiers, as a forelorne hope; that these might, either with darts and other casting weapons, drive backe the beasts upon the enemies, or at least breake their violence, and hinder them from rushing freely upon the Legions. To the same end, they made their battailes deeper in file, than they had bin accustomed to doe. By which means, as they were the lesse subject unto the impression of the Elephants; so were they so much the more exposed unto the violence of horse, wherein the Enemy did farre exceede them. The Elephants were placed by Xantippus, all in one ranke, before his Armie; which followed them at a reasonable distance: his horsemen, and some light-armed foote, of the Carthaginians Auxiliaries, were in the wings. The first onfet was given by the Elephants, against which the Velites were so unable to make resistance, that they brake into the battalions following, and put them into some disorder. In this case, the depth of the Roman battaile was helpful. For when the beasts had spent their force, in piercing through a few of the first ranks; the Squadrons neverthelss persisted in their order, without opening. But the Carthaginian horse, having at the first encounter, by reason of their advantage in number, driven those of Atilius out of the field, beganne to charge the Roman battalions in flanke, and put them in great distresse; who being forced to turne face every way, could neither passe forward nor yet retire; but had very much ado to make good the ground whereon they stood. In the meane while, such of the Romans, as had escaped the fury of the Elephants, and left them at their backes, fell upon the Carthaginian Army, that met them in very good array. It was no even match. The one were a disordered Compaign, wearied with labour and hurt; the other, fresh, and well prepared, to have dealt with the enemy upon equal termes. Here was therefore a greater slaughter with little fight; the Romanes hastily recoyling to the body of their Army, which being surrounded with the enemy, and spent with travaile, fell all to rout, upon the defeat of these troupes, that open the way to a generall overthrow. So the Carthaginians obtained a full victory; destroying the whole Romane Armie, save two thousand, and taking five hundred prisoners, together with Attilus the Confull. Of their owne they lost no more than eight hundred mercenaries, which were slaine, when the fight began, by two thousand of the Romanes: that wheeling about a voyd the Elephants, bare down all before them, and made way even to the Carthaginian trenches. These were the two thousand that escaped, when the whole Armie behinde them was routed. All the rest were either taken or slaine. Hereby fortune made the Romanes know, that they were no lesse her vassals, than were the Carthaginians: how insolent soever they had bin in their proposition of peace, as if they had purchased from her the inheritance of their prosperitie, which shee never gave nor fold to any mortall man. With what joy these newes were welcommed, when they came to Carthage, we may easily conjecture; and what great things the vertue of one man hath often brought to passe in the world, there are many examples to prove, no lesse than this of Xantippus: all of them confirming that sentence of Eurypides, Mens una sapient; plurimum victu manus; Many mens hands equall not one wise minde.

After this great service done to the Carthaginians, Xantippus returned into Greece; whether for that he was more envied than honoured, or for what other cause, it is unknowne.

The death of Attilus Regulus the Confull, was very memorable. He was sent from Carthage to Rome, about the exchange and ranfome of prisoners on both sides: giving his faith to returne if the businesse were not effected. When he came to Rome, and plainly saw that his Country should lose by the bargain: so far was he from urging the Senate unto compassion of his owne miserie, that he earnestly perswaded to have the prisoners in Africke left to their ill destinies. This done, he returned to Carthage: where, for his paines taken, he was rewarded with an horrible death. For this his constancie and faith, all Writers highly extoll him. But the Carthaginians seeme to have judged him an obstinate and malicious enemy, that neither in his prosperitie would hearken to reason, nor yet in his calamitie would have the naturall care, to preserve himselfe and others, by yielding to such an office of humanitie, as is common in all warres (not grounded-upon deadly hatred) onely in regard of some small advantage. Whatsoever the Carthaginians thought of him; sure it is, that his faithfull observance of his word given, cannot be too much commended. But that grave speech, which he made in the Senate, against the exchange of prisoners, appears, in all reason, to have proceeded from a vaine-glorious forwardnesse, rather than from any necessity of State. For the exchange was made soone after his death: wherein the Romanes had the worse bargain; by so much as Regulus himselfe was worth. As for the authority of all Historians, that magnifie him in this point; we are to consider, that they lived under the Roman Empire: Philinus, the Carthaginian, perhaps did censure it otherwise. Yet the death which he suffered with extreme torments, could not be more grievous to him than it was dishonourable to Carthage. Neither do I thinke that the Carthaginians could excuse themselves herein; otherwise than by recrimination: saying, That the Romanes deserved to be no better intreated, for as much as it was their ordinary practice to use others in the like sort. Cruelty doth not become more warrantable, but rather more odious, by being customary. It was the Roman fashion, to whip almost to death, and then to behead, the Captaines of their enemies whom they tooke, yea although they were such as had always made faire wars with them. Wherefore it seemes not meet, in reason, that they should crie out against the like tyrannicall insolency in others, as if it were lawfull onely in themselves.

The consideration both of this misfortune, that rewarded the pride of Attilus his intollerable demands; and of the sudden valour, whereinto the Carthaginians feare was changed by mere desperation; calls to remembrance, the like insolencie of others in prosperitie, that hath bred the like resolution in those, to whom all reasonable grace hath bin denied. In such cases I never hold it impertinent, to adde unto one, more testimonies; approving the true rules, from which our passions carry us away.

In the year 1378. the Genovaises won so fast upon the Venetians, as they not onely drave their Gallies out of the Sea, but they brought their owne fleet within two miles of Venice it selfe. This bred such an amazement in the Citizens of Venice, that they offered unto the Genovaises (their State reserved) whatsoever they would demand. But Peter Doria, blown up with many former victories, would hearken to no composition; save the yielding of their Citie and State to his discretion. Hereupon, the Venetians, being filled with disdain, thrust out to Sea with all their remaining power, and assaile Doria with such desperate furie, that they brake his fleet, kill Doria himselfe, take nineteene of his Gallies, foure score boats of Padoa, & foure thousand prisoners, recover Chiozza, and all the places taken from them; and following their victory, enter the Port of Genoa, enforcing the Genovaises basely to begge peace, to their extreme dishonour and disadvantage, being beaten; which, being victorious, they might have commanded, to their greatest honour and advantage. The like hapned to this Earle of Flanders, in the year 1380, when having taken a notable, and withall an over-cruell revenge upon the Gantois, hee refused mercy to the rest, who in all humility, submitting themselves to his obedience, offered their Citie, goods, and estates, to be disposed at his pleasure. This when hee had unadvisedly refused; and was resolved to extinguish them utterly; they issue out of their Citie with five thousand chosen men, and armed with a desperate resolution, they charge the Earle, brake his Army, enter Bruges (pell-mell) with his vanquished followers; and enforce him to hide himselfe under an heape of straw, in a poore cottage; out of which with great difficulty he escaped, and saved himselfe. Such are the fruits of Insolencie.

How the affaires of Carthage prospered after the victory against Attilus: How the Romanes, having lost their fleet by tempest, resolve to forsake the Sea: The great advantages of a good fleet in warre, betwene Nations divided by the Sea.

BY the reputation of this late victorie, all places that had bin lost in Africke, returne to the obedience of Carthage. Onely Clypea stands out; before which the Carthaginians sit downe, and assaile it, but in vaine: For the Romanes, hearing of the losse of Attilus, with their forces in Africke, and withall, that Clypea was besieged, make ready a grosse Armie, and transport it in a fleet of three hundred and fifty Gallies, commanded by M. Emilus, and Ser. Fulvius, their Consuls. At the Promontory of Mercurie, two hundred Carthaginian Gallies, set out of purpose, upon the bruit of their comming, encounter them: but greatly to their cost. For the Romanes took by force an hundred and foure teene of their fleet, and drew them after them to Clypea; where they staid no longer, than to take in their owne men that had bin besieged: and this done, they made amaine toward Sicily, in hope to recover all that the Carthaginians held therein. In this hasty voyage they despise the advice of the Pilots, who pray them to finde harbour in time, for that the season threatned some violent stormes, which ever hapned betwene the rising of Orion, and of the * Dog-starre. Now although the Pilots of the Roman Fleet had thus fore-warned them of the weather at hand, and certified them withall, that the South coast of Sicily had no good Ports, wherein to save themselves upon such an accident: yet this victorious Nation was perwaded, that the winde and seas feared them no lesse, than did the Africans; and that they were able to conquer the Elements themselves. So refusing to stay within some Port, as they were advised, they would needs put out to Sea; thinking it a matter much helping their reputation, after this victorie against the Carthaginian fleet, to take a few worthless Townes upon the coast. The mercilesse winds in the meane while overtake them, and nere unto Camerina, overturne and thrust headlong on the rocks, all but foure score windes, which the Spaniards call the Nortes, or North windes, are very fearefull: and therefore they that Navigate in those parts, take harbor oft those months take end. Quarta the fifth being as ill advised, in passing the Seas towards Algie, in the Winter quarter, contrary to the counsaile of A. Doria; as he was in like unseasonable times to combat his fleet before Marx in Lorraine, lost an hundred and forty ships by tempest, and fiftene Gallies, with all in effect in them, of men, victuallers, horses, and munition: a losse no lesse great, than his retreat, both from before the one and the other, was extreme dishonourable.

of three hundred and forty ships: so as their former great victory was devoured by the Seas, before the fame thereof recovered Rome.

The Carthaginians, hearing what had hapned, repaire all their warlike vessells, hoping once againe to command the Seas: they are also as confident of their land-forces since the overthrow of Attilus. They send Asdrubal into Sicil with all their old Souldiers, & an hundred and forty Elephants imbarqued in two hundred Gallies. With this Army and fleet he arrives at Lilyeum; where hee begins to vex the Partisans of Rome. But adversity doth not discourage the Romans: They build in three moneths (a matter of great note) one hundred & twenty ships; with which, & the remainder of their late shipwracke, they row to Panormus, or Palerma, the chiefe City of the Africans in Sicil, and surround it by Land and Water: after a while they take it, and leaving a Garrison therein, returne to Rome.

Very desirous the Romans were to be doing in Africk: to which purpose they employed C. Servilius, and C. Sempronius, their Consuls. But these wrought no wonders. Some spoile they made upon the coasts of Africa: but Fortune robbed them of all their gettings. For in their returne, they were first set upon the sands, and like to have perished, nere unto the lesser Syrtes, where they were faine to heave all over-board, that so they might get off: then, having with much ado doubled the Cape of Lilyeum, in their passage from Panormus towards Italy, they lost an hundred and fifty of their ships by foulle weather. A greater discouragement never Nation had; the god of the wars favoured them no more, than the god of the waters afflicted them. Of all that Mars enrich them with upon the Land, Neptune robbed them upon the Seas. For they had now lost, besides what they lost in fight, foure hundred and fixe Ships and Gallies, with all the munition and Souldiers transported in them.

The exceeding damage hereby received, perswaded them to give over their Navigation, and their fight by Sea, and to send onely a Land-army into Sicil, under L. Caelius, and P. Furius, their Consuls. These they transported in some threecore ordinary passage boats, by the freights of Messana, that are not above a mile and a halfe broad from land to land. In like sort, the overthrow which Attilus received in Africa, occasioned chiefly by the Elephants, made them lesse cholericke against the Carthaginians, than before; so that for two yeares after, they kept the high & wooddie grounds, not daring to fight in the faire and champion Countries. But this late resolution of forsaking the Seas lasted not long. For it was impossible for them to succour those places which they held in Sicil, without a Navie, much lesse to maintain the warre in Africa. For whereas the Romans were to send forces from Messana to Egesta, to Lilyeum, and to other places in the extreme West parts of Sicil, making sometimes a march of above an hundred and forty English mile by land, which could not be performed with an Army, and the provisions that follow it, in lesse than foureteene dayes; the Carthaginians would passe it with their Gallies, in eight and forty houres.

An old example we have, of that great advantage of transporting Armies by waters, between Canutus, and Edmond Ironside. For Canutus, when he had entred the Thames with his Navie and Armie, and could not prevaile against London, suddenly imbarqued; and sailing to the West, landed in Dorsetshire, so drawing Edmond & his Army thither. There finding ill entertainment, he againe shipt his men, & entred the Severne, making Edmond to march after him, to the succour of Worcestershire, by him greatly spoiled. But when he had Edmond there, he sailed back againe to London: by means whereof, he both wearied the King, and spoiled where he pleased, ere succour could arrive. And this was not the least help, which the Netherlands have had against the Spaniards, in the defence of their liberty, that being Masters of the Sea, they could passe their Army from place to place, unwaried, and entire, with all the Munition and Artillerie belonging unto it, in the tenth part of the time, wherein their enemies have bin able to doe it. Of this, an instance or two. The Count Maurice of Nassau, now living, on of the greatest Captaines, and of the worthiest Princes, that either the present or preceding Ages have brought forth, in the yeere 1590. carried his Army by Sea, with forty Canons, to Breda: making countenance either to besiege Bosleduc, or Getreviden Berg; which the enemy (in prevention) filled with Souldiers, and victuals. But as soone as the wind served, hee suddenly set saile, arriving in the mouth of the Meuse, turned up the Rhine, and thence to Issell, and sat downe before Zutphen. So before the Spaniards could could march over-land round about Holland, above fourescore mile, and over many great Rivers, with their Cannon and carriage, Zutphen was taken. Againe, when the Spanish Armie had overcome this wearisome march, and were now far from home, the Prince Maurice, making countenance to saile up the Rhine, changed his course in the night; and sailing down the streame, he was set down before Hulst in Brabant, ere the Spaniards had knowledge what was become of him. So this Town he also tooke, before the Spanish Armie could returne. Lastly, the Spanish Army was no sooner arrived in Brabant, than the Prince Maurice, well attended by his good fleet, having fortified Hulst, set saile againe, and presented himselfe before Nymegen in Gelders, a City of notable importance, and mastered it.

And to lay the truth; it is impossible for any maritime Countrie, not having the coasts admirably fortified, to defend it selfe against a powerfull enemy, that is master of the Sea. Hereof I had rather, that Spain than England should be an example. Let it therefore be supposed, that King Philip the second had fully resolved to hinder Sir John Norris in the yeare 1589. from presenting Don Antonio, King of Portugale, before the gates of Lysborne; and that he would have kept off the English, by power of his land-forces; as being too weak at Sea, through the great overthrow of his mighty Armado, by the fleet of Queene Elizabeth, in the yeare foregoing. Surely, it had not bin hard for him, to prepare an Army, that should be able to resist our eleven thousand. But where should this his Army have bin bestowed? If about Lysborne, then would it have bene easie unto the English, to take, ransacke, and burne the Towne of Groine, and to waste the Countrie round about it. For the great and threatening preparations of the Earle of Alsenira, the Marquesse of Seralba, and others, did not hinder them from performing all this. Neither did the hastie leavie of eight thousand, under the Earle of Andrada, serve to more effect, than the increase of honour to Sir John Norris, and his Associates: considering, that the English charged these, at Puente de Burgos, and passing the great Bridge, behinde which they lay, that was flanked with shot, and barricadoed at the further end, routed them, tooke their campe; tooke their Generalls standard with the Kings Armes, and pursued them overall the Countrie, which they fired. If a Royall Army, and not (as this was) a Companie of private adventurers, had thus begun the warre in Gallicia; I thinke it would have made the Spaniards to quit the guard of Portugale, and make haste to the defence of their S^t Jago, whose Temple was not far from the danger. But, had they held their first resolution; as knowing, that Sir John Norris his maine intent was, to bring Don Antonio, with an Army, into his Kingdom, whither coming strong, he expected to be readily and joyfully welcomed: could they have hindred his landing in Portugale? Did not he land and Peniche, and march over the Countrey to Lysborne, fixe dayes journey? Did not he (when all Don Antonio his promises failed) passe along by the River of Lysborne to Cascaliz, and there, having won the Fort, quietly imbarque his men, and depart? But these, though no more than an handfull, yet were they Englishmen. Let us consider of the matter it selfe; what another Nation might doe, even against England, in landing an Army, by advantage of a fleet, if we had none. This question, whether an invading Army may be resisted at their landing upon the coast of England, were there no fleet of ours at the Sea to impeach it; is already handled by a learned Gentleman of our Nation, in his observations upon Cæsars Commentaries, that maintaines the affirmative. This he holds only upon supposition; in absence of our shipping: and comparatively, as that it is a more safe and easie course, to defend all the coast of England, than to suffer any enemy to land, and afterwards to fight with him. Surely I hold with him, that it is the best way, to keep our enemy from treading upon our ground; wherein, if we faile, then must we seeke to make him wish, that he had staid at his owne home. In such a case, if it should happen, our judgements are to weigh many particular circumstances, that belong not unto this discourse. But making the question generally, and positive, whether England, without helpe of her fleet, be able to debarre an enemy from landing; I hold that it is unable so to do: and therefore I thinke it most dangerous to make the adventure. For the encouragement of a first victory to an enemy, and the discouragement of being beaten to the invaded, may draw after it a most perillous consequence.

It is true, that the Marshall Montuc, in his Commentaries, doth greatly complaine, that by his wanting forces, wherewith to have kept the frontier of Guyenne, they of the Protestants Protestant Religion, after the battaile of Moncontour, entre d that Countrie, & gathered great strength and reliefe thence; for if the King (saith he) would have given me but reasonable meances, j'eusse bien gardé à Monsieur l'Admiral de faire boire ses Chevaux en la Garonne, I would have kept the Admiral from watering his horses in the River of Garonne. Monsieur de Langey, on the contrary side, preferres the not fighting upon a frontier with an invading enemy, and commends the delay; which course the Constable of France held against the Emperour Charles, when he invaded Provence. Great difference I know there is, and a diverse consideration to be had, betwene such a Countrie as France is, strengthened with many fortified places; and this of ours, where our Rampars are but of the bodies of men. And it was of invasions upon firme land, that these great Captaines spake: whose entrances cannot bee uncertaine. But our question is, of an Armie to be transported over Sea, and to be landed againe in an enemies Countrey, and the place left to the choice of the Invader. Hereunto I say, That such an Armie cannot be fortified on the coast of England, without a fleet to impeach it; no, nor on the coast of France, or any other Countrey: except every Creeke, Port, or sandy Bay, had a powerfull Army, in each of them, to make opposition. For let his whole supposition be granted; That Kent is able to furnish twelve thousand foot, and that those twelve thousand bee layed in the three best landing places within that Countrie, to wit, three thousand at Margat, three thousand at the Nesse, and sixe thousand at Foulkston, that is somewhat equally distant from them both; as also that two of these troupes (unless some other order bee thought more fit) be directed to strengthen the third, when they shall see the enemies fleet to bend towards it: I say, that notwithstanding this provision, if the enemy, setting saile from the Isle of Wight, in the first watch of the night, and towing their long boates at their sternes, shall arrive by dawne of day at the Nesse, and thrust their Armie on shore there; it will be hard for those three thousand that are at Margat, (twenty and foure long miles from thence) to come time enough to re-enforce their fellows at the Nesse. Nay, how shall they at Foulkston be able to doe it, who are neerer by more than halfe the way? seeing that the enemy, at his first arrival, will either make his entrance by force, with three or foure hundred shot of great Artillery, and quickly put the first three thousand, that were intrenched at the Nesse, to run; or else give them so much to doe, that they shall bee glad to send for helpe to Foulkston, and perhaps to Margat: whereby those places will be left bare. Now let us suppose, that all the twelve thousand Kentish Souldiers arrive at the Nesse, ere the enemy can be ready to dis-embark his Armie, so that hee shall finde it unsafe, to land in the face of so many, prepared to withstand him; yet must we beleve, that he will play the best of his own game; and (having liberty to go which way he list) under covert of the night, set sayle towards the East, where what shall hinder him to take ground, either at Margat, the Downes, or elsewhere, before they at the Nesse can be well aware of his departure? Certainly, there is nothing more easie than to do it. Yea the like may be said of Weymouth, Purbecke, Poole, and of all landing places on the South Coast. For there is no man ignorant, that ships, without putting themselves out of breath, will easily out-run the Souldiers that coast them. Les Armees ne violent point en postes, Armees neither flye, nor run post, saith a Marshall of France. And I know it to be true, that a fleet of ships may be seene at Sunne-set, and after it, at the Lisard; yet by the next morning they may recover Portland, whereas an Armie of foot shall not bee able to march it in sixe dayes. Again, when those troupes lodged on the Sea-shores, shall be forced to run from place to place in vaine, after a fleet of Ships; they will at length sit down in the mid-way, & leave all at adventure. But say it were otherwise; That the invading enemy will offer to land in some such place, where there shall be an Army of ours ready to receive him; yet it cannot be doubted, but that when the choice of all our trained bands, and the choice of our Commanders and Captains, shall be drawn together (as they were at Tilburie in the year 1588.) to attend the person of the Prince, and for the defence of the Citie of London: they that remaine to guard the coast, can be of no such force, as to encounter an Armie like unto that, wherewith it was intended that the Prince of Parma should have landed in England.

The Isle of Tercera hath taught us by experience, what to thinke in such a case. There are not many Lands in the world, better fenced by nature, and strengthened by art: it being every where hard of access, having no good harbour wherin to shelter a Navie of friends, and upon every cove of watering place a Fort erected, to forbid the approach of an enemies boat. Yet when Emanuel de Sylva, and Monsieur de Chartes, that held it to the use of Don Antonio, with five or sixe thousand men, thought to have kept the Marquesse of Santa Cruz, from setting foote on ground therein; the Marquesse having shewed himselfe in the Road of Angra, did set saile, ere any was aware of it, and arrived at the Port des Moles, farre distant from thence; where he wan a Fort, and landed, ere Monsieur de Chartes, running thither in vaine, could come to hinder him. The example of Philip Sroisze, slaine the yeare before, without all regard of his worth, and of three hundred French prisoners murdered in cold blood, had instructed de Chartes and his followers, what they might expect at that Marquesse his hands: Therefore it is not like, that they were slow in carrying reliefe to Port des Moles. Whether our English would be perwaded to make such diligent haste, from Margat to the Nesse, and backe againe, it may be doubted. Sure I am, that it were a greater march than all the length of Tercera; whercof the French-men had not measured the one halfe when they found themselves prevented by the more nimble ships of Spaine.

This may suffice to prove, that a strong Army, in a good fleet, which neither foot, nor horse, is able to follow, cannot be denied to land where it list, in England, France, or elsewhere, unless it bee hindered, encountred, and shuffled together, by a fleet of equal, or answerable strength.

The difficult landing of our English at Fayal, in the year 1597. is alledged against this: which example moves me no way to thinke, that a large coast may be defended against a strong fleet. I landed those English in Fayal my selfe, & therefore ought to take notice of this instance. For whereas I finde an action of mine cited, with omission of my name, I may by a civil interpretation, thinke, that there was no purpose to defraud me of any honour; but rather an opinion, that the enterprize was such, or so ill managed, as that no honour could be due unto it. There were indeede some which were in that voyage, who advised me not to undertake it: and I hearkened unto them somewhat longer than was requisite, especially, whilst they desired me to reserve the title of such an exploit (though it were not great) for a greater person. But when they began to tell me of difficulty: I gave them to understand, the same which I now maintaine, that it was more difficult to defend a coast, than to invade it. The truth is, that I could have landed my men with more ease than I did; yea without finding any resistance, if I would have rowed to another place, yea even there where I landed, if I would have taken more companie to helpe me. But, without fearing any imputation of rashnesse, I may say, that I had more regard of reputation, in that businesse, than of safetie. For I thought it to belong unto the honour of our Prince and Nation, that a few Ilanders, should not thinke any advantage great enough, against a fleet set forth by Q. Elizabeth; and further, I was unwilling, that some Low-Countrey Captaines, and others, not of mine own Squadron, whose assistance I had refused, should please themselves with a sweet conceit (though it would have bin short, when I had landed in some other place) That for want of their helpe I was driven to turne taile. Therefore I tookewith me none, but men assured, Commanders of mine owne Squadron, with some of their followers, and a few other Gentlemen, volunteers, whom I could not refuse; as, Sir William Brooke, Sir William Harvey, Sir Arthur Gorges, Sir John Oke, Sir Thomas Ridgeway, Sir Henrie Tinnes, Sir Charles Morgan, Sir Walter Chute, Marcellus Throckmorton, Captaine Laurence Kemis, Captaine William Morgan, & others, such as well understood themselves and the enemy: by whose helpe, with Gods favour, I made good the enterprize I undertooke. As for the working of the Sea, the steepnesse of the Cliffs, & other troubles, that were not new to us, we overcame them well enough. And these (notwithstanding) made five or sixe Companies of the enemies, that sought to impeach our landing, abandon the wall, whercon their Muskietiers lay on the Rest for us, and won the place of them without any great losse. This I could have done with lesse danger, so that it should not have served for example of a rule, that failed even in this example: but the reasons before alledged, (together with other reasons well knowne to some of the Gentlemen above named, though more private, than to be here laid down) made me rather follow the way of bravery, and take the shorter course; having it still in mine owne power to fall off when I should thinke it meet. It is easily said, that the Enemy was more than a Coward; (which yet was more than we knew) neither will it magnifie such a small peece of service, by seeking to prove him better: whom had I thought thought equall to mine owne followers, I would otherwise have dealt with. But for so much as concerns the Proposition in hand; hee that beheld this, may well remember that the same enemy troubled us more in our march towards Fayal, than in our taking the shore; that he fought how to stop us in place of his advantage, that many of our men were slaine or hurt by him, among whom Sir Arthur Gorges was shot in that march; and that such, as (thinking all danger to be past, when we had won good footing) would needs follow us to the Towne, were driven by him, to forsake the pace of a man of war, and betake themselves to an halfe trot.

For end of this digression, I hope that this question shall never come to triall; his Majesties many moveable Forts will forbid the experience. And although the English will to no lesse disdain, than any Nation under heaven can doe, to be beaten upon their owne ground, or elsewhere by a forraigne enemy; yet to entertaine those that shall assaile us, with their owne beeve in their bellies, and before they eate of our Kensish Capons, I take it to be the wisest way. To do which, his Majesty, after God, will imploy his good ships on the Sea, and not trust to any intrenchment upon the shore.

How the Romans attempt againe to get the masterie of the Seas. The victory of Cæcilius the Roman Consull at Panormus: The siege of Lilyæum. How a Rhodian Gallie entred Lilyæum at pleasure, in despite of the Roman fleet. That it is a matter of great difficulty to stop the passage of good ships. The Romans, by reason of grievous losses received, under Claudius and Junius their Consuls, abandon the Seas againe.

WHen, without a strong Navie, the Romans found it altogether impossible, either to keepe what they had already gotten in Sicily, or to enlarge their Dominions in Africa or elsewhere, they resolved once againe, notwithstanding their late misadventures, to strengthen their fleet & ships of warre. So causing fifty new Gallies to be built, & the old to be repaired, they gave them in charge (together with certaine Legions of Souldiers) to the new Consuls, C. Attilius, & L. Manlius. On the other side, Asdrubal perceiving that the Romans, partly by reason of the shipwracke which they had lately suffered, partly by reason of the overthrow which they received by Xanthippus in Africa, were lesse daring than they had bin in the beginning of the war: & withall, that one of the Consuls was returned into Italy, with the one halfe of the Army, & that Cæcilius, with only the other halfe, remained at Panormus: he removed with the Carthaginian forces from Lilyæum towards it, hoping to provoke Cæcilius to fight. But the Consull was better advised. For when Asdrubal had made his approaches somewhat neere the Towne, Cæcilius caused a deepe trench to be cut, a good distance without the ditch of the Citie: between which and his trench he left ground sufficient, to embattle a Legion of his Souldiers. To these he gave order that they should advance themselves, and passe over the new trench, still such time as the African Elephants were thrust upon them. From those beasts he commanded them to retire, by slow degrees; till they had drawn on the Elephants to the brinke of the new trench, which they could by no means passe. This they performed accordingly. For when the Elephants were at a stand, they were so gawled & beaten, both by those Souldiers that were on the inside of the trench, & by those that lay in the trench it selfe, that being enraged by their many wounds, they brake backe furiously upon their owne foot-men, and utterly disordered them. Cæcilius espying this advantage, sallied with all the force he had; and charging the other troups, that stood embattailed, he utterly brake them, and put them to their heeles; making a great slaughter of them, and taking all their Elephants.

The report of this victory being brought to Rome, the whole state, filled with courage, prepared a new fleet of two hundred saile, which they sent into Sicily, to give end to that warre, that had now lasted fourteen years. With this fleet and Armie the Romans resolve to attempt Lilyæum, the only place of importance which the Carthaginians held in Sicily; and all (indeed) save Drepanum, that was neere adjoining. They set down before it, and possesse themselves of all the places of advantage neere unto it, especially of such as command the haven, which had a very difficult entrance. They also beat to the ground fixe Towers of defence; and by forcible engines weaken so many other parts of the Citie, as the defendants begin to despair. Yet Himilco, Commander of the place, faileth not in all that belongs to a man of Warre. All that is broken he repaireth with admirable diligence; he maketh many furious sallies, and giveth to the Romans all the affronts that possibly could be made. He hath in Garrison (besides the Citizens) ten thousand Souldiers; among which there are certaine Lieutenants, and other pettie Officers, that conspire to render and betray the Towne. But the matter is revealed by an Achean, called Alexon, who had formerly, in danger of the like treason, saved Agrirentum. Himilco useth the help of Alexon, to assure the hired Souldiers, and imployeth Hannibal to appeale the troups of the Gauls, which did waver, and had sent their agents to the enemy. All promise constancie and truth; so that the Traitors, being unable to performe what they had undertaken, are faine to live in the Roman campe as fugitives, that had wrought no good whereby to deserve their bread. In the mean while a supply of ten thousand Souldiers is sent from Carthage to their reliefe, having Hannibal the son of Amilcar for their Conductor: who, in despite of all resistance, entred the Port and Citie, to the incredible joy of the besieged. The old Souldiers, together with the new Companies, (thereto perswaded by Himilco with hope of great reward) resolve to set upon the Romans in their trenches, and either force them to abandon the siege, or (at least) to take from them, or set on fire, their engines of batterie. The attempt is presently made, and pursued to the uttermost, with great slaughter on both sides. But the Romans, being more in number, and having the advantage of the ground, hold still their places, and with extreme difficulty defend their engines.

They of Carthage desire greatly to understand the state of things at Lilyæum; but know not how to send into the Towne. A certaine Rhodian undertakes the service; and having received his dispatch, sailes with one Gallie to Ægusa, a little Island neere Lilyæum. Thence, taking his time, he steered directly with the Port; and having a passing swift Gallie, he past through the best of the Channel, and recovered the water-gate, ere any of those, which the Romans had to guard the Port, could thrust from the shores on either side.

The next day, neither attending the covert of the darke night, nor dreading to be boarded by the Roman Gallies, who waited his returne, he set saile, and shipped his Oares (his Gallie being exceeding quick of steerage, and himself expert in all parts of the channell) recovered the Havens mouth, and the Sea, in despite of all the pursuit made after him. Then, finding himselfe out of danger of being compassed by many, he turned againe towards the mouth of the Haven, challenging any one, if any one durst come forth, to undertake him. This enterprize, and the well performing of it, was very remarkable, and much wondred at in those dayes: and yet, where there was no great Artillerie, nor any other weapons of fire, to kill a farre off, the adventure which this Rhodian made was not greatly hazzardous. For in this Age, a valiant and judicious man of war will not fear to passe by the best appointed Fort of Europe, with the helpe of a good Tide, and a leading gale of wind; no, though fortie pieces of great Artillerie open their mouthes against him, and threaten to teare him in pieces.

In the beginning of our late Queenes time, when Denmark and Sueden were at War, our East-land fleet, bound for Leif-land, was forbidden by the King of Denmark to trade with the subjects of his enemies, and he threatened to sink their ships if they came through the streights of Elfenour. Notwithstanding this, our Merchants (having a ship of her Majesties, called the Minion, to defend them) made the adventure, and sustaining some Volleys of shot, kept on their course. The King made all the provision he could, to stop them, or sink them, at their returne. But the Minion, commanded (as I take it) by William Burroughs, leading the way, did not only passe out with little losse, but did beat downe, with Artillerie, a great part of the Fort of Elfenour; which at that time was not so well rampard, as now perhaps it is: and the fleet of Merchants that followed him, went through without any wound received. Neither was it long since, that the Duke of Parma, besieging Antwerp, and finding no possibilitie to master it, otherwise than by famine, laid his Cannon on the banke of the River, so well to purpose, and so even with the face of the water, that he thought it impossible for the least boat to passe by. Yet the Hollanders and Zelanders, not blowne up by any wind of glorie, but conning to finde a good market for their Butter and Cheese, even the poore men, attending their profit when all things were extreme deare in Antwerpe, passed in boates of ten or twelve Tonne, by the mouth of the Dukes Cannon, in despite of it; when a strong Westerly winde, and a Tide of floud favoured them; as also with a contrary winde, and an ebbing water, they turned backe againe: so as hee was forced, in the end, to build his Stockado overthwart the River, to his marvailous trouble and charge.

The Fort Saint Philip terrified notus in the yeere 1596. when we entred the Port of Caliz, neither did the Fort at Puntal, when we were entred, beate us from our anchoring by it; though it plaid upon us with foure Demi-cannons within point-blancque from fixe in the morning till twelve at none. The siege of Ostend, and of many other places, may be given for proofe, how hard a matter it is to stop the passage of agood ship, without another as good to encounter it. Yet this is true, that where a Fort is so set, as that of Angra in Tercera, that there is no passage along beside it, or that the ships are driven to turne upon a bow-line towards it, wanting all helpe of winde and tide; there, and in such places, is it of great use, and fearefull: otherwile not.

But to returne to our adventurous Rhodian: Hee arrives in safety at Carthage, and makes them know the estate of Lilybeum. Others also, after this, take upon them to doe the like, and performe it with the same successe. The Romans therefore labour to chooke the channell; and, for that purpose, fill many Merchants ships with great stones, and sinke them therein. The force of the Tides cleares it againe in part: but they ground so many of those great bellied boates in the best of the entrance, as at last it made a manifest rising and heape, like a ragged Iland, in the passage. Hereby it came to passe, that a Carthaginian Gallie, taking her course by night, and not suspecting any such impediment, ranne her selfe a-ground thereon, and was taken. Now comes the brave Rhodian, thinking to enter, as hee had done before: but this Carthaginian Gallie, a little before taken, gave him chafe, and gathered upon him; hee findes what shee is, both by her forme and by her swiftnesse: and being not able to runne from her, resolved to fight with her. But shee is too well manned for him, so that he is beaten and taken.

Lilybeum, after this, is greatly distressed; the Souldiers being worne with labour and watching. But in this despaire there rose so violent a tempest, as some of the Romans wooden Towers, by which they over-topt the walls of Lilybeum, were over-turned. A Greeke Souldier undertakes to fire those that were fallen, and performs it: for the fire was no sooner kindled, but being blowne unto by the bellows of a tempest, it increased so fast, as it became resistlesse, and in the end burned all to ashes, and melted the brazen heads of the battering Rammes. Hereupon, despaire and warinesse hinder the Romans from repairing their Engines: so that they resolve, by a long siege, to starve the defendants.

Upon relation of what had past, a supply of tenne thousand Souldiers is sent from Rome, under M. Claudius, the Consull. Hee arrives at Messana, and marcheth over land to Lilybeum: where having re-inforced the Army, and supplied the Gallies with new Rowers, he propounds the surprize of Drepanum, a City on the other side of the Bay of Lilybeum. This service the Captaines and Souldiers willingly embrace. So the Consull embarks his troups, and arrives on the sudden in the mouth of the Port. Adherbal is Governour of the Towne, a valiant and prudent man of warre, who being ignorant of the new supply arrived at Lilybeum, was at first amazed at their sudden approach; but having recovered his spirits, he perswades the Souldiers, rather to fight abroad, than to be enclosed. Herewithall he promisseth great rewards to such, as by their valour shall deserve them; offering to leade them himselfe, and to fight in the head of his fleet. Having sufficiently encouraged his men, he thrusts into the Sea towards the Romans. The Consull, deceived of his expectation, calls backe the foremost Gallies, that hee might now marshall them for defence. Hereupon some rowe backward, some forward, in great confusion. Adherbal findes and followes his advantage, and forceth the Consull into a Bay at hand, wherein he rangeth himselfe, having the land on his backe: hoping thereby to keepe himselfe from being incompassed. But he was thereby, and for want of Sea-roome, so streightened, as he could not turne himselfe any way from his enemies, nor range himselfe in any order. Therefore when hee found no hope of resistance, keeping the shore on his left hand, hee thrust out of the Bay with thirtie Gallies, besides his owne, and so fled away: all the rest of his fleet, to the number of ninetie and foure ships, were taken or sunke by the Carthaginians. Adherbal for this service is greatly honoured at Carthage; and Claudius, for his indiscretion and flight, as much disgraced at Rome.

The Romans, notwithstanding this great losse, arme threescore Gallies, with which they send away L. Junius, their Consull, to take charge of their businesse in Sicil. Junius arrives at Messana, where he meets with the whole remainder of the Roman fleet, those excepted which rode in the Port of Lilybeum. One hundred and twentie Gallies he had; and besides these, hee had gotten together almost eight hundred ships of burthen, which were laden with all necessarie provisions for the Armie. With this great fleet he arrives at Syracuse, where he stayes a while; partly to take in corne, partly to wait for some, that were too slow of saile, to keepe company with him along from Messana. In the meane time he dispatcheth away towards Lilybeum his Quæstors or Treasurers; to whom he commits the one halfe of his victuallers, with some Gallies for their convey.

Adherbal was not carelesse after his late victorie: but studied how to use it to the best advantage. The ships and prisoners that he had taken, he sent to Carthage. Of his owne Gallies he delivered thirtie to Carthalo, who had threescore and ten more under his own charge; and sent him to trie what good might be done against the Roman fleet in the Haven of Lilybeum. According to this direction, Carthalo suddenly enters the mouth of that Haven, where he finds the Romans more attentive to the keeping in of the besieged Carthaginians, than to the defence of their own against another fleet. So he chargeth them, boords, and takes some, and fires the rest. The Roman Campe takes alarme, and hastens to the rescue. But Himilco, Governour of the Town, is not behinde hand; who sallies out at the same time, and putting the Romans to great distresse, gives Carthalo good leisure to goe through with his enterprize.

After this exploit, Carthalo ran all along the South coast of Sicil, devising how to worke mischief to the enemy; wherein Fortune presented him with a faire occasion, which he wisely managed. He was advertised by his Scouts, that they had descried, neere by hand, a great fleet, consisting of all manner of Vessels. These were the victuallers, which the Consull Junius, more hastily than providently, had sent before him towards Lilybeum. Carthalo was glad to heare of their coming: for he and his men were full of courage, by reason of their late victories. Accounting therefore the great multitude of Roman Hulks approaching, to be rather a prey than a fleet likely to make strong opposition, he hastens to encounter them. It fell out according to his expectation. The Romans had no minde to fight: but were glad to seeke shelter in an open Roade, full of rocks, under covert of a poore Towne, belonging to their partie; that could helpe to save them only from the present danger, by lending them engines and other aide, wherewith to beat off the Carthaginians that assailed them. Carthalo therefore, having taken a few of them, lay waiting for the rest, that could not long ride under those rocks, but would be forced by any great change of winde, either to put out into the deepe, or to save their men, how they could, by taking land, with the losse of all their shipping. Whilst he was busied in this care, the Consull Junius drew neare, and was discovered. Against him Carthalo makes out, and findes him altogether unprepared to fight, as being wholly ignorant of that which had hapned. The Consull had neither meanes to flee, nor abilitie to fight. Therefore he likewise ran into a very dangerous Creeke; thinking no danger so great as that of the enemy. The Carthaginian seeing this, betakes himselfe to a Station betweene the two Roman fleets; where he watcheth, to see which of them would first stir, with a resolution to assault that, which should first dare to put it selfe into the Sea. So as now all the three fleets were on the South coast of Sicil, betweene the Promontorie of Pachinnus and Lilybeum; a Tract exceeding dangerous, when the winde stormed at South. The Carthaginians, who knew the times of tempest, and their signes, finding (belike) some swelling billow (for so we doe in the West of England, before a Southerly storme) hastened to double the Cape of Pachinnus, thereby to cover themselves from the rage at hand. But the Romans, who knew better how to fight than how to Navigate, and never found any foule weather in the entrails of their beasts, their Sooth-sayers being all land-prophets, were suddenly over-taken with a boisterous South wind, and all the Gallies forced against the rocks, and utterly wrackt.

This calamitie so discouraged the Romans, that they resolved againe to forsake the Seas, and trust only to the service of their Legions upon firm ground. But such a resolution cannot long hold. Either they must be strong at sea, or else they must not make war in an Island, against those that have a mightier fleet. Yet are they to be excused, in regard of the many great calamities which they had suffered through their want of skill. Here I cannot forbear to commend the patient vertue of the Spaniards. We seldom or never find, that any Nation hath endured so many misadventures and miseries, as the Spaniards have done, in their Indian Discoveries. Yet persisting in their enterprises with an invincible constancie, they have annexed to their Kingdome so many goodly Provinces, as burye the remembrance of all dangers past. Tempests and shipwracks, famine, overthrowes, to mutinies, heat & cold, pestilence, and all manner of diseases both old & new, together with extreme povertie, and want of all things needfull, have bin the enemies wherewith every one of their most noble Discoverers, at one time or other, hath encountered. Many years have passed over some of their heads in the search of not so many leagues: yea more than one or two have spent their labour, their wealth, & their lives, in search of a golden kingdome, without getting further notice of it, than what they had at their first setting forth. All which notwithstanding, the third, fourth, and fift undertakers, have not bin disheartned. Surely, they are worthily rewarded with those Treasures and Paradises which they enjoy; and well they deserve to hold them quietly, if they hinder not the like vertue in others, which (perhaps) will not be found.

§. XI.

The Citie of Eryx is surpris'd by the Romans, and recovered by Amilcar, who stoutly holds war with them five years. The Romans having emptied their common treasure, build a new fleet at the charges of private men. The great victorie at Sea of Lucatius the Consul; whereby the Carthaginians are forced to crave peace. The conditions of the peace between Rome and Carthage.

THE Romans were careful to supplie with all industrie, by land, the want of strength at sea. Therefore they continue the siege of Lilybaeum, and seek to make sure to themselves all places, whither the enemies ships could not bring relief. The Consul Junius, to cure the wound of dishonour, which he had received, be thought him what enterprises to undertake. In the end he resolved to attempt the Mountaine and Citie of Eryx, with the Temple of Venus Erycina: which was the fairest and richest of all the Island; and of these, by cunning or treason, he got possession. Eryx was commodiously seated between Drepanum and Panormus; so that it seemed a fit place for a Garrison, that should restrain the Carthaginians from making roads into the country. Wherefore Junius fortified both the top of the Mountaine, and the first entrance of the passage from the bottome, (both of which places were very defensible) with a good strength of men. But shortly after, in the eighteenth year of this war, the Carthaginians sent forth Amilcar, surnamed Barcas, Father of the great Hannibal, with a fleet and Armie, who sailing to the coasts of Italy, did thoroughly repay the spoyle which the Romans made in Africa. For he first of all waisted and destroyed the Territories of the Locrines, and of the Brutians, that were dependants of Rome. Then entred he into Sicily, and finding there no walled Citie in the Carthaginians power, that served fitly to infest the Romans, he occupied a piece of ground of great advantage, and lodged his Armie thereon; to confront as well the Romans, that were in Panormus, as those that kept about Eryx, putting himselfe between both Armies with admirable resolution.

The place that Amilcar had seized upon, was not onely very strong by situation, but had the command of a Port: whereby it gave him opportunitie to scour all the coast of Italy with his fleet, waisting all along as far as to Cuma. In the Isle of Sicily he held the Romans to hard worke: lying neere unto Panormus, where in three years abode he did many notable acts, though not of much consequence, for that the enemy could never be drawne to hazard the main chance. Having wearied himselfe and the Romans long enough about Panormus, he undertooke a strange peece of worke at Eryx. The Romans Garrisons, placed there by Junius, on the top, and at the bottome of the Mountaine, were very strongly lodged. Nevertheless Amilcar found a way, lying towards the Sea-side, by which he conveyed his men into the City of Eryx, that was about the midst of the ascent, ere the enemy knew of it. By this it came to passe, that the Romans which kept the top of the mountaine, were streightly held (as it were) besieged. And no lesse was Amilcar himselfe restrained, by both of these Garrisons, & such as came to relieve them. There he found them pastime about two years more; hoping still to wearie out those that lay over his head, as they on the contrary did their best, to thrust him out of those quarters.

At this time, all the care, both of the Romans and of the Carthaginians, was bent unto the prosecuting of this businesse at Eryx. Wherein it seemes true (as Hannibal, in Livy, spake unto Scipio) that the affaires of Carthage never stood in better terms, since the beginning of the warre, than now they did. For whereas the Romans had utterly forsaken the Seas, partly by reason of their great losses; partly upon confidence of their land-forces, which they held resistlesse; Amilcar, with a small Armie, had so well acquired himselfe, to the honour of his Country, that by the trial of five years warre, the Carthaginian Souldier was judged equall, if not superior to the Roman. Finally, when all, that might be, had beene devised and gone, for the dislodging of this obstinate Warriour: no way seemed better to the Senate of Rome, than once againe to build a fleet; whereby, if the mastic of the Sea could once bee gotten, it was likely that Amilcar, for lacke of supply, should not long be able to hold out. But in performing this, extreme difficulty was found. The common treasure was exhausted: and the cost was not little, that was requisite unto such an enterprize. Wherefore there was none other way left, than to lay the burden upon private purses. Divers of the principall Citizens undertooke to build (each at his owne charges) one Quinquereme, which example wrought so well, that they, whose abilitie would not serve to doe the like, joyned with some others, and laying their mony together, concurred two or three of them, in building of another; with condition to be repaid, when the war was finished. By this voluntary contribution, they made and finished two hundred new Quinqueremes: taking for their patterne, that excellent swift rowing Gallie which they had gotten from the Rhodian, in the Port of Lilybaeum, as was shewed before. The charge of this fleet was committed to C. Lutatius Catulus; who past with the same into Sicily the Spring following, and entered the Port of Drepanum, endeavouring by all meanes to have forced the Citie. But being advertised that the Carthaginian fleet was at hand, and being mindefull of the late losses which his Predecessors had received; he was careful to put himselfe in order, against their arrival.

Hanno was Admiral of the Carthaginian fleet; a man (as his actions declare him) wise in picture, exceedingly formall, and skilfull in the art of seeming reverend. How his reputation was first bred, I doe not finde; but it was up-held by a factious contradiction, or things undertaken by men more worthe than himselfe. This qualitie procured unto him (as it hath done to many others) both good liking among the ancient fort, whose cold temper is averse from new enterprises, and therewithall an opinion of great foresight, confirmed by every losse received. More particularly, he was gracious among the people, for that he was one of the most grievous oppressors of their subiect Provinces; whereby he procured unto the Carthaginians much wealth, but therewithall such hatred, as turned it all to their great losse. He had ere this beene employed against the Numidians and wilde Africans, that were more like to Rovers than to Souldiers, in making War. Of those fugitive Nations he learned to neglect more manly enemies, to his owne great dishonour, and to the great hurt of Carthage; which lost not more by his bad conduct, than by his malicious counsell, when, having shewed himselfe an unworthy Captain, he betook himselfe to the long Robe. Yet is he much commended in Roman Histories, as a temperate man; and one that studied how to preserve the League betweene Carthage and Rome: In which regard, how well he deserved of his owne Countrey, it will appeare hereafter: how beneficiall he was to the Romans, it will appeare, both hereafter, and in his present voyage; wherein he reduced the Carthaginians to a miserable necessity of accepting, upon hard conditions, that peace which hee thenceforth commended.

Hanno had very well furnished his Navie, with all needfull provisions for the Souldiers at Eryx: (for dexteritie in making preparation was the best of his qualities) but he had neither beene carefull in traying his Mariners, to the practice of Sea-fight, nor in manning his Gallies with stout fellows. He thought, that the fame of a Carthaginian fleet was enough, to make the unexpert Romans give way: forgetting, that rather the restlesse force of tempests, than any other strength of opposition, had made them to forsake the seas. Yet in one thing he had either conceived aright, or else was sent forth well instructed. It was his purpose, first of all to saile to Eryx, and there to discharge his ships of their lading: and having thus lightened himselfe, he meant to take aboard some part of the Land-armie, together with Amilcar himselfe, by whose helpe hee doubted not, but that he should be able to make his enimie repent of his new adventure to Sea. This was a good course, if it could have beene performed. But Catulus used all possible diligence, to prevent the execution of this designe: not because he was informed of the enemies purpose, but that he knew it to be the best for them, & for that he feared no danger so greatly, as to encounter with Amilcar. Wherefore although the weather was very rough, and the seas went high, when the Carthaginian fleet was discried; yet he rather chose to fight with the enimie, that had the winde of him, than to suffer his convoy to passe along to Eryx, upon unlikely hope of better opportunity in the future. All that Hanno should have done, Catulus had performed. He had carefully exercised his men in Rowing; he had lightened his Gallies of all unnessearie burthens; and he had taken aboard the choyce men of the Roman Land-souldiers. The Carthaginians therefore, at the first encounter were utterly broken and defeated, having fiftie of their Gallies stemmed and sunk, and seventy taken, wherein were few lesse than tenshouand men, that were all made prisoners: the rest, by a sudden change of winde, escaping to the Ile of Hieroneisu.

The state of Carthage, utterly discouraged by this change of fortune, knew not whereon to resolve. Meanes to repaire their fleet in any time there were none left; their best men of warre by Sea were consumed; and Amilcar, upon whose valour and judgement the honour and safety of the Common-weale rested, was now surrounded by his enemies in Sicily, where he could not be relieved. In this extremity, they make dispatch unto Amilcar himselfe, and authorize him to take what course should seeme best unto his excellent wisdom, leaving all conclusions to his election and sole counsaile.

Amilcar, whom no adversitie, accompanied with the least hope or possibilitie of recovery, had ever vanquished, looking over every promise, true or false, that the present time could make him, (for to attend any thing from the future he was not able) resolved to make triall, whether his necessitie might be compounded upon any reasonable terms. He therefore sent to Luſatius the Consull an overture of peace: who considering it well, gathered for many arguments from the present poverie of the Roman State, waited beyond expectation in the former warre, that he willingly hearkened unto it. So, in conclusion, an accord was made, but with provision, That it should hold none otherwise, than if the Senate and People of Rome would ratifie it with their allowance.

The conditions were: First, that the Carthaginians should clearely abandon the Ile of Sicily. Secondly, that they should never undertake upon Hieron King of Syracuse, nor invade any part of his Territories, nor the Territories of any of his Friends and Allies. Thirdly, that they should set at libertie, and send back into Italy, all the Romans, whom they held prisoners, without ransom. Lastly, that they should pay unto the Romans two thousand and two hundred talents; which make, as the French reckon the talent, thirtie hundred and twentie thousand crowns: the same to be delivered within twenty years next following.

These Articles were sent to Rome, where they were not thoroughly approved: but ten Commissioners were sent into Sicily, to make perfect the agreement. These Commissioners added a thousand talents to the former sum; and required a shorter time of payment. Further also they tooke order, that the Carthaginians should not only depart out of Sicily itselfe, but should also withdraw their Companies out of all other Ilands between it and Italy, renouncing their whole interest therein.

Such was the end of the first Punicke warre; that had lasted about twenty four years without intermission; in which time the Romans had lost, by fight or shipwrack, about seven hundred Quinqueremes; and the Carthaginians about five hundred: the greatness of which losses, doth serve to prove the greatness both of these two Cities, and of

of the War it selfe; wherein I hold good the judgement of Polybius, That the Romans, in generall, did shew themselves the braver Nation; and Amilcar, the most wortheie Captaine.

CHAP. II.

Of divers actions passing betweene the first and second Punicke Warres.

§. I.

Of the cruell warre begun betweene the Carthaginians and their owne Mercenaries.

He Romans having partly by force, and partly by composition, thrust the Carthaginians out of Sicily, and all the little Ilands thereunto adjacent, gave them rather meanes and leisure to help themselves in a following war, than cause to hold themselves contented with the present peace. It is an ancient and true rule, Quod leges à victoribus discuntur, accipiuntur à victis; That lawes are given by the Conquerors, and received of the conquered. But the Romans had either forgotten the answer that was made unto them, by one of the Privernates; or else had forgotten to follow it, in this weightie businesse. For when one of Privernum, after a rebellion, defending in the Senate the cause of his Citie, was demanded by a Senator, what peace the Romans might hope for, or assure themselves of, if they quitted their present advantage over them; he answered in these words, Si bonam dederitis, & fidam & perpetuam; si malam, haud diuturnam; si the peace be good and faithfull that you give us, it will be perpetuall; if it be ill, then of little continuance. To this answer the Senate, at that time gave such approbation, that it was said, Viri & liberi vocem audiam; an credi possit, nullum populum, aut hominem deniq; in ea condicione, cuius cum pariter sit, divinus quàm necesse sit mansurum? that it was the speech of a manly, and free man; for who could believe, that any people, or indeed any one man, would continue longer in an over-burdened estate, than meeke necessity did enforce? Now, if the Romans themselves could make this judgement of those Nations, who had little else besides their manly resolution, to defend their libertie; surely, they grossly flattered themselves, in presuming, that the Carthaginians, who neither in power nor in pride, were any way inferior unto themselves, would sit downe any longer by the losse and dishonour received, than untill they could recover their legs, and the strength which had a while failed them, to take revenge. But occasion, by whom (while well entertained) not only private men, but Kings and publike States, have more prevailed, than by any proper prowesse or verue; which held the tempest from the Romans for a time, and turned it most fearefully upon Africa, and the Carthaginians themselves.

For after that the first Punicke war was ended, Amilcar, leaving Eryx, went to Lilybæum, from whence most conveniently the Armie might be transported into Africa: the care of which businesse he committed unto Gesto, to whom, as to a man of approved sciencie, he delivered over his charge. Gesto had an especiall consideration of the great summe, wherein Carthage was indebted unto these Mercenaries; and, withall, of the great disability to make payment. Therefore he thought it the wisest way, to send them over (as it were) by handfulls a few at a time, that so the first might have their dispatch, and be gone, ere the second or third Companies arrived. Herein he dealt providently. For it had not been hard to perswade any small number, lodged within so great a Citie as Carthage, unto such a reasonable composition, as the present emptinesse of the common Treasure did require: so that the first might have beene friendly discharged, and a good president left unto the second and third, whilst their dis-junction had made them them unable to recover their whole due by force. But the Carthaginians were of a contrary opinion. They thought to finde, in the whole Armie, some that would be contented to gratifie the Publique State, by remitting a great part of their owne due: and hoped, by such an example, to draw all the multitude to the like agreement and capitulation. So they detained the first and second commers; telling them, that they would make an even reckoning with all together. Thus every day the number increased, and many disorders (a thing incident among Souldiers) were committed; which much disquieted the Citie, not accustomed unto the like. In this regard it was thought fit, to remove them all to some other place, where they might be lesse troublesome. This must be done by some colourable words of perswasion: for their number was already so great, that it was not safe to offend them too far. Wherefore it is devised, that they should all attend the coming of their fellowes, at Sicca: receiving every one a piece of gold, to beare his charges in the meane while.

This motion is accepted, and the Souldiers began to dislodge; leaving behinde them their wives, their children, and all their baggage, as meaning shortly to fetch away all, when they came back for their pay. But the Carthaginians have no fancie to their returning into the Towne; and therefore compell them to trusse up their fardels, that they might have none occasion left to make any errands thither. So to Sicca they removed, with all their goods; and there lay waiting for newes of their fellowes arrivall, and their owne pay. But himselfe they had none to doe, and therefore might easily be drawn to mutinie: the whole argument of their discourse inclining them to nothing else. Their daily talke was, how rich they should be; when all their money came in; how much would fall to every single share: and for how long time the Citie was behind hand with them in reckoning. They were, all growne Arithmeticians; and he was thought a man of worth, that could finde most reason to increase their demands, to the very highest, even beyond their due. No part of their long service was forgotten; but the comfortable words and promises of their Captaines, leading them forth to any dangerous fight, were called to mind, and so many obligations, not to be cancelled, without satisfying their expectation by some unordinarie largesse.

Thus the time passeth away, until the whole armie being arrived, and lodged in Sicca, Hanno comes thither to cleare the accompt. Now is the day come, wherein they shall all be made rich; especially if they can hold together, in maintaining stoutly the common cause. So think they all; and assemble themselves to heare what good newes this messenger had brought: with a full resolution to help his memorie, in case he should happen to forget any part of the many promises made to them; all which were to be considered in their Donative. Hanno begins a very formall Oration; wherein he bewails the povertie of Carthage; tells them how great a sum of money is to be paid unto the Romans; reckons up the excessive charges whereat the Common-wealth had bene in the late warre; and finally desires them to hold themselves contented with part of their pay, and out of the love which they bare unto the Citie, to remit the rest. Few of them understood his discourse: for the Carthaginian Armie was composed of sundrie Nations, as Greekes, Africans, Gauls, Ligurians, Spaniards, and others; all of different languages. Yet they stared upon him, & were (as I think) little pleased with his very gesture. But when such as conceived the whole tenor of his speech, had informed the rest what could comfort he brought; they were all enraged, and fared like mad-men, so that nothing would serve to appeale them.

Hanno would faine have asswaged their furie, but he knew not how: for he lesse understood their dissonant lowd noyes, than they did his Oration. An Armie collected out of so many Countries, that have no one language common to all, or to the greater part of them, is neither easily stirred up to mutinie, nor easily pacified, when once it is broken into outrage. The best that Hanno can doe, is to use the helpe of Interpreters and Messengers. But these Interpreters mistake his meaning; some for want of skill; others of set purpose; and such as deliver his errands in the worst sense, are best believed. Finally, they thinke themselves much abused by the Carthaginians, and resolve to demand their owne in peremptorie termes, at a neerer distance. In this mood they leave Sicca, and march as farre as Tunis, that is within a very little of Carthage; and there they encampe.

Now begin the Carthaginians to finde their own error. It is a good rule,

Curandum

*Curandum imprimi, ne magna injuria fiat
Fortibus & miseris.*

Have speciall care, that valiant povertie
Be not opprest with too great injurie.

But this proud Citie, having neglected the rule, hath also bene carelesse in providing to secure her selfe against the inconvenience that might follow. Shee had suffered the whole multitude, whereunto she was like to give cause of discontent, to joyne it selfe into one bodie, when the severall troupes might easily have bin dispersed: the hath turned out of her gates the wives, children, and goods of these poore men, which had she retained in shew of kindnesse, she might have used them as Hostages for her own safety; and by employing a miserable pennie-father, in her negotiation with men of War, she hath weakened the reputation of her bravest Captaines, that might best have served to free her from the threatening danger. Yet likely it is, that Amilcar had no desire to be used as an instrument in defrauding his owne Souldiers of their wages: especially considering, that as he best could beare witness of their merits, so was he not ignorant, that meanes to content them were not wanting, if the Citizens had bene willing thereunto. Hereunto may be added a probable conjecture, that Hanno, with his complices, who at this very time was a bitter enemy to Amilcar, had the boldnesse to impose the blame of his owne wretched counsell, upon the liberall promises made by the Captaines: Amilcar therefore did wisely, in suffering those that maligned him, to have the managing of their owne plot, and to deale the cards which themselves had shuffled. This they continue to do as foolishly as they had at first begun. They furnish a market an Tunis for the Souldiers; whom they suffer to buy what they list, and at what price they list. They send ever and anon some of their Senators into the Campe; who promise to satisfie all demands, as farre forth as it should be possible. And thus by shifting from one extreme to another, they make the Souldiers understand, into what feare the Citie was driven; which cannot choose but add much insolencie to the passions already stirred up.

This sudden change of weather, and the true cause of it, is quickly found by the Army; which thereupon growes wile, and finding the season fit, labours to make a great harvest: Money must be had, and without any abatement. This is granted. Many have lost their horses in publike service of the State. The State shall pay for them. They had lived some yeares, by making hard shift, without receiving their allowance of victuals from Carthage. If they had lived, they wanted not meat; therefore what was this to the Carthaginians? Was it not all one, whether the ships did bring in provision, or their Captaine direct them where to fetch it? But this would not serve. They said that they had bene sometimes driven to buy; and that (since they could not remember how much, or at what rate they bought) they would be paid for their provision during the whole time, and according to the dearest price that wheat had borne, whilst the Warre lasted. Such are now the demands of these Mutiners; who might easily have bene satisfied with farre lesse charges, and far more honour, by receiving their due at the first. But now they make no end of craving. For whilst the Carthaginians are perplexed, about this Com-monie; the Souldiers have devised many more tricks, whereby to extort a greater sum of money, without all regard of shame. Since therefore no good end could be found of these controversies which daily did multiply, it was thought convenient, that one of the Carthaginians, which had commanded in Sicily, should be chosen by the Souldiers, to reconcile all differences. Hereunto the Armie consented, and made choice of Geso: partly out of good liking to him, who had shewed himselfe at all times a friendly man to them, and careful of their good, especially when they were to be transported into Africke: partly out of a dislike which they had conceived of Amilcar; for that he had not visited them in all this busie time. So Geso comes among them; and, to please them the better, comes not without money: which might give better countenance to his proceedings, than barren eloquence had done to the negotiation of Hanno. He calls unto him first of all the Captains, and then the severall Nations apart; rebuking them gently for that which had passed; advising them temperately concerning the present, and exhorting them to continue their love unto the State, which had long entertained ned them, and would needs alwaies be mindefull of their good services. After this he began to put hand to his purse, offering to give them their whole pay in hand; and then after to consider of other reckonings at a more convenient time. This had bin well accepted, and might have served to bring all to a quiet passe, if two seditious ring-leaders of the multitude had not stood against it.

There was in the Campe one Spendius, a sturdie fellow, and audacious, but a slave; that in the late war had fled from a Roman, whom he served, and therefore stood in feare, lest he should be delivered back to his Master; at whose hands he could expect no lesse, than to be whipt and crucified. This wretch could finde no better way to prolong his owne life, than by raising such troubles as might serve to with-draw men from care of private matters, and make his owne restitution impossible, were his Master never so importunate. With Spendius there associated himselfe one Matho, an hote-headed man, that had beene so forward in stirring up the tumult, as he could not choose but feare, lest his owne death should be made an example, to deterre others from the like seditious behaviour. This Matho deales with his Countymen the Africans; telling them, that they were in far worfe condition, than either the Gauls, the Greekes, the Spaniards, or any foreine mercenaries. For (saith he) *These our companions have no more to doe, than to receive their wages, and so get them gone: but we that are to stay behinde in Africa, shall be called to another manner of account, when we are left alone; so that we shall have cause to wish that we had returned home beggars, rather than loaden with the money, which (little though it be) shall breake our backs. We are not ignorant, how tyrannically those our haughty masters of Carthage doe reigne over us. They thinke it reasonable, that our lives and goods should be at their disposition; which they have at other times bin accustomed to take from us even without apparent cause, as it were to declare their sovereignty: what will they now doe, seeing that we have demeaned our selves as freemen, and bin bold to set a good face on the matter, demanding our own, as others have done? We all doe know, that it were a very blame for us, if having bin as forward in every danger of war, as any other men, we should now stand quaking like slaves, and not dare to open our mouths, when others take libertie to require their due. This notwithstanding ye may assure your selves, that we are like to be taught better manners, as soone as our fellows are gone: in regard of whom we are content to shadow their indignation with a good, but a forced countenance. We are therefore be wise, and consider that they hate and feare us: their hatred will shew it selfe when their feare is once past: unlesse we now take our time, and whilst we are the stronger, enfeeble them so greatly, that their hatred shal not be able to do us wrong. All their strength consisteth in money, wherewithall they have hired others against us, and us against others. At the present they have neither money nor friends. The best armie that ever served them, whereof we are no small part, lies at their gates, ready to helpe us if we be men. A better opportunity cannot be expected; for were our swords once drawne, all Africke would rise on our side. As for the Carthaginians, whither can they send for helpe? The case it selfe is plain: but we must quickly resolve. Either we must prevent the diligence of Gesco, by incensing these Gauls and Spaniards, and procuring them to draw blood; or else it behoveth us to please our good Masters, by joining with them against our fellows, yea by offering to forgive unto them all our wages, if so (peradventure) they may be won to forgive us, or not over-cruelly to punish our faults committed. He is most worthy a wretched slave, that neither hath care to winne his Masters love, nor the courage to attempt his owne liberty.*

By such perswasions Matho winnes the African souldiers to his owne purpose. They are not now so greedie of money, as of quarrell; which he that seeketh will not misse to find. When Gesco therefore offered to pay them their whole stipend presently, but referred their other demands, for horses and victuals, to some other more convenient time; they brake into great outrage, and say, that they will have all, even all at once, and that out of hand. In this tumult, the whole African flocke together about Matho and Spendius; whose diligence is not wanting to add more fuell to the fire already blazing. Matho and Spendius are the only men to whom the Souldiers will hearken: if any other stand up to make a speech, a shew of stones, flying about his eares, puts him to silence, that he shall never afterwards speake word more. Neither stay they to consider what it is that any man would say: enough hath beene said already by those good spokesmen, so that no other word (though perhaps to the same purpose) can be heard, save only Throw, throw.

Now

Now the rebellion begins to take forme. Matho and Spendius are chosen Captains; who, followed by a desperate crew of Russians, will suffer no man to make his owne peace, but pursue their owne ends, under faire pretence of the common cause. All which notwithstanding, Gesco is not wanting to the good of his Countrie, but adventures himselfe upon their furie. One while he deales with the Capitaines, and other principall men; taking them by the hand, and giving gentle words: another while he workes with the severall Nations; putting them all in hope of their own hearts desire, if any reason would content them. None of them are so fullen as the Africans: indeed none of them had so good cause. They require him peremptorily to give them their owne, and not to feed them with words. The truth is, that they are not so covetous as they seeme: but will be more glad of an ill answer, than of a good payment. This is more than Gesco knowes: he sees not that Matho hath any more than bare words to bestow upon them. Wherefore, as rebuking their inconsiderate heat, he tels them, That they may doe well, if they stand in want of money, to seeke it of their Captaine Matho. This is enough. Shall he both defraud them and deride them? They stay no longer, but lay violent hands upon the treasure that he had brought; yea upon him also, and all that are with him: as intending to take this in part of payment, and, for the rest, to take another course. Matho and Spendius are glad of this. It had little pleased them to see their fellows begin to grow calme, by his faire language: wherefore they cast into bonds both him, and all the Carthaginians that they can finde; that so the Armie may be freed from danger of good admision, which they call Treason. After this followes open war. Matho solicites all Africke, and his Embassadors are every where well entertained. Neither is it needfull to use perswasion: the very fame of this rebellion sufficeth to draw the whole countrie into it. Now must the Carthaginians be plagued for those oppressions, with which they have plagued others. It is true that adversitie hath never beene untold of her errors: and as she is ever assured to heare her owne, so commonly with her owne she undergoes those of other men. The Africans finding the Carthaginians hang under the wheele, tell them boldly, that their Impositions were mercilesse; that they took from them the one halfe of their come; that they doubled their tributes in all things else; and that they inflicted upon their vassals the greatest punishment for the least offences. These cruelties the Carthaginians themselves have forgotten: but the people, that have suffered so much, retain all in perfect memorie. Wherefore not only such as can beare Armes are readie to doe service in this great Commotion; but the very women bring forth their Jewels, and other ornaments, offering all to sale for the maintenance of so just a quarrell. By this great forwardnesse, and liberall contribution, Matho and Spendius are supplied with a strong aide of threecore and ten thousand Africans: and are moreover furnished with money, not onely to satisfie the present appetite of their men; but sufficient to continue the war begun, though it should be of long endurance.

§. II.

Divers observations upon this war with the Mercenaries.

†. I.

Of Tyrannie, and how Tyrants are faine to use the helpe of Mercenaries.

HERE let us rest a while, as in a convenient place, whence we may take a prospect of the subject, over which we travell. Behold a tyrannicall Citie, persecuted by her owne Mercenaries with a deadly war. It is a common thing, as being almost necessarie, that a tyrannie should be upheld by mercenarie forces: it is common that Mercenaries should be false: and it is common that all warre made against Tyrants, should be exceeding full of hate and crueltie. Yet we seldome heare, that ever the ruine of a tyrannie is procured or fought by those that were hired to maintaine the power of it: and seldome or never doe we reade of any war that hath been profecuted with such inexpiable hatred, as this that is now in hand.

That which we properly call Tyrannie, is, A violent form of government, not respecting the good of the subject, but only the pleasure of the Commander. I purposely forbear to say, that it is the unjust rule of one over many: for very truly doth Cleon in Thucydides tell the

the Athenians, that their dominion over their subjects, was none other, than a meere tyrannie; though it were so, that they themselves were a great Citie, and a popular citate. Neither is it peradventure greatly needfull, that I should call this forme of commanding, violent: since it may well and easily be conceived, that no man willingly performs obedience to one regardless of his life and welfare; unless he himselfe be either a mad man, or (which is little better) wholly possessed with some extreme passion of love. The practice of tyrannie, is not alwaies of a like extremitie: for some Lords are more gentle than others, to the very slaves; and he that is most cruell to some, is milde enough towards others, though it be but for his owne advantage. Nevertheless, in large Dominions, wherein the Rulers discretion cannot extend it selfe, unto notice of the difference which might be found between the worth of severall men; it is commonly seene, that the taste of sweetnesse, drawne out of oppression, hath so good a relish, as continually inflames the Tyrants appetite, and will not suffer it to be restrained with any limits of respect. Why should he seek out bounds to prescribe unto his desires, who cannot endure the face of one so honest, as may put him in remembrance of any moderation? It is much that he hath gotten by extorting from some few: by sparing none, he should have riches in goodly abundance. He hath taken a great deale from every one: but every one could have spared more. He hath wrung all their purses, & now he hath enough, but (as Covetousnesse is never satisfied) he thinks that all this is too little for a stock, though it were indeed a good yearly In-come. Therefore he deviseth new tricks of robbery, and is not better pleased with the gains, than with the Art of getting. He is hated for this, and he knows it well: but he thinks by cruelty to change hatred into feare. So he makes it his exercise, to torment and murder all whom he suspecteth in which course, if he suspect none unjustly, he may be said to deale craftily; but if Innocencie be not safe, how can all this make any Conspirator to stand in feare, since the Traitor is no worse rewarded, than the quiet man? Wherefore he can think upon none other securitie, than to dis-arm all his Subjects; to fortifie himselfe within some strong place; and, for defence of his Person and State, to hire as many lustie Souldiers as shall be thought sufficient. These must not be of his owne Countrey: for if not every one, yet some one or other may chance to have a feeling of the publike miserie. This considered, he allures unto him a desperate rabble of strangers, the most dishonest that can be found; such as have neither wealth nor credit at home, and will therefore be careful to support him, by whose only favour they are maintained. Now left any of these, either by desertation of his wickednesse, or (which in wicked men is most likely) by promise of greater reward than he doth give, should be drawn to turn his sword against the Tyrant himselfe: they shall all be permitted to doe as he doth; to rob, to ravish, to murder, and to satisfy their owne appetites, in most outrageous manner; being thought so much the more assured to their Master, by how much the more he sees them grow hateful to all men else. Considering in what age, and in what language I write; I must be faine to say, that these are not dreams: though some Englishman perhaps that were unacquainted with Historie, lighting upon this lease, might suppose this discourse to be but little better. This is to shew, both how tyrannie growes to stand in need of mercenarie Souldiers, and how those Mercenaries are, by mutuall obligation, firmly assured unto the Tyrant.

¶ II.

That the Tyrannie of a Citie over her Subjects is worse, than the tyrannie of one man: and that a tyrannicall Citie must likewise use mercenarie Souldiers.

NOW concerning the tyranny wherewith a Citie or State oppresseth her subjects, it may appear some waies to be more moderate, than that of one man: but in many things it is more intolerable. A Citie is jealous of her Dominions, but not (as is one man) fearfull of her life: the lesse need hath she therefore to secure her selfe by cruelty. A Citie is not luxurious in consuming her treasures, and therefore needs the lesse to plucke from her subjects. If warre, or any other great occasion, drive her to necessity of taking from her Subjects more than ordinarie summes of money; the same necessity makes either the contribution easie, or the taking excusable. Indeed no wrongs are so grievous & hateful, as those that are insolent. Remember (saith Caligula the Emperor to his Grand-mother Antonia that I may doe what I list, and to whom I list: these words were accounted horrible, though he did her no harme. And Juvenal reckons it, as the complement of all torments, inflicted by a cruel Roman Dame upon her slaves, that whilst she was whipping them, she painted her face, talked with her Gossips, and used all signes of neglecting what those wretches felt. Now seeing that the greatest grievances wherewith a domineering State offendeth her Subjects, are free from all sense of indignitie: likely it is, that they will not extremely hate her, although desire of libertie make them wearie of her Empire. In these respects it is not needfull, that she should keep a Guard of licentious cut-throats, and maintaine them in all villany, as a Dionysius or Agathocles must doe: her owne Citizens are able to terrifie, and to hold perforce in obedience, all male-contents. These things, considered alone by themselves, may serve to prove, That a Citie is scarce able to deserve the name of a Tyrannesse, in the proper signification.

All this notwithstanding, it shall appeare, that the miseries, wherewith a Tyrant loadeth his people, are not so heavey, as the burdens imposed by a cruell Citie. Not without some appearance of truth, it may be said, that Lust, and many other private passions, are no way incident to a Citie or Corporation. But to make this good, we shall have need to use the helpe of such distinctions, as the Argument in hand doth not require. Was not Rome lascivious, when Cato was faine to rise and leave the Theater, to the end, that the reverend regard of his gravity might not hinder the people, from calling for a shew of naked Courtians, that were to be brought upon the open stage? By common practice, and generally approved custome, we are to censure the quality of a whole State; not by the private vertue or vice of any one man, nor by metaphysicall abstraction of the universall from the singular, or of the Corporation, from those of whom it is compounded. I say therefore, (as I have said elsewhere) That it were better to live under one pernicious Tyrant, than under many thousands. The reasons proving this, are too many to set downe, but few may suffice. The desires of one man, how inordinate soever, if they cannot be satisfied, yet they may be wearied; he is not able to search all corners; his humour may be found, and soothed; age or good advice, yea, or some unexpected accident may reforme him; all which failing, yet is there hope, that his successe may prove better.

Many Tyrants have beene changed into worthy Kings: and many have ill used their ill-gotten Dominion, which, becoming hereditary to their posterity, hath grown into the most excellent forme of Government, even a lawfull Monarchy. But they that live under a tyrannicall Citie, have no such hope: their Mistress is immortall, and will not slacken the reines, untill they be pulled out of her hands, and her owne mouth receive the bridle of a more mightier Chariotter. This is wofull: yet their present sufferings make them lesse mindefull of the future. New flies, and hungry ones, fall upon the same fore, out of which others had already sucked their fill. A new Governour comes yearly among them, attended by all his poore kindred and friends, who meane not to returne home empty to their hives, without a good lading of waxe and hony. These flye into all quarters, and are quickly acquainted with every mans wealth, or whatsoever else, in all the Province, is worthy to be desired. They know all a mans enemies, and all his fears: becoming themselves, within a little space, the enemies that he feareth most. To grow into acquaintance with these masterfull guests, in hope to win their friendship, were an endless labour, (yet it must be undergone) and such as every one hath not means to goe about: but were this effected, what availed it? The love of one Governour is purchased with gifts: the Successor of this man, he is more loving than could be wished, in respect of a faire Wife or Daughter: then comes the third, perhaps of the contrary faction at home, a bitter enemy to both his fore-goers, who seeks the ruine of all that have beene inward with them. So the miseries of this tyranny are not simple, but interlaced (as it were) with the calamities of civil warre. The Romans had a Law De Reperundis, or, Of Recoverie, against extorting Magistrates: yet we finde, that it served not wholly to restrain their Provinciaall Governours; who presuming on the favour of their owne Citizens, and of their kindred and friends at home, were bold, in their Provinces, to worke all these enormities rehearsed; though somewhat the more sparingly, for feare of judgement. If the subjects of Rome groaned under such oppressions, what must we think of those that were Vassals unto Carthage? The Romans imposed no burthenome tributes; they loved not to heare; that their Empire was grievous; they condemned many noble Citizens for having bene ill Governours. At Carthage all went quite contrary: the rapines newly devised by one Magistrate, served as Presidents to instruct another; every man resolved to doe the like, when it should fall to his turne; and he was held a notable Statesman, whose robberies had bene such, as might afford a good share to the common treasure. Particular examples of this Carthaginian practice are not extant: the government of Verres the Roman in Sicily, that is lively set out by Tullie, may serve to informe us, what was the demeanour of these Punick Rulers, who stood in feare of no such condemnation, as Verres under-went. By prosecuting this discourse, I might inferre a more generall Proposition; That a Citie cannot governe her subject Provinces to so mildly as a King: but it is enough to have shewed, That the tyranny of a Citie is far more intolerable, than that of any one most wicked man.

323. Sutable to the crueltie of such Lords, is the hatred of their Subjects: and againe, sutable to the hatred of the Subjects, is the jealousy of their Lords. Hence it followed, that, in wars abroad, the Carthaginians durst use the service of African souldiers; in Africk it selfe they had rather be beholding to others, that were farther fetcht. For the same purpose did Hannibal, in the second Punick war, shift his Mercenaries out of their own countries; Ut Afri in Hispania, Hispani in Africa, melior procul ab domo futurus uterq; miles, velut mutui pignorum obligati stipendia facerent; That the Africans might serve in Spain, the Spaniards in Africk, being each of them like to prove the better Souldiers, the farther they were from home, as if they were obliged by mutuall pledges. It is disputable, I confesse, whether these African and Spanisb hirelings, could properly be termed Mercenaries: for they were subject unto Carthage, & carried into the field, not only by reward, but by dutie. Yet seeing their dutie was no better than enforced, and that it was not any love to the State, but meer desire of gain, that made them fight; I will not nicely stand upon propriety of a word, but hold them, as Polybius also doth, no better than Mercenaries.

†. III.

The dangers growing from the use of mercenarie Souldiers, and forraine Auxiliaries.

THE extreme danger, growing from the imployment of such Souldiers, is well observed by Machiavel: who sheweth, that they are more terrible to those whom they serve, than to those against whom they serve. They are seditious, unfaithfull, disobedient, devourers, and destroyers of all places and Countries, whereinto they are drawne; as being held by no other bond, than their own commoditie. Yea, that which is most fearfull among such hirelings, is, that they have often, and in time of greatest extremity, not only refused to fight, in their defence, who have entertained them, but revolted unto the contrarie part; to the utter ruine of those Princes and States that have trusted them. These Mercenaries (saith Machiavel) which filled all Italie when Charls the eighth of France did passe the Alpes, were the cause that the said French King won the Realm of Naples with his Buckler without a Sword. Notable was the example of Sforza, the Father of Francis Sforza, Duke of Milan; who being entertained by Queen Joane of Naples, abandoned her service on the sudden, and forced her to put her self into the hands of the king of Aragon. Like unto his father was Francis Sforza, the first of that race, Duke of Milan; who being entertained by the Milanais, forced them to become his slaves, even with the very same armie which themselves had levied for their own defence. But Lodowick Sforza, the son of this Francis, by the just judgement of God, was made a memorable example unto posterity, in losing his whole estate by the treachery of such faithles Mercenaries, as his own father had bin. For, having waged an armie of Swissers, and committed his Dutchie, together with his person, into their hands, he was by them delivered up unto his enimie the French King, by whom he was inclosed in the Castle of Loches unto his dying day.

The like inconvenience is found, in using the helpe of forreigne Auxiliaries. We see, that when the Emperor of Constantinople had hired ten thousand Turks against his neighbour Princes; he could never, either by perswasion or force, set them againe over the sea upon Asia side; which gave beginning to the Christian servitude, that soon after followed.

followed. Alexander, the son of Cassander, sought aide of the great Demetrius: but Demetrius, being entred into his Kingdome, flue the same Alexander, who had invited him, and made himselfe King of Macedon. Syracon the Turke was called into Egypt by Sanar the Soldan, against his Opposite: but this Turke did settle himselfe so surely in Egypt, that Saladin his successor became Lord thereof, & of all the holy Land, soon after. What need we look about for examples of this kind? Every Kingdome, in effect, can furnish us. The Brittaines drew the Saxons into this our Countrey; and Mac Murrough drew the English into Ireland; but the one and the other soone became Lords of those two Kingdomes.

10 Against all this may be alledged, the good successe of the united Provinces of the Netherlands, using none other than such kinde of Souldiers, in their late warre. Indeed these Low-countries have many goodly and strong Cities, filled with Inhabitants that are wealthie, industrious, and valiant in their kinde. They are stout Sea-men, and therein is their excellencie; neither are they bad at the defence of a place well fortified: but in open field they have seldome bin able to stand against the Spaniard. Necessity therefore compelled them to seeke helpe abroad: and the like necessity made them forbear to arme any great numbers of their owne. For, with money raised by their Trade, they maintained the Warre: and therefore could ill spare unto the Pike and Musket, those hands, that were of more use in helping to fill the common purse. Yet what of this? they sped well. Surely they sped as ill as might be, whilst they had none other than mercenarie Souldiers. Many fruitlesse attempts, made by the Prince of Orange, can witness it: and that brave Commander Count Lodowicke of Nassau, felt, to his griefe, in his retreat from Gravingham; when, in the very instant that required their service in fight, his Mercenaries cried out aloud for money, and so ranne away. This was not the onely time, when the hired Souldiers of the States, have either sought to hide their cowardize under a shew of greedinesse; or at least, by meere covetousnesse, have ruined in one houre the labour of many moneths. I will not stand to prove this by many examples: for they themselves will not deny it. Neither would I touch the honour of Monsieur the Duke of Anjou, brother to the French King; save that it is folly to conceal what all the world knows. He that would lay open the danger of forraine Auxiliaries, needeth no better patterne. It is commonly found, that such Aiders make themselves Lords over those, to whom they lend their succour: but where shall we meet with such another as this Monsieur, who, for his protection promised, being rewarded with the Lordship of the Countrey, made it his first worke, to trust by violence a galling yoke upon the peoples necke? Well, he lived to repent it, with griefe enough. Even whilst he was counterfeiting unto those about him, that were ignorant of his plot, an imagine sorrow for the poore Burghers of Antwerpe, as verily beleiving the Towne to be surprisid and wonne, the death of the Count St. Aignan, who fell over the wall, and the Cannon of the Citie, discharged against his owne troups, informed him better what had hapned; shewing, that they were his own French who stood in need of pittie. Then was his feigned passion changed into a very bitter anguish of minde, wherein, smiting his breast, and wringing his hands, he exclaimed; Helas, mon Dieu, que veux tu faire de moy? Alas, my God, what wilt thou doe with me? So the affaires of the Netherlands will not serve to prove, that there is little danger in using mercenarie Souldiers, or the helpe of forraine Auxiliaries. This notwithstanding, they were obedient unto necessity, and sought helpe of the English, Scots, and French; wherein they did wisely, and prospered. For when there was in France a King, partaker with them in the same danger; when the Queen of England refused to accept the Sovereignty of their Countrey, which they offered, yet being provoked by the Spaniard their enimie, pursued him with continual war; when the heir of England reigned in Scotland a King too just and wise (though not engaged in any quarrell) either to make profit of his Neighbours miseries, or to help those that had attempted the conquest of his owne inheritance: then might the Netherlands very safely repose confidence in the forces of these their Neighbour-countries. The Souldiers that came unto them from hence, were (to omit any other commendations) not onely regardfull of the pay that they should receive, but well affected unto the cause that they tooke in hand: or, if any were cold in his devotion, unto the side whereon he fought, yet was he kept in order, by remembrance of his owne home, where the English would have rewarded him with death, if that his faith had bene corrupted by by the Spaniard. They were therefore trusted with the custodie of Cities; they were held as friends, and patrons; the necessitie of the poorer sort was relieved, before the pay-day came, with lendings, and other helpees, as well as the abilitie of the States could permit. When three such Princes, reigning at one time, shall agree so well, to maintain against the power of a fourth, injurious (or at least so seeming) to them all, a Neighbour-Country of the same religion, and to which they all are lovingly affected: then may such a countie be secure of her Auxiliaries, and quietly intend her Trade, or other business, in hope of like successe. But these circumstances meet so seldom, as it may well hold true in generall: That mercenary and forraign auxiliary forces are no lesse dangerous, than the enemy against whom they are entertained.

†. IIII.

That the moderate government of the Romans gave them assurance to use the service of their owne subjects in their wars. That in mans nature there is an affection breeding tyrannie, which hindreth the use and benefit of the like moderation.

Here it may be demanded, whether also the Romans were not compelled to use service of other souldiers in their many great wars, but performed all by their own Citizens: for if it were their maner to arm their own subjects, how hapned it, that they feared no rebellion: if strangers, how then could they avoid the inconveniences above rehearsed? The answer is, That their Armies were compounded usually of their own Citizens, and of the Latines in equal number: to which they added, as occasion required, some companies of Campanes, Hetrurians, Samnites, or other of their subjects, as were either interested in the quarrell, or might best be trusted. They had, about these times, (though seldom they did employ so many) ten Roman Legions; a good strength, if all other helpe had bin wanting; which served to keepe in good order their subjects, that were always fewer in the armie than themselves. As for the Latines, if constanguinitie were not a sufficient obligation; yet many privileges and immunities, which they enjoied, made them assured unto the State of Rome: under which they lived almost at libertie, as being bound to little else, than to serve it in war. It is true, that a yoke, how easie soever, seems troublesome to the neck that hath bin accustomed to freedom. Therefore many people of Italie have taken occasion of severall advantages, to deliver themselves from the Roman subjection. But still they have bin reclaimed by war, the Authors of rebellion have sharply bin punished, and the people by degrees have obtained full liberty, as made them esteem none otherwise of Rome, than as the common citie of all Italy. Yet, in proceesse of time it was granted unto many Cities, and those far off removed, even to Tarsus in Cilicia, where Saint Paul was born, That all the Burgeses should be free of Rome it selfe. This favour was conferred absolutely upon some; upon some, with restraint of giving voyce in election of Magistrates, or with other such limitation as was thought fit. Hereunto may be added, that it was their maner, after a great conquest, to release unto their new subjects halfe of their tribute which they had bin wont to pay to their former Lords, which was a ready way to bring the multitude into good liking of their present condition; when the review of harder times past, should rather teach them to feare a relapse, than to hope for better in the future, by seeking innovation. Neither would it be forgotten, as a speciall note of the Romans good government, That when some, for their well-deserving, have had the offer to be made Citizens of Rome, they have refused it, and held themselves better contented with their owne present estate. Wherefore it is not marvell, that Petellia, a Citie of the Brutians in Italie, chose rather to endure all extremities of war, than, upon any condition, to forsake the Romans; even when the Romans themselves had confessed, that they were unable to helpe these their subjects, and therefore willed them to looke to their owne good, as having bin faithfull to the utmost. Such love purchased these mild Governors, without impairing their Majesty thereby. The sum of all is, they had of their own, a strong Armie; they doubled it by adjoining them unto the Latines; and they further increased it, as need required, with other help of their own subjects: all, or the most of their followers, accounting the prosperitie of Rome to be the common good.

unto their Lords, and consequently, in the establishment or enlargement of Dominion: it may seeme strange, that the practice of tyranny, whose effects are contrary, hath been so common in all ages. The like, I know, may be said of all Vice and Irregularity, whatsoever. For it is lesse difficult, (who soever thinke otherwise) and more safe, to keepe the way of Justice and Honesty, than to turne aside from it: yet commonly our passions doe lead us into by-paths. But where Lust, Anger, Feare, or any the like Affection, seduceth our reason; the same unruly appetite, either bringeth with it an excuse, or, at least-wise, taketh away all cause of wonder. In tyrannie it is not so: for as much as we can hardly descry the passion, that is of force to infigurate it selfe into the whole tenour of a Government. It must be confessed, that lawlesse desires have bred many Tyrants: yet so, that these desires have seldom bin hereditary, or long-lasting; but have ended commonly with the Tyrants life, sometimes before his death; by which meanes the government hath bin reduced to a better forme. In such cases, the saying of Aristotle holds, That tyrannies are of a short continuance. But this doth not satisfie the question in hand. Why did the Carthaginians exercise Tyranny? Why did the Athenians? Why have many other Cities done the like? If in respect of their generall good; how could they be ignorant, that this was an ill course for the safety of the Weale publique? If they were led hereunto by any affection; what was that affection wherein so many thousand Citizens, divided and subdivided within themselves by factions, did all conquire, notwithstanding the much diversity of temper, and the vehemencie of private hatred among them? Doubtlesse, we must be faine to say, That Tyrannie is, by it selfe, a Vice distinct from others. A Man, we know, is Animal politicum, apt even by Nature, to command, or to obey; every one in his proper degree. Other desires of Mankind, are common likewise unto brute beasts; and some of them, to bodies wanting sense: but the desire of rule belongeth unto the nobler part of reason; whereunto is also answerable an aptnesse to yeld obedience. Now as hunger and thirst are given by nature not only to Man and Beast, but unto all sorts of Vegetables, for the sustentation of their life: as Feare, Anger, Lust, and other affections are likewise natural, in convenient measure, both unto Mankind, and to all creatures that have sense, for the shunning or repelling of harme, and seeking after that which is requisite: even so is this desire of ruling or obeying, ingrafted by Nature in the race of Man, and in Man onely as a reasonable creature, for the ordering of his life, in a civil forme of Justice. All these in-bred qualities are good and usefull. Nevertheless, Hunger and Thirst are the Parents of Gluttony and Drunkennesse, which in reproach, are called beastly, by an improper terme: since they grow from appetites, found in lesse worthy creatures than beasts, and are yet not so common in beasts, as in men. The effects of Anger, and of such other Passions as descend no lower than unto brute beasts, are held lesse vile; and perhaps not without good reason: yet are they more horrible, and punished more grievously, by sharper Lawes, as being in generall more pernicious. But, as no corruption is worse, than of that which is best; there is not any Passion, that nourisheth a vice more hurtfull unto Mankind, than that which issueth from the most noble root, even the depraved Affection of ruling. Hence arise those two great mischiefs, of which hath beene an old question in dispute, whether be the worse; That all things, or That nothing should be lawfull. Of these, a dull spirit, and over-loaden by fortune, with power, whereof it is not capable, occasioneth the one; the other proceedeth from a contrary distemper, whose vehemencie the bounds of Reason cannot limit. Under the extremity of either, no Country is able to subsist: yet the defective dulnesse, that permitteth any thing, will also permit the execution of Law, to which meere necessity doth enforce the ordinary Magistrate; whereas Tyranny is more active, and pleaseeth it selfe in the successe, with a false colour of justice. Examples of stupidity, and unaptnesse to rule, are not very frequent, though such natures are every where to be found: for this quality doubles not it selfe in seeking Empire; or if by some error of fortune, it encounter herewithall, (as when Claudius, hiding himselfe in a corner, found the Empire of Rome) some friend, or else a wife, is not wanting to supply the defect, which also cruelty hath helpe to shadow. Therefore this Vice, as a thing unknowne, is without a name. Tyrannie is more bold, and feareth not to be knowne, but would be reputed honourable: for it is prosperum & felix scelus, a fortunate mischiefe, as long as it can sub-

There is no reward or honour (saith Peter Charron) assigned unto those, that know how how to increase, or preserve humane nature: all honours, greatnesse, riches, dignities, Empires, triumphs, trophies, are appointed for those, that know how to affix, trouble, or destroy it. Cæsar and Alexander, have un-made and laine, each of them, more than a million of men: but they made none, nor left none behinde them. Such is the error of Mans judgement in valuing things according to the common opinion. But the true name of Tyranny, when it grows to ripenesse, is none other than Feritie: the same that Aristotle saith to be worse than any vice. It exceedeth indeed all other vices, issuing from the passions incident both to Man and Beast; no lesse than Perjury, Murder, Treason, and the like horrible crimes, exceed in villanie, the faults of Gluttony & Drunkenness, that grow from more ignoble appetites. Hereof Sciron, Procrustes, and Pityrampes, that used their bodily force to the destruction of Mankind, are not better examples, than Phalaris, Dionysius, and Agathocles, whose mischievous heads were affixed by the hands of detestable Rustians. The same barbarous desire of Lordship, transported those old examples of Feritie, and these latter Tyrants, beyond the bounds of reason: neither of them knew the use of Rule, nor the difference between Freeman and slaves.

1 Cor. 7. 20. 21.

The rule of the husband over the wife, and of parents over their children, is naturall, and appointed by God himselfe; so that it is alwayes, and simply, allowable and good. The former of these, is as the dominion of Reason over Appetite; the latter is the whole authoritie, which one Freeman can have over another. The rule of a King is no more, nor none other, than of a common Father over his whole country: which he that knows what the power of a Father is, or ought to be, knows to be enough. But there is a greater, and more Masterly rule, which God gave unto Adam, when he said: Have dominion over the fish of the Sea, and over the fowle of the aire, and every living thing that moveth upon the earth: which also he continueth unto Noah and his children, saying, The feare of you, and the dread of you, shall be upon every beast of the earth, and upon every fowle of the aire, upon all that moveth upon the earth, and upon all the fishes of the Sea: into your hands are they delivered. He who gave this dominion unto Man, did give also an aptitude to use it. The execution of this power hath since extended it selfe, over a very great part of Mankind. There are indeed no small numbers of men, whose disability to govern themselves, proves them, according unto Aristotles doctrine, to be naturally slaves.

Yet finde I not in Scripture any warrant to oppress men with bondage: unless the lawfulness thereof be sufficiently intimated, where it is said, That a man shall not be punished for the death of a servant, whom he hath laine by correction, if the servant live a day or two, because he is his money; or else by the captivity of the Midianitish girls, which were made bond-slaves, and the Sanctuary had a part of them for the Lords tribute. Doubtlesse the custome hath bene very ancient: for Noah laid this curse upon Canaan, that he should be a servant of servants; and Abraham had of Pharaoh, among other gifts, men-servants and maid-servants, which were none other than slaves. Christian Religion is said to have abrogated this old kinde of servilitie: but surely they are deceived that think so. Saint Paul desired the liberty of Onesimus, whom he had won unto Christ: yet wrote for this unto Philemon by way of request, craving it as a benefit, not urging it as a dutie. Agreeable hereto is the direction, which the same Saint Paul giveth unto servants: Let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called: art thou called, being a servant? care not for it, but if thou mayst be made free, use it rather. It is true, that Christian religion hath procured liberty unto many; not onely in regard of pietie, but for that the Christian Masters stood in fear of being discovered by their slaves, unto the persecutors of religion. Mahomet likewise, by giving libertie to his followers, drew many unto his impietie: but whether he forbade it, as unlawfull, unto his sectators, to hold one another of them in bondage, I cannot tell; save that by the practice of the Turks and Moors, it seemes he did not. In England we had many bond-servants, untill the time of our last civill wars; and I think that the Lawes concerning Villenage are still in force, of which the latest are the sharpest. And now, since slaves were made free, which were of great use and service, there are growne up a rabble of Rogues, Curpeses, and other the like trades; slaves in Nature, though not in Law.

But whether this kinde of dominion be lawfull, or not; Aristotle hath well proved that it is naturall. And certainly, we finde not such a latitude of difference in creature creature, as in the nature of man; wherein (to omit the infinite distance in estate of the elect & reprobate) the wisest excell the most foolish, by far greater degree, than the most foolish of men doth surpass the wisest of beasts. Therefore when Commiseration hath given way to Reason, we shall finde, that Nature is the ground even of Masterly power, and of servile obedience, which is thereto correspondent. But it may be truly said, that some countries have subsisted long without the use of any servilitie; as also it is true, that some countries have not the use of any tame cattell. Indeed the affections which uphold civill rule, are (though more noble) not so simply needfull, unto the sustentation either of our kinde, as are Lust, and the like; or of every one, as are hunger and thirst; which notwithstanding are the lowest in degree. But where most vile and servile dispositions have liberty to shew themselves begging in the streets, there may we more justly wonder, how the dangerous toile of sea-faring men can finde enough to undertake them, than how the swarme of idle vagabonds should increase, by access of those, that are weary of their own more painfull condition. This may suffice to prove, that in Mankind there is found, ingrafted even by Nature, a desire of absolute dominion: whereunto the generall custome of Nations doth subscribe; together with the pleasure which most men take in flatterers, that are the basest of slaves.

This being so, we finde no cause to marvell, how Tyranny hath been so rife in all ages, and practised, not only in the single rule of some vicious Prince, but ever by consent of whole Cities and Estates: since other vices have likewise gotten head, and borne a generall sway, notwithstanding that the way of vertue be more honourable, and commodious. Few there are that have used well the inferior Passions: how then can we expect, that the most noble affections should not be disordered? in the government of wife and children, some are utterly carelesse, and corrupt all by their dull connivencie: others, by masterly rigour, hold their owne blood under condition of slavery. To be a good Governour is a rare commendation: and to preserve the Weal publike above all respects whatsoever, is the Vertue justly termed Heroicall. Of this Vertue many ages afford not many examples. Hector is named by Aristotle as one of them; and deservedly, if this praise be due to extraordinary height of fortitude, used in defence of a mans owne Country. But if we consider, that a love of the generall good cannot be perfect, without reference unto the fountain of all goodnesse: we shall finde, that no morall vertue, how great soever, can, by it selfe, deserve the commendation of more than Vertue, as the Heroicall doth. Wherefore we must search the Scriptures, for patternes hereof; such as David, Josaphat, and Josias were. Of Christian Kings, if there were many such, the world would soone be happy. It is not my purpose to wrong the worth of any, by denying the praise where it is due, or by preferring a lesse excellent. But he that can finde a King religious, and zealous in Gods cause, without enforcement, either of adversitie, or of some regard of state; a procurer of the generall peace and quiet; who not only useth his authority, but stides the travell of his eloquence, in admonishing his Judges to doe justice; by the vigorous influence of whose Government, civilitie is infused, even into those places, that have been the dens of savage Robbers and Cut-throats; one that hath quite abolished a slavish Brebon Law, by which a whole Nation of his subjects were held in bondage; and one, whose higher vertue and wisdom doth make the praise not only of Nobility and other ornaments, but of abstinence from the blood, the wives, and the goods of those that are under his power, together with a world of chiefe commendations belonging unto some good Princes, to appeare lesse regardable: he, I say, that can find such a King, findeth an example, worthy to add unto vertue an honourable title, if it were formerly wanting. Under such a King, it is likely, by Gods blessing, that a Land shall flourish, with increase of Trade, in Countries before unknowne; that Civility and Religion shall be propagated, into barbarous and heathen Countries; and that the happinesse of his subjects, shall cause the Nations farre off removed, to wish him their Sovereigne. I need not add hereunto, that all the actions of such a King, even his bodily exercises, doe partake of vertue; since all things tending to the preservation of his life and health, or to the mollifying of his cares, (who fixing his contemplation upon God, seeketh how to imitate the unspeakable goodnesse, rather than the inaccessible majestie, with both of which himselfe is indued, as farre as humane nature is capable) doe also belong to the furtherance of that common good, which he procurerth. Left any man should thinke mee transported with admiration, or other affection, beyond the bounds of reason; I add hereunto, hereunto, that such a King is neverthelesse a man, must dye. and may erre: yet wisdom and fame shall set him free, from error, and from death, both with and without the help of time. One thing I may not omit, as a singular benefit (though there be many other besides) redounding unto this King, as the fruit of his goodness. The people that live under a pleasant yoke, are not only loving to their Sovereigne Lord, but free of courage, and no greater in muster of men, than of stout fighters, it need require: whereas on the contrary, he that ruleth as over slaves, shall be attended in time of necessity, by slavish minds, neither loving his person, nor regarding his or their own honour. Cowards may be furious, and slaves outrageous, for a time: but among spirits that have once yielded unto slavery, universally it is found true, that Homer saith, God bereaveth a man of halfe his vertue that day when he casteth him into bondage.

Hom. Odyf. l. 17.

Of these things, I might perhaps more seasonably have spoken, in the generall discourse of Government: but where so lively an example of the calamity following a tyrannicall rule, and the use of Mercenaries, thereupon depending, did offer it selfe, as is this present business of the Carthaginians; I thought that the note would be more effectuell, than being barely delivered, as out of a common place.

§. III.

How the war against the Mercenaries was diversely managed by Hanno and Amilcar, with variable successe. The bloody counsels of the Mercenaries; and their final destruction.

BEING now to returne unto those Mercenaries, from whom I have thus farre digressed, I cannot readily finde, by what name henceforth I should call them. They are no longer in pay with the Carthaginians; neither care they to pretend, that they seeke their wages already due; so that they are neither Mercenaries, nor Mutiniers. Had they all been subjects unto Carthage, then might they justly have been termed Rebels: but Spandin, and others, that were the principall part of them, ought none allegiance to that State, which they endeavoured to subvert. Wherefore I will borrow the name of their late occupation, and still call them Mercenaries, as Polybius will, so doth.

* Utica is seated in the great bay that enters towards Carthage, not far within the Promontory of Apollis. At this time it is called portus Uticensis, or Ufens, & by the Africans themselves, Casidonia. Niger saith, that the town it selfe is ruined, and the place whereon it stood, now called Magazetha. It was very ancient, and built before Carthage, saith Silius. As it flourished before Carthage was set up, so did it after Carthage was throwne down by the Romans in the third Punicke warre. Famous it was by the death of Cato the younger, who held it against Cæsar. It was the birth place of Diomedes, was Bishop thereof in the time of Genesius the Arian, who lived all the time of that Tyrant, and hath written the story of his cruelties.

These, using the advantage of their present strength, besieged * Utica and Hippagreta, Cities of great importance, as being seated upon the western Haven of Carthage, where it is divided by a neck of land; Hippagreta standing inwards upon the great Lake, Utica further out upon the Sea. Neither was the Campe at Tunis abandoned, which lay fitly to hinder the Carthaginians from passing up into the countrey: for Mattho and Spandin wanted not men to follow the war in all parts at once.

How the Carthaginians were amazed with this unexpected perill, any man may conceive. But the business it selfe awakes them hastily. They are hardly prest on all sides, and therefore travelled their brains to the uttermost, how to shake off these furious dogs from their shoulders, who, sometimes by night, sometimes by day, came unto the very walls of their Citie. In this exigent, Hanno was made their Generall: who failed not in his accustomed diligence of making all good preparation; but had gotten together whatsoever was needfull, as well to relieve a Town besieged, as to batter and assaile any place defended against him. With these provisions, and with an hundred Elephants, he came unto Utica, so suddenly, that the enemies, as men surprised, forsook their Trenches, and retired themselves unto a rising piece of woody ground, where they might be safe against the violence of his assaults. Hanno, thinking that he had to doe with Numidians, whose custome was, after any losse, to flie two or three whole daies journey off; present-ly entered the Town; to shew himselfe after this his victory. But these good fellows, against whom he was to war, had learned of Amilcar, to retire and to fight again, many times in one day, as need required. Therefore as soon as they perceived, that he knew not how to use a victory, they assailed their own Camp, and with great slaughter, drove the Carthaginians out of it, forcing them to hide themselves within Utica; and got possession of all the store that Hanno had brought for the reliefe of the Towne. This beginning Hanno followed with futable indiscretion: losing the benefit of many faire opportunities, and suffering the enemies to take possession of all the entrance from Carthage to the firm land.

The Carthaginians perceiving this, were exceedingly troubled, and did therefore let fall their shete-anchor; sending to the field their great Capitaine Amilcar, whom they furnished with ten thousand foot of supply, and seventy Elephants. Amilcar had worke enough to doe, before he should be able to meet with the enemy upon equall ground. For, besides other places of advantage that the Mercenaries had occupied, Hanno had suffered them to win the onely bridge, by which the River Macra, or Bagradas, was passable unto these, that were to travell into the Continent. This River had not many fords, nor those easie for a single man to get over: but upon them all was kept such guard, as gave to Amilcar little hope of prevailing in seeking way by force. As for the Bridge it selfe, Mattho and his followers were there lodged: and had there built a town, wherein to lye commodiously, intencive only to the custody thereof. But Amilcar had observed, that the very mouth of Bagradas used to be sometimes cloyed with sand and gravel, that was driven in by certain customary winds, and could not be driven out againe, by force of that slow river, till the wind failing, or changing, suffered the weight of the waters, to dis-burden their channell. Hereof he made use; and taking his opportunity, passed the River, contrary to all expectation, either of the enemy, or of his owne Citizens.

There was no need to bid Spandin looke about him, when once it was heard, that Amilcar was come over Bagradas: all the Mercenaries were troubled with the newes; knowing that they were no longer to deal with the improvident gravity of Hanno, but with an able spirit, even with their owne Master in the Art of Warre, whom they admired, though they hated him. But this feare was soone changed into presumption; when more than fifteen thousand of their owne society, were come from Utica, and other ten thousand from the guard of the Bridge. Their Armie was farre greater, than that of Amilcar; and they were, in their owne judgement, the better men; upon which confidence, they resolved to charge him on all sides, and beat him downe, in despite of his worth and reputation. With this resolution they attended upon him, watching for some advantage, and still exhorting one another to play the men, and give the onser. Especially they that followed him in the Reare, had a great minde to begin the fight; whereunto their promptnesse was such, as tooke from them their former circumspection. Amilcar held his way towards the Bridge, keeping himselfe on plaine grounds, that were fittest for the service of his Elephants, which he placed in front of his Armie. Neither made he shew of any desire to fight, but suffered the rashnesse of his enemies to increase, till it should breake into some disorder. At length perceiving, that with more boldnesse than good heed, they followed him so neare, as would be little for their good, if he should turne upon them, he hastened his march, even to such a pace, as made a shew little differing from plaine flight. The Mercenaries presently fell upon his skirts; beleiving, that for feare of them he was ready to run away. But whilst they confusedly, as in sudden opinion of victory, were driven at the heeles of those that had the Reare; Amilcar wheeled about, and met them in the face, charging them hotly, but in very good order, so that, amazed with the apprehension of unexpected danger, they fled without making any resistance. In this overthrow there were fixe thousand of the Mercenaries slaine, and about two thousand taken, the rest fled, some to the Campe at Utica, others to the town at the Bridge; whither Amilcar followed them so fast, that he wan the place easily; the enemies being thence also fled unto Tunes, as not having recollected their spirits to make it good.

The fame of this victory, together with the diligence of Amilcar in pursuing it, caused many Towns revolted, partly by feare, partly by force, to return to their former obedience. Yet was not Mattho wanting to himselfe in this dangerous time. He sent about Numidia and Africa, for new supplies; admonishing the people, now or never, to doe their best, for the recovery of their freedome; he perswaded Spandin, and Antaritus, that was a Capitaine of the Gaules, to wait upon Amilcar, and always to keepe the higher grounds, or at least, the foot of some hill, where they might be safe from the Elephants; and he himselfe continued to presse the Town of Hippagreta with an hard siege. It was necessary for Amilcar, in passing from place to place, as his business required, to take such ways as there were: for all the Country lay not level. Therefore Spandin, who still coasted him, had once gotten a notable advantage of ground; the Carthaginians lying in a plaine, surrounded with hills, that were occupied by the Mercenaries, with their

Numidian

Numidian and African succours. In this difficultie, the fame of Amilcar his personall worth did greatly benefit his Countrey. For Naravassus, a young gentleman commanding over the Numidians, was glad of this occasion, serving to get the acquaintance and love of so brave a man, which he much desired: and therefore came unto Amilcar, signifying his good affection to him, with offer to doe him all service. Amilcar joyfully entertained this friend, promised unto him his own daughter in marriage; and so won from the enemies two thousand horse, that following Naravassus turned unto the Carthaginians side. With this helpe he gave battell unto Spendius: wherein the Numidian laboured to approve his own valour to his new friend. So the victory was great: for there were slaine ten thousand of Spendius his fellowes, and foure thousand taken prisoners; but Spendius himselfe, with Autarim the Gauls, escaped to doe more mischief. Amilcar dealt very gently with his prisoners: pardoning all offences past, and dismissing as many as were unwilling to become his followers; yet with condition, that they should never beare armes against the Carthaginians; threatening to take sharpe revenge upon all that should breake this Covenant.

This humanitie was vehemently suspected by Matho, Spendius, and Autarim, as tending to win from them the hearts of their Souldiers. Wherefore they resolved to take such order, that not a man among them should dare to trust in the good nature of Amilcar, nor to hope for any safety whilst Carthage was able to doe him hurt. They counterfeited letters of advertisement, wherein was contained, that some of their company, respective only of their private benefit, and careless of the generall good, had a purpose to betray them all unto the Carthaginians, with whom they held intelligence; and that it was needfull to look well unto Gesco, and his companions, whom these traitors had a purpose to enlarge. Upon this Theme Spendius makes an oration to the Souldiers, exhorting them to fidelity; and shewing with many words, that the seeming humanity of Amilcar, toward some, was none other than a baite, wherewith to intrap them all at once together; as also telling them what a dangerous enemy Gesco would prove, if he might escape their hands. While he is yet in the midst of his tale, were letters come to the same purpose. Then steps forth Autarim, and speaks his minde plainly: saying, that it were the best, yea, the only way for the common safetie, to cut off all hope of reconciliation with Carthage; that if some were desiring to make their owne peace, it would goe hard with those that had a care of the war; that it were better to make an end of Gesco his life, than to trouble themselves with looking to his custody; that by such a course every one should be engaged in the present Action, as having none other hope left, than in victory alone; finally, that such as would speak here against, were worthy to be reputed Traitors. This Autarim was in great credit with the Souldiers, and could speak sundry languages, in such sort, that he was understood by all. According to his motion therefore it was agreed, that Gesco, and all the other prisoners, should forthwith by put to horrible death, by torments. Nevertheless there were some, that for love of Gesco sought to alter his intended cruelty; but they were forthwith stoned to death, as a Document unto others; and so the Decree was put in execution. Neither were they therewith all contented, but further ordained, that all Carthaginian prisoners which they tooke, should be served in like sort: and that the subjects or friends of Carthage, should lose their hands, and so be sent home: which rule they observed ever afterwards.

Of this cruelty I need say no more, than that it was most execrable feritie. As for the counsell of using it, it was like unto the counsell of Achitophel; All Israel shall heare, that thou art abhorred of thy father; then shall the hands of all that are with thee be strong. Such are the fruits of desperation. He that is past all hope of pardon, is afraid of his owne fellowes, if they be more innocent; and to avoid the punishment of lesse offences, committeth greater. The cowardize of offenders, and the revengfull spirits of those that have been wronged, are breeders of this desperation: to which may be added some deficiency of Lawes, in distinguishing the punishments of malefactors, according to the decree of their severall crimes. A coward thinks all provision too little for his owne securitie. If Phocas be a coward (said the Emperour Mauritius) then he be murderous. To be steadfast and sure, in taking revenge, is thought a point of honour, and a defensive against new injuries. But wrongfully: for it is opposite to the rule of Christianitie; and such a quality discovered, makes them deadly enemies, who otherwise wife would have repented, and sought to make amends, for the wrong done in passion. This was it which wrought so much woe to the Carthaginians; teaching Matho, and his Africans, to suspect even their gentleness, as the introduction to extreme rigour. Like unto the errors of Princes and Governors, are the errors of Lawes. Where one and the same punishment is awarded unto the lesse offence, and unto the greater, he that hath adventured to rob a man, is easily tempted to kill him, for his own securitie.

Against these inconveniences, Mercie and severitie, used with due respect, are the best remedies. In neither of which Amilcar failed. For as long as these his own souldiers were any way likely to be reclaimed by gentle courses, his humanity was ready to invite them. But when they were transported with beastly outrage, beyond all regard of honesty and shame, he rewarded their villanie with answerable vengeance, casting them unto wild beasts to be devoured.

Untill this time Hanno, with the Armie under his command, had kept himselfe apart from Amilcar, and done little as may seem, for that nothing is remembred of him since his late losses. Neither was Amilcar sorry to want his helpe; as being able to doe better without him. But when the war grew to such extremity, as threatened utter ruine to the one or the other side, then was Hanno sent for, and came to Amilcar, with whom he joynd his forces. By this access of strength Amilcar was not enabled to doe more than in former times; rather he could now perform nothing: such was the hatred between him and his unworthy Colleague. The Towns of Utica and Hippagreta, that had stood always firm on the Carthaginians partie, did now revolt unto the enemy, murdering all the Souldiers that they had in Garrison, and casting their bodies forth, without suffering them to be buried. The provisions brought by sea, for maintenance of the Armie, were lost in foule weather; and Carthage it selfe stood in danger of being besieged, about which Matho and Spendius consulted, whilst one of the Carthaginian Generals did (as it were) bind the others hands.

It hath in all Ages been used as the safest course, to send forth, in great Expeditions, two Generals of one Armie. This was the common practice of those two mighty Cities Athens and Rome, which other States and Princes have often imitated; perswading themselves, that great Armies are not so well conducted by one, as by two: who out of emulation to excell each other, will use the greater diligence. They have also joynd two chiefe Commanders in equal commission, upon this further consideration; the better to restrain the ambition of any one, that should be trusted with so great a strength. For hereof all Common-weals have been jealous, having been taught by their examples that have made themselves Tyrants over those Cities and States that have employed them. In this point the Venetians have bin so circumspect, as they have, for the most part, trusted strangers, and not their own, in all the wars which they have made. It is true, that the equal authority of two commanding in chiefe, serveth well to bridle the ambition of one or both, from turning upon the Prince or State that hath given them trust: but in managing the war it selfe, it is commonly the cause of ill successe. In wars made near unto Rome it selfe, when two good friends were Consuls, or such two at least, as concurred in one desire of Triumph, which honour (the greatest of any that Rome could give) was to be obtained by that one years service; it is no marvell, though each of the Consuls did his best, and referred all his thoughts unto none other end than victory. Yet in all dangerous cases, when the Consuls proceeded otherwise than was desired, one Dictator was appointed, whose power was neither hindered by any partner, nor by any great limitation. Neither was it indeed the manner, to send forth both the Consuls to one war; but each went whither his lot called him, to his owne Province; unless one business seemed to require them both, and they also seemed fit to be joynd in the administration. Now although it was so, that the Romans did many times prevail with their joynt Generals: yet was this never or seldom, without as much concord, as any other vertue of the Commanders. For their modesty hath often been such, that the lesse able Captaine, though of equall authoritie, hath willingly submitted himselfe to the other, and obeyed his directions. This notwithstanding, they have many times, by ordaining two Commanders of one Armie, received great and most dangerous overthrowes; whereof in the second Punicke warre we shall finde examples. On the contrary side, in their warres most remote, that were always managed by one, they seldom failed failed to win exceeding honour, as hereafter shall appeare. Now of those ten Generals, which served the Athenians at the Battell of Marathon, it may truly be said, that had not their temper bene better, than the judgement of the people that sent them forth, and had not they submitted themselves to the conduction of Miltiades; their affaires had found the same successe which they found at other times, when they coupled Nicias and Alcibiades together in Sicil: the one being so over-waie, and the other so hasty, as all came to nought that they undertook: whereas Cimon alone, as also Aristides, and others, having sole charge of all, did their Countre and Common-weale most remarkable service. For it is hard to finde two great Captaines of equall discretion and valour; but that the one hath more of fury than of judgement, and so the contrary, by which the best occasions are as often over-slipt, as at other times many actions are unreasonably undertaken. I remember it well, that when the Prince of Condé was slain after the Battell of Jarnac; (which Prince, together with the Admiral Chastillon, had the conduct of the Protestant Armie) the Protestants did greatly bewaile the losse of the said Prince, in respect of his Religion, person, and birth; yet comforting themselves, they thought it rather an advancement, than an hinderance to their affaires. For so much did the valour of the one out-reach the advisednesse of the other, as whatsoever the Admirall intended to win by attending the advantage, the Prince adventured to lose, by being over-confident in his own courage.

But we need no better example, than of the Carthaginians in this present businesse: who, though they were still sicke of their ill grounded love to Hanno and were unwilling to disgrace him; yet seeing that all ran towards ruine, through the discord of the Generals, committed the decision of their controversies, unto the Armie that served under them. The judgement of the Armie was, that Hanno should depart the Camp: which he did, and Hannibal was sent in his stead, one that would be directed by Amilcar, and that was enough.

After this, the affaires of Carthage began to prosper somewhat better. Matho and Spendius had brought their Armie neere unto the Citie; and lay before it, as in a siege. They might well be bold to hope and adventure much; having in their Campe above fifty thousand, besides those that lay abroad in Garrisons. Nevertheless, the Citie was too strong for them to win by assault: and the entrance of victuals they could not hinder, if any should be sent in by friends from abroad.

Hieron, King of Syracuse, though during the warres in Sicil he assisted the Romans, and still continued in their alliance, yet now sent succours to the Carthaginians: fearing their fall, and consequently his owne; because if no other State gave the Romans somewhat to trouble their digestion, the Principalltie of Syracuse would soon be devoured by them. The Romans also gave them some slender assistance, and, for the present, refused good offers made unto them by the Mercenaries. This they did, to shew a kind of noble disposition; which was indeed but counterfeite, as the sequell manifestly proved.

Whilest Matho and his followers were busily pressing the Citie, Amilcar was as diligent in waiting at their backs, and cutting off all that came to their supply: so that finding themselves more streightly besieged by him, than Carthage was by them, they purposed to desist from their vaine attempt, and try some other course. Hereupon they issued into the field: when Spendius, and one Zarcas an African Captaine assisting the rebellion, take upon them to finde Amilcar worke; leaving Matho in Tunis, to negotiate with their friends, and take a generall care of the businesse. The Elephants of Carthage, and horse of Naracasus, made Spendius fearefull to descend into the Plaines. Wherefore he betooke himselfe to his former method of warre, keeping the mountaines and rough grounds, or occupying the freightest passages, wherein the desperate courage of his men might shew it self, with little disadvantage. But Amilcar had more skill in this Art, than could be matched by the labour of Spendius. He drew the enemy to many skirmishes; in all which the successe was such, as added courage to his owne men, and abated the strength and spirit of the Rebels. Thus he continued, provoking them night and day: still intrapping some of them, and sometimes giving them the overthrow in plaine battell: untill at length he got them into a streight, whence ere they should get out, he meant to take of them a good account. Their judgement was enough to perceive their owne disadvantage; and therefore they had the lesse stomack to fight fight; but a waiting for helpe from Tunis. Amilcar prudently foreseeing, that necessity might teach them to dare impossibilities, used the benefit of their present feare, & shute them close up with Trench and Rampart. There they waited miserably for succour, that fed upon the bodics of their prisoners. This they suffered patiently, knowing that they had not deserved any favour from Carthage: and hoping, that their friends at Tunis they were faine to devour their own companions, and yet saw none appearance, or likelihood of reliefe: their obstinacie was broken, and they threatened their Captains with what they deserved, unlesse they would goe forth to Amilcar, and seeke such peace as might be gotten. So Spendius, Zarcas, and Autaritus, fell to consultation, wherein it was resolved to obey the multitude, and yeeld themselves, if it were so required, unto the death, rather than perish by the hands of their owne Companions. Hereupon they sent to crave parlie, which is granted; and these three come forth to talke with Amilcar in person. What they could say unto him, it is hard to conjecture: yet by the conditions which Amilcar granted, it seemes that they tooke the blame upon themselves, and chose pardon for the multitude. The conditions were, that the Carthaginians should choose, out of the whole number of these enemies, any ten whom they pleased, to remaine at their discretion; and that the rest should all be dismissed, each in his shirt, or in one single coate. When the peace was thus concluded; Amilcar told these Ringleaders, that he chose them presently, as part of the ten, & so commanded to lay hands on them: the rest he forthwith went to fetch with his whole Army in order. The Rebels, who knew not that peace was concluded upon so gentle articles, thought themselves betrayed: and therefore amazedly ran to armes. But they wanted Captaines to order them; and the same astonishment, that made them breake the Covenants of peace, whereof they were ignorant, gave unto Amilcar both colour of justice, in accomplishing revenge, and ease in doing the execution. They were all slain: being forty thousand, or more, in number.

This was a famous exploit: and the newes thereof exceeding welcome to Carthage; and terrible to the revolted Cities of Africk. Henceforward Amilcar, with his Naracasus, and Hannibal, carried the warre from Towne to Towne, and found all places ready to yeeld: Asia, and Hippagretia onely standing out, upon feare of deserved vengeance; & Tunis, being held by Matho, with the remainder of his Army. It was thought fit to begin with Tunis, wherein lay the chiefe strength of the enemy. Comming before this Towne, they brought forth Spendius, with his fellows, in view of the defendants, and crucified them under the walls; to terrifie those of his old companions, that were still in armes. With this rigour the siege began; as if speedy victory had been assured. Hannibal quartered on that part of Tunis, which lay towards Carthage; Amilcar on the opposite side: too far asunder to helpe one another in sudden accidents; and therefore it behooved each to be the more circumspect.

Matho from the walls beheld his owne destiny, in the misery of his companion, and knew not how to avoide it otherwise than by a cast at dice with fortune. So hee brake out upon that part of the Carthaginian Army, that lay secure, as if all danger were past, under the command of Hannibal: and with so great and unexpected fury hee sallied, that after an exceeding slaughter, he tooke Hannibal prisoner; on whom, and thirty the most noble of the Carthaginian prisoners, he presently revenged the death of Spendius by the same torture. Of this Amilcar knew nothing, till it was too late; neither had he strength enough remaining, after this great losse, to continue the siege; but was faine to breake it off, and remove unto the mouth of the River Aggradas, where he incamped.

The terror was no lesse within Carthage, upon the fame of this losse, than had bene the joy of the late great victory. All that could beare armes, were sent into the field, under Hanno; whom, it seemes, they thought the most able of their Captaines surviving the late accidents of Warre. If there were any Law among them forbidding the employment of one sole Generall neere unto their Citie (for they are knowne to have trusted one man abroad) the time did not permit, in this hasty exigent, to devise about recalling it. But thirty principall men are chosen by the Senate, to bring Hanno to Amilcar's Camp, and by all good perswasions to reconcile them. This could not be effected in one day. It neerly touched Amilcar in his honour, that the carelesnesse of Hannibal seemed to be imputed unto him, by sending his enemy to moderate his proceedings. Nevertheless after many conferences, the authority of the Senators prevailed; Amilcar & Hanno were made friends; and thenceforth, whilst this warre lasted, Hanno took warning by Hannibals calamities, to follow good directions, though afterwards he returned to his old and deadly hatred.

In the meane season Matho was come abroad, as meaning to use the reputation of his late success, whilst it gave some life unto his business. He had reason to doe as he did: but he wanted skill to deale with Amilcar. The skirmishes, and light exercises of warre, wherein Amilcar trained his Carthaginians, did so farre abate the strength, and withall diminish the credit of Matho; that he resolved to try the fortune of one battaile: wherein either his owne desire should be accomplished, or his cares ended. To this conclusion the Carthaginians were no lesse prone, than Matho: as being weary of these long troubles, and insupportable expences; confident in the valour of their owne men, which had approved it selfe in many trials; and well assured of Amilcar his great worth, whereunto the enemy hath not what to oppose. According to this determination, each part was diligent in making provision: inviting their friends to helpe; and drawing forth into the field, all that lay in Garrison.

The issue of this battaile might have beene foretold, without helpe of witchcraft. Matho, and his followers, had nothing whereon to presume, save their daring spirits, which had bin well cooled by the many late skirmishes, wherein they had learned how to run away. The Carthaginians had reason to dare, as having been often victorious: and in all points else they had the better of their enemies; especially (which is worth all the rest) they had such a Commander, as was not easily to be matched in that Age. Neither was it likely that the desire of liberty should worke so much, in men accustomed to servitude; as the honour of their State would, in citizens, whose future & present good lay all at once engaged in that adventure. So the Carthaginians won a great victory, wherein most of the Africans their enemies were slain; the rest fled into a Town, which was not to be defended, & therefore they all yielded; and Matho himselfe was taken alive. Immediately upon this victory, all the Africans that had rebelled, made submission to their old masters: Utica only, and Hippagreta stood out, as knowing how little they deserved of favour. But they were soone forced, to take what conditions best pleased the victors. Matho and his fellows were led to Carthage in triumph; where they suffered all torments that could be devised, in recompence of the mischiefs which they had wrought in this war. The warre had lasted three yeares, and about foure moneths, when it came to this good end: which the Carthaginians, whose subjects did not love them, should with lesse expence, by contenting their Mercenaries, have prevented in the beginning.

§. IIII.

How the Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, that were in Sardinia, rebelled: and were afterwards driven out by the Ilanders. The faithlesse dealing of the Romans with the Carthaginians, in taking from them Sardinia, contrary to the peace.

WHilst Matho and Spendius were making terrible combustion in Africke; other Mercenaries of the Carthaginians had kindled the like fire in Sardinia: where murdering Bastar the Governour, & other Carthaginians, they were in hope to get, & hold that Iland to their own use. Against these, one Hanno was sent with a small Army (such as could bee spared in that busie time) consisting likewise of Mercenaries, levied on the sudden. But these companions that followed Hanno, finding it more for their safety, & present profit to joyn themselves with those that were already revolted, than to indanger themselves by battaile, for the good of that common weale, of which they had no care; began to enter into practice with the Sardinian Rebels; offering to runne one course of fortune with them in their enterprise. This their offer was kindly taken; but their faith was suspected. Wherefore, to take away all jealousy and distrust, they resolved to hang up their Commander Hanno, and performed it. A common practice it hath beene in all Ages, with those that have undertaken the quarrell of an unjust warre, to enioyne the performance of some notorious and villainous act to those that come in to them as seconds, with offer to partake, and to assist the impious purposes which they have in hand. It is indeede the best pawne, that desperate men can deliver to each other, to performe some such actions, as are equally unpardonable to all.

By such a kinde of cruelty did the ungratefull Mantineans murder a Garrison of Achians, sent unto them for their defence against the Lacedamonians, by Aratus, who, ly spare the sacke and spoile thereof, but gave them equall freedome, with the rest of the Cities united. These Revolts are also common in our Court wars; where, in the conquests of new fortunes, and making of new parties, and factions, without the demies, C'est ont les coups de vieille escrime. These, (say the French) be the blowes of the old art of fencing.

These Mercenaries in Sardinia were no whit lesse violent in their purpose, than were Spendius, and his associates: only they wanted a Matho among them, to negotiate with the inhabitants of the Province. The Ilanders were no lesse glad, than the souldiers, that the Carthaginians were expelled the Countrey: but they could not agree about the profits of the victory. The Sardinians thought that it was enough, if they rewarded the souldiers for their paines taken. Contrariwise, the souldiers were of opinion, that the title of the Carthaginians to that Ile, was devolved unto themselves, by right of conquest. The same quarrell would (in likelihood) have risen, between Spendius with this Mercenaries, & their African friends; if the common desire of both had once taken effect: unlesse the riches of Carthage had served to content them all. But in Sardinia, where there was none other valuable reward, than possession and rule of the Countrey; the matter was not easily taken up. So they fell to blowes; which how they were delt, I know not; but finally, the Mercenaries were driven out, and compelled to save themselves in Italy. Before their departure out of Sardinia, they had invited the Romans into it, with as good right, as the Mamertines had called them into Sicily. Yet this offer was refused, upon reasons that follow.

Some Italian Merchants had relieved Matho and Spendius with corrie: of whom the Carthaginians tooke almost five hundred, and held them in prison. Hereof was made a great complaint: so that the Romans sent Embassadors to Carthage, requiring satisfaction. It was no time for the Carthaginians to dispute: they quietly yielded to release them all. This was so kindly taken, that they forbad all their Merchants, to trade thenceforth with the Rebels; admonishing them to carry all provisions to Carthage. And upon the same reason, did they forbear to meddle with Sardinia, or to accept the Citie of Utica, offering it selfe unto their subjection. This might have served, as a notable example of the Roman faith, to all posterity: had not the issue proved, that it was meere regard of greater profit, which kept them so temperate; no longer than the hope lasted of thriving better thereby, than they should have done by open breach of faith. The whole estate of Carthage depended at that time, upon the vertue of Amilcar: who, had beene overthrowne by Spendius or Matho, in one maine battaile, that mighty City must either have fallen into the barbarous hands of mercilesse villaines, or have humbled her selfe under protection of the Romans, with whom she had lately striven for superiority. That extreme necessity, wherein Matho reduced the City, by the fortune of one fallie made out of Tunis, is enough to prove, that Carthage was not farre from such a miserable choice. Wherefore it was not unwilfully done of the Romans, to make such demonstration of kindnesse, and honourable dealing, as might invite a rich, but sinking ship, to runne her selfe aground upon their shore. But when all was well ended in Africke, and the Carthaginians began to prepare for the recovery of Sardinia: then did Ambition put off her goodly vizour. The Romans perceiving that Carthage, beyond their hope, had recovered her feet againe; began to strike at her head. They denouneed warre against this enfeebled and impoverished City, under a shamelesse pretence, that the preparations made for Sardinia, were made indeede against Rome it selfe. The Carthaginians knew themselves unable to resist; and therefore yielded to the Romans demand; renouncing unto them all their right in Sardinia. But this was not enough. They would have twelve hundred talents, in recompence belike (for I see not what reason they could alledge) of the great feare which they had endured, of an invasion from Carthage. It is indeede plaine, that they impudently sought occasion of warre. But necessity taught the Carthaginians patience; and the mony was payed, how hardly soever it was raised. From this time forward, let not Rome complain of the Punic faith, in breach of Covenants: she her selfe hath broken the peace already, which Amilcar pupposeth to make her deeply repent; but what Amilcar lives not to performe, shall be accomplished by Hannibal his renowned sonne.

§. V.

How the affaires of Carthage went betwene the African Rebellion, and the second Punicke Warre.

THe injurious dealing of the Romans, expressing their desire to pick a quarrell, served to instruct the Carthaginians in a necessarie lesson: That either they must make themselves the stronger, or else resolve to be obedient unto those that were more mighty. In a City long accustomed to rule, the braver determination easily tooke place: and the best meanes were thought upon, for the increase of puissance and Empire. The strength, and the jealousie of the Romans, forbad all attempts upon the Meditteran Seas; but the riches of Spain, that lay upon the Ocean, were unknown to Rome: wherefore that Province might serve, both to exercise the Carthaginians in war, and to repaire their decayed forces, with all needfull supplies. Of the Spanish Expedition, the charge and soveraigne trust was committed unto Amilcar: upon whom his Country did wholly repose it selfe; in hope to recover strength by his means, that had saved it from ruine.

Hanno, with some other envious men that were of his faction, tooke little pleasure in the generall love and honour, which daily increased towards Amilcar and his friends. Yet could they not denie him to be the most worthy of command in all the City: onely they commended peace and quietnesse; advising men to beware of provoking the Romans, in whose amity they said, that the felicity of Carthage did consist. By such discourses, harsh to the eares of good Citizens, who had feeling of the wrong done to their Common-weale; they got none other reputation, than of singularity: which the ignorant sort suspected to be wisdom.

But the glory of Amilcar was continually upheld & enlarged, by many notable services that he did, to the singular benefit of his Country. He passed the streights of Hercules, (now called the streights of Gibraltar) and landed on the western coasts of Spain; in which Country, during nine yeeres that he lived there, he subjected unto the State of Carthage the better part of all those Provinces. But finally, in a battaile that he fought with a Nation in Portugale, called the Vetones, (defending himselfe a long time with an admirable resolution) he was invironed and slaine: carrying with him to the grave the same great honour and fame, by which in many signall victories, he had acquired the name of a second Mars.

After the death of Amilcar, Asdrubal his son in law was made Generall of the Carthaginian forces in Spain. This was a good man of warre; but farre better in practice and cunning than in deeds of armes. By his notable dexterity in matter of negotiation, he greatly enlarged the Dominion of Carthage: adding so many Subjects and confederates thereunto, that the Romans began to grow jealous againe of this haile increase. He built a goodly Citie, upon a commodious Haven, in the Kingdome of Granado, opposite to that of Oran in Africa, & gave it the name of New Carthage, which to this day is neerly remaineth, being called now Carthagena. With this successe of the Carthaginians in Spain, the Romans were not a little troubled; but began to accuse their own negligence. For whereas they had formerly taken so much paines to beate them out of the Ile of Sicily, as suspecting their neighbourhood there; they had now, by cumbering themselves in a warre of farre lesse importance, (whereof I shall speake anon) given them leisure, without interruption, to recover upon their owne Continent, a Dominion by far exceeding, both in the bodies of men and in revenue, that which the Romans had taken from them. But how to helpe this, at the present they knew not; for they daily expected to be invaded by the Gauls, their ancient enemies, and neerest neighbours to the West. But he needeth little helpe of force, that knoweth himselfe to be feared: it is enough if he request, since his request shall have the vertue of a command.

Yet were the Romans utterly destitute of all good colour, that might helpe them to intermeddle in Spain. The Spaniards were then unacquainted with Rome, whereof (in probability) they scarce had heard the name: so that there were no Mamertines, nor other such Rebels, to call in Roman succours. But in the enterprize of Sardinia, the Romans had learned an impudent pretence, that might also serve their turne in Spain. For though it were apparent, that the Spanish affaires had no relation to the peace between these two Cities; and though it were nothing likely, that Asdrubal had any purpose, to extend his victories unto the gates of Rome, or to any of the Roman frontiers: yet (as if some such matter had bin suspected) they sent unto him, requiring that he should forbear to proceede any further, than to the River of Iberus. In addressing their messengers, rather to Asdrubal, than to the City of Carthage; they seeme to have hoped, that howsoever the generalltie of the Carthaginians had sweetly swallowed many bitter pilles, to avoid all occasion of warre with Rome, yet the bravery of one man might prove more sitidious, and presenting the injurie, returne such answer, as would intangle his whole Countie in the quarrell, that they so much desired; and might embrace at leisure, when once they had found apparent cause. But Asdrubal finely deluded their expectation. He pretended no manner of dislike at all: and whereas they would have this insolent covenant inserted into the Articles of peace; he tooke upon him to doe it, of his own power, with such appearance of conformity to their will, that they went their wayes contented, and sought no further.

If it had been so, that the State of Carthage, thereunto pressed by the Romans, for feare of present warre, had ratified this new composition made by Asdrubal; yet should it not have stood bound in honour, to observe the same carefully, unlesse an oath had also bin extorted, to make all sure. But since all passed quietly, under the bare authority of Asdrubal, this Capitulation was none other in effect than a second breach of peace; whereof the Romans might be accused more justly, than they could accuse the Carthaginians of perjury, (as they after did) for refusing to stand to it.

By this Treaty with Asdrubal, the Romans won some reputation in Spain. For when it was once conceived by the Spaniards, that the Citie which would neede be mistress over them, stood in feare her selfe, of receiving blows from a stouter Dame; there were some found some, that by offering themselves to the protection of Rome, became (as they thought) fellow-servants with Carthage. But the Carthaginians will shortly teach them another lesson. The Saguntines, a people on the South-side of Iberus, entred into confederacie with the Romans, and were gladly accepted. Surely it was lawfull unto the Romans, to admit the Saguntines, or any other people (neither subject, nor open enemy in war to the Carthaginians) into their society: & unlawfull it was unto the Carthaginians, to use violence towards any that should thus once become confederate with Rome. Nevertheless, if we consider the late agreement made with Asdrubal, we shall find that the Romans could have none other honest color of requiring it, than an implicit covenant of making the River Iberus a bound, over which they themselves would not passe, in any Discovery or Conquest by them intended to be made upon Spain: in which regard, they might have some honest pretence to require the like of the Carthaginians; though Rome as yet had no foot, on the one side of Iberus, whereas Carthage, on the other side of that River, held almost all the Countie. Howsoever it were, this indignity was not so easily digested, as former injuries had beene. For it was a matter of ill consequence, that the Nations which had heard of no greater power than the Carthaginian, should behold Saguntum resting securely among them, upon confidence of help from a more mighty Citie. Wherefore either in this respect, or for that the sense is most feeling of the latest injuries, or rather for that now the Carthaginians were of power to doe themselves right: war against Saguntum was generally thought upon, let the Romans take it how they list. In such termes were the Carthaginians, when Asdrubal died, after he had commanded in Spain eight yeares: (being slaine by a slave, whose master he had put to death) and the Great Hannibal, sonne of the Great Amilcar, was chosen Generall in his stead.

* The Spaniards have since built a Citie of the same name in the West Indies: which being peopled by them in the yeere 1533, was taken by the English in the yeere 1585.

The estate of Greece from the death of Pyrrhus, to the reign of Philip the sonne of Demetrius in Macedon.

IN the long terme of the first Runic war; and the vacation following, betwene it & the second; the citie of Greece, after the death of Pyrrhus, was grown somewhat like unto that, wherein Philip of Macedon had found it; though farre weaker, as in an after-spring. The whole Country had recovered by degrees, a forme of liberty: the petty tyrannies (bred of those inferiour Capitaines, which in the times of generall combustion, had seised each upon such townes as he could get) were, by force or accident, extirpated, & reformed; and some States were risen to such greatnesse, as not only served to protect themselves, but to give protection to others. This conversion to the better, proceeded from the like diffinitions and tumults in Macedon, as had bin in Greece, when Philip first began to encroach upon it. For after many quarrels & great wars, about the Kingdom of Macedon, between Antigonus the elder, Cassander, Demetrius, Lyfimachus, Sedomeus, Pyrrhus, & the Gauls: Antigonus, the sonne of Demetrius, finally got and held it, reigning fixe and thirty yeares; yet so, that he was divers times thence expelled, not only by the Gauls, & by Pyrrhus, as hath bin already shewed, but by Alexander the son of Pyrrhus the Epirot, from whose father he had hardly won it. This happened unto him, by the revolt of his souldiers, even at such time, as having overthrowne with great slaughter an Army of the Gauls, hee was converting his forces against the Athenians, whom he compelled to receive his Garrisons. But his young sonne Demetrius raised an Army, wherewith he chased Alexander, not only out of Macedon, but out of his own Epirot, and restored his father to the Kingdom.

By the help of this young Prince Demetrius (though in another kind) Antigonus got into his possession the Citadell of Corinth; which was justly termed the fever of Greece. The Citadell called Acrocorinthus, stood upon a steepe rockie hill on the North side of the towne, and was by nature and art so strong, that it seemed impregnable. It commanded the towne; which was of much importance, as occupying the whole breadth of the Isthmus, that running between the Aegean and Ionique Seas, joyneth Peloponnesus to the maine of Greece. Wherefore he that held possession of this Castle, was able to cutt off all passage by land, from one halfe of Greece unto the other; besides the commoditie of the two Seas, upon both of which, this rich and goodly City had commodious havens. Alexander, the son of Polyperchon; and after his death, Craefopolis his wife, had gotten Corinth in the great shuffling of Provinces and Townes, that was made betwene Alexanders Princes. Afterwards it passed from hand to hand, until it came, I know not how, to one Alexander; of whom I finde nothing else, than that he was thought to be poisoned by this Antigonus, who deceived his wife Nicea thereof, and got it from her by artifice. The device was this. Antigonus sent his yong Demetrius to Corinth, willing him to court Nicea, and seeke her marriage. The foolish old widow perceived not how unfit a match she was for the yong Prince, but entertain'd the fancy of marriage; whereunto the old King was even as ready, to consent as was his sonne to desire, and came thither in person to solemnize it. Hereupon all Corinth was filled with sacrifices, feasts, plaies, and all sorts of games: in the midst of which, Antigonus watched his time, and got into the Castle, beguiling the poore Lady, whose jealousie had bin exceeding diligent in keeping it. Of this purchase he was so glad, that he could not containe himselfe within the gravity becoming his old age. But as he had stolen it; so was it againe stolen from him: neither lived he to revenge the losse of it, being already spent with age.

Demetrius, the son of this Antigonos, succeeding unto his father, reigned ten yeeres. He made greater proofe of his vertue before he was King, than after. The Dardanians, Ætolians and Atheans, held him continually buied in war; wherein his fortune was variable, and for the more part ill. About the fift times the power of the Macedonians began to decay: and the Greecians to cast off their yoke.

Prince;

Prince; but he assumed the name and power of a King, though he respected Philop as his own sonne, to whom hee left the Crowne at his death; This Antigonus was called the Tutor, in regard of his protectorship; and was also called Dolon, that is as much as, will-give, because he was slow in his liberality. Hee repressed the Dardanians & Thessalians, which molested his Kingdome, in the beginning of his reigne. Upon confidence of this good service, he took fast upon him, as one that rather were King in his own right, than onely a Protector. Hereupon the people fell to mutinie; but were soone appeased by faire words, and a seeming unwillingnesse of his to meddle any more with the Government. The Achaians tooke from him the city of Athens, soon after Demetrius his death; and likely they were to have wrought him out of all, or most that he held in Greece; if their own estate had not bin endangered by a neerer enemy. But civill dissention, which had overthrowne the power of Greece, when it flourished most; overthrow it easily now againe, when it had scarcely recovered strength after a long sicknesse; and gave to this Antigonus no lesse authority therein, than Philop the father of Alexander, got by the like advantage.

These Achaians from small beginnings, had increased in short time to great strength and fame: so that they grew the most redoubted Nation of all the Greeks. By the equality of their Laws, and by their clemency (notwithstanding that they were a long time held under by the Macedonians and Spartans) they did not only draw all others by their love and alliance, but induced, through their example, the rest of the Citizens of Peloponnesus to be governed by one Law, and to use one and the same sort of weights, measure, and money.

Aratus, the Sicyonian, was the first that united them againe; and gave them courage, after that they had bin by the Macedonian Captains divided into many Principalities. In elder times they were governed by Kings, as most of the great Cities of Greece were; to which kinde of rule they first subjected themselves, after the descent of the Heraclidae, when Tifameneus the son of Orestes posselt the Territory of Achaia. In this estate the continued to the time of Gyges; after whom, when his sons sought to change the Legal government of their Predecessors into Tyrannie, they expelled them, and made their State popular; as seeming most equall. This forme of Common-weale had continuance, with some small changes according to the diversity of times, till the reign of Philip and Alexander Kings of Macedon; who tempest-like overturned all things in that part of the world. For those twelve Cities, call'd the Cities of Alliance, whereof Helice, and Bura or Olenus, the Sea had eaten up a little before the Battaille of Leuctres; were, by disturbance of the Macedonians, divided from each other, and trained into a war, no lesse foolish than cruell, among themselves. But in the one hundred and foure and twentieth Olympiad, in which, or neere it, Ptolomy the son of Lagus, Lysimachus, Seleucus, and Prothomy Ceraunus, left the world; two of ten remaining Cities and people, namely, the Patresnes and the Dimeis, united themselves, and laid the foundation of that generall accord, and re-union, which after followed. For having been, some of them Patresnes with sundrie Macedonian Captains, and others having bin governed by petty Kings; they began to fasten themselves in a strong league of amitie, partly, in the Olympiad before spoken of, and partly at such time as Pirryhus made his first voyage into Italy. Now after the uniting of the Patresnes and Dimeis, to whom also the Cities of Titreus, and Phara, joynd themselves; Agira chased out her Garrisons: and the Burians, killing their Kings, entred with the Ceraunians into the same Contederacie. These Cities, for twenty and five yeares, used the same forme of Government with the Achaians; who by a Senatory and two Prætors, ordered all things in their Common-weale; and soone after, by one Prætor, or Commander: of which, Marcus Carynenfis was the first, and Aratus the second.

This Aratus was a noble young Gentleman of Sicyon, who living at Argos in exile, whilst his Countrie was oppressed by Tyrants, found means, through the helpe of other banished men, to enter their own Citie by night, with ladders; whence they chafed the Tyrant, and restored the people to liberty. This was in the time of Antigonus Gonatas King of Macedon, a Prince more busie in watching what to get among the Greeks, than wife in looking to his owne. For feare of Antigonus, the Sicyonians enter into the Achaian league: which though at that time it received more increase by their accession than it added strength to them; yet the benefit of this conjunction served well enough against an Armie, had carried away fifty thousand slaves; and, which was worse, their discipline was corrupted, Avarice & Luxury reigned among them, the poore were oppressed by the rich, and the generosity of spirit, that had sometime bin their generall vertue, was hardly now to be found among the best of them. There were left in Sparta no more than seven hundred naturall Citizens; of whom not above one hundred had Lands all the rest were needie people, and desirous of innovation. Hereupon followed intestine sedition; which endangered the City most of all. Agis a good King, who sought to reforme on; which endangered the City most of all. Agis a good King, who sought to reforme the disorders of the State, exhorted the people to a strict observation of Lycurgus his laws. To which purpose he caused them to passe an Act, for the abolishing of all debts, and equall division of Lands. All the younger, and poorer sort were glad of this: but the rich men opposed it. These had recourse unto Leonidas the other King, (for in Sparta were two Kings) who tooke their part: being himselfe a dissolute man, as one trained up in the Court of Syria, whence also he had his wife. In this contention Leonidas was expelled the Citie, and a new King chosen in his stead. But Agis his friends & Counsaillers in this enterprise, abused his good meaning to their owne private commodity. They were hasty to take away all debts, and cancell all bonds, for they themselves were deeply indebted: but the division of lands they afterwards hindred, because their owne possessions were great. Hence arose a tumult in Sparta, which these men increased by their foule oppression of the poorer Citizens. So that in fine, Leonidas was brought home, and restored to his Kingdome, and the two adverse Kings drivento take Sanctuary; out of which, Cleombrotus, the late-made King, was dismissed into exile: but Agis was trained forth, drawn into prison, and there by his enemies condemned and strangled, together with his Mother, and his old Grand-mother. The like to this was never known in Sparta: and (which is the more odious) this cruelty proceeded from the Ephori, Magistrates that should have given Patronage to the laws, using their power, and more power than to them belonged, against a King, that had proceeded orderly in reforming the City, as the law required.

The death of Agis was much lamented by all good Citizens; and served to establish the impotent rule of a few tyrannicall oppressors. In which case Aratus might well hope to adjoine Lacedemon to the Achaens Common-wealth: though it were great injustice, to take such advantages, and attempt by force, that which would have redounded to the generall good of Peloponnesus, and to the benefit of Sparta it selfe, if it could have bin wrought by perswasion.

But, the same man who redressed the disorders of Sparta, and revenged the death of Agis, did also requite the unjust attempts of the Achaens, even in their own kinde: obtruding upon them by force an union of all Peloponnesus, though little to their good liking, for that the Lacedemonians and their King, should have bin the principall; not they and their Prætor. Leonidas having thus caused Agis to be slaine, tooke his wife that was very rich and beautiful, and gave her in marriage (perforce) to his owne son Cleomenes. This young Prince fell greatly enamoured on his wife, and sought to win her affection, as well as he had her person. Hee discoursed much with her about the purpose of her former husband Agis, and by pitying his misfortune, began to entertaine a desire of accomplishing that, wherein Agis had failed. So comming himselfe to be King, whilst hee was very young, he gladly embraced all occasions of Warre: for that he hoped by strong hand to effect that, which Agis by proceeding formally, in so corrupt an estate of the City, had attempted to his own ruine. Therefore when the Ephori gave him in charge, to take and fortifie Athenæum, a Temple on the marches of Laconia, to which both they and the Megalopolitans pretended title; he readily performed it. Hereof Aratus made no complaint, but sought to take by surprize Tegæa & Orchomenus, Cities then confederate with the Lacedemonians: wherein, his intelligence failing, he lost the labor of a painful nights travel, & discovered his enmity to Sparta, of which Cleomenes was nothing forrie. By these degrees the war began. In the entrance whereto Aratus had discovered the Ætolian practice, and therefore would have staid the quarrell from proceeding too far. But Lyfias and Aristomachus would needs fight, and he could doe none other than be ruled by them; especially seeing Cleomenes was so urgent. Aristomachus was at that time Generall of the Achaens, (He and Lyfias being of great account, since they had abandoned their tyrannie) who sent unto Aratus, lying then in Athens, and required his assistance in a journey to be made into Laconia. No dissuasions of Aratus would serve therefore he came in person, and tooke part of a businesse, little pleasing him in the present, and lesse in the future. When he met with Cleomenes, he durst not fight; but opposed himselfe against Aristomachus, who desired to give battaile. Yet had the Achaens twenty thousand foot, and one thousand horse, in their Army: whereas Cleomenes had no more than five thousand in all. This gave reputation to the Lacedemonian, and raised an ill report upon Aratus; which Lyfias helped to make worse, by accusing his cowardize. Nevertheless the Achaens would not fall out with Aratus their Benefactor, but chose him their Generall the yeare following, against Lyfias his accuser that sued for the place. Being Generall himselfe, it behooved him to confute, with deeds, the slanderous words of Lyfias. Therefore he purposed to set upon the Æleans: but was met withall on the way, neere unto the Mount Lycaeus, by Cleomenes, who vanquished him in a great battaile, and drave him to hide himselfe all night for feare, so that he was thought to have bin slaine. This misadventure Aratus recompensed by a trick of his owne more naturall occupation: performing with his broken Army, that which could hardly have bin expected, had he bin victorious. For whilst there was no suspicion of any great matter that he could undertake; he suddenly wrought with some of the Mantineans, who did let him into their city. These Mantineans, (whom he had thus brought to his purpose) had once before joyned themselves with the Achaens; but shortly upon feare, or some other passion, they gave themselves to the Ætolians; and from the Ætolians, presently after this victory, to Cleomenes, from whom immediately they were thus won. For this their levity they were not punished, but freely admitted now again into the Achaen society. As this good successe repaired the credit of Aratus; so another battaile almost ruined it. Cleomenes and he encountered neere unto Megalopolis; where the Achaen had somewhat the better at the first, but their Generall durst not follow his advantage. Thereupon Lyfias, of whom we spake before, grew somewhat impatient with anger; & taking with him all the horse, brake upon the Lacedemonians, whom he routed at the beginning, but pursuing them too far into places of hard passage, he was slaine by them, and his followers driven backe upon their own Companions; in such sort, that finally all the Army was disordered and put to flight. This was a great losse, and incensed the Achaens against Aratus: yet their indignation proceeded no further, than that they refused to make any longer contribution, towards the pay of those Mercenaries which he had waged. This Aratus tooke patiently, & followed the warre nevertheless; where in though Cleomenes wanne some Townes, and Aratus got the better in one small fight, yet little of importance was done; the Achaens being wearie, and the Spartan King intensive to another businesse.

Cleomenes having ledde into the field all that were like to hinder his purpose, and tired them with painfull journeyes, forsooke the Achaen warre on a sudden, and came unexpected home to Sparta, where he slue the Ephori, and restored by force the ancient discipline of Lycurgus. Then gave he an account of his doings: and shewing by what degrees the Ephori had incroched upon the power of Kings, & many disorders had grown in the Citie; hee justified his proceedings, and forthwith began to make equall division of the Lands, reducing all to the first institution. He also supplied the defect of Citizens, by choosing new, out of such as were friends to the State, and valiant men: so that henceforth his Country might not altogether stand in need of Mercenarie helpe, as it lately had done, to save it selfe from the Ætolians, Illyrians, and such other enemies. All this was dispatched in great haste; the Spartans well satisfied; and Cleomenes himselfe ready in the field, ere his enemies could take any advantage of these his domestical troubles.

The Achaens hearing of this great alteration in Sparta, thought that it would be long ere Cleomenes durst issue forth of the City, for feare of some rebellion. But it was not long ere they heard, that he had wasted all the Country of Megalopolis; had ranged over all Arcadia at his pleasure; and was admitted into Mantineæ; and ready to take other places, even of Achaia. These newes displeased them not a little: but they must patiently endure to heare worse. For when Cleomenes had shaken off the power of the Ephori, that curbed his authority, he proceeded more roundly in his worke, being better obeyed and by better men. His Lacedemonians resumed their ancient courage; and he himselfe had the heart to demand the Principality of Greece. He did not therefore henceforth content about the possession of a few Townes: but adventured to winne or lose all, all, The Ætolians in favour of his attempt, declared themselves on his side: and where-as he had gotten Mantinea, Tegea, and other places, to which they had some title, they willingly renounced all their interest unto him.

Aratus did apprehend the danger of his Country, and saw that Antigonus, with the Ætolians, or perhaps without them, would shortly make an end of that, which Cleomenes had thus begunne. Therefore he devised how to provide against the worst, and either to repaire all, or (if it could not be) to save all from utter ruine. The office of Generall, when it was next put upon him, he refused, fearing to be so far prett, as to hazard in one battaile all the force of his Country, to which as he had never any affection, nor perchance courage, so was his maner of warfare otherwise. For he commonly attempted by surprize, & defended upon the advantage of place, after the maner of the Irish, and of all other Nations, over-charged with numbers of men. Yet did hee not forsake the care of the Weale-publique, though in aiming at the generall good, it seems that private passion drew him into an ill course. He saw, that Megalopolis could not be defended without making a dangerous hazzard of battaile; that Mantinea had not only opened her gates unto Cleomenes, but slaine the Achaean Garrison that lay therein; that other Townes had yielded unto him, without compulsion; and that Aristomachus, once Tyrant of Argos, and since Generall of the *Achaean*s, was now revolted unto the enemy, following the fortune of Cleomenes. Prolomy was too farre off to helpe; and the needresse of Antigonus was very dangerous; yet might be usefull, if this King would (as Polybius saith) like others, bee friend or enemy, as should best agree with his owne profit. To make triall hereof, Aratus practised with some of Megalopolis, whom he found apt unto his purpose; and instructed them how to deale both with Antigonus, and the *Achaean*s.

The City of Megalopolis had beene well affected to the Macedonians, ever since the time of Philip the Father of Alexander, who had obliged it unto him by some especiall benefits. At this time it lay neerest unto the danger; was very faithfull, and therefore deserved succour; yet could not well be releevd by the *Achaean*s, with their owne proper strength. Wherefore it was thought meet, that Embassadors should be sent unto the generall Councell of Achaia, requesting leave and good allowance, to trie the favour of Antigonus in their necessitie. This was granted, for lacke of what else to answer: and the same Embassadors dispatched away to Antigonus. They did their owne errand briefly; telling him of the good will and respect which their City had of long time borne unto him and his Predecessors; of their present need; and how it would agree with his honour to give them aide. But when they delivered the more generall matter; wherein Aratus had given them instruction; shewing how the ambition of Cleomenes, and violence of the Ætolians, might redound to his owne great losse or danger, if the one and the other were not in time prevented; how Aratus himselfe did stand affected; and what good likelihood there was of reducing the *Achaean*s under the Patronage of Macedon: then beganne Antigonus to lend a more attentive eare to their discourse. He embraced the motion: and to give it the more life, he wrote unto the Megalopolitans, that his helpe should not be wanting, so farre forth, as it might stand with the *Achaean*s good liking. Particularly he commended himselfe, by these Messengers to Aratus; assuring them, that he thought himselfe highly bound to this honourable man, whose former actions he now perceived, not to have beene grounded upon any hatred to the Macedonians, but only upon a just and worthy love to his owne Nation. With this answer they returned to Megalopolis: & are presently sent away to the Councell of Achaia; there to make some speedy conclusion, as the necessity of the time required. The *Achaean*s were glad to heare, that Antigonus was so inclinable to their desire; & therefore were ready to entertaine his favour, with all good correspondence. Hereunto Aratus gave his consent; and praised the wisdome of his Countreimen, that so well discerned the best and likeliest meanes of their common safety: adding nevertheless, that it were not amisse, first of all to try their owne ability; which if it failed, then should they do well to call in this gracious Prince, and make him their Patron and Protector. Thus he shewed himselfe moderate, in that which himselfe of all others did most wish: to the end, that he might not afterward sustaine the common reprehension, if any thing fell out amisse; since it might appeare, that he had not beene Author of this Decree, but only followed, and that lesurably, the generall consent.

Nevertheless

Nevertheless, in true estimation, this finenesse of Aratus might have bin used, with his greater commendation, in a contrary course. For it had bin more honourable to make an end of the war, by yeelding unto Cleomenes that power which they gave unto Antigonus: since thereby he should both have freed his country from all further trouble; and withall, should have restored unto the universall state of Greece, that honourable condition, whereof the Macedonians had bereft it. But it is commonly found, (which is great pittie) that Vertue, having risen to honour by degrees, and confirmed it selfe, (as it were) in the fear of Principality, by length of time, and successe of many actions, can ill endure the battie growth of any others reputation, wherewith it sees it selfe likely to be overtopped. Other cause to despise the Lacedæmonians there was none, than that they lately had bin in dangerous case: neither could any reason be found, why Aratus should preferre Antigonus before Cleomenes, than that he had stood in doubt of the one, when he thought himselfe more mighty than the other. Wherefore he was justly plagued, when he saw his own honours reveried by the insolent Macedonians; and in stead of living as a companion with Cleomenes, that was descended of a long race of Kings, the posterity of Heracles, was faine to doe sacrifice unto Antigonus, as unto a god, and was finally paysoned by Philip, whose Nobilitie was but of five descents, and whom perhaps hee might have beene his fellowes, if he had not made them his Lords. By this inclination to the Macedonians, the love of Ptolome was lost: who forthwith tooke part with Cleomenes, though he did not supply him with such liberality, as he had used to the *Achaean*s; being wared, as may seeme, by their example, to be more wary both in trusting and disburfing. Cleomenes himselfe, whilst this businesse with Antigonus was a-foot, passed through Arcadia with an Armie, and laboured by all meanes to draw the *Achaean*s to battell. At the Citie of Dymes in Achaia were assembled all the remaining forces of the Nation; with which it was concluded to make triall, whether perhaps they might amend their estate, without seeking helpe of the *Macedonian*s. Thither went Cleomenes, & there fought with them; where he had so great a victory, that the enemy was no longer able to keepe the open field. The calamity was such, that Aratus himselfe durst not take upon him to be their Generall, when his turne came in the next election. Wherefore the *Achaean*s were compelled to sue for peace; which was granted upon this easie condition: That they should not arrogate unto themselves the command of Peloponnesus, but suffer the Lacedæmonians (as in former ages) to be their Leaders in war. Hereunto if they would consent, he promised unto them, that he would presently restore all places taken from them, and all his prisoners ransom-free: also that they should enjoy their own Lawes and Liberties without molestation. This gentle offer of Cleomenes was very pleasing to the *Achaean*s; who desired him to come to the Citie of Lerna, where a Parliament should be held, for the conclusion of the War.

Now seemed the affaires of Greece likely to be settled in better order, than they had ever bin since the beginning of the Peloponnesian Wars, yea, or since the Persian invasion: when God, who had otherwise disposed of these matters, hindred all, with a draught of cold water, which Cleomenes dranke in great heat, and thereupon fell extreme sicke, and so could not be present at Lerna, but caused the Parliament to be deferred to another time. Nevertheless he sent home the chiefe of his prisoners, to shew that he meant none other than good faith. By this faire dealing he confirmed the *Achaean*s in their desire of his friendship: who assembled againe at Argos, there to establish the League. But Aratus was violently bent against it; and fought by great words, and terrible threats, to make his Countreimen afraid of resolving. When all would not serve turne, he betooke himselfe to his cunning; and sent word to Cleomenes, that he should doe well to leave his Armie behinde him, and come alone into Argos, receiving hostages for safetie of his person. Cleomenes was already far on his way, when he met with this advertisement; and tooke it in ill part, that he should be thus deluded. For it had bin an easie matter, to have told him so much at the first, and not have made him come so far with an Armie, which afterwards he must dismisse. Yet that which chiefly seemed to have troubled him, was the drift of his oppugners; who sought thereby, either to make him wait without the gates, and deale only with themselves and their Messengers; or if he would adventure himselfe into the Citie, then to deprive him of all Royall shew, that might breed respect of him in the multitude. This was that indeed which Aratus feared, & for which he sought to hinder his coming thither in person; lest the people, hearing the promises of Cleomenes ratified by his owne mouth, should presently be wonne with his gentle words, and finish the bargain without more adoe. Therefore Cleomenes wrote unto the whole Councell, bitterly complaining against these juggling tricks: and Aratus was not farre behind with him, in as bitter an Oration. So betwene feare of the one, and reverence of the other, the Assembly knew not how to proceed, but abruptly brake up, leaving all, as it were, to fortune. Cleomenes tooke his advantage of their present weakness, and renewed the Warre. Many Cities yielded unto him willingly; many he forced, and partly by force, partly by terror, he wan Argos, which never King of Spacia before him could doe. In this case Aratus sent his owne sonne to Antigonus, intreating him to deferre no time, but come presently to relieve the distressed Achaens. Antigonus gave good words as could be wished: saying that he utterly refused to doe any thing, unless he might first have Acrocorinthus put into his hands. This demand was somewhat like unto that of the Hunter, who promised to helpe the Horse against his enemy the Stagge: but with condition, that the horse should suffer himselfe to be saddled and bridled. Aratus was herewithall contented, but wanted all honest colour to doe it: seeing the Corinthians had no way deserved to be thus given away to the Macedonians. Yet at length an occasion was found; for that the Corinthians, perceiving what he intended, were minded to arrest him. So he withdrew himselfe out of their Citie, and sent word to Antigonus, that their Caste should be ready to let him in. The Corinthians on the other side ranne to Cleomenes, who lost no time, but made haste with them to Corinth, where he fought how to get possession of their Caste, or at least to save it from Antigonus, by surrounding it within Trenches, that none might issue nor enter without his leave. Whilest this was doing, he tooke speciall order, that Aratus his house and goods, within the Towne, should be kept for the Owner; to whom he sent Messenger after Messenger, desiring him to come to agreement, and not to bring in the barbarous Macedonians, and Ilyrians, to Peloponnesus; promising, that if he would hearken to these perswasions, then would he give him double the same pension, which he had been wont to receive of King Ptolomeus. As for the Caste of Corinth, which was the gate of Peloponnesus, and without which none could hold assured soveraigntie of the Countrey; he desired that it might not be committed unto his own disposition, but be joyntly kept by the Lacedemonians and Achaens. All this entreaty served to no purpose. For Aratus rejecting utterly the motion, sent his owne sonne as an Hostage to Antigonus; and laboured with the Achaens, to put Acrocorinthus into his hands. Which when Cleomenes understood, he seized upon the goods of Aratus in Corinth, and wasted all the Countrey of Sicyon, whereof this his Adversary was native.

Antigonus in the meane time drew neere to the Isthmus; having passed with his Army through Eubœa, because the Etolians held the streights of Thermopyla against him. This they did, either in favour of Cleomenes, which they pretended; or in doubt of the greatness, whereunto the Macedonians might attaine by the good successe of this journey. At his coming thither he found the Lacedemonians ready to forbid his entrance: and that with sufficient strength; yet with no purpose to hazzard battell, but rather to weary him thence with hunger, against which he came not well provided. Antigonus therefore laboured hard to make his way by force; but he was not able so to doe: he secretly got into the Corinthian Haven; but was violently driven out againe, with great losse of men; finally, he resolved to turne aside, and seeke a passage over the gulf of Corinth, to Sicyon, or some other part of Achaia; but this required much time, and great preparation, which was not easily made.

In this perplexity, newes from Argos came by Sea, that greatly comforted Antigonus, and no lesse troubled his enemies. The Achaens were gotten into that Citie; and the Garrison which Cleomenes had left therein, though it was not driven out of the Citiedell, yet was hardly distressed, and stood in need of present helpe. Argos had alwayes beene enemy to Spacia, and well affected to the Kings of Macedon. When Cleomenes took it he forbore to chase out those whom he most suspected; partly at the entreaty of friends, and partly for that they all made shew to be glad of his prosperity. They were glad indeed of Cleomenes his victories, both in Argos and elsewhere, as many as hoped that he would cause all debtors to be discharged from their creditors, as he had lately done in Sparta. But that which Cleomenes had done in Sparta, was agreeable to the Spartan institution: in other places, where it would have beene tyrannicall, he did it not. Thereupon such as were disappointed of their unjust hopes, began to turne good Common-wealths men; and called him Tyrant for his doings at home, because hee would not doe the like abroad. So they tooke their time, invited the Achaens, assailed his Garrison, cut in peeces the rescue that he sent, and compelled him at length to forsake the defence of Corinth, and looke unto the enemies that were behind his back. For when he understood by continuall messages, that his men which held the Cittadell at Argos were almost lost; he began to feare lest his labour in guarding the entry should grow frivolous; the Achaens in the meane while spoyling all that lay within. Therefore he forsooke his custody of the Isthmus, and made all haste towards Argos; which if he could save, he meant to trust fortune with the rest. And so farre he prevailed at his coming to Argos, that both Argives and Achaens were glad to house themselves, leaving him Master of the streets: when the horsemen of Antigonus were discovered afaire off, halting to relieve the Citizens; and Antigonus himselfe (to whom Corinth was yielded, as soone as the Spartan had turned his backe) following apace with the body of his Armie. Cleomenes therefore had no more to doe, than to make a safe retreat. This hee did, and got him home into Laconia: losing in short space all, or most of that which he had bin long in getting.

Antigonus having shewed himselfe at Argos, and commended the Citizens, went into Arcadia: where he wan such Castles as were held for Cleomenes, and restored them to the old Possessors. This done, hee tooke his way to Aegium, where was held a Parliament by the Achaens; to whom he declared the cause of his coming, and spake brave words, that filled them with hope. The Achaens were not behinde with him; but made him Capitaine-Generall over them and their Confederates: and further entered into covenant with him, That they would not deal with any Prince or State, either by writing or Embassadour, without his consent. All this while, and somewhat longer, Aratus was the only man, that seemed to rule the Kings heart: carrying him to Sicyon his owne Towne, (for Winter was come on) where he not only feasted him as a great Prince, but suffered more than humane honours, as sacrifices and the like, to be done unto him. This example of Aratus and his Sicyonians, was followed by the rest of Achaia: which had made (forsooth) a very wise bargain, if in stead of Cleomenes, that would have bin a King, it had obtained the protection of a God. But this God was poore, and wanting wherewith to pay his Macedonians, imposed the burthen upon the Achaens. This was hardly taken; yet worse must be endured in hope of better. Neither was Aratus himselfe over-carefully respected; when the statues of those Tyrants, which he had throwne downe in Argos, were againe erected by Antigonus; or when the statues, which he had erected, of those that had taken Acrocorinthus with him, were all throwne downe by the same King, and one onely left unto himselfe at his earnest intreaty. It might therefore appeare, that this God was also spitefull. Nevertheless in taking revenge upon those that offended him, Aratus did satisfie his own passion by the aide of these Macedonians. For with extreme torments he did put Aristomachus to death, who had bin once Tyrant of Argos; afterwards Generall of the Achaens, and from them revolting unto Cleomenes, did fall at length into their hands. In like sort handled he (though not as yet the Mantineans, for their ingratitude and cruelty shewed to the Achaens. For he slue all the principall Citizens, and sold the rest, men, women, and children, all for bond-slaves: dividing the spoyle; two parts to the Macedonians, and the third to the Achaens. The Towne it selfe was given by Antigonus to the Argives; who peopled it with a Colony of their own; and Aratus having charge of this business, caused it to be new-named Antigonia. Surely of this cruelty there can be no better excuse, than even the slavery which Aratus was driven to use to Antigonus: forasmuch as it was a token of servility, whereinto they had urged and brought him; whom he, as in revenge thereof, did thus requite. But leaving to speake of this change, which the coming in of the Macedonian wrought in the Civill state of the Achaens; let us returne unto his war against the Lacedemonians.

The next Summer Antigonus wan Tegea, Mantineia, Orchomenus, Heræa, & Telphussa: Mantineia he dispeopled, as was said before; in Orchomenus he placed a Garrison of his Macedonians; the rest he restored to the Achaens, with whom he wintered at Aegium, where they held a Parliament. Once only Cleomenes had met him this year; and that was on the borders of Laconia, where he lay ready to defend his owne Territory. The reason why he stirred no further, nor followed Antigonum to Mantineæ, &c. to those other Townes that he wan, was this: He had few Souldiers, and had not money enough to wage more. Ptolomie the Egyptian promised much, but would performe nothing, unless he might have Cleomenes his own Mother, and his children in pledge. These were lesse into Egypt, yet the aide came not. For Ptolomie was slow; as dealing in the businesse of Greece, rather for his mindes sake, than upon any apprehension of necessity. Cleomenes therefore provided for himselfe, as well as his own ability would serve. He manumitted all the Heilotes, which were the Lacedæmonian slaves: taking money for their liberty, and arming two thousand of them after the Macedonian fashion. Having thus increased his forces, he came on the sudden to Megalopolis: that lay secure, as having defended it selfe in more dangerous times, and having now Antigonum neere at hand in Ægium. The towne he wan: but after he was entred, all that were fit to beare Armes rose hastily against him; and though they could not drive him out, yet saved the multitude, to whom they gave a Port free for their escape. He sent after the Citizens, offering them their Towne and goods to them againe, if they would be of his party. But they bravely refused his offer: wherefore he sacked and ruined it, carrying with him to Sparta a great bootie that he found therein. These newes astonished the Acheans at Argum: who thereupon brake up their Parliament. Antigonum sent hastily for his Macedonians, out of their wintering places: but they were so long in coming, that Cleomenes was safely gone home. Therefore he returned them back to their lodgings, and went himselfe to Argos, there to passe the rest of his unluckie winter, somewhat further from the eyes of the grieved Acheans. When he had laine a while at Argos, Cleomenes was at the gates, with no great number of men, yet with more than Antigonum had then about him. The Argives perceiving that their Country would be spoiled, if Antigonum did not issue into the field, were very earnest with him to goe forth and fight. But he was wiser than to be moved with their clamors; and suffered them to see their villages burnt: to bid him resigne his Office of Protector unto some that were more valiant; and to satisfie their passions with foolish words: rather than he would be overcome in fight, and thereby lose more honour than could easily be repaired. By this Cleomenes had his desire, in weakening the reputation of his enemy: though he thereby added neither followers, nor other strength unto Lacedæmon.

Afterwards, when the season was more fit for war, Antigonum gathered together all his troupes; meaning to requite these bravadoes of his enemy, with the conquest of Sparta. Cleomenes, on the other side, laboured to keepe the war from his owne gates; and therefore entred upon the Country of Argos, where he made such havock, as drew Antigonum thither, from his intended invasion of Laconia. Many great affronts the Macedonian was faine to endure, in coasting of the Spartan King; that ranging over the Country of the Argives, Phliasians, and Orchomenians, drave a Garrison of his out of Oligyrtis; and did sacrifice, as it were, before his face, in the suburbs of Argos, without the Temple of Juno, that was shut up; sending unto him in scorn, to borrow the keys. These were light things; yet served to dishearten the Achean side, and to fill the enemy with courage, which was no matter of light importance. Therefore he concluded to lay apart all other regard of things abroad, and to put all to hazzard; by setting up his rest, without any more delay, upon Sparta it selfe. He had in his Army eight and twenty thousand foot, and twelve hundred horse, collected out of sundry Nations, as Macedonians, Illyrians, Gauls, Epiriots, Bœotians, Acarnanians, and others; together with the Acheans, and their friends of Peloponnesus. Cleomenes had of all sorts twenty thousand, with which he lay at Selasia: fortifying slightly the other passages into Laconia, through which the Macedonians were not likely to seeke entrance. Antigonum, coming unto Selasia, found his enemy so strongly incamped, upon and between the hills of Eva and Olympus, that he was constrained to spend much time there, before he could advance any one foot: neither lay it in his power to come hastily to blowes, which he greatly desired, without the hazzard of his whole Army, in assailing their well-defenced Camp. But at length (as it happens, when men are wearie both of their hopes and feares) both Kings being resolved to make an end one way or other; Antigonum attempted with his Illyrians to force that part which lay on the hill Eva. But his Illyrians were so ill seconded by the Achean foot, that the Spartan horse, and light-armed foot, incamped in the straight valley betweene those hills, issuing forth, fell upon their skirts, and not only disordered them, but were like to have endangered all the rest. If Cleomenes himselfe had stood in that part of the battell, hee would have made great use of such a faire beginning. But Euclydas, his brother, a more valiant than skilfull Souldier, commanded in that wing: who neither followed this advantage, nor tooke such benefit as the ground afforded, whereon he lay. Philopemen the Arcadian of Megalopolis, who afterwards proved a famous Capitaine, served then on horse, as a private young man, among the Acheans. Hee seeing that all was like to goe to rout, if their Illyrians were driven to fall back upon the Achean Mercenaries: but they would not: partly despising his youth and want of charge; partly, for that Antigonum had given order, that they should keepe their places, until they received a signe from him, which was not as yet. Philopemen perceiving them to be more orderly than well advised, intreated some of his own Countreimen to follow him, gave a charge on the Spartans, and forced them, not only to leave the Illyrians, but seek how to save themselves. Being so far advanced, he found the place which the Illyrians had attempted, like enough to be won, through the unskilfulness of him that held it. Wherefore he alighted, and perswaded the men at Armes his Companions to doe the like: the folly of Euclydas being manifest, who kept the top of the hill, and stirred not to hinder those that ascended, but waited for them in a Plaine, where they might fight upon even termes. So he recovered the Hill top; where though he was forehurt, yet he made good the place that he had gotten, until the whole Army came up to him; by which the Lacedæmonians were beaten from it, with great slaughter of them in their descent. This overthrow, and death of Euclydas, made Cleomenes lose the day: who fighting bravely on the other side, upon Olympus, against Antigonum himselfe, was like to have beene surrounded and lost, if he had not withdrawne himselfe with an extraordinary speed. In this battell ended the glory of Lacedæmon, which, as a light ready to goe out, had with a great, but not long blaze, shined more brightly of late, than in many ages past.

Cleomenes fled unto Sparta; where he had no desire to stay, finding onely two hundred left of sixe thousand Spartans that he had led unto this battell, and most of his hired Souldiers dead, or gone away. So he perswaded his people to yeeld themselves unto Antigonum; and promising to doe all that should at any time lie in his owne power, for their good, he hastened away to the Sea-side (where he had shipping long before provided against all that might happen) and imbarqued himselfe for Egypt. He was lovingly entertained by Ptolomie Evergetes, who undertooke to restore him to his Kingdom, and (perhaps) meant no lesse, as being much delighted with his gallant behaviour, and qualities. In the meane season, he had a pension allowed him, of foure and twenty Talents, yearly. But this Ptolomie died; and his son Ptolomie Philopater succeeded him: a vicious young Prince, wholly governed by lewd Women; and base Men, unmindefull of all vertue, and hating any in whom it was found. When therefore Cleomenes was desirous to returne into Greece, whither the troubles in Peloponnesus did seeme to invite him; Ptolomie and his Minions, would neither give him aide; nor yet dared to displease him (as he desired) to trie his own friends in Greece, because he was too well acquainted with the weaknesse of Egypt: nor well knew how to detain him against his will. At length they devised matter against him, and made him prisoner. The last act of him was, that with thirty of his Countreimen, he undertooke a desperate enterprise: breaking out of the prison, and provoking the Alexandrines to rebell and seeke their liberty. In which attempt he slew some enemies of his that he met; and having walked up and down the streets without resistance (no man offering to take his part, or which is very strange, to fight against him on the Kings behalfe) hee, and his Companions, agreed together to be ministers of their own death. Upon his dead body Ptolomie was bold to shew his indignation: and slue his Mother and Children, that had beene sent thither as Hostages, together with the wives of his Adherents, as many as were there, attending upon the old Queene. Such was the end of Cleomenes, a generous Prince, but Son of Leonidas, who had caused Agis, with his Mother and Grandmother, to come to such a bloudy end, as now befell his owne Wife, Son, and Grandchildren.

After the victory at Selasia, Antigonum without resistance entred Sparta: wherewith never the force of any Enemy, before him, could make way. He kindly intreated the Citizens, and left them to their own lawes and Government: rarrying there no longer than two or three dayes; after which he hastened out of Peloponnesus, and never returned. The cause of his speedy departure was, an advertisement that he received out of Macedon; how the Illyrians over-ran, and destroyed the Countrey. Had these newes come a little sooner, or had Cleomenes either deferred the fight, a few dayes longer, or at least wife tarried a few dayes after the fight, in Sparta; the Kingdome of Lacedaemon would have stood, and perhaps have extended it self over all Greece. But God had otherwise determined.

Antigonus fought a great battell with the Illyrians, and overcame them. Yet therein he caught his bane: not by any wound, but by over-straining his voyce; wherewith he brake a veine that bled inwardly, and in short space finished his life, who was troubled before with a consumption of the lungs. His Kingdome descended unto Philip, the son of Demetrius, being then a boy: as also about the same time it was, that Antiochus, surnamed (I know not why) the Great; and Ptolomy Philopater, began to reign in Asia, and Egypt; Boyes all of these, Ptolomy, though old enough to love Harlots, when he first was king, yet continued a Boy all the seventeen years of his reign. The unripe age of Philip & Antiochus, bred such intestine inconvenience to their Kingdomes, as is usuall in the minority of Princes: but their elder years brought them acquainted with the Romans; upon which occasion, when it comes, we shall more seasonably speak of them, and of their kingdomes, more at large.

§. VII.

How the Illyrians infested the coast of Greece, and how they were subdued by the Romans.

Lindisfar.

WHilst things thus passed in Greece, and whilst the Carthaginians were busied in their conquest of Spain; the Romans had found themselves work among the Sardinians and Corsicans; that were easily subdued at first, & easily vanquished again, when they rebelled. They made also war with the Illyrians, wherewith they got much honour with little pain. With the Gauls they had much ado, that lasted not long; being rather, as Livie saith, a tumult than a war. So that by all these light excises, their valour was hardly kept from rust. How they got the Ilands in the Mediterran Sea, it hath bin shewed before: of their dealings with the Illyrians and Gauls, it is now meet to be utterly silent.

The Illyrians inhabited the Country now called Slavonia; a troublesome Nation, impatient of rest, and continually making war for gaine, without either regard of friend or foe. They were invited by Demetrius, king of Macedon, to help the Mydionians his friends, that were besieged by the Ætolians; for that they refused to be of their society. Before the Illyrians succours came, the Mydionians were so far spent, that the Ætolians contended about the booty: the old Prator, or chief Magistrate of their Nation, who was going out of his office, claiming to have the honour of the victory, and the division of the spoyle to be referred unto him; for that he had in a manner brought the siege to an end, and won the towne: others, that were in hope to be chosen into the Office, contradicting this, and desiring that old orders might be kept. It was a prettie strife, and somewhat like to that of the French in later ages, who thought upon dividing the prey, before they had won the victories, which anon they lost, at Poitiers and Agincourt. The Ætolians wisely compounded the difference, ordering it thus; That the old, and the new Prator should be jointly intitled in the victory, and have equal authority in distribution of the gettings. But the Illyrians finished the strife much more elegantly, and after another fashion. They arrived, and landed ere any was aware of them; they fell upon the Ætolians; and though good resistance was made, yet got the victory, partly by force of their multitude, partly by the help of the Mydionians, that were not idle in their own busines, but stoutly sallied out of the towne. Many of the Ætolians were slain, more were taken, their camp and all their baggage was lost: the Illyrians took the spoyle, and went their way; the Mydionians erected a Trophee, inscribing the names both of their old and new Magistrate (for they also chose new Officers at the same time) as the Ætolians had directed them by example.

The successe of this voyage highly pleased Agroon King of the Illyrians: not only in regard of the mony, wherewith Demetrius had hired his assistance; or of the booty that was gotten; but for that having vanquished the stoutest of the Greeks, he found it not un-easie to enrich himselfe by setting upon the lesse warlike. For joy of this he feasted, and drank to immoderately, that he fell into a Pleuresie, which in few dayes ended his life. His Kingdome, together with his great hopes, he left unto Tenta his wife.

Tenta gave her people free liberty to rob all sorts at Sea, making no difference between friend and foe; as if she had beene sole Mistresse of the salt Waters. She armed a fleet, and sent it into Greece; willing her Captaines to make warre where they found advantage, without any further respect. These fell with the western coast of Peloponnesus, wherethey invaded the Eleans, and Messenians. Afterwards they returned along by Epirum, and stayed at the Citie of Phœnice, to take in victuals and other necessaries. There lay in Phœnice eight hundred Gauls, that having bin Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, went about to betray first Agrigentum, then Eryx, to the Romans; but failing to doe either, they nevertheless revolted, and were for their misdeeds disarmed and sent to sea by the Romans, yet entertained by these Epirots, and trusted to lye in Garrison within their Towne. The Gauls were soone growne acquainted with the Illyrians, to whom they betrayed Phœnice; which deserved none other, in trusting them. All Epirum was presently in armes, and hastned to drive out these unwelcome guests. But whilst the Epirots lay before the Towne, there came newes into their Campe, of another Illyrian Armie, that was marching thitherward by Land, under one Scerdilaidas, whom Queene Tenta had sent to help his fellows. Upon this advertisement, a part of them is sent away towards Antigonis, to make good that Town, and the streights adjoining, by which these new commers must enter into their Countrey; another part of them remains at Phœnice, to continue the siege. Neither the one nor the other sped well in their busines. For Scerdilaidas found means to joyne with his fellows; and they that were besieged within Phœnice, sallied out of the towne, and gave such an overthrow to the Epirots, as made them despair of saving their Countrey, without great and speedy help from abroad. Wherefore Embassadors were sent to the Acheans and Ætolians: craving their help, with very pitifull terms of intreaty. They obtained their suit; neither was it long, before an Army, sent by these two Nations, was ready in Epirum, to present battell unto Scerdilaidas. But Scerdilaidas was called home by letters from Tenta the Queene, that signified a rebellion of some Illyrians against her: so that he had no mind to put his forces to hazard, but offered composition, which was accepted. The agreement was, That the Epirots might ransom their Towne, and all their people that were prisoners, and that the Illyrians should quietly depart with all their booty and slaves. Having made this profitable and honourable bargain, the Illyrians returned into their own country by land, sending their booty away by Sea.

At their comming home, they found no such great trouble, as that which they brought, or had occasioned in this voyage. For, in fulfilling the commandment of their Queene, they had taken many Italian Merchants, whilst they lay at Phœnice; and made them good prize. Hereof the complaints, made unto the Roman Senate, were so frequent, that Embassadors were sent to require of Tenta, that she should abstaine from doing such injuries. These Embassadors found her very jolly; both for the riches which her fleet had brought in; and for that she had, in short space, tamed her Rebels, and brought all to good order, save only the Town Issa, which her forces held streightly besieged. Swelling with this prosperity, she could hardly afford a good look to the Romans, that found fault with her doings; and calling them by a true name, Piracy, required amends. Yet when their speech was ended, she vouchsafed to tell them, That injury in publike shee would doe them none: as for private matters, no account was to be made of them; neither was it the maner of Kings to forbid their subjects to get commodity, how they best could by Sea. But (said the younger of the two Embassadors) we Romans have a maner, and a very laudable one, to take revenge in publike, of those private wrongs that are born out by publike authority: therefore we shall teach you, God willing, to reforme your kindly maners, and learn better of us. These words the Queen took so impatiently, that no revenge could satisfie her, but the death of him that had spoken them. Wherefore, without all regard of the common Law of Nations, she caused him to be slain: as if that had bin the way to set her heart at rest; which was indeed the mean to disquiet and afflict it ever after.

The

The Romans, provoked by this outrage, prepare two great Armies; the one by Sea, consisting of two hundred saile, commanded by C. Fulvius; the other by Land, led by A. Posthumus. They trouble not themselves any more with requiring satisfaction: for this injury is of such nature, as must be requited with mortall war. It is indeed contrary to all humane Law, to use violence towards Embassadours: the reason and ground whereof, seemes to be this; that since without mediation, there would never be an end of warre and destruction, therefore it was equally received by all Nations, as a lesion taught by Nature, that Embassadours should passe freely, and in safety, between enemies. Nevertheless, as I take it, this generall Law is not without limitation. For if any King or State lay hold upon Embassadours sent by their enemies, not unto themselves, but unto some third, whom they should draw into the quarrell; then it is as lawfull to use violence to those Embassadours (thus employed to make the war more terrible) as it is to kill the men of war, & subjects of an enemy. And so might the Athenians have answered it, when they slew the Lacedæmonian Embassadours, that were sent to Xerxes, to draw him into a war upon the Athenians. Neither are those Embassadours, which practise against the person of that Prince, in whose Countries they reside, warranted by any law whatsoever. For whereas the true office of an Embassadour residing, is the maintenance of amitie; if it be not lawfull for one Prince to practise against the life of another, much lesse may an Embassadour doe it without incurring justly the same danger of punishment, with other Traitors; in which case, his place gives him no privilege at all. But we will leave this dispute to the Civilians; and go on with the revenge, taken by the Romans, for the slaughter of their Embassadour Coruncannus.

The Illyrian Queen was secure of the Romans, as if they would not dare to stir against her. She was indeed in an error, that hath undone many of all sorts, greater and lesse than she, both before and since: Having more regard unto fame, than unto the substance of things. The Greeks were at that time more famous than the Romans; the Ætolians and Epirots had the name of the most warlike people in Greece; these had the easily vanquished, and therefore thought, that with the Romans she should be little troubled. Had she considered, that her whole Army, which wrought such wonders in Greece, was not much greater than of ten thousand men; and that nevertheless, it prevailed as much by odds of number, as by valour, or skill in armes; shee would have continued to use her advantage against those that were of more fame than strength, with such good caution, that she should not have needed to oppose her late-gotten reputation, against those that were more mighty than her selfe. But she was a woman, and did what she listed. She sent forth a greater fleet than before, under Demetrius of Pharos; with the like ample commission to take all that could be gotten. This fleet divided it selfe, and one part of it fell with ^a Dyrrachium, sometimes called Epidamnus, and now Durazzo, seated upon the Adriaticke Sea, betwene the Islands of Pharos and Corcyra. ^b Corcyra, an Island of the Adriaticke Sea, not far from Durazzo, called now Corfu, and in the possession of the Venitians.

^a Dyrrachium, the other with Corcyra. Dyrrachium was almost surpris'd by the Illyrians; yet was it refused by the stout Citizens. In ^b Corcyra the Illyrians landed, wasted the Isle, and besieged the Towne. Hereupon the Ætolians and Achaïans were called in to helpe; who came, and were beaten in a fight at Sea: losing, besides others of lesse note, Marcus Cærensis, the first Prætor of Achaïa, whom Aratus succeeded. The Towne of Corcyra, dismayed with this overthrow, opened the gates unto Demetrius, who tooke possession of it with an Illyrian Garrison: sending the rest of his forces to besiege Dyrrachium. In the meane season, Tenta was angry with her Captain Demetrius: I know not why; but so, as he resolved to trie any other course, rather than to trust her.

The Romans were even ready to put to Sea, though uncertaine which way to take, when advertisement was brought to C. Fulvius the Consull, of Demetrius his feare and discontent. Likely it was that such an occasion might greatly helpe to advance the business in hand. Wherefore the consull failed thither; where he found the Towne of Corcyra so well prepared to his hand by Demetrius, that it not only received him willingly, but delivered into his power the Illyrian Garrison, and submitted it self unto the Roman protection.

^c Apollonia, a City near Dyrrachium, or Durazzo, upon the Sea-coast, the Venitians call it Sissopoli.

After this good beginning, the Consull failed along the coast to ^c Apollonia; accompanied with Demetrius, whom he used thenceforth as his counsellor and guide. To Apollonia came also Posthumus, the other Consull, with the Land-Armie, numbred at twenty thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Thence they hasten towards Dyrrachium, which the Illyrians had besieged; but upon newes of the Roman armie they disperse themselves.

From

From thence the Romans enter Illyria, and take Parthenia; beat the Illyrians by Sea, take twenty of their ships, and enforce the Queen Tenta to forsake the coast, and to cover her selfe in Rifon, far within the Land. In the end, part of the Romans haste them homeward, and leave the best places of Illyria in the hands of Demetrius; another part staies behind, and prosecutes the war, in such sort, that Tenta was forced to beg peace; which she obtained upon miserable conditions; to wit, That she should quit the better part of Illyria, and pay tribute for the rest; and from thenceforth never send any of her ships of war towards the coasts of Greece, beyond the Island of Lissa: except it were some one or two vessels, unarmed, and by way of Trade.

After this Illyrian war, the Romans sent Embassadours into divers parts of Greece, signifying their love to the country, and how, for good will thereunto, they had made war with good successe upon Tenta, and her people. They hoped, belike, that some distressed Cities would take this occasion, to desire their patronage: which if it hapned, they were wile enough to play their own games. But no such matter fell out. The Embassadours were only rewarded with thanks; and a decree made at Corinth, That the Romans thenceforth might be partakers of the Isthmian pastimes. This was an idle courtesie, but well meant by the vain Greeks; & therefore well taken by the Romans: who by this Illyrian expedition got nothing in Greece, save a little acquaintance, that shall be more hereafter.

§. VIII.

Of the war between the Romans and Gauls, somewhat before the coming of Hannibal into Italie.

THE Gauls that dwelt in Lombardie, were the next, against whom the Romans tooke Armes. These were a populous Nation, and often molested Rome; sometimes with their own forces, and sometimes with the assistance of those that inhabited France. Once their fortune was good, when they tooke Rome, and burnt it: though the issue of that war proved not answerable to the beginning, if we may give credit unto Roman Historians. In following times their successe was variable, and commonly bad. Many overthrows they received; and if they got any victory, it yielded them no profit, but was soone extorted out of their hands. They were indeed more fierce than well advised: lightly stirred up to war, and lightly giving over. At the first brunt, they were said to be more than men; but when that was past, lesse than women. The Romans were acquainted with their temper, by long experience, and knew how to handle them: yet gave alwayes carefull heed to their approach, were it onely bruited. For the danger of them was sudden, and uncertaine; by reason of their neighbourhood and want of intelligence amongst them. Few of their attempts upon Rome were called wars, but tumults; Gallici tumultus of the Gauls: and rightly. For they gave many alarms to Italie, and used to rise with great Armies: but after a few dayes march, and sometimes before their setting forth, any small occasion served to disperse them. Having received an overthrow, they would rest ten or twelve yeares, sometimes twenty or thirty: till they were stirred up again, by younger heads, unacquainted with the danger. Whilst they rested, the state of Rome, that against these made only defensive war, had leisure to grow; by setting upon others. Hercin God provided well for that Monarchie, which he intended to raise: that the Gauls never fell upon Italie with a mighty power, in the time of any other great and dangerous war. Had they attempted to conquer it, whilst Pyrhus was travelling in the same enterprise; or in either of the two former Punicke wars: it may be doubted what would have become of this imperious Citie. But it seems that the Gauls had no better intelligence in the affairs of Italie, than strangers had in Gauls. At least, they knew not how to use their times; and were therefore like to smart, whensoever the enemies, whom they had much provoked, and little hurt, should finde leisure to visit them at their own home: which was now after the first Punicke Warre. Once before this, the Romans had been bold, to set upon the Gauls in their own Country: and that was three yeares before the coming of Pyrhus into Italie. At that time the Senones, a Tribe of the Gauls, invading Helvetia, and besieging Arretium, had won a great battell, and slaine L. Cæcilium, with the most of his Armie. Mannius Curius the new Consull, sent Embassadours to them, to treat about ransom of prisoners. But these a There were divers nations of the Boji, as in Pannonia, Illyria, Germany, in Bourbonia, in France, and in Aquitany; but these Boji were of French race, and dwelt at this time about the mouth of the river Po.

Embassadors they sue. Therefore when fortune turned to the better, the Romans followed it so well, that they expelled the Senones out of their Country, and sent a colonie of their own to inhabit it. This caused the Boji, another people of Gauls, to feare the like measure: who thereupon tooke armes, and drew the Hetrurians to their side. But the Romans overthrew them in two great battels; and thereby made them sue for peace, which lasted untill the end of this Illyrian war.

It vexed the Gauls to see a Roman colony planted in their Country, who had bin accustomed to enlarge their bounds, by driving out their neighbours perforce. Wherefore they laboured with the Transalpins (so the Romans called those in France, as lying from them beyond the Alpes, thought to us they were neerer; like as they called Cisalpins, or to by-hither the Alpes, those who dwelt between them and the Mountaines) to draw them to their party: reasonably presuming, that as their disjunction had caused their losse, so their union might recompence it, with large amends. But the business was so foolishly carried, that the Cisalpins and Transalpins fell together by the ears, putting the Romans only to a tumult, without further trouble of war. Soone after, they were urged by a greater indignity, to go more substantially to work. For C. Flaminius, a popular man in Rome, proposed a Decree, which was ratified by the people; That, besides one Colony already planted in the territory of the Senones, as many more should be carried thither, as would serve to people the whole Country between Ancona and Ariminum: exterminating utterly those Gauls. Such an offer, were it made in England, concerning either Virginia, or Guiana it self, would not over-joy the Multitude. But the commonalty of Rome took this in so good part, notwithstanding all danger joynd with the benefit, that Flaminius had ever after their good will.

This dreadfull President extremely displeased the Boji; who being neighbours to Ariminum, feared the like displantation. And because the rest of the Gauls had reason to resolve, that themselves also should be rooted out by degrees; the great Nation of the Insulbrians, which inhabited the Dutchy of Milan, joynd with the Boji, & upon a common purse, entertained the Gessates, nations about Rhodanus, wageable as the Switzers in these times. The Gessates having received a great imprest, come to the field under the conduct of their Kings Concolitanus and Aneroestus: who with the Boji and Insulbrians, compassed an Armie of fifty thousand foot, and twenty thousand horse; and those of the best men, and best appointed, that ever invaded the Roman Territory; to whom the Semgalls, that had bin beaten out of their possessions, gave a great increase of strength. On the contrary side, the Venetians, and the Cenomanni, adhered to the Romans: as better leaving in their prosperitie and rising fortune. For feare of whose incursions therefore, the Gauls were forced to leave a good part of their Armie, on the frontier of Milan: with the rest of their forces they entred into Tuscane. The Romans hearing of this danger, send Emilius to Rimini, to stop their passage; and in the place of C. Atilius their former Consul, who then was in Sardinia, they imploy one of their Prætors, for the defence of Tuscane.

Being at this time greatly troubled with the consideration of this powerfull Armie, which the Gauls had assembled, they caused a view to be taken, as well of all their own forces, as of those of their Allies: who were no lesse willing than themselves, to oppose the incursions of the barbarous people; fearing, as they had cause, that their own destruction could not be prevented otherwise, than by the good fortune of Rome. The numbers, found in this Muster, deserve to be recorded: because they set out the power of the Romans in those dayes. With the Consuls they sent forth to the war four Legions of their owne: every Legion consisting of five thousand two hundred foot, and three hundred horse; and of their Allies, thirty thousand foot, and two hundred horse. There were also appointed for supplies (if any misadventure came to these) of the Sabines and Hetrurians fifty thousand foot, and four thousand horse, which Armie was to be lodged in the border of Hetruria. Of the Umbri and Sarsinates, which inhabited the Apenines, there were twenty thousand; and of the Venetians and Cenomanni, other twenty thousand: which latter Armies were directed to invade the Boji, that forcing them to defend their own Territories, the generall Armie of the Gauls should be thereby greatly diminished. There were besides these, to be ready against all uncertaine chances of warre, thirtie thousand foot, and fiftene hundred horse, garrison'd in Rome it self, of their own people; and of their Allies, thirty thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Over and above these great troupes; in the Roll of the Laines, that was sent unto the Senate, there were numbered fourscore thousand foot, and five thousand horse; in that of the Samnites, seventie thousand foot, and of horse seven thousand; in that of the Japyges & Messapges, fifty thousand foot, and sixteene thousand horse; the Lucans sent a list of thirtie thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the Marfi, Marrucini, Ferenienses, and the Vesuntini, of twenty thousand foot, and four thousand horse. The Romans had also two Legions in Sicily, and about Tarentum, containing eight thousand four hundred foot, and four hundred horse. So as of the Romans and Campanians jointly, reckoning men armed, and fit to beare armes, there were registred two hundred and fifty thousand foot; and of horse three and twenty thousand: of which, reckoning the Romans apart, there were an hundred and fifty thousand foot, and about fixe thousand horse. Calling up the whole forces of all the Provinces in Italie, both of the Romans and their confederates, it amounted to seven hundred thousand foot, and seventy thousand horse. But the number is some what mis-cast by Polybius; not with a purpose to enrich himselfe by the dead payes: for where he reckons nine hundred horse too many, hee fals short nine thousand two hundred of the foot.

How great forever this Muster was, it seemes to have beene like unto that, which Lodovick Sforza made, when Lewis the twelfth invaded Milan: at what time, the better to encourage himselfe, and his subjects, he tooke a Roll of all persons able to beare armes, within the Dutchie, though indeed he were never able to bring a tenth part of them into the field. Certaine it is, that the battels of Trebia, Thryasymene, and Cannæ, did not consume any such proportion, as was answerable to this large accompt. Yet were the Romans faine to arme their slaves, even for want of other Souldiers, after their overthrow at Cannæ. Wherefore the marvell is not great, that the Carthaginians and others were little terrified, with report of such a multitude. For all heads are not fit for Helms: though the Roman Citizens were, in general, as good fighting men, as elsewhere might be found.

Notwithstanding all these counter-preparations, the Gauls keepe on their way: and entred into Tuscane, destroy, and put to fire and sword, all that lay before them. From thence they march directly towards Rome; hoping to find the Romans rather in deliberation, than in the field. But their intelligence failes them. For the Roman Army, sent into Tuscane, having taken some other way than they did, & finding that it had missed of them, came againe fast after them, to arrest them in their journey. Hereof when they heard the rumor, fearing to be charged on their backs, they turned head: and in the same evening discovered the Roman Army, by whom they incamped. It was now a matter of apparent necessity, that fight they must. Wherefore they helped themselves with a stratagem: that shewed no great finess of wit, but such as well befitted those that had none other occupation than war; and stood them in good stead at the present. In the dead of the night, they cause their foot to march away, but not far, leaving their horse in guard; to whom they give order to come off at the first light of day, with such a speed, as might rather argue a running away, than a retreat; as if they had not dared to abide battell. The Romans, interpreting this their hasty departure as the Gauls desired they should, follow them in disorder. The Gauls returne, charge them, and kill fixe thousand upon the place; the rest take a piece of ground of advantage, and defend themselves, till L. Emilius, being at Ariminum, comes to their succour. Upon the comming of the Consul, the Gauls consult, whether they should give the Romans battell, or forbear. In which dispute, Aneroestus, one of their Kings, perswades them, rather to return into their own Countries; where, after they had disposed of the great spoiles and riches which they had gotten, they should then renew the war, being without carriage, pester, or other impediment. This advice they all embrace; for, seeing they that were Mercenaries, had obtained what they came for, to wit, the spoiles of their enemies, they thought it wisdome, to hazzard neither it, nor themselves, any further.

This indeed had beene a good resolution, if they had taken it, before the enemy had beene in fight. But as well in the warres of these later ages, as in former times, it hath ever beene found extreme dangerous, to make a retreat in the Head of an Enemies Army. For although they that retire, doe often turne head; yet in always going on from the pursuing enemy, they finde, within a few miles, either streight, hedge, ditch, or place of disadvantage, which they are enforced to passe in disorder. In such cases, the Souldier

CHAP. III.

Of the second Punick Warre.

S. I.

The warres of Hannibal in Spaine. Quarrels betweene the Romans and Carthaginians. Hannibal besiegeth and taketh Saguntum, whilst the Romans are busied with the Illyrians. Warre proclaimed betweene Rome and Carthage.

HANNIBAL, the sonne of Amilcar, was about fixe and twenty yeers old, when he was chosen Generall of the Carthaginian forces in Spaine. He was elected by the Armie, as soone as Asdrubal was dead: & the election was ratified by the State of Carthage; where with Hanno & his Complices were nothing pleased. This was now the third of the Barchine family (so called of Amilcar, whose surname was Barcas) that had command in chiefe, over the men of warre. Which honour would perhaps have beene lesse envied, by these domestickall enemies; if the Allies and Friends of the Barchine house, had not also borne the whole sway in government, and beene the onely men regarded, both by the Senate and the people. This generall good will, as it was first purchased by the most worthy desert of Amilcar, in saving his Country from imminent ruine, enlarging the Dominion thereof, and enriching it with treasures and great revenues; so was it retained, by the same good arts, among his friends and followers. Hanno therefore, and his Partisans, being neither able to take the vertue of their enemies, that was unprovable; nor to performe the like services unto the Common-weale; had nothing left, whereby to value themselves, excepting the generall reprehension of Warre, and cautious advice, of not provoking the Romans. This they seasoned other-whiles with detraction; saying, that the Barchine faction went about to oppresse the liberty of the City. But their malicious words were unregarded; and if it were factious, to beare ill will to Rome, then were all the Citizens (very few excepted) no lesse Barchine, than Hannibal himselfe. For it was long since apparent, that the oath of the Romans, to the articles of peace, afforded no security to Carthage, were she never so quiet, and officious; unless she would yeeld to become their Subject. Since therefore the peace was like to hold no longer, than until the Romans could finde some good advantage, to renew the warre: it was rather desired by the Carthaginians, that whilst their owne state was in good case, the warre should begin; than that in some unhappy time of famine or pestilence, or after some great losse of Army or Fleet, they should be driven to yeeld unto the impudent demands of their enemies; and to give away safely their lands and treasures, as they had lately done; or miserably fight, upon termes of disadvantage.

This disposition of his countymen, Hannibal well understood. Neither was ignorant (for his father, and other friends, had long time devised of this businesse) that in making war with the Romans, it was no small advantage to get the start of them. In case he could bring an Arme into Italy, without molestation; there was good hope, that he should finde friends and assistance, even of those people, that helped to increase the Roman armies in forreigne wars. But this could never be effected, if the matter were openly disputed at Carthage. For it was to be doubted, that the Carthaginians, how glad soever they would be, to heare that he had set the war on foot, would nevertheless be slow and timorous, as commonly men are in the beginning of great enterprises, if the matter were referred to their deliberation. Which if it should happen; then were the Romans like to be made acquainted, not onely with the generalities of his purpose, but with such particulars as must be discoursed of, in procuring allowance to his designe. This might suffice to disorder the whole Project. Wherefore, he resolved to lay siege unto Saguntum, which might seeme not greatly to concerne the Romans, and would highly please the Carthaginians, that had fresh in minde the indignity of that Spanish Townes alliance with their halfe friends. So should he assaie both the patience of his enemies and the disposition of his owne Citizens.

Having

Having thus concluded, he neverthelesse went faire and orderly to worke: and beginning with those that lay next in his way, approaching unto Saguntum by degrees. This he did (saith Livie) to give some colour to his proceedings: as if he had not principally intended the warre against Saguntum, but had beene drawne thither by course of businesse. Yet reason teacheth plainly, that without regard of such formalities, it was needfull to finish the conquest of the rest, before he did any thing that should provoke the Romans. First therefore hee entred upon the Territory of the Olcades; and having besieged Althaa (Livie calleth it Carteia) their chiefe Citie, he became, in a few dayes, Master not onely thereof, but of all the other Townes of their Countrey. This Nation which he first undertooke, being subdued, and the winter at hand, he rested his Army in new Carthage, or Carthagena; and imparted liberally to the Souldiers, the spoiles he had gotten in his late Conquest.

In the Spring following, he pursued the warre against the Vaccæi: and without any great difficulty, swan first Salmanica, now called Salamanca; and after it, Arbucala, by assault: though not without a long siege, and great difficulty. But in his returne, he was put to the height, both of his courage, and of his Martiall judgement. For all such of the Vaccæi, as were able to beare armes, being made desperate, by the spoile of their country, with those of Salamanca; and of the Olcades, that had escaped in the late overthrow, joyning themselves with the Toletans; compounded an Army of an hundred thousand able men: and stayed Hannibal on the banks of the River Tagus, which runneth to the Sea by Lisborne in Portugale. These foure Nations, having had experience of Hannibals invincible courage, and that he never saw enemy, upon whom he durst not give charge; were thoroughly resolved, that his naturall valour would at this time no lesse neglect the cold advice of discretion, than at other times it had seemed to doe, when the like great occasion perswaded him to use it. But he that makes himselfe a body of Crytall, that all men may looke through him, and discern all the parts of his disposition; makes himselfe (wichall) an Asse: and thereby teacheth others, either how to hide, or drive him. Wise men, though they have single hearts in all that is just & veruous; yet they are like Coffers with double bottomes: which when others looke into, being opened, they seee not all that they hold, on the fudden, and at once. It is true, that this subtle Carthaginian, when he served under Asdrubal, was, of all the men of marke in the Armie, the most adventurous. But that which may beseeeme a Captaine, or inferior Commander, doth not alwaies become a Chiefe; though it hath sometime succeeded well with such great ones, as have beene found more fortunate, than wise. At this time, our great Man of warre knew as well how to dissemble his courage, as at other times to make it good. For he with-drew himselfe from the River-side, as if fearefull to boord it; thereby to draw over that great multitude, from their banks of advantage. The Spaniards, apprehending this in such sort, as Hannibal desired that they should; thrust themselves in furie and disorder, into the swift streame, with a purpose to charge the Carthaginians, abandoning (as they thought for feare) the defenses one the contrary side. But when Hannibal saw them in their way, and well neare over; hee turned backe his Elephants to entertaine them at their landing; and thrust his Horse-men, both above and beneath them, into the River. These carrying a kinde of Lance de Gay, sharpe at both ends, which they held in the middelt of the staffe; had such an advantage over the foot, that were in the River, under their strokes, clattered together, and unable to move or shift their bodies, as on firme ground: that they flue all those, (in a manner) without resistance, which were already entred into the water; and pursued the rest, that fled like men amazed, with so great a slaughter, as from that day forward, there was not any Spaniard, on that side the River of Iberus (the Saguntines excepted) that had the daring to lift up their hands against the Carthaginians.

The Saguntines, perceiving the danger towards them; cried before they were hurt. They sent Embassadors to Rome, and bemoaned themselves, as likely to suffer that, which afterwards they suffered indeed; onely because of their alliance and friendship with this honourable City, which the Carthaginians hated. This tale moved the Senate, but much more a report, that Saguntum was already besieged. Hereupon some cry out, that Warre should be proclaimed by Land and Sea; as also that the two Consuls should be sent with Armies, the one into Spaine, the other into Affrick. But others went more Roman-like to worke, and carried it. So it was onely concluded; that Embassadours should be sent into Spain, to view the state of their confederates: which were indeed none other, than the Saguntines. For if Hannibal intended warre against Rome, it was likely, that he would give them, ere it were long, a more plausible occasion to take armes against him: if he had no such purpose, yet would it be in their power, to determine what they lifted themselves upon the report of these Embassadours; and this their gravity, in being not too rash at first, would serve to countenance their following Decree. Of these Embassadours Livie reports, that they found Hannibal before Saguntum, but could not get audience of him, and therefore went to Carthage, where also they were not regarded, nor heard. But Polypius an Historian of sincerity lesse questionable, tells, that they found him at Carthage, & had conference with him, though such as left them doubtfull. This is more agreeable to the rest of Hannibal his whole course. And surely we might wonder, why the Carthaginians should afterwards admit a more peremptory Embassage (as Livie confesseth) & fall to dispute about the covenants of peace; if they had rejected that which was sent upon none other pretence, than prevention of warre.

A people (saith Strabo) neere the River of Ebro. But in the old description of Spaine, in Ortelius, they are found neere Tagus, and by Sindus, not far from New Carthage. A people of Castile the old Arbucala, or Albucala, an in land City of the Vaccæi in Dragon.

Whilest the Embassadours passed to and fro, Hannibal prepared not onely his forces, but some Romane pretences, against Saguntum. He found out Mamertines, or people that should doe as the Mamertines in Sicil had done for the Romans; and implore his helpe against the Saguntines. These were the Turdetani, a Nation adjoining to Saguntum, & having many quarrels with them: (as happens commonly among Neighbours) of which, Hannibal himselfe had hatched some. Finding therefore such an occasion, whatsoever it was, as made him able to say, that the Saguntines had first provoked him, ere he meddled with them; he made no more ado, but sat down with his whole power before their Towne. He was now more secure, than he had formerly beene, of his owne Citizens: for that they had not entertained the Roman Embassadours, with any trembling reverence, as of late yeeres they had been wont. Nevertheless, he was glad of any handsome colour, to shadow his actions, not onely because the war, which he so much desired, was not proclaimed; but that he might not be checked in his course, as an open enemy, before he could set foot in Italy. The Romans had the like, though contrary desire. They were glad of the quarrell: as hoping, that Carthage, with all thereto belonging, should thereby in short space become their owne. Yet were they not hasty to threaten, before they were ready to strike; but meant to temporize, untill they had an Army in readinesse to be sent into Spain, where they thought to make Saguntum, the seat of the Warre.

In the meane while, Demetrius Pharius, whom the Romans had made King over a great part of Ilyria, rebelled against them: either for that he found himselfe over-streightly tyed up by them, with hard conditions, or rather because he was of an unthankfull disposition. The commotion of the Gaules, and afterward, the fame of the Carthaginian warre, emboldened him to despise his Benefactors and Patrons: whom he ought to have defended and aided, in all perils, even with the hazzard of his whole estate, which he had received of their gift. But he was a Traitor to his own Queene; and therefore dealt according to his kinde, with those that had rewarded him for being such. First, he built ships, & spoiled the Isles of Greece, against the covenants to which he was bound. Then he adventured further, and seized upon some places, that the Romans kept in their owne hands. If he had begun sooner, or rather if he had stayed somewhat longer, he might have spedde better. For the businesse with the Gaules, was ended; with Hannibal, not thoroughly begun, when he declared himselfe, by his doings, an enemy, and was vanquished. The Roman Consul, Emilius, was sent against him: who in seven dayes wan the strong towne of Dimalum; and thereby brought such terrour upon the Country round about, that Embassadours were sent from all places, to yeeld themselves, without putting him to further paines. Onely the City of Pharus, in which Demetrius lay, prepared to resist: which he might have done long, if the hot-headed Rebel had not bene too foolish. Emilius landed a great part of his Army, in the Isle of Pharus, by night; and bestowed them in covert, presenting himselfe the next morning, with twenty ships before the towne, and offering to force the Haven. Demetrius with all his power issued out against the Consul, & was soone intercluded from the town, by those that lay in ambush. Wherefore he fled away through by-paths to a creeke, where he had shipping ready ready for him, and imbarqued himselfe: leaving all his estate unto them, of whose liberality he first had it.

This businesse, though it were soone dispatched, yet prevented it not the siege of Saguntum; before which Hannibal fate downe, ere Emilius was landed in Ilyria. In the beginning of the siege, the Carthaginians were much discouraged, by reason of the brave sallies made by the Saguntines; in one of which, their Generall received a dangerous wound in the thigh, that caused him to lie many dayes unable to move. Nevertheless he was not unmindfull of his worke in the meane while; but gave order to raise certaine moveable Towers, that might equall those which were built on the wals of the City; and to prepare to batter the curtaines, and make a breach. These being finished and applied, had soone wrought their effect. A great and large breach was made, by the fall of divers Towers, and a great length of wall; whereat an hot assault was given: but it was so well sustained by the Saguntines, as the Carthaginians were not onely beaten from the breach, and out of some ground within the Towne, which upon the first fury they had won; but they were pursued even to their owne trenches and campe. Nevertheless the Carthaginian Army, wherein were about an hundred and fifty thousand men, did so wearie the townesmen with continuall travaile, that at length it got within the wals; and was onely hindered from taking full possession of the City, by some counter-works of the Saguntines, that were also ready to be won. In this extremity, there was one Alcon a Saguntine, that conveyed himselfe out of the towne, to treat with Hannibal for some accord. But the conditions which the Carthaginian offered, were so severe, and without all compasse of honour, as Alcon durst not returne to propound them to his countremen. For Hannibal demanded all that they had; gold, silver, plate, and other riches within the Citie: yea, the City it selfe to be abandoned by the Citizens; promising, that he would assigne some other place for their habitation: not allowing them, to carry out with them any other thing, wherewith to sustaine themselves, than the cloaths on their backs; or other armes, to defend them, than their nailes and teeth. Yet might they farre better have submitted themselves unto this miserable appointment, (seeing thereby they might have enjoyed their lives, and saved the honour of their wives and daughters) than to have rested at the discretion of the Conquerour, as soone after they did: by whom their wives and daughters were defouled before their own faces; and all put to sword, that were above fourteen yeeres of age. For it was a poore comfort, which a great number of them tooke; when not daring to fight, and sell their blood at the dearest rate, they shut themselves up like most wretched creatures in their own houses, and therein burnt themselves with all that they had: so dying unrevenged. The treasures found in Saguntum, which were very great, Hannibal kept, therewith to pay his Army: the slaves, and other bootie, he divided among his Souldiers, reserving some things of choice, wherewith to present his friends at Carthage, and to animate them unto the Warre.

These tidings exceedingly vexed the Romans, who had good cause to be angry at their own slownesse, in forbearing to send helpe unto the Saguntines, that held out eight moneths, looking still for succour, but in vaine. Wherefore they determined to repaire their honour, by taking sharpe revenge. To this end they sent Embassadours againe to Carthage: demanding onely, whether it were by generall consent and allowance of the Carthaginians, that Hannibal had made warre upon Saguntum: which if they granted (as it seemed they would) then to give them defiance. Hereunto answer was made, in the Senate of Carthage, to this effect; That this their second Embassage, howsoever qualified with mild words, was indeed more insolent than the former. For in that, they onely required justice against Hannibal; but in this, the very State and Commonwealth of Carthage, was urged to plead guilty, or not guilty. But (said the Carthaginian speaker) whether the Generall of our Army in Spain, in besieging Saguntum, have onely followed his owne counsaile; or whether he did it, by direction from us: it is not the question which the Romans ought to aske us. That which is indeed worthy examination or dispute, is; whether it were lawfull or unlawfull, for Hannibal to doe as he hath done. For it belongs to us, to call our own Commanders in question, and to punish them according to their faults & errors; to you, to challenge us, if we have done any thing contrary to our late League and contract. It is true, that in our negotiation with Lucretius the Consul, the Allies of both Nations were comprehended: but the Saguntines were not then of your Allies, and therefore no parties to the peace then made; for of your Allies in the future, or of ours, there was no dispute. As touching the last agreement, between you and Asdrubal, wherein you will say, that the Saguntines were comprehended by name; it is you that have taught us how to answer that particular. For whatsoever you found in the Treaty between us and Luchatim, to your owne disadvantage, you cast it upon your Consuls presumption; as promising those things, for which he had no warrant from the Senate and People of Rome. If then it be lawfull for the Romans, to disavow the actions of their Consuls and Commanders, concluding any thing without punishment and precise warrant; the same liberty may wee also assume, and hold our selves no way bound in honour, to performe those bargaines, which Asdrubal hath made for us, without our commandement and consent.

This was an impertinent answer, and little better than a meere cavill. For Luchatim the Consul, in his Treaty of peace with the Carthaginians, had expressly referred the allowance thereof to the people of Rome. It had bene therefore much better, to have dealt plainly; and to have alledged, That after this League was made, and confirmed on both parts, it was broken by the Romans, in robbing the Carthaginians of the Isle of Sardinia, and withall of twelve hundred talents: which perjurie the State of Carthage, being now growne able, would revenge with open War. As for the Saguntines, it little skilled that the Romans had admitted them into confederacie, and forthwith inserted their names into the Treaty of peace with Asdrubal: seeing that the Treaty with Asdrubal, and all other businesse betweene Rome and Carthage, following the violence and breach of peace, in taking away Sardinia, were no better than Roman injuries, as implying this commination, Do whatsoever we require, else will we make Warre, without regard of our oath, which we have already broken.

But this the Carthaginians did not alledge, forgetting, in heat of contention (as Polybius takes it) the best of their Plea. Yet since Livie himself doth remember and acknowledge, that the taking of Sardinia from the Carthaginians, did inflame the spirit of Amilcar with desire of revenge: wee may reasonably thinke, that the mention of this injurie was omitted, not so much upon forgetfulness, as for that it was not thought convenient, by ripping up such ancient matter of quarrell, to shew that the war, now towards, had long bene thought upon, and like to be made with extraordinary force, in other manner than heretofore. In conclusion, the Carthaginian Senate moved the Roman Embassadors, to deliver unto them in plaine termes the purposes of those that sent them, and the worst of that, which they had long determined against them: as for the Saguntines, and the confining of their Armies within Iberum; those were but their pretences. Whereupon Q. Fabius gathering up the skirt of his Gowne, as if somewhat had bene laid in the hollow thereof, made this short reply: I have here (quoth he) in my Gowne skirt both Peace and War: make you (my Masters of the Senate) election of these two, which of them you like best, and purpose to embrace. Hereat all cried out at once; Even which of them you your selfe have a fancy to offer us. Marry then (quoth Fabius) take the War, and share it among you. Which all the assembly willingly accepted.

This was plaine dealing. To wrangle about pretences, when each part had resolved to make Warre, it was meere frivolous. For all these disputes of breach of peace, have ever bin maintained by the partie unwilling, or unable to sustaine the Warre. The rusty sword, and the empty purse, doe alwaies plead performance of covenants. There have been few Kings or States in the World, that have otherwise understood the obligation of a Treaty, than with the condition of their owne advantage: and commonly (seeing peace betweene ambitious Princes and States, is but a kinde of breathing) the best advised have rather begun with the sword, than with the trumper. So dealt the Arragonians with the French in Naples; Henry the second of France, with the Imperials, when he wrote to Brissac, to surpris as many places as he could, ere the War brake out; Don John with the Netherlands, and Philip the second of Spaine, with the English, when in the great Imbargo he tooke all our ships and goods in his Ports.

But Hannibal, besides the present strength of Carthage, and the common feeling of injuries received from these enemies, had another private and hereditary desire, that violently carried him against the Romans. His father Amilcar, at what time he did sacrifice, being ready to take his journey into Spaine, had solemnly bound him by oath, to pursue them with immortal hatred, and to worke them all possible mischief, as soone as he should be a man, and able. Hannibal was then about nine yeeres old, when his father caused him to lay his hand upon the Altar, and make this vow: so that it was no marvel, if the impression were strong in him.

That it is inhumane, to bequeath hatred in this sort, as it were by Legacy, it cannot be denied. Yet for mine owne part, I doe not much doubt, but that some of those Kings, with whom we are now in peace, have received the like charge from their Predecessors, that as soone as their coffers shall be full, they shall declare themselves enemies to the people of England.

§. II.

Hannibal takes order for the defence of Spaine, and Africke. His journey into Italy.

WArre being thus proclaimed, Hannibal resolved not to put up his sword, which he had drawne against the Saguntines, until he had therewith opened his passage unto the gates of Rome. So began the second Punicke Warre; second to none, that ever the Senate and people of Rome sustained. Hannibal wintered at Carthage; where he licensed his Spanish Souldiers to visit their friends, and refresh themselves against the Spring. In the meane while he gave instructions to his brother Asdrubal, for the government of Spaine in his absence. He also tooke order, to send a great many troupes of Spaniards into Africke, to equall the number of Africans formerly drawne thence into Spaine; to the end, that so the one Nation might remaine as pledges and gages for the other. Of the Spaniards, he transported into Africke thirteene thousand; eight hundred and fifty foot, and twelve hundred horse; also eight hundred slingers of the Baleares. Besides these he selected foure thousand foot, all young men, and of qualitie, out of the best Cities of Spaine; which he appointed to be garrisoned in Carthage it selfe, not so much in regard of their forces, as that they might serve for hostages: for among those foure thousand, the best of the Spanish Citizens, and those that swayed most in their severall States, had their Sonnes or Kinsmen. He also sent with his brother, to guard the coast and Ports, fifty and seven Gallies; whereof thirty seven were presently armed, and appointed for the warre. Of Africans and other Nations, strangers, he left with him above twelve thousand foote, and two thousand horse, besides one and twenty Elephants.

Having in this sort taken order for the defence of Spaine & Africke; he sent Discoverers before him, to view the Passages of the Pyrenean Mountains, and of the Alpes. He also sent Embassadors to the Mountainers of the Pyrenes, and to the Gauls, to obtaine a quiet passage: that he might bring his Army entire into Italy, and not be compelled to diminish his forces, by any Warre in the way, till he came to encounter the Romans. His Embassadors and Discoverers being returned with good satisfaction; in the beginning of the Spring, he past over the River of Iberum, with an Army consisting of foure score and ten thousand foot, and twelve thousand horse. All those parts of Spaine, into which he had not entered before, he now subdued: and appointed Hanno (not that old enemy of his house, who sat still at Carthage) to govern Spaine on the East side of Iberum; to whom he left an Army of ten thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Being arrived at the borders of Spaine, some of his Spanish Souldiers returned home, without asking leave: which that others might not also doe, or attempt, he courteously dismissed many more, that seemed willing to be gone. Hereby it came to passe, that the journey seemed the lesse tedious unto those that accompanied him; as being not enforced by compulsion. With the rest of his Army, consisting now but of fifty thousand foot, and nine thousand horse, he past the Pyrenes, & entered into Gaule. He found the Gauls that bordered upon Spaine, ready in Armes, to forbid his entrance into their Country: but won them, with gentle speech, and rich presents that he bestowed upon their Leaders, to favour his Expedition. So without any molestation, he came to be the bank of Rhodanus; where dwelt, on each side of the River, a people called Volca. These were unacquainted with the cause of his comming; and therefore sought to keepe him from passing over the water. But he was greatly assisted by some of those Gauls, that inhabited on the West side of Rhodanus, to wit, by those of Favaretz and Lyonnais. For although many of them had transported themselves & their goods, into the Country of Dauphine, thinking

* Majorca, & Minorca.

This interrupted his intended voyage into Spain. Nevertheless hee sent away thither his brother Cn. Cornelius Scipio, with the greatest part of his fleet and Army, to trie what might be done against Asdrubal & the other Carthaginian Lieutenants in that Country. He himselfe, taking with him a few choice bands, returned by Sea to Pisa; and so passing through Tuscane into Lombardie, drew together the broken troupes of Manlius & Attilius that lately had bin beaten by the Gauls: with which forces he made head against the enemy, thinking to finde him over-laboured, with travaile of his painefull journey.

§. IV.

Scipio the Romane Consul overcome by Hannibal at Ticinum. Both of the Romane Consuls beaten by Hannibal, in a great battell at Trebia.

FIVE Moneths Hannibal had spent in his tedious journey from Carthage; what great muster he could make, when he had passed the Alpes, it is not easily found. Some reckon his foote at an hundred thousand, and his horse at twenty thousand; others report them to have beene only twenty thousand foot, and fixe hundred horse. Hannibal himselfe, in his Monument which he raised, in the Temple of Juno Lacinia, agreeth with the latter summe. Yet the Gauls, Ligurians, and others that joyined with him, are likely to have mightily increased his Army, in short space. But when hee marched Eastward from the banks of Rhodanus, he had with him eight and thirty thousand foot, & eight thousand horse; of which, all save those remembered by himselfe in the Inscription of his Altar in Juno's Temple, are like to have perished, by diseases, enemies, Rivers, and Mountains; which mischiefs had devoured, each, their severall shares.

Having newly passed the Alpes, and scarce refreshed his wearied Army in the Countrey of Piemont: hee sought to win the friendship of the Taurini, who lay next in his way. But the Taurini held warre at that time with the Insabrians, which were his good friends; and refused (perhaps for the same cause) his amity. Wherefore he assaulted their Towne; and wanne it by force in three daies. Their spoile served well to hearten his Army; and their calamity, to terrifie the Neighbour places. So the Gauls, without more ado, fell unto his side: many for feare, many also for good-will, according to their former inclination. This disposition ranne through the whole Countrey: which joyned, or was all in readinesse to joyne with the Carthaginians; when the newes of Scipio the Consul his arrivall, made some to be more advised, than the rest. The name of the Romans was terrible in those quarters; what was in the Carthaginians, experience had not yet laid open. Since therefore the Roman Consul was already gotten through the most defensible passages, ere any speech had beene heard of his approach: many late still for very feare, who else would faine have concluded a League with these new-come friends; and some, for greater feare, offered their service against the Carthaginians, whom nevertheless they had wished well to speed.

This wavering affection of the Province, whereinto they were entred, made the two Generals hasten to the trial of a battaile. Their meeting was at Ticinum, now called Pavia; where each of them wondered at the others expedition: Hannibal thinking it strange that the Consul, whom he had left behinde him on the other side of the Alpes, could meet him in the face, before he had well warmed himselfe in the Plaines; Scipio admiring the strange adventure of passing those Mountaines, and the great spirit of his Enemy. Neither were the Senate at Rome little amazed at Hannibal's successe, and sudden arrivall. Wherefore they dispatched a Messenger in all haste unto Sempronius, the other Consul, that was then in Sicilia, giving him to understand hereof: & letting him further know, that whereas he had bin directed to make the warre in Africa, it was now their pleasure that he should forebare to prosecute any such attempt, but that he should return the Army under his charge, with all possible speed, to save Italy it selfe. According to this order, Sempronius sent off his Fleet from Libyeum: with direction to land the Army at Arminum, a Port Towne not farre from Ravenna: quite another way from Carthage, whither he was making haste. In the meane while, Scipio & Hannibal were come so neere, that fight they must, ere they could part asunder. Hereupon, both of them prepared the mindes of their Souldiers, by the best arguments they had: unto which Hannibal added the Rhetoricke of a present example, that hee shewed upon certain prisoners of the Savoyans, which he brought along with him, fitted for the purpose, into Italy. For these, having beene no lesse miserably fettered and chained, than sparingly fed; and withall so often scourged on their naked bodies, as nothing was more in their desire, than to bee delivered from their miseries by any kinde of present death, were brought into the middle of the Army: where it was openly demanded, which of them would fight hand to hand with some other of his Companions, till the one of them were slaine, with condition, being the Victor, to receive his liberty, and some small reward. This was no sooner propounded, than all of them together accepted the offer. Then did Hannibal cause lots to be cast, which of them should enter the List, with such weapons, as the Chieftaines of the Gauls were wont to use in single combats. Every one of these unhappy men wished, that his owne lot might speed; whereby it should at least bee his good fortune, to end his miseries by death, if not to get a reward by victory. That couple, whose good hap it was to be chosen, fought resolutely: as rather desiring, than fearing death; and having none other hope, than in vanquishing. Thus were some few couples matched, it skilled not how equally: for all these poore creatures were willing, upon whatsoever uneven termes, to ridde themselves out of slavery. The same affection that was in these Combatants, and in their fellows which beheld them, wrought also upon the Carthaginians, for whom the spectacle was ordained. For they deemed happy, not only him, that by winning the victory had gotten his liberty, together with an horse and armour: but even him also, who being slaine in fight, had escaped that miserable condition, unto which his Companions were returned. Their Generall perceiving what impression this dumbe shew had wrought in them, began to admonish them of their owne condition, speaking to this effect: That hee had laid before them an example of their owne estates: seeing the time was at hand, wherein they were all to runne the same fortune, that these slaves had done; all to live victorious and rich; or all to die, or (which these prisoners esteemed farre more grievous) to live in a perpetuall slavery: That none of them all, in whom was common sense, could promise to himselfe any hope of life by flight; since the Mountaines, the Rivers, the great distance from their owne Countries, and the pursuit of mercilesse Enemies, must needs retrench all such impotent imaginations. He therefore prayed them to remember, that they, who had even now praised the fortune both of the Victor, and of the vanquished, would make it their owne case; seeing that there was never any in the world, appointed with such a resolution, that had ever bin broken, or beaten by their enemies. On the contrary, hee told them that the Romans, who were to fight upon their owne soile, & in view of their owne Townes; who knew as many ways to save themselves by flight, as they had bodies of men to fight withall, could no way entertaine such a resolution as theirs: seeing the same necessity, (to which nothing seemes impossible) did no way presse them, or constrain them. In this sort did Hannibal, with one substantiall argument, that there was no meane betwene victory and Death, encourage his Companions. For, (saith a great Capitaine of France) La commodité de la retraite avance la fuite; The commodity of a retreat, doth greatly advance a flat running away.

Scipio on the other side, after that he had given order for the laying of a bridge over the River of Ticinum, did not neglect to use the best arguments and reasons he could, to encourage the Army he led: putting them in minde of the great conquests and victories of their Ancestors; against how many Nations they had prevailed; and over how many Princes, their Enemies, they had triumphed. As for this Army commanded by Hannibal, although it were enough to tell them, that it was no better than of Carthaginians, whom in their late warre they had so often beaten, by Land and Sea; yet he praised them withall to consider, that at this time it was not only so diminished in numbers, as it rather seemed a troupe of Brigants and Theeves, than an Army likely to encounter the Romans, but so weather-beaten, and starved, as neither the men, nor horses, had strength or courage to sustaine the first charge that should be given upon them. Nay (saith he) yee your selves may make judgement what daring they have now remaining, after so many travailes and miseries; seeing when they were in their best strength, after they had past the Roane, their horse-men were not onely beaten by ours, and driven back to the very Trenches of their Camp, but Hannibal himselfe, fearing our approach, ranne head-long towards the Alpes: thinking it a lesse dishonour, to die there by frost, famine, and precipitation, than by the sharpe swords of the Romans, which had so often cut downe his people.

people, both in Africa and in Sicil. It was not long after this, ere the two Generals met: each being far advanced before the groffe of his Army, with his Horse; and the Roman having also with him some light-armed foot, to view the ground, and the enemies countenance. When they discovered the approach one of the other; Scipio sent before him his horsemen of the Gaules, to begin the fight, and bestowing his Darters in the void ground betweene their troupes; to assist them: himselfe with his Roman men at armes, followed softly in good order. The Gaules (whether desirous to trie the mettal of the Carthaginians, or hoping thereby to get favour of the Romans) behaved themselves courageously; and were as courageously opposed. Yet their foot that should have aided them, shrank at the first brunt, or rather fled cowardly away, without casting a Dart; for fear, of being troden downe by the enemies horse. This notwithstanding, the Gaules maintained the fight, and did more hurt than they received; as presuming that they were well backed. Neither was the Consull unmindfull to relieve them: their hardinesse deserting his aide; and the hasty flight of those that should have stood by them, admonishing him that it was needfull. Wherefore he adventured himselfe so farre, that he received a dangerous wound; and had beene left in the place, if his sonne (afterward surnamed Africanus) had not brought him off: though others give the honour of this rescue to a Ligurian slave. Whilst the Romans were busied in helping their Consull; an unexpected storme came driving at their backs, and made them looke about how to helpe themselves. Hannibal had appointed his Numidian light-horse, to give upon the Romans in the flanke, and to compass them about, whilst hee with his men at Armes sustained their charge, and met them in the face. The Numidians performed this very well: cutting in pieces the scattered foot, that ranne away at the first encounter; and then falling on the backs of those, whose looks were fastened upon Hannibal and Scipio. By this impression, the Romans were shuffled together, and routed: so that they all betooke them to their speed, and left unto their enemies the honour of the day.

When Scipio saw his horsemen thus beaten, and the rest of his Army thereby greatly discouraged; he thought it a point of Wisedome, having lost so many of his Fleet upon the first puffe of the winde, to take Port with the rest, before the extremest of the tempest overtook him. For he saw by the lowering morning what manner of day it was like to prove. Therefore his battaile of foot being yet unbroken, he in a manner stole the retreat; and recovered the bridge over Ticinus, which he had formerly built. But notwithstanding all the haste that he made, he left fixe hundred of his Reare behinde him: who were the last that should have passed; and staid to breake the bridge. Herein he followed this rule of a good man of war, Si certamen quandoque dubium videatur, tacitum miles arripit fugam: fuga enim aliquando laudanda: which must be understood in this sort: If a General of an Army, by some unprosperous beginnings doubt the successe; or finde his Army fearefull or wavering, it is more profitable to seale a safe retreat, than to abide the uncertaine event of battaile.

It was two daies after, ere Hannibal could passe the River; Scipio the whilst refreshing his men, and easing himselfe of his wound in Placentia. But as soone as Hannibal presented his Army before the Towne, offering battaile to the Romans, who durst not accept it, nor issue forth of their Campe: the Gaules, that hitherto had followed Scipio for feare, gathered out of his feare, courage to forsake him. They thought that now the long-desired time was come, in which better Chieftaines and Souldiers, than Anerostus, Britomarus, & Gessares, were come to helpe them: if they had the hearts to helpe themselves. Wherefore the same night they fell upon the Roman Campe; wounded and slue many; especially of those guards that kept watch at the gate; with whose heads in their hands, they fled over to the Carthaginians, & presented their service. Hannibal received them exceeding courteously, and dismiss them to their owne places: as men likely to be of more use to him, in perswading the rest of their Nation to become his Confederates, than in any other service at the present.

About the fourth watch of the night following, the Consull stole a retreat, as he had done before; but not with the like ease and security. Hannibal had a good eye upon him, and ere he could get farre, sent the Numidians after him: following himselfe with all his Army. That night the Romans had received a great blow, if the Numidians, greedy of spoile, had not staid to ransacke their campe; & thereby given time to all, save some few in Reare, that were slaine or taken, to passe the River of Trebia, and save themselves.

being both unable to travell by reason of his wound, and withall, finding it expedient to attend the comming of his fellow-Consull; incampes himselfe strongly upon the bankes of Trebia. Necessitie required that he should so doe; yet this diminished his reputation. For every day more and more of the Gaules fell to the Carthaginian side; among whom came in the late Bajus, that brought with them the Roman Commissioners, which they had taken in the late Insurrection. They had hitherto kept them as pledges, to redeeme their own hostages; but now they deliver them up to Hannibal, as tokens and pledges of their affections towards him; by whose help they conceived better hope of recovering their owne men and lands. In the meane while, Hannibal, being in great scarcity of victuals, attempted the taking of Clasidium, a Towne wherein the Romans had laid up all their store and munition. But there needed no force; a Brundusian, whom the Romans had trusted with keeping it, sold it for a little money.

The newes of these disasters, brought to Rome, filled the Senate and People, rather with a desire of hasty revenge, than any great sorrow for their losse received; seeing that in a manner, all their foot, wherein their strength and hope consisted, were as yet entire. They therefore halted away Sempronius, that was newly arrived, towards Ariminum, where the Armie, by him sent out of Sicil, awaited his comming. Hee therefore hasted thither; and from thence he marched speedily towards his Colleague: who attended him upon the bankes of Trebia. Both the Armies being joyned in one, the Consuls devised about that which remained to be done: Sempronius receiving from Scipio the relation of what had passed since Hannibal's arrivall; the fortune of the late fight; and by what error or misadventure the Romans were therein foiled: which Scipio chiefly laid on the revolt and treason of the Gaules.

Sempronius, having received from Scipio the state of the affaires in those parts; sought by all means to trie his fortune with Hannibal, before Scipio were recovered of his wounds, that thereby he might purchase to himselfe the sole glory of the victory, which he had already, in his imagination, certainly obtained. Hee also feared the election of the new Consuls: his owne time being well-nere expired. But Scipio perswaded the contrary; objecting the unskillfulness of the new-come souldiers: and withall, gave him good reason, to assure him that the Gaules, naturally unconstant, were upon termes of abandoning the party of the Carthaginians; those of them inhabiting between the rivers of Trebia and Po, being already revolted. Sempronius knew all this as well as Scipio: but being both guided and blinded by his ambition, he made haste to find out the dishonour which he might otherwise easily have avoided. This resolution of Sempronius was exceeding pleasing to Hannibal: who feared nothing so much as delay and losse of time. For the strength of his Armie, consisting in strangers, to wit, in Spaniards and Gaules; he no lesse feared the change of affection in the one, than the impatience of the other: who being farre from their owne home, had many passions moving them to turne their faces towards it. To further the desire of Sempronius, it fell out so, that about the same time, the Gaules, inhabiting neere unto Trebia, complained of injuries done by the Carthaginians. They did not supply Hannibal with necessaries, as he supposed that they might have done; although he daily reprehended their negligence, telling them, that for their sakes, and to set them at libertie, he had undertaken this Expedition. Seeing therefore how little they regarded his words, he was bold to be his owne Carver; and took from them by force, as much as he needed of that which they had. Hereupon they fled to the Romans for helpe: and, to make their tale the better, say that this wrong is done them, because they refused to joyne with Hannibal. Scipio cared not much for this: he suspected their falshood, and was assured of their mutability. But Sempronius affirmed, that it stood with the honour of Rome, to preserve their Confederates from suffering injurie: and that hereby might be won the friendship of all the Gaules. Therefore he sent out a thousand horse; which comming unlooked for upon Hannibal's forragers, and finding them heavie laden, cut many of them in pieces, and chased the rest even into their own campe. This indignitie made the Carthaginians fallie out against them: who caused them to retire faster than they came. Sempronius was ready to back his owne men; and repelled the enemies. Hannibal did the like. So that at length, all the Roman Armie was drawne forth; and a battell ready to be fought, if the Carthaginian had not refused it.

This victory (for so the Consull would have it called) made the Romans in generall desirous desirous to trie the maine chance in open field: all the persuasions of Scipio to the contrary notwithstanding. Of this disposition Hannibal was advertised by the Gauls, his spies, that were in the Roman Campe. Therefore he bethought himselfe how to help forward the victorie, by adding some stratagem to his forces: he found in the hollow of a water-courfe, over-grown with high reed, a fit trench to cover an ambush. Therein he callt his brother Mago with a thousand choyce horse, and as many foot. The rest of his Armie, after they had well warmed, and well fed themselves in their campe, he led into the field, and marched towards the Consul. Early in the morning, he had sent over Trebia some companies of Numidian light-horse, to brave the enemy, and draw him forth to a bad dinner, ere he had broken his fast. Sempronius was ready to take any opportunity to fight: to and therefore not onely issued out of his Campe, but foorded the River of Trebia, in a most cold and miserable day; his foot being wet almost to the arme-holes: which, together with the want of food, did so enfeeble and cool their courages, as they wanted force to handle the armes they bare. Strong they were in foot, as well of their owne Nation, as of the Latines: having of the one fixtene, of the other twenty thousand. The masse of these they ranged in a grosse Battalion, guarded on the flanks with three thousand horse, thrusting their light-armed, and Darters, in loose troupes in the head of the rest, in the nature of a Vanguard. The Carthaginian numbers of foot were in a manner equal to their enemies, in horse they had by far the better, both in number and goodnesse. When therefore the Roman horse, ranged on the flanks of their foot, were broken by the Numidians, when their foot were charged both in front and flanke, by the Spaniards, Gauls, and Elephants; when finally the whole Armie was unawares prest in the Reare, by Mago and his two thousand, that rose out of their place of ambush, then fell the Romans, by heaps, under the enemies swords: and being beaten down, as well fighting in disorder, as flying towards the River, by the horsemen that pursued them, there escaped no more of six and thirtie thousand, than ten thousand of all sorts, Horse and Foot.

Three great errors Sempronius committed, of which every one deferred to be recompensed with the losse that followed. The first was, that he fought with Hannibal in a Champeine, being by far inferior in horse, and withall, thereby subject to the African Elephants, which in inclosed or un-even grounds and wood-lands, would have bin of no use. His second error was, that he made no discoverie of the place upon which he fought, whereby he was grossely over-reacht, and insnared, by the ambush which Hannibal had laid for him. The third was, that he drencht his footmen with empty stomachs, in the River of Trebia, even in a most cold and frostie day, whereby, in effect, they lost the use of their limbs. For, as one saith well, There is nothing more inconvenient and perillous, than to present an armie tired with travell, to an enemy fresh and fed; since where the strength of body faileth, the generosity of minde is but as an unprofitable vapour.

The broken remainder of the Roman Armie, was collected by Scipio, who got thence with into Placentia; stealing away the same night, which was exceeding rainy, from the Carthaginians, who either perceived him not, because of the showres; or would not perceive him, because they were over-wearied. Sempronius escaped with extreme danger, flying through the Countrie that was over-run by the enemies horse. He was attended by more, than were requisite in a secret flight; yet by fewer, than could have made resistance, if the enemy had met with him. Nevertheless he got away, and came to Rome, where he did his office in choosing new Consuls for the yeere following: and then returned into his Province, with a fresh supply against Hannibal.

§. V.

The departure of Hannibal from the Cisalpine Gauls into Herruria. Flaminius the Roman Consul saine, and his Armie destroyed by the Carthaginians, at the Lake of Thrasymene.

THE Winter growing on apace, was very sharpe, and unfit for service: to the great contentment of the Romans, who, being not able to keepe the field, lay warme in Placentia, and Cremona. Yet Hannibal did not suffer them to rest very quiet; but vexed them with continuall Alarms: assaying divers places, and taking some; beating the Gauls their adherents, and winning the Lyguriens to his party, who presented him, in token of their faithfull love, with two Roman Quettors, and Treasurers, two Colonels, and five Gentlemen, the Sons of Senators, which they had intercepted. These, and in general all such prisoners as he had of the Romans, he held in streight places, loaden with irons, and miserably fed: those of their followers hee not onely well intreated, but sent them to their Countreies without ranfome; with this protestation, That he therefore undertooke the Warre in Italie, to free them from the oppression of the Romans. By these means hee hoped, and not in vaine, to draw many of them to his partie and assistance. But the Gauls were not capable of such persuasions. They stood in feare, lest he should make their Countrie the seat of War; and perhaps take it from them. They were also more grieved than reason willed them, at his feeding upon them, and wasting their territories. Wherefore some of them conspired against his life; others admonished him of the danger: and these that gave him the advice, were ready soon after to practise against him; but were in like sort detected. He was therefore glad to use Perwigs of haire, and false beards of divers colours; to the end, that he might not be descried, nor knowne, to those that should undertake to make him away. Faine he would have passed the Appenines, upon the first appearance of Spring; but was compelled by the violence of weather, to tarry among the Gauls, till he had seen more swallows than one. At length, when the yeare was somewhat better opened, he resolved to take his leave of these giddie companions, &c. bring the war nearer to the gates of Rome. So away he went, having his Armie greatly increased with Ligurians and Gauls; more serviceable friends abroad, than in their own Countrie. That the passage of the Appenine Mountains was troublesome, I hold it needlesse to make any doubt. Yet since the Romans found no memorable impediment, in their marches that way: the great vexation which fell upon Hannibal, when he was travelling through and over them, ought in reason to be imputed rather to the extremity of Winter, that makes all wayes soule, than to any intolerable difficultie in that journey. Nevertheless, to avoide the length of way, together with the resistance and fortifications, which may not improbably be thought to have beene erected upon the ordinary passages towards Rome: he chose at this time, though it were with much trouble, to travell through the Fennes and rotten grounds of Tuscane. In those Marshes and bogges, he lost all his Elephants; save one, together with the use of one of his eyes; by the moistnesse of the ayre, and by lodging on the cold ground, and wading through deepe mire and water. In briefe, after hee had with much ado recovered the firme and fertile Plaines; he lodged about Arretium: where he somewhat refreshed his wearied followers, and heard newes of the Romish Consuls.

C. Flaminius, and Cn. Servilius had of late bin chosen Consuls for this year: Servilius a tractable man, and wholly governed by advice of the Senate; Flaminius an hot-headed popular Orator; who having once been robbed (as he thought) of his Consulship, by a device of the Senators, was afraid to be served so againe, unless he quickly finished the war. This jealous Consul thought it not best for him to be at Rome, when he entred into his Office, lest his adversaries, by feining some religious impediment, should detain him within the Citie, or find other businesse for him at home, to disappoint him of the honour that he hoped to get in the war. Wherefore he departed secretly out of the Town; and meant to take possession of his Office, when the day came, at Arretium. The Fathers (so the Senators were called) highly displeased with this, revoked him by Embassadors: but he neglected their injunction; and hasting to meet with the Carthaginians, took his way to Arretium, where he shortly found them.

The fierie disposition of this Consul, promised unto Hannibal great assurance of victory. Therefore he provoked, with many indignities, the vehement nature of the Roman: hoping thereby to draw him unto fight, ere Servilius came with the rest of the Armie. All the Countrie between Fesula and Arretium he put to fire and sword, even under the Consuls nose; which was enough to make him stirre, that would not have sitten still, though Hannibal had been quiet. It is true that a great Captaine of France hath said; Plus gaste n'est pas perdu; A wasted Countrie is not thereby lost. But by this waste of the Countrie, Flaminius thought his owne honour to be much impaired; and therefore advanced towards the Enemy. Many advised him (which had indeed been best) to have patience a while, and stay for his Colleague. But of this hee could not abide to heare: saying, that hee came not to defend Arretium, whilst the Carthaginians were burning downe all Italie before them, to the gates of Rome. Therefore heooke horse, and commanded the Armie to march. It is reported as ominous, that one of their Ensignes stucke so fast in the ground, as it could not be plucked up by the Ensigne-bearer. Of this tale, whether true or false, Tully makes a jeast; saying, That the cowardly knave did faintly pull at it (as going now to fight) having hardly pitched it into the earth. Neither was the answer of Flaminius (if it were true) disgraceable hereto: for he commanded, that it should be digged up, if eare had made the hands too weak to lift it: asking withall, whether letters were not come from the Senate, to hinder his proceedings. Of this their jealousie, both he and the Senate that did give him cause, are likely to repent.

All the Territorie of Corona, as far as to the Lake of Thrasymene, was on a light fire; which whilest the Consul thought to quench with his enemies blood, he pursued Hannibal so unadvisedly, that he fell with his whole Armie into an ambush cunningly layd for him, betweene the Mountaines of Corona and the Lake. There he was charged unawares, on all sides, (save onely where that great Lake of Perusia permitted neither his enemies to come at him, nor him to flye from them) knowing not which way to turne, or make resistance. So was he flaine in the place, accompanied with fifteene thousand dead carcases of his Countymen. About fixe thousand of his men, that had the Vanguard, tooke courage, as for the most part it happens, out of desperation; and breaking through the enemies, that stood in their way, recovered the tops of the Mountaines. If thesed returned, and given charge upon the Carthaginians backs, it was thought that they might have greatly amended, if not wholly altered, the fortune of the day. But that violence of their feare, which, kindled by necessity, had wrought the effects of hardinesse, was well asswaged, when they ceased to despair of saving their lives by flight. They stood still, in a cold sweat, upon the Hill-top, hearing under them a terrible noise, but not any way discovering how things went, because of the great fogge that held all that morning. When it grew toward noone the ayre was cleared, and they might plainly discern the lamentable slaughter of their fellows. But they stayd not to lament: for it was high time, they thought, to be gone ere they were desferied and attached by the enemies horse. This they should have thought upon sooner, since they had no minde to returne unto the fight. For desferied they were, and Maharbal sent after them; who over-tooke them by night in a Village, whiche he surrounded with his horse: and so they yeelded the next day, rendering up their armes, upon his promise of their lives and liberties.

This accord Hannibal refused to confirme; saying, That it was made by Maharbal without sufficient warrant, as wanting his authority to make it good. Herein he taught them (yet little to his owne honour) what it was to keepe no faith: and fitted them with a trick of their owne. For if it were lawfull unto the Romans, to alter covenants, or adde unto them what they listed; if the Carthaginians must be faine to pay certaine hundreds, and yet more hundreds of talents, besides their first bargain; as also to renounce their interest in Sardinia, and be limited in their Spanish Conquests, according to the good pleasure of the Romans, whose present advantage is more ample, than the conditions of the late concluded peace: then can Hannibal be as a Roman, as themselves; and make them know, that perfidiousnesse gaineth no more in prosperitie, than it loseth in the change of fortune. Fifteene thousand Italian prisoners, or thereabout, he had in his hands: of which, all that were not Romans, he set free without ranfome; protesting, as he had done before, that it was for their sakes, and to free them and others from the Roman tyrannie, that he had undertaken this war. But the Romans hee kept in streight prison, and in fetters, making them learne to eat hard meat. This was a good way to breed in the people of Italie, if not alove of Carthage, yet a contempt of Rome: as if this war had not concerned the generall safetie, but onely the preserving of her owne necke from the yoke of slavery, which her over-strong enemies would thrust upon her in revenge of her oppressions. But an ancient reputation, confirmed by successe of many ages, is not lost in one or two battels. Wherefore more is to be done, ere the Carthaginians can get any Italian Partisans.

Presently after the battell of Thrasymene, C. Centronius, with foure thousand Roman horse, drew neere unto the Campe of Hannibal. He was sent from Ariminum by Servilius the other Consul, to increase the strength of Flaminius: but, coming too late, he increased only the misadventure. Maharbal was employed by Hannibal, to intercept the companie companie; who finding them amazed with report which they had newly heard of the great overthrow, charged them, and brake them: and killing almost halfe of them, drave the rest unto an high piece of ground, whence they came downe, and simply yeelded to mercie the next day. Servilius himselfe was in the meane while skimming with the Gaules; against whom he had wrought no matter of importance, when the newes was brought him of his Colleagues overthrow and death in Hetruria; that made him hasten backe to the defence of Rome.

In these passages, it is easie to discern the fruits of popular jealousie, which perswaded the Romans to the yearly change of their Commanders in the wars; which greatly endangered, and retarded the growth of that Empire. Certaine it is, that all men are farre better taught by their owne errors, than by the examples of their foregoers. Flaminius had heard, in what a trap Sempronius had beene taken up but the yeare before, by this subtle Carthaginian; yet suffered hee himselfe to be caught soone after in the same manner. Hee had also belike forgotten, how Sempronius, fearing to be prevented by a new Consul, and ambitious of the sole honour of beating Hannibal in battell, without helpe of his companion Scipio, had beene rewarded with shame and losse: else would he not, contrary to all good advice, have beene so hastic to fight, before the arrivall of Servilius. If Sempronius had beene continued in his charge, it is probable that he would have taken his companie with him the second time, and have searched all suspected places, proper to have shadowed an ambush: both which this new Consul Flaminius neglected. We may boldly avow it, that by being continued in his government of France ten years, Cesar brought that mighty Nation, together with the Helvetians and many of the German, under the Roman yoke; into which parts had there beene every yeare a new Lieutenant sent, they would hardly, if ever, have beene subdued. For it is more than the best wit in the World can doe, to informe it selfe, within one yeare compass, of the nature of a great Nation, of the Factions of the Places, Rivers, and of all good helps, whereby to prosecute a war to the best effect. Our Princes have commonly left their Deputies in Ireland three years; whence, by reason of the shortnesse of that their time, many of them have returned as wife as they went out; others have profited more, and yet when they began but to know the first rudiments of War, and government, fitting the Country, they have bin called home, & new Apprentices sent in their places, to the great prejudice both of this and that Estate. But it hath ever beene the course of the World rather to follow old errors than to examine them; and of Princes and Governours, to uphold their stollish ignorance, by the old examples and policie of other ages and people; though neither likenesse of time, of occasion, or of any other circumstance, have perswaded the imitation.

S. VI.

How Q. Fabius the Roman Dictator, sought to consume the force of Hannibal, by lingering to war. Minutius the Master of the Horse, honoured and advanced by the People, for bold and successefull attempting; adventures rashly upon Hannibal, and is like to perish with his Armie, but rescued by Fabius.

Greatly were the Romans amazed at this their ill successe, and at the danger apparent; which threatened them in more terrible manner, than ever did war, since Rome it selfe was taken. They were good Souldiers; and so little accustomed to receive an overthrow, that when Pyrrius had beaten them, once and againe, in open field, all Italy was strangely affected with his successe, and held him in admiration, as one that could worke wonders. But Pyrrius his quarrell was not grounded upon hate: hee only sought honour, and fought (as it were) upon a braverie: demeaning himselfe like a courteous enemy. This Carthaginian detested the whole Roman name; against which he burned with desire of revenge. Ticinum, Trebia, and Thrasymene, witnessed his purpose, & his abilitie. Which to withstand, they fled unto a remedie that had long bin out of use, and created a Dictator. The Dictators power was greater than the Consuls, and scarcely subject unto controll of the whole Citie. Wherefore this Officer was seldom chosen, but upon some extremitie, and for no longer time than fixe moneths. Hee was to be named by one of the Consuls, at the appointment of the Senate: though it were so, that the Consul (if he stood upon his prerogative) might name whom he pleased. At this time the one Consul being dead, and the other too farre off, the People tooke upon them, as having supreme authority, to give the Dignity by their election, to Q. Fabius Maximus; the best reputed man of war in the Citie. Novum factum novum consilium expetit. Contrarie winds, contrarie courtes. Q. Fabius chose M. Minutius Rufus Master of the horse; which Officer was customarily as the Dictators Lieutenant; though this Minutius grew afterwards famous, by taking more upon him.

The first act of Fabius, was the reformation of somewhat amiss in matters of Religion: a good beginning, and commendable; had the Religion beene also good. But if it were true (as Livie reports it) that the Bookes of Sybil were consulted, and gave direction in this businesse of devotion; then must we believe, that those bookes of Sybil, preserved in Rome, were dictated by an evill spirit. For it was ordained, that some Vow, made in the beginning of this warre to Mars, should be made anew, and amplified; as having not bin rightly made before: also that great playes should be vowed unto Jupiter, and a Temple to Venus; with such other trumperie. This vehemencie of superstition, proceeds alwaies from vehemencie of feare. And surely this was a time, when Rome was exceedingly distempered with passion: whereof that memorable accident, of two women that suddenly died, when they saw their sons returne alive from Thrasymene, may serve to bare witness; though it be more properly an example of motherly love. The walls and towers of the Citie were now repaired and fortified; the bridges upon Rivers were broken downe; and all care taken for defence of Rome it selfe. In this tumult, when the Dictator was newly set forth against Hannibal; word was brought that the Carthaginian fleet had intercepted all the supply, that was going to Cn. Scipio in Spain. Against these Carthaginians, Fabius commanded Servilius the Consul to put to Sea; and taking up all the ships about Rome and Osia, to pursue them: whilest he, with the Legions, attended upon Hannibal. Fourre Legions he had levied in haste; and from Ariminum he received their army, which Servilius the Consul had conducted thither.

With these forth-with he followed apace after Hannibal; not to fight, but to affront him. And knowing well, what advantage the Numidian horse had over the Romans, he alwayes lodged himselfe on high grounds, and of hard access. Hannibal in the meane while, pursuing his victorie, had ranged over all the Countrey, and used all manner of cruelty towards the inhabitants; especially to those of the Roman Nation, of whom he did put to the sword, all that were able to bear arms. Passing by Spoleum and Anconae he incamped upon the Adriatick shores; refreshed his diseased, and over-travelled Companies, armed his Africans after the manner of the Romans, and made his dispatches for Carthage; presenting his friends, which were in effect all the Citizens, with part of the spoiles that he had gotten. Having refreshed his army, fed his horses, cured his wounded Souldiers, and (as Polybius hath it) healed his horse heels of the scratches, by washing their pasternes in old wine: he followed the coast of the Adriatick Sea towards Apulia, a Northerne Province of the Kingdome of Naples; spoiling the Marrucini, and all other Nations lying in his way. In all this ground that he over-ran, he had not taken any one Citie: onely he had assailed Spoleum, a Colonie of the Romans; and finding it well defended, presently gave it over. The malice of a great Armie is broken, and the force oft spent in a great siege. This the Protestant Armie found true at Poitiers, a little before the battell of Moncousours and their victorious enemies, anon after, at S. Jeand'Angely. But Hannibal was more wise. He would not engage himselfe in any such enterprize, as should detain him, and give the Romans leave to take breath. All his care was to weaken them in force and reputation: knowing, that when once he was absolute Master of the field, it would not be long ere the walled Cities would open their gates, without expecting any engine of battery. To this end he presented Fabius with battell, as soon as he saw him; and provoked him with all manner of bravadoes. But Fabius would not bite. He well knew the differences between souldiers bred up, ever since they were Boyes, in war and in blood, trained and hardened in Spain, made proud and adventurous by many victories there, and of late by some notable acts against the Romans; and such, as had no other seen the enemy, than bin vanquished by him. Therefore he attended the Carthaginian so neer, as he kept him from traggling too far; & preserved the countrey from utter spoile. He injured his men by little and little, & made them acquainted with dangers by degrees; and he brought them first to looke on the Lyon as farre off, that in the end he might sit on his taile.

Now

Now Minutius had a contrary disposition, and was as fiery as Flaminius; taxing Fabius with cowardize and feare. But all stirred not this well-advised Commander. For wife men are no more moved with such noise, than with winde bruised out of a bladder. There is nothing of more indiscretion and danger, than to pursue misfortune: it wasteth itselfe sooner by sufferance, than by opposition. It is the invading Army that desires battell: and this of Hannibal, was both the invading and victorious. Fabius therefore suffered Hannibal to crosse the Apennines, and to fall upon the most rich and pleasant Territories of Campania; neither could he by any arguments be perswaded, to adventure the Roman Armie in battell: but being far too weak in horse, he alwayes kept the Hills and fast grounds. When Hannibal saw he could by no meanes draw this wary Dictator to fight, that the Winter came on, and that the Towns stood firm for the Romans, whose Legions were in fight, though as farre off; he resolved to rest his Army, that was laden with spoyle, in some plentifull and assured place, till the following spring. But ere this he done, he must passe along by the Dictators campe, that hung over his head upon the hills of Callicula, and Caslinum: for other way there was none, by which he might issue out of that goodly garden-countrey, which he had already wasted, into places more abundant of provision for his wintering. It was by mere error of his guide, that he first entered within these streights. For he would have bin directed unto Caslinum, whence he might both assay the faire Citie of Capua, which had made him friendly promises under hand, and hinder the Romans from comming neere it to prevent him. But his guide misunderstood the Carthaginian pronunciation, and conducted him awry another way, from Caslinum to Caslinum, whence Fabius hoped that he should not easily escape. Now began the wisdom of Fabius to grow into credit; as if he had taken the Carthaginians in a trap, and won the victory without blowes. But Hannibal reformed this opinion, and freed himselfe, by a sleight invention, yet serving the turne as well as a better. In driving the country, he had gotten about two thousand King, whose homes he dressed with dry faggots, and setting fire to them in the darke night, caused them to be driven up the hills. The spectacle was strange, and therefore terrible; especially to those that knew it to be sworke of a terrible enemy. What it should meane, Fabius could not tell; but thought it expedient to circumvent him, and therefore kept within his Trenches. They that kept the hill-tops were horribly afraid, when some of these fiery Monsters were gotten beyond them; and ran therefore hastily away, thinking that the enemies were behind their backs; and fell among the light-armed Carthaginians, that were no lesse afraid of them. So Hannibal, with his whole Army, recovered sure ground without molestation: where he staid till the next morning, and then brought off his light footmen, with some slaughter of the Romans, that began to hold them in skirmish. After this, Hannibal made semblance of taking his journey towards Rome: and the Dictator coasted him in the wonted maner; keeping still on high grounds, betweene him and the Citie, whilest the Carthaginian wasted all the Plains. The Carthaginian tooke Geryon, an old ruinous Town in Apulia, forsaken by the Inhabitants, which hee turned into Barnes and Store-houses for winter, and incamped under the broken wall. Other matter of importance hee did none: but the time passed idly, till the Dictator was called away to Rome, about some businesse of Religion, and left the Armie in charge with Minutius the Master of the horse.

Minutius was glad of this good occasion to shew his owne sufficiency. He was fully perswaded, that his Romans, in plaine field, would be too hard for the Africans and Spaniards: by whom if they had beene foiled already twice or thrice, it was not by open force, but by subtilty and ambush, which he thought himselfe wise enough to prevent. All the Armie was of his opinion; and that so earnestly, as he was preferred, by judgement of the Souldiers, in worthinesse to command, before the cold and warie Fabius. In this jollity of conceit, he determined to fight. Yet had he beene peremptorily forbidden so to doe, by the Dictator; the breach of whose command was extreme perill of death. But the honour of the victory, which he held undoubtedly his owne; and the love of the Armie, and the friends that hee had at home bearing office in Rome, were enough to save him from the Dictators rods and axes, tooke he the matter never so haughtily. Hannibal on the other side was no lesse glad, that he should play with a more adventurous gamester. Therefore he drew neer, & to provoke the Romans, sent forth a third part of his Armie to waste the Countrey. This was boldly done, seeing that Minutius incamped hard by him: but it seemed, that he now despised those whom he had so often vanquished. There was a piece of high ground between the two Campes; which because it would be commodious to him that could occupie it, the Carthaginians seized upon by night with two thousand of their light-armed. But Minutius, by plain force, won it from them the next day; and intrenching himselfe thereupon, became their neerer neighbour.

The maine businesse of Hannibal at this time was, to provide abundantly, not only for his men, but for his horses, which he knew to be the chiefe of his strength; that hee might keepe them in good heart against the next Summer: if besides this he could give to the Romans another blow, it would increase his reputation, incourage his owne men, terrifie his enemies, and give him leave to forrage the Countrey at will. Since therefore Minutius did not in many dayes issue forth of his Campe, the Carthaginian sent out (as before) a great number of his men, to fetch in harvest. This advantage Minutius wisely espied, andooke. For he led forth his Armie, and setting it in order, presented battell to Hannibal, that was not in case to accept it, even at his owne Trenches. His horses, and all his light Armature, divided into many companies, he sent abroad against the forragers; who being dispersed over all the fields, and loaden with bootie, could make no resistance. This angered Hannibal, that was not able to helpe them; but worse did it anger him, when the Romans took heart to assaile his Trenches. They perceived that it was meere weaknesse, which held him within his Campe, and therefore were bold to despise his great name, that could not resist their present strength. But in the heat of the businesse, Asdrubal came from Geryson with foure thousand men, being informed of the danger, by those that had escaped the Roman horse. This imboldned Hannibal to issue forth against the Romans; to whom neverthelesse he did not such hurt, as he had received.

For this piece of service Minutius was highly esteemed by the Armie, and more highly by the people at Rome, to whom he sent the newes, with somewhat greater boast than truth. It seemed no small matter, that the Roman Armie had recovered spirit, so far forth that it dared to set upon Hannibal in his own camp; and that in fo doing, it came off with the better. Every man therefore praised the Master of the horse, that had wrought this great alteration; and consequently, they grew as far out of liking with Fabius, and his timorous proceedings, thinking that he had not done any thing wisely, in all his Dictatorship: saying that he chose such a worthy Lieutenant; whereas indeed in no other thing he had so greatly erred. But the Dictator was not so joyfull of a little good lucke, as angry with the breach of discipline; and fearefull of greater danger, thereon likely to ensue. He said that he knew his owne place, and what was to be done; that he would teach the Master of the horse to doe so likewise; and make him give account of what he had done, if he were Dictator: speaking it openly, That good successe, issuing from bad counsell, was more to be feared, than calamitie; for as much as the one bred a foolish confidence, the other taught men to be warie. Against these sermons every one cried out, especially Metellus, a Tribune of the people: which Office warranted him to speake, and doe what he list, without feare of the Dictator. Is it not enough (said hee) that this our onely Man, chosen to be General, and Lord of the Towne, in our greatest necessitie, hath done no manner of good, but suffered all Italy to be wasted before his eyes, to the utter shame of our State; unless he also hinder others, from doing better than himselfe can, or dares? It were good to consider what he means by this. Into the place of C. Flaminius he hath not chosen any new Consul all this while; Servilius is sent away to Sea, I know not why: Hannibal and he, have as it were taken Truce; Hannibal sparing the Dictators grounds: (for Hannibal had indeed forborne to spoyle some grounds of Fabius, that so he might bring him into envie and suspition) and the Dictator giving him leave to spoyle all others, without impeachment. Surely his drift is even this: he would have the war to last long, that he himselfe might be long in Office, and have the sole Government both of our Citie and Armies. But this must not be so. It were better, that the Commonalty of Rome, which gave him this authority, should againe take it from him, and conferre it upon one more worthy. But lest, in moving the people hereto, I should seeme to doe him injurie; thus farre forth I will regard his honour: I will only propound, That the Master of the Horse may be joynd in equall authority with the Dictator; a thing not more new, nor lesse necessary, than was the election of this Dictator, by the People.

Though all men, even the Senators, were ill perswaded of the course which Fabius had taken against Hannibal, as being neither plausible, nor seeming beneficiall at the present; yet was there none so injurious, as to thinke that his generall intent, and care of the Weale publike, was lesse than very honourable. Whereas therefore it was the manner, in passing of any act, that some man of credit and authority, besides the propounder, should stand up, and formally deliver his approbation; not one of the principall Citizens was found so impudent, as to offer that open disgrace, both unto a worthy Personage, and (therewithall) unto that dignity, whose great power had fired the State at severall times, from the greatest dangers. Onely C. Terentius Varro, who the yeere before had bene Prætor, was glad of such an opportunity, to winne the favour of the Multitude. This fellow was the sonne of a Butcher, afterwards became a Shop-keeper; and being of a contentious spirit, grew, by often brabbling, to take upon him as a Pleader, dealing in poore mens causes. Thus by little and little he got into Office; and rose by degrees, being advanced by those, who in hatred of the Nobility favoured his very basenesse. And now he thought the time was come, for him to give a hard push at the Consulship; by doing that, which none of the great men, fearing or favouring one another, either durst or would. So he made an hot invective, not only against Fabius, but against all the Nobility; saying, That it grieved them to see the people doe well, and take upon them what belonged unto them, in matter of Government; That they sought to humble the Commons by povertie, and to impoverish them by Warre; especially by warre at their owne doores, which would soone consume every poore mans living, and finde him other worke to thinke upon, than matter of State. Therefore he bade them to be wise; and since they had found one (this worthy Master of the Horse) that was better affected unto them and his Countrey, to reward him according to his good deserts; and give him authority, according as was propounded by the Tribune, that so he might be encouraged and enabled to proceed as hee had begun. So the Act passed. Before this busie day of contention, Fabius had dispatched the election of a new Consul, which was M. Aulius Regulus, in the roome of C. Flaminius; and, having finished all requisite businesse, went out of Towne, perceiving well, that he should not be able to withstand the multitude, in hindering the decree. The newes of Minutius his advancement, was at the campe as soone as Fabius: so that his old Lieutenant, and new Colleague, began to treat with him as a Companion; asking him at the first, in what fort hee thought it best to divide their authority: whether that one, one day; and the other, the next; or each of them successively, for some longer time, should command in chiefe. Fabius briefly told him, That it was the pleasure of the Citizens, to make the Master of the horse equall to the Dictator, but that he should never be his superiour: Hee would therefore divide the Legions with him, by lot, according to the custome. Minutius was not herewith greatly pleased; for that with halfe of the Armie he could not worke such wonders as otherwise he hoped to accomplish. Neverthelesse he meant to doe his best, and to taking his part of the Armie, incamped about a mile and a halfe from the Dictator. Needfull it was (though Livie seems to take him for it) that he should so doe: For where two severall Commanders are not subordinate one unto another, nor joynd in Commission, but have each intire and absolute charge of his owne followers, there are the forces (though belonging to one Prince or State) not one, but two distinct Armies: in which regard, one Campe shall not hold them both, without great inconvenience. Polibius neither findes fault with this distinction, nor yet reports, that Fabius was unwilling to command in chiefe successively (as the two Consuls used) with Minutius, by turns. He saith that Minutius was very refractary; and so proud of his advancement, that continually he opposed the Dictator: who thereupon referred it to his choyce, either to divide the forces betweene them, as is said before, or else to have command over all by course. This is likely to be true. For Natures impatient of subjection, when once they have broken loose from the rigour of authority, love nothing more, than to contest with it: as if herein consisted the prooffe and assurance of their libertie.

he would worke, and that he would aske no more, than once to have a sight of Hannibal, whom he promised to vanquish the very first day: yet the providence and care of Paulus travelled more earnestly toward the accomplishment of that, whereof his fellow vainly boasted. He wrote unto the two old Consuls Servilius and Atilius, desiring them to abstaine from hazzard of the maine chance; but nevertheless, to plic the Carthaginians with daily skirmish, and weaken them by degrees: that when hee and his Colleague should take the field, with the great Armie which they were now levying, they might finde the foure old Legions well accustomed to the enemy, and the enemy well weakened to their hands. He was also very strict in his Musters; wherein the whole Senate assisted him so carefully, as if in this Action they meant to refute the slanders, with which Terentius and his Adherents had burdened them. What number of men they raised, is uncertaine. Fourescore thousand foot, at the least, and fixe thousand horse, they were strong in the field, when the day came, which Varro had so greatly desired, of looking upon Hannibal.

Hiero, the old King of Syracuse, as he had relieved the Carthaginians, when they were distressed by their owne Mercenaries; so did he now send help to Rome, a thousand Archers, and Slingers, with great quantitie of Wheate, Barlie, and other provisions: fearing nothing more, than that one of these two mightie Cities should destroy the other, whereby his owne estate would fall to ruine, that stood upright, by having them somewhat evenly ballanced. He gave them also counsell, to send forces into Africa; if (perhaps) by that means they might divert the warre from home. His gifts, and good advice were lovingly accepted; and instructions were given to Tum Othacilius the Prator, which was to goe into Sicily, that he should accordingly passe over into Africke, if hee found it expedient.

The great Levies, which the Romans made at this time, doe much more serveto declare their puissance, than any, though larger accompt by Poll, of such as were not easily drawne into the field, and fitted for service. For, besides these Armies of the Consuls, and that which went into Sicily, twentie five thousand, with L. Posthumus Albinus, another of the Prators, went against the Gauls, to reclaim that Province, which the presence of Hannibal through it, had taken from them. The contemplation of this their present strength, might well embolden them to doe as they did. They sent Embassadors to Philip, the son of Demetrius, King of Macedon, requiring him to deliver into their hands Demetrius Pharius: who, having been their subject, and rebell, was fled into his Kingdom. They also sent to the Illyrians, to demand their tribute; whereof the day of payment was already past. What answer they received, it is not knowne: only this is known, that Demetrius Pharius was not sent unto them; and that Philip henceforth began to have an eye upon them, little to their good. As for the Illyrian money, by the shifts that they were driven soon after to make, it will appeare, that the one halfe of it (how little soever) would have bin welcome to Rome, and accepted, without any cavill about forfeiture for non-payment of the whole.

Whilst the Citie was busied in these cares, the old Consuls lay as neere unto Hannibal as possibly they could, without incurring the necessity of a battell. Many skirmishes they had with him; wherein their successe, for the most part, was rather good than great. Yet one mischance not only diminished the honour of their other services, but was indeed the occasion to draw on the miserie following. Hannibal, for the most part of that time, made his abode at Geryon; where lay all his store for the Winter. The Romans, to be neere him, lodged about Cannusum; and, that they might not be driven to turne aside for all necessities, to the losse of good opportunities, they bestowed much of their provisions in the Castle of Canna: for the towne was razed the yeere before. This place Hannibal wan, and thereby not only furnished himselfe, but compelled his enemies to want many needfull things, unless they would be troubled with farre carriage. Besides this, and more to his advantage, he enabled himselfe to abide in that open Countrey, fit for the service of his horse, longer than the Romans, having so many mouths to feed, could well endure to tarry; without offering battell, which hee most desired. Of this mishap when Servilius had informed the Senate, letting them understand, how this Peeces taken by Hannibal, would serve him to command no small part of the Countrey adjacent; it then seemed needfull, even unto the Fathers themselves, to adventure battell with the Carthaginian, rather than suffer him thus to take roote in the ground.

of Italy. Nevertheless, answer was returned unto Servilius, that he should have patience yet awhile: for that the Consuls would shortly be there, with a power sufficient to doe as need required.

When all things were ready in the City, and the season of the yeere commodious to take the field, the two Consuls, with their Army, set forth against Hannibal. This was alwaies done with great solemnity: especially, whensoever they went forth to warre against any noble or redoubted Enemy. For Sacrifices, and solemn Vowes, were made unto Jupiter, and the rest of their gods, for good successe and victory: which being performed, the Generals in warlike attire, with an honorable traine of the principall men, (not onely such as were of their kindred and alliance, or followed them to the warre, as Voluntaries, for love, but a great number of others that meant to abide at home,) were accompanied on their way, and dismissed with friendly leave-taking, and good wishes. At this time, all the Fathers, and the whole Nobility, waited upon Emilius Paulus, as the onely Man, whom they thought either worthy of this honour, or likely to doe his Countrey remarkable service. Terentius his Attendants were the whole multitude of the poorer Citizens; a troupe no lesse in greeneesse, than the other was in dignity. At the parting, Fabius the late Dictator, is said to have exhorted the Consull Paulus, with many grave words, to shew his magnanimity, not onely in dealing with the Carthaginians, but (which he thought harder) in bridling the outrageous follie of his fellow-Consull. The answer of Paulus, was, That he meant not againe to runne into danger of condemnation by offending the multitude; that he would doe his best for his Countrey: but if he saw his best were likely to be ill taken, he would thinke it lesse rashnesse to adventure upon the Enemies sword, than upon the malice of his owne Citizens.

§. VIII.

Dissention betweene the two Roman Consuls. Whether it be likely, that Hannibal was upon point of flying out of Italy, when the Romans pressed him to fight. The great battaile of Canna.

These new Generals, arriving at the Campe, dismissed M. Atilius, one of the last yeeres Consuls, requesting it because of his age and weaknesse: Servilius they retained with them, as their Assistant. The first thing that Emilius thought necessary, was, to hearten his Souldiers with good words; who out of their bad successe hitherto, had gathered more cause of feare, than of courage. He willed them to consider, not onely now, their victories in times past against the Carthaginians, and other more warlike Nations than were the Carthaginians, but even their owne great numbers: which were no lesse than all that Rome at the present was able to set forth. Hee told them in what danger their Country stood; how the state and safety thereof rested upon their hands; using some such other common matter of perswasion. But the most effectual part of his Oration, was, That Hannibal with this his terrible Army, had not yet obtained one victory by plaine force and valour: but that onely by deceit and ambush he had stolne the honor, which he had gotten at Trebia & Thrasymene. Herewithall he taxed the inconsiderate rashnesse of Sempronius and Flaminius; of whom the one was not his enemies, untill hee was surrounded by them; the other scarce saw them, when they struck off his head; by reason of the thick mist, through the darknesse whereof he went groping (as it were blinde-fold) into their snares. Finally, declaring what advantages they had against the Enemy; and how destitute the Enemy was of those helps, by which he had hitherto prevailed against them; he exhorted them to play the men, and doe their best. They were easily perswaded: for the contemplation of their owne multitude, and confidence of the Roman vertue in matter of Armes, gave them cause to thinke, that under a Capitaine so well experienced, and every way sufficient, as Emilius was knowne to bee, they should easily prevaile against the Carthaginians, that came short of them in all things else, save craft; which would not alwayes thrive. But in one thing they mistooke the meaning of their Generall. It was his desire that they should have heart to fight; not that they should lose the patience of awaiting a convenient season. But they, having pre-conceived a victory, thought all delays to bee impediments: and thereby fought to robbe themselves of their best helpe; which on the East part of the River, seeming perhaps more fit for marshalling of their Army. Hannibal was glad of this, as he had great cause; and without any delay, passed likewise over, somewhat higher up the streame, which ran from the South; leaving in his owne campe so many, as he thought would serve to defend it, and no more. To encourage his men; He had them looke about them, and view the ground well, upon which they were to fight. They did so. And could you (said hee) pray for any greater fortune than to joyne battaile with the Romans upon such a level ground, where the stronger in horse are sure to prevaile? They all assented to him; and shewed by their countenances, that they were very glad of it. Well then (said hee further) yee are first of all to thanke the gods, that have brought them hither; and then Us, that have trained them along, and drawne them into necessity of playing for their lives, where they are sure to lose them. As for these Romans, I was faine to encourage you against them, when yee met them first: but now yee may even encourage your selves, by calling to minde that they are the men, whom yee have as often beaten as scene. Of one thing onely I will put you in minde: That whereas hitherto you fought for other respects, as, to drive them before you out of Gaul; and to win the open Countrey, and fields of Italy, both of which yee have obtained: now are ye to fight for the Townes themselves, and all the riches within them; which this victory shall make yours. Therefore play the stout Souldiers: and ere many houres passe, yee shall be Lords of all that the Romans hold.

When he had said this; his brother Mago came to him, whom he had sent to view the countenance of the Enemy. Hannibal asked him, what newes; & what worke they were likely to have with these Romans? Work enough (answered Mago) for they are an horrible many. As horrible a many as they are (thus Hannibal replied) I tell thee, brother, that among them all, search them never so diligently, thou shalt not finde one man, whose name is Mago. With that he fell a laughing, and so did all that stood about him: which gladdened the souldiers, who thought their Generall would not be so merry, without great assurance. Whether it were so, that Hannibal, in the pride of his victories already gotten, valued one Mago above many thousand Romans; or whether he intimated, that the Romans were no lesse troubled with thinking upon Mago and his Companions, than was Mago with beholding their huge multitude; or whether hee meant onely to correct the sad moode of his brother with a jest, and shew himselfe merry unto the Souldiers: this his answer was more manly, than was the relation of his discoverer. But if Hannibal himselfe had beene sent forth by Mago, to view the Romans, he could not have returned with a more gallant report in his mouth, than that which Captain Gamb, before the battaile of Agincourt, made unto our King Henry the fift: saying, that of the Frenchmen, there were enow to be killed; enow to be taken prisoners, and enow to run away. Even such words as these, or such pleasant jests as this of Hannibal, are not without their moment; but serve many times, when battaile is at hand, to worke upon such passions, as must governe more of the businesse: especially, where other needfull care is not wanting; without which they are but vaine boasts.

In this great day, the Carthaginian excelled himselfe; expressing no lesse perfection of his military skill, than was greatnesse in his spirit and undertakings. For to omit the commodiounesse of the place, into which he had long before conceived the meanes to draw his enemies to battaile; He marshalled his Army in such convenient order, that all hands were brought to fight, where every one might doe best service. His Darters, and Slingers of the Baleares, hee sent off before him, to encounter with the Roman Velites. These were loose troupes, answerable in a manner to those, which we call now by a French name Enfans perduez; but when we used our owne termes, the forlorne hope. The grosse of his Army following them, he ordered thus. His Africans, armed after the Roman maner, with the spoiles which they had gotten at Trebia, Thralymen, or elsewhere; and well trained in the use of those weapons, that were of more advantage, than those wherewith they had formerly served; made the two wings, very deepe in file. Betwene these he ranged his Gauls and Spaniards, armed, each after their own Countrey manner; their shields alike; but the Gauls using long broad swords, that were forcible in a downe-right stroake; the Spaniards, short and well-pointed blades, either to strike or thrust; the Gauls, naked from their navell upwards, as confident in their own fiercenesse: the Spaniards, wearing white cassocks embroidered with purple.

This medley of two Nations, differing as well in habit and furniture, as in quality, made a gallant shew; and terrible, because strange. The Gauls were strong of body, and furious in giving charge, but soone wearied, as accustomed to spend their violence at the first brunt, which disposition all that come of them have inherited to this day. The Spaniards were lesse eager, but more warie; neither ashamed to give ground, when they were over-pressed; nor afraid to returne, & renew the fight, upon any small encouragement. As the roughnesse of the one, and patience of the other, served mutually to reduce each of them to a good and firme temper; so the place which they held in this battaile, added confidence joyntly unto them both. For they saw themselves well and strongly flanked with Carthaginians and other Africans; whose name was growne terrible in Spaine, by their Conquests; and in Gaul, by this their present war. Since therefore it could not be feared, that any great calamity should fall upon them, whilst the wings on either side stood fast: these Barbarians had no cause to shrink, or forbear to employ the uttermost of their hardinesse, as knowing that the enemy could not presse fire upon them, without further engaging himselfe than discretion would allow. Hereunto may be added that great advantage, which the Carthaginian had in horse: by which he was able, if the worst had happened, to make a good retreat. The effect of contraries is many times alike. Desperation begetteth courage; but not greater, nor so lively, as doth assured Confidence. Hannibal therefore caused these Gauls and Spaniards to advance; leaving void the place wherein they had stood, and into which they might fall backe, when they should be overhardly pressed. So, casting them into the forme of a Crescent, He made them as it were his Vant-guard: the two points of this great halfe Moone, that looked toward the empty space from which he had drawne it, being narrow and thin, as serving onely to guide it orderly backe, when need should require; the foremost part of the Ring, swelling out toward the enemies, being well strengthened & thickned against all impression. The circle hereof seemeth to have beene so great, that it shadowed the Africans, who stood behinde it: though such figures, cut in brasse, as I have scene of this Battaille, present it more narrow; with little reason, as shall anon appeare: as also in the same figures it is omitted, That any Companies of Africans, or others, were left in the Reare, to second the Gauls and Spaniards, when they were driven to retreat; though it be manifest, that Hannibal in person stood between the last ranks of his long battalions, and in the head of his Reare, doubtlesse well accompanied with the choice of his owne Nation. Betwene the left battalion and the River Ausidum, were the Gauls & Spanish horse, under the command of Asdrubal: On the right wing, toward the wide Plaines, was Hanno (Livie saith Maharbal) with the Numidian light-horse. Hannibal himselfe, with his brother Mago, had the leading of the Reare. The whole summe of Hannibals Army in the field this day, was ten thousand horse, and forty thousand foot; his enemies having two to one against him in foot; and He, five to three against them in horse.

The Roman Army was marshalled in the usuall forme: but somewhat more narrow, and deepe, than was accustomed; perhaps, because this had beene found convenient against the Carthaginians, in the former warre. It was indeed no bad way of resistance against Elephants, to make the Ranks thick and short, but the Files long; as also to strengthen well the Reare, that it might stand fast compacted as a wall, under shelter whereof the disordered troupes might rally themselves. Thus much it seemes, that Terentius had learned of some old Souldiers; and therefore he now ordered his Battalies accordingly, as meaning to shew more skill, than was in his understanding. But the Carthaginians had here no Elephants with them in the field: their advantage was in Horse; against which, this manner of embattailing was very unprofitable, forasmuch as their charge is better sustained in front, than upon a long flanke. As for Emilius, it was not his day of command: He was but an Assistant; and in such cases it happens often, that wise men yeeld for very wearinesse unto the more contentious. Upon the right hand, and toward the River, were the Roman horse-men, under the Consull Paulus: On the left wing, was C. Terentius Varro the other Consull, with the rest of the horse, which were of the Laines, and other associates: Cn. Servilius the former yeeres Consull, had the leading of the battaile. The Sunne was newly risen, and offended neither part; the Carthaginians having their faces Northward, the Romans toward the South.

After some light skirmish, betwene the Roman Velites and Hannibals his Darters and slingers

slingers of the Balears: Asdrubal brake upon the Consul Paulus, and was roughly encountered; not after the manner of service on horse-backe, used in those times, wheeling about Alman-like; but each giving on in a right line, Pouldron to Pouldron, as having the River on the one hand, and the shoulder of the foot on the other hand; so that there was no way left, but to pierce and breake thorow. Wherefore they not onely used their Lances and Swords; but rushing violently amongst the Enemies, grasped one another: and so their horses running from under them, fell many to the ground; where starting up againe, they began to deale blowes like foot-men. In conclusion, the Roman horse were over-borne, and driven by plaine force to staggering recoil. This the Consul Paulus could not remedy. For Asdrubal, with his boisterous Gaules and Spaniards, was not to be resisted by these Roman Gentlemen, unequall both in number, and in horsemanship. When the battailes came to joyning, the Roman Legionaries found worke enough, and somewhat more than enough, to breake that great Crescent, upon which they first fell: so strongly for the while, did the Gaules and Spanish foot make resistance. Wherefore the two points of their battaile drew towards the midst; by whose aide, these Opposites were forced to disband, and flye backe to their first place. This they did in great haste and feare: and were with no lesse haste, and folly pursued. Upon the Africans that stood behinde them, they needed not to fall foule; both for that there was voide roome enough; and forasmuch as the Reare, or Hornes of this Moone, pointed into the safe retrait, where Hannibal with his Carthaginians was ready to re-enforce them, when time should require. In this hasty retrait, or flight, of the Gaules and Spaniards; it hapned, as was necessary, that they who had stood in the limbe or utter compasse of the halfe Moone, made the innermost or concave surface thereof (disordered and broken though it were) when it was forced to turne the inside outward: the hornes or points thereof, as yet, untouched, onely turning round, & recoyling very little. So the Romans, in pursuing them, were inclosed in an halfe circle; which they should not have needed greatly to regard, (for that the sides of it were exceeding thin and broken; and the bottom of it, none other than a throng of men routed, and seeming unable to make resistance) had all the enemies foot bin cast into this one great body, that was in a manner dissolved. But whilst the Legions, following their supposed victory, rushed on upon those that stood before them, & thereby unwittingly engaged themselves deeply within the principall strength of the Enemies, hedging them in on both hands; the two African Battalions on either side advanced so far, that getting beyond the Reare of them, they enclosed them, in a manner, behinde: and forward they could not passe farre, without removing Hannibal and Mago; which made that way the least easie. Hereby it is apparent, That the great Crescent, before spoken of, was of such extent, as covered the Africans, who lay behinde it. undiscerned, untill now. For it is agreed, that the Romans were thus empaled unawares; and that they behaved themselves, as men that thought upon no other worke, than what was found them by the Gaules. Neither is it credible, that they would have beene so mad, as to run head-long, with the whole bulke of their Army, into the throat of slaughter; had they seene those weapons bent against them at the first, which when they did see, they had little hope to escape. Much might be imputed to their heat of fight, and rashnesse of inferiour Captaines: but since the Consul Paulus, a man so expert in warre, being vanquished in horse, had put himselfe among the Legions; it cannot be supposed, that hee and they did wilfully thus engage themselves. Asdrubal, having broken the troupes of Roman horse, that were led by the Consul Paulus, followed upon them along the River side, beating downe and killing, as many as he could, (which were almost all of them) without regard of taking prisoners. The Consul himselfe was either driven upon his owne Legions, or willingly did cast himselfe among them; as hoping by them to make good the day, notwithstanding the defeat of his horse. But he failed of this his expectation. Nevertheless he cheered up his men as well as he could, both with comfortable words, and with the example of his owne stout behaviour: beating downe, and killing many of the enemies with his owne hand. The like did Hannibal among his Carthaginians, in the same part of the battaile; and with better successe. For the Consul received a blow from a sling, that did him great hurt: and though a troupe of Roman Gentlemen, riding about him, did their best to save him from further harue; yet was he so hardly laid at, that he was compelled, by wounds and weaknesse, to forsake his horse. company alighted, thinking that the Confull had given order so to doe: as in many battailes, the Roman men at armes had left their horses, to help their foot in distresse. When Hannibal (for he was neer at hand) perceived this, and understood that the Confull had will'd his horse-men to dismount; He was very glad of it, and pleasantly said, I had rather he would have delivered them unto me, bound hand & foot: meaning, that he had them now almost as safe, as if they were so bound. All this while C. Terentius Varro, with the horse of his associates, in the left wing, was marvellously troubled by Hanno (or Ma-harbal) and the Numidians: who beating up and downe about that great sandy Plaine, raised a foule dust; which a strong Southwinde, blowing there accustomedly, drave in to the eyes and mouthes of the Romans. These, using their advantage both of number and of lightnesse, wearied the Confull and his followers exceedingly: neither giving, nor sustaining any charge, but continually making offers, and wheeling about. Yet at the first they seemed to promise him an happy day of it. For when the battailes were even ready to joyne; five hundred of these Numidians came pricking away from their fellows, with their shields cast behinde their backs, (as was the maner of those which yielded) and, throwing downe their armes, rendred themselves. This was good lucke to beginne withall, if there had beene good meaning. Varro had not leisure to examine them; but caused them, unweaponed as they were, to get them behinde the Armie, where he bade them rest quietly till all was done. These crafty adventurers did as hee bade them, for a while; till they found opportunity to put in execution the purpose, for which they had thus yielded. Under their jackets they had short swords and poniards; besides which, they found other scattered weapons about the field, of such as were slain, and therewithall slew upon the hindmost of the Romans, whilst all eyes and thoughts were bent another way: so that they did great mischief, and raised yet a greater terror. Thus Hannibal, in a plaine levell ground, found meanes to lay an ambush at the backe of his enemies. The last blow, that ended all fight and resistance, was given by the same hand which gave the first. Asdrubal, having in short space broken the Romane troupes of horse, and cut in pieces all, save the Companie of Emilius that rushed into the groffe of his foot, and a very few besides, that recovered some narrow passage, between the River and their owne Battalions; did not stay to charge upon the face of the Legions, but fell backe behinde the Reare of his owne, and fetching about, came up to the Numidians: with whom he joynd, and gave upon Terentius.

This fearefull cloud, as it shewed at the first appearance what weather it had left behinde it, on the other side: so did it prognosticate a dismall storme unto those upon whom it was ready now to fall. Wherefore Terentius his followers, having wearied themselves much in doing little, and seeing more worke toward, than they could hope to sustaine; thought it the best way, to avoid the danger by present flight. The Confull was no lesse wise than they, in apprehending the greatnesse of his owne perill; nor more desperate, in striving to worke impossibilities: it being impossible, when so many thranke from him, to sustaine the impression alone, which he could not have indured with their assistance. Now hee found, that it was one thing to talke of Hannibal at Rome; and another, to encounter him. But of this, or of ought else, excepting hasty flight, his present leisure would not serve him to consider. Close at the heeles of him and his flying troupes, followed the light Numidians, appointed by Asdrubal unto the pursuit, as fittest for that service. Asdrubal himselfe, with the Gaules and Spanish horse, compassing about, fell upon the backs of the Romans; that were ere this hardly distressed, and in a manner surrounded on all parts else: He brake them easily; who before made ill resistance, being inclosed, and laid at on every side, not knowing which way to turne. Here began a pittifull slaughter: the vanquished multitude thronging up and downe, they knew not whither or which way, whilst every one sought to avoid those enemies, whom he saw neerest. Some of the Roman Gentlemen that were about Emilius, got up to horse, and saved themselves: which though it is hardly understood how they could do; yet I will rather beleieve it, than suppose that Livie so reporteth, to grace thereby his History with this following tale. Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, galloping along by a place where he saw the Confull sitting all bloodied upon a stone, intreated him to rise and save himselfe; offering him his assistance and horse. But Paulus refused it; willing Lentulus to strive for himselfe, and not to lose time: saying, That it was not his purpose to be brought againe into judgement by the People, either as an accuser of his Colleague, or as guilty him-

selfe of that dayes losse. Further, he willed Lentulus to commend him to the Senate, and in particular to Fabius: willing them to forsake Rome, as fast as well they could; and telling Fabius, that he lived and died mindfull of his wholesome counsaile. These words (peradventure) or some to like purpose, the Consull uttered to Lentulus, either when against his will he was drawne to that Battaille, or when he beheld the first defeat of his Horse; at what time he put himselfe in the head of his Legions. For I doubt not, but Hannibal knew what he said a good while before this; when he thought the Consull & his troupe, in little better case than if they had been bound. The whole Grosse of the Romans, was inclosed indeed as within a sacke; whereof the African Battalions made the sides; the Spaniards, Gaules, & Hannibal with his Carthaginians, the bottom; & Asdrubal with his horse, closed up the mouth: in which part, they first of all were shuffled together, and begonne the Rout, wherein all the rest followed. Emilius therefore, who could not fit his horse, whilest the battaille yet lasted, and whilest the spaces were somewhat open, by which he might have withdrawne himselfe; was now (had he never so well bin mounred) unable to flie, having in his way so close a throng of his owne miserable followers, and so many heapes of bodies, as fell apace in that great Carnage. It sufficeth unto his honour, that in the Battaille he fought no lesse valiantly, than he had warily before, both abtained himselfe, and dissuaded his fellow-Consull, from fighting at all. If, when the day was utterly lost, it had lien in his power to save his own life, unto the good of his countrie, never more needing it; I should thinke, that hee either too much esteemed himselfe; or being too faintly minded, was wearie of the World, and his unthankfull Citizens. But if such a resolution were praise-worthy in Emilius, as proceeding out of Roman valour; then was the English vertue of the Lord John Talbot, Viscount Lisle, sonne to that famous Earle of Shrewsbury, who died in the Battell of Chastillon, more highly to be honoured. For Emilius was old, grievously, if not mortally wounded, & accomptable for the overthrow received: Talbot was in the flowre of his youth, unhurt, easily able to have escaped, and not answerable for that dayes misfortune, when he refused to forsake his Father; who foreseeing the losse of the battaille, and not meaning to staine his actions past by flying in his old age, exhorted this his noble sonne to be gone and leave him.

In this terrible overthrow died all the Roman foot, save two or three thousand, who (as Livie saith) escaped into the lesser campe; whence, the same night, about fixe hundred of them brake forth, & joyning with such of those in the greater campe, as were willing to trie their fortune, conveyed themselves away ere morning, about foure thousand foot, and two hundred horse, partly in whole troupes, partly dispersed, into Cannusum: the next day the Roman camps, both lesse and greater, were yeilded unto Hannibal by those that remained in them. Polybius hath no mention of this escape: onely hee reports, that the ten thousand, whom Emilius had left on the West side of Ausidus (as was shewed before) to set upon the campe of Hannibal, did as they were appointed; but ere they could effect their desire, which they had well-neere done, the battaille was lost: and Hannibal, comming over the water to them, drave them into their own campe; which they quickly yeilded, having lost two thousand of their number. Like enough it is, that at the first sight of Hannibal, comming upon them with his victorious Army, a greater number of these did flie; and thereby escaped, whilest their fellowes, making defence in vaine, retired into their campe, and held the enimie busied. For about two Legions they were (perhaps not halfe full, but made up by addition of others, whose fault or fortune was like) that having served at Canna, were afterwards extremely disgraced by the State of Rome, for that they had abandoned their companions fighting. Of the Romane horse what numbers escaped, it is uncertaine: but very few they were that saved themselves in the first charge, by getting behinde the River; and Terentius the Consull recovered Venusia, with threecore and ten at the most in his company. That he was so ill attended, it is no marvell: for Venusia lay many miles off to the Southward; so that his neerest way thither, had bene through the midst of Hannibals Army, if the passage had bene open. Therefore it must needs be, that when once he got out of sight, he turned up some by-way; so disappointing the Numidians that hunted contre. Of such as could not hold pace with the Consull, but tooke other wayes, and were scattered over the fields; two thousand, or thereabout, were gathered up by the Numidians, and made prisoners: the rest were slaine, all save three hundred; who dispersed themselves in flight, as chance led them, and got into sundry Towns. There died in this great Battaille of Cannæ, besides L. Æmilius Paulus the Consul, two of the Roman Quæstors or Treasurers, and one and twenty Colonels or Tribunes of the Souldiers, foure score Senators, or such as had borne office, out of which they were to be chosen into the Senate. Many of these were of especiall mark, as having been Ædiles, Prætors, or Consuls: among whom was Cn. Servilius, the last yeeres Consul, and Minutius, late master of the horse. The number of prisoners, taken in this battaille, Livie makes no greater than three thousand foot, & three hundred horse: too few to have defended for the space of one halfe houre, both the Roman Camps; which yet the same Livie saith, to have bin over-cowardly yeelded up. We may therefore doe better, to give credit unto one of the prisoners, whom the same Historian shortly after introduceth, speaking in the Senate, & saying, That they were no lesse than eight thousand. It may therefore be, that these three thousand were onely such as the Enemy spared, when the fury of Execution was past: but to these must be added about five thousand more, who yeelded in the greater campe, when their company were either slaine or fled. So the reckoning falls out right: which the Romanes, especially the Consull Varro, had before cast up (as we say) without their Host; nothing so chargeable, as now they finde it. On the side of Hannibal there died some foure thousand Gauls, fifteen hundred Spaniards and Africans, and two hundred horse, or thereabouts: a losse not sensible, in the joy of so great a victory; which if he had pursued, as Maharbal advised him, and forthwith marched away towards Rome; it is little doubted, but that the War had presently been at an end. But he beleevd not so far in his own prosperity; and was therefore told, That he knew how to get, not how to use a victory.

Of things following the battaille at Cannæ.

NOT without good cause doth Polybius reprehend those two Historians, Fabius the Roman, and Philius the Carthaginian: who regarding more the pleasure of them, unto whose honour they consecrated their travailes, than the truth of things, and information of posterity, magnified indifferently, whether good or bad, all actions and proceedings, the one of his Carthaginians, the other of his Roman Quirites, and Fathers conscript. No man of sound judgement will condemne this liberty of censure, which Polybius hath used. For, to recompence his junioritie (such as it was) he produceth substantiall arguments; to justify his owne Relation; and confuteth the vanity of those former Authors, out of their own writings, by conference of places ill cohering: which paines is to bee suspected, that he would not have taken, had he beene borne in either of these two Cities, but have spared some part of his diligence, and been contented, to have all men thinke better and more honourably than it deserved, of his owne Countrey. The like disease it is to be feared, that we shall hereafter finde in others; and shall have some cause to wish, that either they were somewhat lesse Roman, or else, that some Works of their opposite Writers were extant, that so we might at least heare both sides speake: being henceforth destitute of Polybius his helpe, that was a man indifferent. But since this cannot be, we must bee sometimes bold, to observe the coherence of things; and beleieve so much only to be true, as dependeth upon good reason, or (at least) faire probabilitie. This attentive circumspection is needfull at the present: such is the repugnance, or forgetfulness, which we find in the best Narration of things following the Battaille of Cannæ. For it is said, that foure thousand foot & horse gathered together about the Consull Terenius at Venusia; that others to the number of ten thousand got unto Cannusium, choosung for their Captaines, young P. Scipio, and Ap. Claudius; yet that the Consull Terenius Varro, joyning his company unto those of Scipio at Cannusium, wrote unto the Senate, that he had now well-neere ten thousand men about him; that these letters of the Consull were brought to Rome, when the Senate was newly risen, that had beene taking order for pacifying those tumults in the City, which grew upon the first brui of the overthrow; and yet, that Embassadours from Capua (after some consultation, whether it were meet to send any, or without further circumstance, to side with Hannibal) were sent unto Terenius, and found him at Venusia, a pretty while before he wrote those letters, which overtook (in a manner) at Rome the first news of the overthrow.

overthrow. Among such incoherences, I hold it the best way, to omit so much as hath not some particular connexion with matter ensuing: mutuall dependencie in things of this nature, being no small argument of truth.

When Hannibal had sacked the Roman camp, and trussed up the spoiles, forthwith he dislodged, and marched away into Samnium; finding a disposition in the Hirpines, and many other people thereabout, to forsake the Roman partie, & make alliance with Carthage. The first towne that opened the gates unto him, was Cussa, where he laid up his baggage: and leaving his brother Mago to take in other places, he hastened into Campania. The generall affection of the multitude, in all the cities of Italy, was inclinable unto him, not onely in regard of their grievous losses, sustained abroad in the fields, which the Romans themselves, who could not hinder him from spoiling the Country, especially the poorer sort of them, did hardly indure; but in a loving respect unto that great courtesie (as it seemed) which he used, unto such of them as became his prisoners. For as at other times, so now also after his great victory at Canna, He had lovingly dismissed as many of the Italian Confederates of Rome, as fell into his hands: rebuking them gently for being so obstinate against him that had sought to deliver them from bondage. Neither spared he to win their love by gifts; pretending to admire their valour; but seeking indeed, by all wayes & meanes, to make them his, whilst all other motives were concurrent. At this time also he began to deale kindly (though against his nature) with the Roman prisoners; telling them, that he bore no mortall hatred unto their Estate; but being provoked by injuries, fought to right himselfe and his countrey; and fought with them, to trie which of the two Cities, Rome or Carthage, should beare soveraigne Rule, not, which of them should be destroyed. So he gave them leave to chooſe ten of their number, that should be sent home to treat with the Fathers about their ranſome: and together with these, he sent Carthalo a Nobleman of Carthage, and Generall of his Horse, to feele the disposition of the Senate; whether it were bowed as yet by so much adversity, and could stoop unto desire of peace. But with the Romans these arts prevailed not, as shall be shewed in due place. The people of Italy, all, or most of them, save the Roman Colonies, or the Laines, were not onely wearie of their losses past; but enterained a deceivable hope, of changing their old Society for a better. Wherefore not only the Samnites, Lucans, Bruians, and Apulians, ancient enemies of Rome, and not until the former generation utterly subdued, began to re-assume their wonted spirits: but the Campanians, a Nation of all other in Italy most bound unto the State of Rome, and by many mutuall affinities therewith as straightly conjoynd, as were any save the Laines, changed on a sudden their love into hatred; without any other cause found, than change of fortune.

Campania, is the most goodly and fruitfull Province of Italy, if not (as some then thought) of all the Earth: and the City of Capua, answerable unto the country, whereof it was Head, so great, faire, and wealthie, that it seemed no lesse convenient a seat of the Empire, than was either Rome or Carthage. But of all qualities, bravery is the least requisite unto soveraigne command. The Campanians were luxurious, idle, and proud: and valuing themselves like Jayes by their feathers, despised the unfortunate vertue of the Romans their Parrons and Benefactors. Yet were there some of the principall among them, as in other Cities, that bore especial regard unto the Majestie of Rome, and could not indure to heare of Innovation. But the Plebeian faction had lately so prevailed within Capua, that all was governed by the pleasure of the Multitude; which wholly followed the direction of Pacuvius Calavius an ambitious Noble-man, whose credit grew, and was up-held by furthering all popular desires: whereof, the conjunction with Hannibal was not the least. Some of the Capuans had offered their city to the Carthaginians shortly after the battaile of Thrasymene: whereupon chiefly it was, that Hannibal made his journey into Campania; the Dictator Fabius waiting upon him. At that time, either the neernesse of the Roman Army, or some other feare of the Capuans, hindred them from breaking into actual rebellion. They had indeed no leisure to treat about any article of new Confederacie: or had leisure served, yet were the multitude (whose inconstant love Hannibal had won from the Romans, by gentle usage, and free dismissing of some prisoners in good account among them) unable to hold any such negotiation, without advice of the Senate; which mainly impugned it. So they that had promised to yeeld up their towne to Hannibal, & meet him on the way, with some of their nobility that should assure him of all faithfull meaning, were driven to sit still in a great perplexity: as having failed to let in this their new friend, yet sufficiently discovered themselves, to draw upon them the hatred of the Romans. In this case were no small number of the Citizens: who thereupon grew the more incensed against their Senate, on whom they cast all the blame, easily pardoning their owne cowardize. The people holding so tender a regard of liberty, that even the lawfull Government of Magistrates grieved them, with an imaginary oppression; had now good cause to feare lest the Senators would become their Lords indeed, & by helpe of the Romans bring them under a more streight subjection, than ever they had indured. This feare being ready to breake into some outrage, Pacuvius made use of, to serve his owne ambition. He discoursed unto the Senate, as they fate in Council, about these motions troubling the city: and said, That he himselfe had both married a Roman Ladie, and given his Daughter in marriage to a Roman: but, that the danger of forsaking the Roman partie was not now the greatest: for that the people were violently bent to murder all the Senate, & after to joyne themselves with Hannibal; who should countenance the fact, and save them harmelesse. This he spake, as a man well knowne to be beloved himselfe by the People, and privie unto their designs. Having thoroughly terrefied the Senate, by laying open the danger hanging over them: He promised nevertheless to deliver them all, and to set things in quiet, if they would freely put themselves into his hands; offering his oath, or any other assurance that they should demand, for his faithfull meaning. They all agreed. Then shutting up the Court, and placing a Guard of his owne followers about it, that none might enter, nor issue forth, without his leave; He called the people to assembly: and speaking as much ill of the Senate, as he knew they would be glad to heare, he told them, that these wicked Governours were surpris'd by his policie, & all fast, ready to abide what sentence they would lay upon them. Onely thus much he advised them, as a thing which necessity required, That they should chooſe a new Senate, before they satisfied their anger upon the old. Sorehearing unto them the names of one or two Senators, he asked what their judgement was of those. All cried out, that they were worthy of death. Chooſe then (said he) first of all some new ones into their places. Hereat the multitude, unprovided for such an election, was silent; untill at last, some one or other adventured to name whom he thought fit. The men so nominated, were utterly disliked by the whole Assembly; either for some knowne fault, baseness, and insufficiency; or else even because they were unknowne, and therefore held unworthy. This difficulty in the new Election appearing more and more, whilst more were to be chosen; (the fittest men to be substituted, having beene named among the first, and not thought fit enough) Pacuvius intreated, and easily prevailed with the people, that the present Senate might for this time be spared, in hope of amends hereafter; which (doubtlesse) they would make, having thus obtained pardon of all offences past. Henceforth, not onely the people, as in former times, honoured Pacuvius, and esteemed him their Parron; but the Senators also were governed by him, to whom they acknowledged themselves indebted, for saving all their lives. Neither did the Senate faile after this by all obsequiousnes, to court the People; giving the reines unto their lawlesse Wil, who else were likely to cast them down. All the city being thus of one mind; onely feare of the Romans kept them from opening their gates to Hannibal. But after the Battaille at Canna, this impediment was removed: and few there were, that would open their mouths to speake against the Rebellion. Yet forasmuch as three hundred principall Gentlemen of the Campanians, did then serve the Romans in the Ile of Sicily: the Parents and Kinsmen of these prevailed so far, that Embassadors were sent unto Terentius the Consul; to see his present case, and what it could minister of Hope or Feare. These, wheresoever they found him, found him weakly attended, and as weak in spirit, as in followers. Yet they offered him formally the service of their State; and desired to know what he would command them. But he most basely lamented unto them the greatnesse of the Roman misfortune: saying, that all was lost; and that the Campanians must now, not helpe the Romans, who had nothing left wherewith to helpe themselves, but make warre in their defence against the Carthaginians; as the Romans had sometimes done for the Campanians against the Samnites. Hereunto hee is said to have added a foolish Invective against Hannibal and his Carthaginians: telling, How he had taught them to make bridges of slaughtered carcases, and to feed upon mans flesh; with such other stiffe, as only bewraied his own feare. As for the Campanians themselves,

He put them in minde of their present strength: they having thirty thousand foot, and four thousand horse; with money, and all provisions, in abundance. Thus he dismissed them, prouder than they came, and filled them with conceit of getting a great Lordship; whereas before, they were somewhat timorous in adventuring to seek their own liberty. Having reported this at Capua: the same Embassadors were dispatched away to Hannibal, with whom they easily made alliance, upon these conditions; That the Campanians should be absolutely free, and ruled by their owne Lawes; That no Citizens of theirs should bee subject unto any Carthaginian Magistrate, in what case soever, whether in Warre or Peace; and, That Hannibal should deliver unto the Campanians three hundred Romane prisoners, such as themselves would choose, whom they might exchange for to their Gentlemen which were in Sicily.

Against all this Negotiation, Decim Magius, an honourable Citizen, opposed himselfe earnestly: using, in vaine, many persuasions, to the wilfull and head-strong Multitude; whom he put in minde of Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, wishing them not to change old friends for new acquaintance. This did he, when they were sending Embassadors unto Hannibal: and this also did he, when the new Alliance was concluded; but most earnestly, when a Carthaginian Garrison was entering the towne: at which time he gave advice, either to keepe it out, or to fall upon it, and to cut it in pieces, that by such a notable piece of service, they might make amends unto the Romans, whom they had forsaken.

Advertisement hereof was given to Hannibal: who lying about Naples not farre off, sent for Magius to come speake with him in the campe. This Magius refused: alledging, that he was, by the late concluded Articles, free from subjection unto any Carthaginians; and therefore would not come. Hannibal thereupon halted himselfe towards Capua: forbearing to attempt any further upon Naples; which he thought to have taken in his way by Scalado, but found the walls too high, & was not well provided to lay siege unto it. At Capua he was entertained with great solemnity and pompe: all the people issuing forth of the towne, to behold that great Commander, which had won so many noble victories. Having taken his pleasure in the sight of that goodly City, and passed over his first entertainments; He came into their Senate: where he commended their resolution, in shaking off the Roman yoke; promising, that ere long all Italy and Rome it selfe, should be driven to acknowledge Capua as chiefe, and receive Law from thence. As for Decim Magius, who openly tooke part with the Romans their enemies; He prayed them, that they would not thinke him a Campan, but a traitor to the State, & use him accordingly, giving sentence out of hand upon him, as he deserved. This was granted: and Magius delivered unto Hannibal; who unwilling to offend the Capuans, at his first coming, by putting so great a man to death, yet fearing that they might sue for his liberty, if he kept him alive, thought it best to send him away to Carthage. Thus Hannibal settled his friendship with the Campanians: among whom, onely this Decim Magius had openly dared to speake against him; being assisted by Perolla the sonne of Pacuvius. This Perolla would have murdered Hannibal, whilst he was at supper, the first night of his coming; had not his Fathers authority kept him from attempting any such attempt. All the towne (besides) were so earnest in the love of their new Society, that they are said to have murdered all the Romans, upon whom at the present they could lay hand; or, (which is all one) to have smothered them to death in an hot Bath.

The same course of fortune, with those of Capua, ranne some other townes therabouts, which depended on this, as their Mother-City. Nola, Nuceria, Naples, Casert, and Acerre, were the Cities next adjoining, that stood out for the Romans. Against these Hannibal went, thinking to finde them weakly manned; as they were indeed, though stoutly defended.

The Romans at this time were not in case, to put Garrisons into all their walled townes; but were faine to leave all places, except a few of the most suspected, unto the faith and courage of the Inhabitants. Rome it selfe was in extreme feare of Hannibals coming, at the first report of the overthrow at Cannae: and the griefe of that losse was so generall and immoderate, that it much disturbed the provision against apparent danger. It was hard to judge, whether the losse already received, or the feare of destruction presently threatening, were the more terrible. All the Senators found worke enough, to steepe the noyse and lamentable bewailings, whereof the streets were full. Courtiers were sent sent forth, to bring assured tidings how all went: whereof when Letters from the Consul Varro had thoroughly informed them, they were so amazed, that they ran into barbarous superstition; and taking direction (as was said) from their fatall bookes, buried alive two men and women, Gauls and Greekes, in their Ox-market. If the bookes of Sibyl gave them such instructions; we may justly thinke that Sibyl her selfe was instructed by the Divell. Yet is it not improbable, that extremity of feare caused them to hearken to wicked Sooth-sayers; whose detestable counsels they afterwards, for their own honour (as ashamed of such Authors) imputed to the bookes of Sibyl. An Embassador was sent to Delphi, to consult with the oracle of Apollo; and enquire with what prayers and supplications they might pacifie the gods, and obtain an end of these calamities. This is enough to discover the greatnes of their feare; though not serving to give remedy. At that time came Letters out of Sicily, from the Prator Octavius; whom the Senate had appointed, if he found it meet, to passe over into Africke. In these were contained newes of one Carthaginian fleet that wasted the kingdome of Hieron their good friend & confederate; and of another fleet, riding among the Iles & Egates, which was in readinesse to set upon Lilybaeum, and the rest of the Roman Province, if the Prator stirred aside to the rescue of Hieron.

In the midst of these extremities, it was thought needfull to call home Terentius the Consul, that he might name a Dictator, to take sovereign charge of the Weale publike, with absolute power, as necessity required. It must needs seeme strange, that all sorts of people went forth to meet the Consul, and bid him welcome home, giving him thanks for that he had not despaired of the Weale publike. But this was done (as may seeme) by order from the Senate: which therein (doubtlesse) provided wisely for upholding the generall reputation. If his coming into the Citie had renewed the lamentations and outcries of the people: what else would have followed, than a contempt of their wretchedness, among those that were subject unto their Dominion? Now in finding this occasion (though indeed he gave it not) of bestowing upon him their welcome, and thanks; they noysed abroad a fame, which came perhaps unto the eares of Hannibal, of their Magnanimity and Confidence: that might seem grounded on their remaining strength. This therefore was wisely done. But whereas Lucius would have us thinke, that it was done fearfully, and out of great spirit; let me be pardoned, if I beleve him not. It was done fearfully, and to cover their griefe: had they dared to shew their indignation, they would have struck off his head; as in few years after, Cn. Fulvius had his life brought into question, and was banished by them, being lesse blame-worthy, for a smaller offence. M. Junius, by appointment of the Senate, was nominated Dictator; and T. Sempronius, Master of the horse. These fell presently to mustering of Souldiers, of whom they raised foure new Legions, and 1000 horse: though with much difficulty; as being faine to take up some that were very boyes. These foure Legions are elsewhere forgotten in account of the forces levied by this Dictator; and two Legions onely set downe, that had bin enrolled in the beginning of the year for custody of the City. So it may be, that these two Legions being drawn into the field; foure new ones of Prætextati, or striplings were left in their places. In such raw Souldiers, and so few, little confidence was to be reposed; for which reason they increased their number, by adding unto them 8000 sturdy slaves, that were put in hope of liberty, if they should deserve it by manfull service. This not sufficing; the Dictator proclaimed, That whatsoever ought money and could not pay it, or had committed any capital offence, should forthwith be discharged of his debt or punishment, if he would serve in the War. To arme these Companies, they were faine to take down out of their Temples and Porches, the spoiles of their enemies that had bin there set up: among which, were 6000 Armors of the Gauls, that had bin carried in the Triumph of C. Flaminius, a little before the beginning of this War. To such mockery had God brought the pride of the Romans, as a due reward of their insolent oppressions; that they were faine to issue forth of their own gates, in the habite of strangers, when Hannibal was ready to encounter them with his Africans, armed Roman like.

About the same time it was that Carthalo, with the Agents of the prisoners taken at Cannae, came to Rome. Carthalo was not admitted into the City, but commanded, whilst he was on the way, to be gone ere night out of the Roman Territory. To the messengers of the captives, audience was given by the Senate. They made earnest Petition to be ransomed at the publike charge; not only the teares and lamentation of their poor kinsfolke, but the great need, wherein the City then stood, of able Souldiers, commending their their suites; which yet they obtained not. Besides the generall custome of the Romans (held by long Tradition, and strengthened by a notable Precedent, when Regulus was overthrowne, and taken prisoner in the former Warre) not to be too tender of such as had yielded to the enemy; much was alledged against these who now craved ranfome: but the speciall point was, that they were wilfully lost, since they might have saved themselves, as others did. It sufficed not unto these poore men, to say, that their offence was no greater than the Consuls; they were told, that this was great presumption. The truth was, the State wanted money; and therefore could not want excuses, whereby to avoid the disburfement: whether it were fo, or not, that any such Plea was held about this matter of redemption, as we find recorded. Neither must wee regard it, that the slaves which were armed for the warre, are said to have cost more, than the summe did amount unto, that would have ranfomed these prisoners. For this is but a tale, devised to countenance the Roman proceedings, as if they had bene severe; when as indeed they were futable to the present fortune, poore, and somewhat beggarly. Hereof it is no little prooffe, That Hannibal valued those Roman slaves, whom he had taken in the Campe among their Masters, as no more, than every one the third part of a common Souldiers ranfome: and likely it is, that hee offered them at the price, whereat hee thought them current. But if we should suppose, that by trading with Hannibal, a better bargain for slaves might have bene made, than was by the State at home, in dealing with private men; yet must we wicall consider, that these private men did onely lend these slaves for a while unto the Common-wealth, and were afterwards contented to forbear the price of them (when by order of the Senate they were enfranchised) untill the Warre should be ended. If Hannibal would have given such long day of payment, it is likely that the Romans would have bene his Chapmen: but, seeing hee dealt onely for ready money, they chose rather to say, We will not give, than, We cannot. The like austeritie, upon the same reason, but contrary pretence, was used toward the souldiers that escaped from that great Battell. These were charged for having fled: as the prisoners were, for not flying, when they might have done so. True it is, that in such cases (if ever) that which they call ragione del Stato, may serve for an excuse: when the Common-wealth, being driven to a miserable exigent, is faine to helpe it selfe, by doing injuries to private men. And so dealt the Romans now: condemning all those that had served at Canna, to be transported into Sicily; and there to serve, not as others did, untill they had fulfilled twenty yeeres in the Warres, or else were fifty yeeres of age; but untill this Warre should be ended, how long forever it lasted, and that without reward. The same thrifty censure was afterwards layd upon others, for their mis-behaviour: but never upon any man of quality, save only (a good while after this, at better leisure) upon Cecilius Metellus, and a few other hare-brain'd fooles his companions; who, being frighted out of their wits, with the terror of so great a losse, were devising, after the battell, which way to runne out of Italie, when Hannibal as yet had scarce one towne within it. The inequality of this rigour grew shortly distastfull to the Commonalty: and was openly blamed by a Tribune of the people; nevertheless it was quietly digested, the excuse being no lesse apparent than the fault.

M. Junius the Dictator, having dispatched all needfull businesse within the Citie, tooke the field with five and twenty thousand men. What he did with this Army, I cannot find: nor more of him than this, That he spent the time about Campania; where (as may be presumed) he was not idle. To him therefore perhaps it may be ascribed, that Hannibal did no greater evill: for of any evill done to Hannibal, by the Romans, in this their weak estate, onely Marcellus had the honour. Marcellus, being then one of the Prætors, lay at Ostia, with a Fleet ready to set saile for Sicily, having one Legion aboard his ships, and fiftene hundred other Souldiers newly taken up: with which forces hee was to defend that Iland, and doe what harme he could in Africk. But hearing of the overthrow at Canna, he sent these of his new Levies to Rome, for defence of the Citie; and marched hastily with his Legion toward Cannusium: delivering the Fleet, empty of Souldiers, to P. Furius his Colleague. Thence was he called by the Magistrates, and chiefe Citizens of Nola, to helpe them: who were like to be forced by the multitude (assisted, as were the rest of the Campanes) to let in the Carthaginians; and knew not how to avoid this otherwise, than by seeming to deliberate about the articles of this new confederacie. Wherefore hee made great journies thitherward; and arrived even time enough to prevent the Enemy. Many idle walkes Hannibal made betwixt Nola and Naples: assaying by faire words and terrible threats the one and the other Citie. Naples was strong, and not infected with any the least touch of disloyaltie: had also a faire Haven, whereby it stood in the lesse feare of sustaining much inconvenience, by spoyle of the Lands and Villages abroad in the Countrey. But at Nola it was thought a valuable consideration, That Hannibal was Master of the field; which if he laid waste, all the poore people were utterly undone. So thought the Multitude: and such talk used some, that had little feare of their own private want or poverty, but a great desire to gratifie the Carthaginians. Of these, one L. Banius was chiefe: a stout young gentleman, and Souldier of 10 speciall make, well beloved in the Citie, and one that had done good service to the Romans; but was found by Hannibal halfe dead at Canna; and after much gentle usage, good attendance, and cure of his wounds, friendly dismissed with liberal gifts. Hee therefore thought, that it concerned him in honour, to returne the greatest thanks hee could unto so courteous an enemy. Marcellus perceiving this, wrought upon the same easie nature of the Gentleman: and taking notice of him, as if it had bene by chance, seemed to wonder, why one that had so well deserved of the Roman state, had not repaired unto him the Prætor, who desired nothing more than such acquaintance: So with many commendations, gifts, and loving entertainment, being himselfe also a man highly reputed for his personall valour, he made this Banius so faine in love with him, that nothing could be attempted within Nola, against the Romans, whereof he had not presently 10 advertisement. At the coming of Marcellus, Hannibal removed from about Nola; and assayed, as formerly he had done, the Neapolitans: but they had lately taken in a Roman Garrison; upon confidence whereof they gave him a peremptorie answer, to his discontent. Thence went he to Nuceria, which he tooke by composition; and so returned backe againe to Nola. He was not ignorant, what good affection the common people of Nola bore unto him: who although they durst not stirre in his quarrell, being over-awed by the Roman Garrison; yet if they saw Marcellus hardly bestead, and forced to turne his care from watching them within, to repelling the enemies assailing him without, like enough it seemed, that they would not be wanting unto the accomplishment of their owne desires. He therefore brought his Armie close to the Towne, and skirmished often with Marcellus: not in hope thereby to doe much good, but onely to make shew of a meaning to force the Towne; which he sought in the meane while to take by intelligence. In the night time there passed messages between him and the Citizens his partakers: whereby it was concluded, That if once Marcellus, with all his forces, could be trained into the field, the Multitude within the Towne should presently rise; and seizing upon the gates, exclude him as an Enemy. Of this Negotiation Marcellus was advertised: and fearing lest the Conspirators would shortly adventure, even to find him busied within the Citie, whilst the Carthaginians should scale the walls; hee thought it the surest way, to cut off the enemies hope, and send him away betimes. Wherefore ordering his men in three companies, within three severall gates, looking 10 towards the enemy: he gave a streight command, that all the Citizens should keepe their houses. Thus he lay close a good part of the day, to the enemies great wonder; against whom he had customarily issued forth before more early, every day, to skirmish. But when it was further noted, that the walls were bare, and not a man appearing on them; then thought Hannibal, that surely all was discovered, and Marcellus now busied with the Citizens. Whereupon he had his men bring ladders, and make ready for the assault: which was done in all haste. But when the Carthaginians were at the very walls, and thought nothing lesse, than that the Romans would meet them in the field: suddenly the middle gate was opened, whereat Marcellus, with the best and oldest of his Souldiers, brake forth upon them, with a great noise, to make his unexpected fallie the more terrible. Whilst the Carthaginians, much out of order, were some of them flying before Marcellus, the rest making head against him: the other two gates opened, whereat in like sort issued they of the new levied Companies, upon the enemies backs. The sudden terror was more available unto the Romans, than their force: yet the Execution was so great, that this was accounted as a victorie, and reputed one of the bravest Acts performed in all that Warre, forasmuch as hereby it was first proved, that Hannibal might be overcome. After this, Marcellus, being freed from his enemies that were departed, tooke a strict account of the Citizens of Nola; condemning above

threecore and ten of high Treason, whose heads he struck off; and so leaving the town in quiet obedience unto their Senate, went and incamped hard by about Suessula. Hannibal in the meane season was gone to Acerra: where being excluded, hee thought it no wisdom to lose time in perswasions, but layd siege unto it, and began on all sides to close it up. This terrified the People, who knew themselves unable to hold out. Therefore, before his Workes were finished, and they quite surrounded; they stole out by night, and left him the Town empty: which he lacked and burnt. Then hearing newes of the Dictator, that he was about Casiline, thither went Hannibal; as being unwilling that an Enemy so neere should disquiet him at Capua; where he meant to Winter. It seemes, or rather indeed it is plain, that the late victory of Marcellus had nothing abated the spirit of the Carthaginian: who durst with a small part of his Army seeke out the Dictator, that had with him the heart of the Roman strength. Wherefore the joy of his Enemies, upon so slight an occasion as the death of some two thousand of his men, at the most, and those not slaine in plaine battell, but by a sudden eruption; witnesseth chiefly, in what great feare they stood of Hannibal, and how Crest-fallen they werethat having three yeares since demanded at Carthage the body of Hannibal, to bee delivered unto their pleasure, by his owne Citizens; could now please themselves, as with good newes, to heare, That in a skirmish not far from Rome, hee appeared to be a man, and not resistlesse. At Caslinum the Dictator was not: but many Companies of Italians, Confederates of Rome, were gotten into the Town, and held it. Five hundred of the Prætor fines there were, and about foure hundred of Perusia, with some of the Latines. All these had the good hap, to come too late to the battell at Canna, being sent by their severall States to the Campe: whether whilest they were marching, the tidings of that great misfortune encountered them; and sent them back forrowfull; for they loved well their Lords the Romans, under whose government they lived happily. So came they all, one after another, to Casiline, where they met and stayed. Neither had they stayed there long, ere they heard newes from Capua. How that great Citie became the King-leader of all the Campanes into rebellion. The people of Casiline were affected as they of Capua: and therefore fought how to rid their hands of those Prætorines and their fellows; but the Souldiers were too hard for them, and after many traines laid one for another, at last they slew all the Townsmen in a night, and fortified the Westerne part of the Towne (for it was divided by the River Volturnus) against the Enemy. If they had run away with the goods, and pretended, that these of Casiline were as the rest of the Campanes, all Traitors; they themselves might have bin reputed, as no better than the Mamertines. But their constancy in defence of the place witnesseth, upon what honest reasons they surprisid it. Hannibal came thither, thinking to have encountered with greater forces: but these few found him more worke than he expected. Divers assaults he gave, but was still repelled with losse: and many sallies they made, with variable event. The Enemy mined; and they countermined: opposing so much industry to his force, that he was driven to close them up, and seeke to winne them by famine. T. Sempronius Gracchus, that was Master of the horse, lay with the Roman Army higher up the River: who faime would have relieved Casiline, but that the Dictator, being gone to Rome about some matters of Religion, had given him expresse charge not to fight till his returne. Marcellus from Suessula could not come: his way being stopped by the overflowings of Volturnus; the Nolans also beseeching him not to leave them, who were in danger of the Campanes, if he departed. Thus it is reported: but if the water stayed his journey, such entreaties were needlesse. Neither is it like that the Dictator tarried at Rome so long, as till extreme famine had consumed the Garrison in Casiline. Wherefore it may be thought, that the Towne was lost, because the Romans durst not adventure to raise the siege. Barrels of corne were sent by night, floating down the River; and when some of these, being carried awry by an Eddie of the water, stucke among the Willows on the bank, whereby this manner of reliefe was discovered and prevented; Gracchus cast a great quantity of Nuts into the streame, which faintly sustained the poore besieged men. At length when all food was spent, and whatsoever grew greene under the Wall was gathered for Sallers, the Carthaginians ploughed up the ground; whereon the besieged presently sowed Rape-seede. Hannibal seeing this, admired their patience; and said, That he meant not to stay at Casiline untill the Rapes were grown. Wherefore, though hitherto he had refused to hearken unto any Composition, as intending to make them an example to all others, by punishing their obstinacy; yet now he was content, to grant them their lives at an indifferent ranfom; which when they had paid, he quietly dismissed them, according to his promise. Seven hundred Carthaginians he placed in Casiline, as a Garrison for defence of the Campanes; unto whom he restored it. To the Prætorine Souldiers great thanks were given, and loving rewards; among which they had offer, in regard of their vertue, to be made Citizens of Rome. But their present condition pleased them so well, that they chose rather to continue, as they were in Prætorie: which is no weake proofe, of the good estate wherein the Cities flourished, that were subject to the Roman Government. This siege of Casiline was not a little beneficiall to the Romans; as having long detained Hannibal, and consumed much of his time, that might otherwise have bin better spent. For Winter overtook him long before he could dispatch the businesse: which how to quit with his honour he knew not, when he was once engaged. Therefore he wintered at Capua: where he refreshed his Army, or rather corrupted it, as all Historians report, and made it effeminate; though, effeminate as it was, He therewithall did often beat the Romans in following times, as shall appeare hereafter.

Of the great supply that was decreed at Carthage to be sent to Hannibal into Italie. How by the malice of Hanno, and sloth or parsimony of the Carthaginians, the supply was too long deferred. That the riches of the Carthaginians grew faster, than of the Romans. Of Fabius and other old Roman Historians how partiall they were in their writings.

When Mago, the son of Amilcar, had spent some time about the taking in of such Italians, as fell from the Romans after the battell at Canna; his brother Hannibal sent for him to Capua, and thence dispatched him away to Carthage, with the joyfull message of Victory. He told the Carthaginian Senate with how many Roman Generals his brother had fought, what Consuls he had chased, wounded, or slaine; how the stout Romans, that in the former war never shunned any occasion of fight, were now growne so calme, that they thought their Dictator Fabius the onely good Captaine, because he never durst adventure to come to battell; That, not without reason, their spirits were thus abated, since Hannibal had slaine of them above two hundred thousand, and taken above fifty thousand prisoners. He further told them of the Brutians, Apulians, Samnites, Lucans, and other people of Italy, that following the fortune of those great victories, had revolted unto the Carthaginians. Among the rest hee magnified Capua, as a goodly Citie, and fit to be not onely (as already it was) Head of all the Capuans, but the chiefe seat of their Dominion in Italie: and there he informed them, how lovingly his brother had bin entertained, where he meant to rest that winter, attending their supply. As for the war, He said it was even at an end, if they would now pursue it closely, and not give the Romans any breathing time, wherein to re-collect themselves, and repair their broken forces. He willed them to consider, that the war was far from home, in the Enemies Countrey; that so many battells had much diminished his brothers Armie: that the Souldiers, who had so well deserved, ought to be considered with liberall rewards; and that it was not good to burden their new Italian friends, with exactions of money, corne, and other necessaries; but that these things must be sent from Carthage; which the victory would requite with large amends. Finally, hee caused the golden rings, taken from the fingers of the Roman Knights that were slaine, to be powred out openly in the Court: which being measured, filled (as some say) three bushels; or (as others would rather have it) no more than one; adding, that by this might appeare the greatnesse of the Roman calamity, for as much as none but the * principal of that order, were accustomed to wear that ornament.

Who so considers the former Punicke warre, may easily find, that the State of Carthage never did receive, in all the durance thereof, any such hopefull advertisements from their Capitaines abroad. Wherefore it is no marvell, if the errand of Mago found extraordinary welcome. In the vehemency of this joy, Himilco, a Senator adverse to the faction of Hanno, is said to have demanded of that great perswader unto peace with Rome,

Wh ether quiet,

* Thus Livie reports it; and credible it is, that while Rome was poore, the bravery of private men was not altogether so great, as the Law would have permitted, though otherwise Jun. Amm. The wearing of the King, was the generall privilege of the Roman K.

Whether he were still of opinion, that Hannibal should be yeelded up unto the Romans; or whether he would forbid them to give thanks unto the gods, for their good success. Hereunto though it be not likely that Hanno made the same formal answer, which Livie puts into his mouth, calling the Carthaginian Senators Parres conscripti, by a terme proper to the Romans; and putting them in minde of his owne shamefull overthrow received at the Ilands Ægæis: yet the summe of his speech appeares to have been no lesse malicious than it is set downe, forasmuch as Hannibal himselfe, at his departure out of Italie, exclaimed against the wickednesse of this Hanno; saying, that his hatred against the Barchines, had oppressed their Familie, when otherwise it could not, with the ruine of Carthage. Therefore it may well be, that he made such a jest of these victories, as is reported; saying, It ill befel them well, who had vanquished the Romans; to call for more help as if he had been beaten; or him, that had taken their camp, filled forsooth with spoile, to make request for meat and mony. To these cavils, if answer were needfull, it might be said, That other booty than of horses and slaves, little was to be found in the Roman campe: the best of the Souldiers carrying no other wealth into the field, than a few silver studs in the bridles and trappings of their horses. If Hannibal had taken any maine convoy of mony and provisions, going to supply all wants of a great army in some other Province, (as the two Scipio's are afterwards said to have done, when they wan the campe of Asdrubal, that carried along with him all the wealth of Spain, in his journey towards Italie) then might such an objection more justly have bin made unto his demand of a supply. But the most likely part of Hanno his Oration, and where in he best might hope to prevail, contained a perswasion to use their fortune with moderation; and now to seeke peace, whilest they had so much the better in war.

What would have bin the issue of this counsell, if it had bin followed, it were not easie to say. For though it be likely, that the Roman pride would have brooked much indignity, in freeing Italy from the danger of war; yet it is not likely, that the faith, so often broken to the Carthaginians in former times, would have bin kept entire, when any opinion of good advantage had called for revenge of so many shamefull overthrowes; since after this war ended, and a new league concluded, no submissive behaviour could preserve Carthage from ruine, longer, than untill such time as Rome was at leisure from all other wars. This counsell therefore of Hanno, though it might seeme temperate, was indeed very pestilent; and served onely to hinder the performance of a noble resolution. For it was concluded by a maine consent of the Senate, that forty thousand Numidians, forty Elephants, and great abundance of silver, should be sent over to Hannibal: and that, besides these, twenty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, should be levied in Spain; not onely to supply, as need should require, the Armies in that Province, but to be transported into Italie.

This great aide, had it bene as carefully sent, as it was readily decreed, the Roman Historians would not have found cause, to tax the retchlesse improvidence of Hannibal, in forbearing to march directly from Cannæ to Rome, or in refreshing his Armie among the delights of Capua: the next yeeres worke would have finished the businesse, with lesse dangerous adventure; and the pleasures, which his men enjoyed among the Campanes, would have been commended, as rewards by him well thought upon, wherewith to animate both them and others, that were to be employed in the following Warre. But either the too much carelesnesse of those, that were loth to make haste in laying out their money, before extreme necessity required it; or the crafty malice of Hanno, and his fellows, working upon the private humours of men, that had more feeling of their owne commodity, than sense of the publike need; utterly perverted, and made unprofitable in the performance, the order that had bene so well set down. The Elephants were sent: and some money peradventure, uncertaine it is how long after. But those great forces of three score thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, came not into Italy, till much was lost of that which already had been gotten, and a great part of the old Carthaginian Armie, was first consumed by time, and sundry accidents of warre. Onely some small numbers, no way answering unto the proportion decreed, were sent into Spain; and the journey of Asdrubal thence through France into Italie much talked of, but he not enabled thereunto, till many yeeres were past, and the Romans had recovered their strength.

Here wee may note, what great riches the Carthaginians drew into their Citie, both by the Tributes received from their subjects, and by their wealthy Trade of Merchandize. For it is not long, since the Warre of the Mercenaries, and the perfidious tyranny of the Romans, extorting in time of greatest necessitie twelve hundred talents; had exceedingly impoverished Carthage: which was before brought into great want, even by the expence of so much money, as was to be disbursed for redeeming of peace, after the losse at Ægæis. Yet we see, what great Armies of Numidians, and Spaniards, besides those already on foot, are appointed to the service in Italie, and how little the Carthaginians feare the want of money in these chargeable undertakings: whereas the Romans, on the other side, having three or foure yeeres together bene forced to some extraordinary cost, are faine to goe upon credit, even for the price of those slaves, which they bought of their owne Citizens to arme for their defence. Such advantage, in meanes to enrich their Treasury, had the wealthy Merchants of Carthage, trading in all parts of the Mediterranean Sea, even from Tyrrus their Mother-Citie in the bottome of the streights unto the great Ocean, above the Romans: who lived on the fruits of their ground, and received their Tributes from people following the same course of life. When time therefore was come, that the hatred of Rome found leisure to shew it selfe, in the destruction of Carthage; the impudence of Roman falsehood, in seeking an honest colour wherewith to shadow the intended breach of faith, discovered plainly whence the jealousie was bred, that this mighty City would againe rebell. For the Carthaginians, having given up hostages, even before the Roman Army did set forth, to perform whatsoever should be enjoyed them, with condition, that their City might not be destroyed; and having accordingly, when they were so required, yeelded up all their weapons, and engines of Warre; the Romans told them plainly, That the Citie of Carthage, which was the body of the Citizens, should be friendly dealt withall, but the Towne must needs be demolished, and removed into some other place, that should be twelve miles distant from the Sea. For (said the Romans) This Trade of Merchandize, by which ye now live, is not so fit for peaceable men, such as ye promise to become hereafter, as is the Trade of Husbandry; an wholesome kind of life, and enduing men with many laudable qualities, which enable their bodies, and make them very apt for conversation. This villainous dealing of the Romans, though sugred with glossing words, plainly shewes, what good observation the elder Cato had made of the hastic growth of Carthage in riches. For, when being demanded his opinion in the Senate about any matter whatsoever it were, he added still this conclusion, Thus I thinke; and thus Carthage should be destroyed; Hee may seeme, not onely to have had regard unto that present wealth, which at his being there he had found in the City, but much more unto these times, and the great height whereunto it rose, even suddenly as we see, out of many calamities, whilest the Romans thought, that it had not bin in case to dare so terrible a War.

But as the Carthaginians, in gathering wealth, were more industrious and skilfull than the Romans; so came they far short of them in the honourable care of the publike good: having every one, or most of them, a more principall regard of his owne private benefit. This made them (besides the negligence commonly found in victors) when the first heat of their affection (wherein they concluded to pursue the war strongly) was over-past, goe more leisurely to worke, than had bin requisite in the execution. It was easie for Hanno to perswade covetous men, that they should first of all defend their own in Spain. This might be done with little charges. Afterwards, when that Province was secured, they might send an Army into Italie; so going to worke orderly by degrees. For it were no wisdom to commit all the strength of the Common-wealth to one hazzard of fortune, against the enemies; or (which perhaps were worse) to the government of an ambitious man, and his brethren; who having once (if they could so doe) finished the warre, might easily make

* Hannibal a King, and subdue Carthage, with the forces that they had given him to the conquest of Rome.

By such malicious working of Hanno, and by their owne slacknesse, incredulity, dulnes, or nigardize, the Carthaginians were perswaded rather to make small disbursements in Spain, than to set up all their rest at once in Italy. Yet was it indeed impossible, to hold a Countrey of so large extent, and so open a coast as that of Spain, free from all incursions of the Enemy: especially the affection of the Naturals being (as in a new Conquest) ill established. A better way therefore it had bene, to make a running Warre; by which the Romans might have bin found occupied, even with the ordinary Carthaginian Garrisons, or some little addition thereunto. For if it were thought meet, to defer the prosecution of their maine intendment against Rome it self, untill such time as every little thorne were pulled out of the sides of so great a Province, then must Emporie have been besieged and forced: which, by reason of alliance with the Masilians, gave unto the Romans, at all times when they pleased, a ready and secure Harbour. But the towne of Emporie was too strong to be wonne in haste: it had long defended it selfe against the Barbarians; having not above foure hundred paces of wall to the main Land, and exceedingly well fortified; a great Spanish Town of the same name, lying without it, that was three miles in compasse, very strong likewise, and friend unto the Gracians, though not over-much trusted. Wherefore to force this towne of Emporie, that was, besides the proper strength, like to be so well assisted by the Masilians, Romans, and some Spaniards, would have bin a worke of little lesse difficulty, than was the Roman warre (in appearance) after the battell at Canna: yea, it had bin in effect none other, than to alter the seate of the warre; which Hannibal had already fixed, with better judgement, neere unto the gates of Rome. The difficulty of this attempt, being such as caused it altogether to be forborne; great folly it was, to be much troubled about expelling the Romans utterly out of Spain: whom they might more easily have diverted thence, and drawne home to their owne doores, by making strong war upon their Citie. For even so the Romans afterwards removed Hannibal into Africk, by sending an Army to Carthage; and by taking the like course, they now endeavoured to change the seate of the warre, transferring it out of Italy into Spain. But the private affections of men, regarding the common good no otherwise, than as it is necessary to their owne purposes, did make them easily winke at opportunities, and hope, that somewhat would fall out well of it selfe, though they set not too their helping hands. Hanno was a malicious wretch: yet they that thought him so, were well enough contented to hearken unto his discourages, as long as they were plausible, and tended to keepe the purse full. In the meane while they suffered Hannibal, and all the noble house of Amilcar, to weary themselves in travell for the Common-wealth: which all Carthage in generall highly commended, but weakly assisted; as if the industry of these Barbines had bin somewhat more than needfull. Surely the Carthaginians, in generall, were far lesse honourable than the people of Rome; not only in government of their subject Provinces, but in administration of their own estate; few of them preferring the respect of the Weale publike above their private interest. But as they thrived little in the end, by their parsimony used toward their own Mercenaries, when the former Roman warre was finished: so the conclusion of this war present, will make them complaine, with feeling sighes, of their negligence in supplying Hannibal after the victory at Canna; when gladly they would give all their Treasures, to redeem the opportunity, that now they let passe, as if it were cost enough to send a few handfulls into Spain.

Bell.

That both the Spanish businesse, and the state of Africk it selfe, depended wholly, or for the most part, upon successe of things in Italy, the course of actions following will make manifest. Particularly, how matters were ordered in Spain by the Carthaginian Governours, it is very hard, and almost impossible, to set downe. For, though we must not reprehend, in that worthy Historian Livie, the tender love of his owne Countrey, which made him give credit unto Fabius and others: yet must we not, for his sake, believe those lies, which the unpartiall judgement of Polybius hath condemned, in the Writers that gave them originall. It were needlesse to rehearse all that may be found in Polybius, concerning the untruth of that Roman Historian Fabius. One example may suffice. He saith of Amilcar and his men at Eryx, in the former war, That, having cleane spent their strength, and being even broken with many miseries, they were glad to submit themselves unto the Romans. Contrary hereunto we finde in the life of Amilcar, set downe by Æmilius Probus, That Eryx was in such fort held by the Carthaginians, that it seemed to be in as good condition, as if in those parts there had not been any war. These words, being referred to the brave resolution of the Carthaginian Souldiers, and the singular vertue of their Generall, insufling such spirit into them, may be taken as not over liberall. For in the treaty of peace betweene Amilcar and Caulus when the Roman first of all required, that this Garrison of Eryx should lay downe their Armes and forsake Sicily, threatening, that otherwise hee would not talke of any composition.

A milit.

Amilcar boldly bad him chuse, whether he would talke of it or no; for that the Armes which his Country had put into his hands to use against her Enemies, it was not his purpose to yeeld up unto them. Now since the Romans, contrary to their custome upon like advantages, were content to let Amilcar have his wil, & not to stand with him upon point of honour, whilst otherwise they might quietly rid their hands of him; plaine enough it is, that they were farre from thinking him a man consumed with miseries, as Fabius would have him seeme. Hereunto agrees the relation of Polybius: who flatly, and by name, chargeth Fabius with untruth, saying, that howsoever Amilcar and his Souldiers had endured all extremity, yet they behaved themselves as men that had no sence thereof; and were as far from being either vanquished or tired, as were their Enemies. Such being the difference betweene Fabius (as also perhaps between other old Writers of the Roman story) & those that had more regard of truth, than of flattering the mighty city of Rome: we must take it in good part, that howsoever Livie introduceth Hanno, in one place, joining very foolishly his own shame full overthrow at the Islands * Ægates, with the great services of Amilcar at Eryx, as if both of them had had a like event; yet elsewhere he forbeareth not to put a more likely tale (though with as impudent a commemoration of his own unhappy conduct) into the same Hanno his mouth, making him say, That the affairs of Carthage went never better, than a little before the losse of their Fleet in that battell at Sea: wherein himselfe was Generall. Now, concerning the doings of the Scipio's in Spain, there is cause to wish, that this Fabius, with Val. Antius, & others of the like stamp, had either written (if they could not write more temperately) nothing at all; or that the tender affection of Livie to his Rome, had not caused him to think too well of their relations; which are such as follow.

§. XI.

Strange reports of the Roman victories in Spain, before Asdrubal the son of Amilcar followed thence his brother Hannibal into Italie.

It hath bin shewed already, how P. Cornelius Scipio the Consul, returning from Gaul into Italy, so encounter with Hannibal at his descent from the Alps, sent before him his brother Cneus, with part of his Fleet and Army, into Spain. Two Roman Legions, with foureteene thousand foot of the Confederates, and twelve hundred horse, had been allotted unto the Consul, therewith to make war in Spain against Hannibal: who, since he was marching into Italy with the strength of his Army, P. Scipio beleaved, that a good part of these his own forces might well be spared from the Spanish Expedition; & therefore made bold to carry some of the number back with him, sending on his brother with the rest, as his Lievtenant. Publius himselfe remained in Italy all the time of his Consulship: which being expired, he was sent Proconsul into Spain by the Senate, with an Army of feight thousand men, and a Fleet of thirty Gallies.

The Acts of these two Brethren in their Province, were very great; and, as they are reported, somewhat marvellous. For they continually prevailed in Spain, against the Carthaginians: whom they vanquished in so many battels, and withdrew from their Alliance so many of the Spaniards their Confederates; that we have cause to wonder, how the enemy could so often find means to repaire his forces, and returne strong into the field. But as the Romans, by pretending to deliver the Country from the tyranny of Carthage, might easily win unto their Confederacy, as many as were galled with the African yoke, and durst adventure to breake it: so the ancient reputation of the first Conquerors might serve to arme the Naturals against these Invaders; and to reclaime those, that had revolted unto the Romans, were it only by the memory of such ill successe, as the like rebellions in former times had found. Hereto may be added the Carthaginian Treasure: which easily raised Souldiers, among those valiant, but (in that Age) poore, and gold-thirsty Nations. Neither was it of small importance, that so many of the Spaniards had their children, kinsmen, and friends, abroad with Hannibal in his Italian Wars; or serving the Carthaginians in Africk. And peradventure, if we durst be bold to say it, the victories of the Scipio's, were neither so many, nor so great, as they are set out by Livie. This we may be bold to say, That the great Captaine Fabius, or Livie in his person, maketh an objection unto Scipio, which neither Scipio, nor Livie for him, doth doth answer, That if Asdrubal were vanquished, as Scipio would say, by him in Spain: strange it was, and as little to his honour, as it had been extremely dangerous to Rome, that the same vanquished man should invade Italy. And it is indeed an incredible narration, That Asdrubal, being enclosed on all sides, and not knowing how to escape out of battell; have onely by the steep descent of Rockes, over a great River that lay at his backe, ran away with all his money, Elephants, and broken troupes, over Tagus, directly towards the Pyrenees, and so toward Italy, upon which he fell with more than threefore thousand armed souldiers. Neither doe I see, how it hangs well together, That hee chose a piece of ground very defensible, but most incommodious for his retreat, if he should happen to be vanquished; and yet, that hee sent all his money and Elephants away before him, as not intending to abide the enemy: Or how it could be true, that these his Elephants, being so sent before, could hinder the Romans (for so have they said to have done in the last battell between him and Scipio) from breaking into his Campe. Wherefore we can no more than be sorry, that all Carthaginian records of this Warre, and Spanish, (if there were any) being utterly lost, we can know no more thereof, than what it hath pleased the Romans to tell us: unto whom it were no wisdom to give too much credit. In this regard, I will summarily run over the doings of the Scipio's in Spain; not greatly insifting on particulars, whereof there is no great certainty.

Cn. Cornelius landed at Emporia, an Haven towne, not farre within the Pyrenees, retaining still the same name with little infection. That by the fame of his clemencie hee assured many Nations to become subject unto Rome, as the storie begins of him, I could easily beleve, if I understood by what occasion they had need to use his clemency, or he to give such famous example thereof, being a meere stranger, and having no justification in the Countrey. Yet it is certain, that he was a man very courteous, and one that could well insinuate himselfe into the love of the Barbarians; among whom, his dexterity in practice had the better successe, for that hee seemed to have none other errand, than setting them at liberty. This pretext availed with some: others were to be hired with money: and some hee compelled to yeeld by force or feare; especially, when hee had won a battell against Hanno. Into all Treaties of accord, made with these people, likely it is, that hee remembered to insert this Article, which the Romans in their Alliances never forgate, unlesse in long times past, and when they dealt with the Carthaginians, or their Superiors; Majestatem Pop. Rom. comiseri conservent, which is, as Tullie interprets it, That they should gently (or kindly) uphold the Majesty of the People of Rome. This was in appearance nothing troublesome: yet implied it indeed an obscure covenant of subjection. And in this respect it may be true, That the Spaniards became diuinitis Romanis; of the Roman jurisdiction; though hereafter they will say, they had no such meaning. That part of the Countrey wherein Scipio landed, was newly subdued by Hannibal in his passage toward Italy; and therefore the more easily shaken out of obedience. Particularly in the Barguins; Hannibal had found at his coming among them, such an apprehension of the Roman greatnesse, as made him suspect, that any light occasion would make them start from the Carthaginians. Wherefore hee not onely appointed Hanno Governour over them, as over the rest of the Province betwene Iberus and the Pyrenees, but made him also their Lord; that is, (as I conceive; for I doe not thinke he gave the Principality of their Countrey unto Hanno and his Heires,) He made him not onely Lieutenant-generall over them, in matters of Warre, and things concerning the holding them in obedience to Carthage; but tooke from them all inferiour Officers of their owne, leaving them to be governed by Hanno at his discretion. These therefore had good cause to rejoyce at the coming of Scipio: with whom others also (no doubt) found reasons to joyne; it being the custome of all conquered Nations, in hatred of their present Lords, to throw themselves indiscreetly into the protection of others, that many times prove worse than the former. So were the Neapolitans, and Milanais, in the age of our Grand-fathers, weary by turnes of the Spaniards and French; as more sensible still of the present evill which they felt, than regardfull of the greater mischiefe, whereinto they ran by seeking to avoid it. This bad affection of his Province, would not suffer Hanno to temporize. Ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, Hannibal had left unto him: besides which, it is like, that some forces he was able to raise out of his Province. Therefore hee adventured a battell with Scipio; wherein hee was overthrowne and taken. Following this victory, Scipio besieged Stilsum, a towne hard by, and wonne
